"A Catalogue of thoſe antient cities of Britain was tranſcribed and tranſmitted by that very antient writer Ninnius[5], who was a monk in the monaſtery of Bangor, and lived about the year 620; amongſt which we find Cair-Lerion, interpreted by Alfred of Beverley, Henry Huntingdon, and all Hiſtorians and Antiquaries, to be our Leiceſter. Now we muſt know, that Leiceſter is ſituate upon the river, antiently called Legra or Leir, and now Soar: and alſo, that about the year of the world 3110, there was a king reigning in this iſland called Leir, being one of the deſcendants from Brute, and the tenth from him; and this Leir is ſaid to have built Leiceſter: and hence the variety of conjectures have come, whether this place took its name from the river whereon it is ſeated, or from king Leir, reputed to have been the builder of it. Leland[6], and from him our countryman Mr. Burton[7], thinks it ſo called from the river Cair-Lerion, ſignifying as much as the city ſtanding upon the river Leir. And William of Malmeſbury[8] deſcribes it thus: "Leiceſter is an "antient City in the midland of England, ſo called "from the river Legra running by it." Indeed there is a town in this county that is called Lear or Leir, ſtanding about the head of this river, from whence moſt probably it is that it took that name, it being very uſual for rivers to give denomination to towns ſituate upon them[9]: as Derby took its name from the river Derwent; Dove from the river of that name; Colcheſter from Colne; Lancaſter from Lune; Ribblecheſter from the river Ribble; and many others the like. Now if this river baptized the place by this name, then we are at a great loſs for the time of its birth, not knowing to what age, or to what original, to aſſign it. But if it was firſt built by king Leir, as Geoffrey of Monmouth[10] ſays, and as others think, and took its name from him as ſuch a parent, and Cair-Lerion then ſignifying the city of king Leir, then we may give ſomewhat a near gueſs at its age; for Leir reigning here, as it is ſaid before, about the year 3110, upon the reputation of Geoffrey, it will appear to take its date about 1000 years before the birth of Chriſt, and about the time of Amaſiah and Jeroboam, kings of Judah and Iſrael[11]. And, for our purpoſe, let me only further note, that in that Catalogue of Ninnius, the word Cair is præpoſed to all the cities names, this word Cair in the Britiſh tongue ſignifying a city[12]; and Caius[13] ſays, that Cair ſignifies a city in the Trojan language, the native language of Brute and his company; and the notation of this ſeems to ſome to appear alſo in the Grand Cairo of Egypt; and alſo in Carthage itſelf, which, in the Phœnician language, ſignifies the New

---

[1] In "The Hiſtory and Antiquities of the antient Town and once City of Leiceſter. By Thomas Staveley, Eſq; "Steward of the Borough of Leiceſter." The Author's original MS. which Mr. Peck once intended to publiſh under the title of "Ratæ Antiquæ & Novæ," is now before us; as is alſo a later Hiſtory by Mr. Carte. Both theſe will be incorporated in the preſent work.

[2] De Primord. fol. 57.

[3] "Britannia viginti et octo civitatibus quondam nobiliſſimis erat inſignita." Eccl. Hiſt. lib. i. cap. 1.

[4] "Britannia decorata bis denis, biſque quaternis civitatibus." De Excid. Brit.

[5] De Urbib. Brit.

[6] Coll. II. p. 373.

[7] Leiceſterſhire, fol. 160.

[8] De Geſt. Pontif. Angl. lib. iv. fol. 289.—"As mar, mer, and mor, ſignified anciently water as well as ſea; ſo did likewiſe the word Lyr, whence Lyr and Léri in Cardiganſhire, and Loire in France." Mr. E. Lhwyd, MS.—Hence may the name of Leiceſter be deduced from the river that runs by it, now called Soar, but antiently Liar, or Ligur. Carte.

[9] Camd. Brit.

[10] Lib. i. cap. 15.

[11] Helvic. Chronol. p. 50.

[12] "An incloſure, whether of wood or ſtone, might be called Caer, from the Celtic or old Britiſh word Can; and that perhaps from the Hebrew word Gaiaph, to fence or encloſe; which, with ſubmiſſion, I rather take to be its true etymon, than Kir or Kiriah, a Wall or City." Rowland's Mona Antiqua reſtaurata, p. 29.

[13] De Antiq. Cantab. lib. i.

City; and if our Cair-Lerion[1] upon this account claims any alliance with its nameſake Carthage[2], ſurely it may boaſt in a felicity of duration far beyond it, as ſurviving the noble Carthage, long ago buried in its own ruins, at which an excellent Poet[3] glanceth thus:

—— "Qua devictæ Carthaginis arces
Procubuere, jacentque infauſto in littore turres
Everſæ. Quantum illa metus, quantum illa laborum
Urbs dedit inſultans Latio, & Laurentibus arvis?
Nunc paſſim vix reliquias, vix nomina ſervans,
Obruitur propriis non agnoſcenda ruinis.
Et querimur, genus infelix! humana labare
Membra ævo, cum regna palam moriantur, et urbes.

"So wealthy Carthage walls did fall before,
And ruin'd bulwarks on that hapleſs ſhore.
What fearful wars, what dangers might ſhe boaſt
To cauſe to Rome and the Laurentian coaſt?
Now ſcarce her relics or her name are known,
Nor the uncertain ruins of that Town.
And we complain of our ſad lives ſhort date,
When realms and cities periſh by like fate."

"But now, to return to our Cair-Lerion, concerning the original thereof, whether it be the city on the river Leir, or the city of king Leir, I leave every man to the liberty of his own conjecture; whilſt we may very certainly and infallibly conclude, that it is of a very antient ſtanding, beyond the reach of any intelligence now extant, as to its original, other than that alliance which it claims to king Leir, for the reaſons aforeſaid. Wwhenſoever, or by whomſoever built, it flouriſhed a long while in the Britains time, by the name of Cair-Lerion; after which, in the time of the Romans, according to the opinion of Mr. Camden, founded on very good inducements, and not hitherto contradicted by any good Antiquary, it was called Ratæ; next, by the Saxons, Legeceſtria; and the other variations before named; and laſtly, as it is now called, Leiceſter.

"For its ſtate in the time of the Romans, it ſeems to have been very conſiderable, and of no ſmall import; being ſituate upon one of their great military highways, called the Foſs. Being ſeated almoſt in the centre of the land, moſt commodiouſly for intercourſe with their legions, garriſons, and camps; and being itſelf a noted ſtation, or camp-place for their ſoldiers, as well in regard of its convenient ſituation, as divers other conſiderable inſtances, it could not but be much regarded and frequented in the Romans' time. There is an excellent piece of Antiquity, called the Itinerary of Antonine, compoſed by that Emperor, or by his appointment, for the uſe of the Captains and Soldiers, with the Prætors and Proconſuls marching into and through the Provinces, leſt they ſhould miſtake their way, and for expedition and other accommodations; and this contains the removes and diſtances from one ſtation or garriſon to another: and ſo much thereof as concerns Britain conſiſts of ſixteen Itineraries or ſet marches over the Province, from place to place, with the diſtances and number of miles: and here I will give you the particulars of the ſixth ſtage or march in this Itinerary:

Iter a Londinio Lindum M. P.[4] CLVI.; ſic,		The March from London to Lincoln 156 Miles; thus,
VEROLAMIO,	XXI.	Verulam,	21 M.
DUROCOBROVIS,	XII.	Dunſtable,	12
MAGIOVINIO,	XII.	Magiovin,	12
LACTODORO,	XVI.	Stony Stratford,	16
ISANNAVATIA[5],	XII.	Wedon,	12
TRIPONTIO,	XII.	Towceſter,	12
VENNONIS,	IX.	High Croſs, Cleyceſter,	9
RATIS,	XII.	Leiceſter,	12
VEROMETO,	XIII.	Burrow,	13
MARGIDUNO,	XIII.	Belvoir,	13
AD PONTEM,	VII.	Paunton,	7
CROCOCALANA,	VII.	Ancaſter,	7
LINDO,	XII.	Lincoln,	12

"By which ſtages, or march, it may be obſerved, that the Romans took not always the next and direct way, but kept in their old military tract, wheeling about for their own ſecurity and convenience; and ſo made their fartheſt way about oftentimes the neareſt way home. Our learned Antiquary[6], and after him a late Commentator on this Itinerary[7], are much troubled to find out Durocobrovium, and Magiovinium, mentioned in this march; ſometimes they pitch upon Redbourn and Dunſtable; but then the diſagreeing of miles makes them not hit right; for which there is no other cure but the preſumption of the miſtakes of ſcribes and typographers in the ſetting down the numeral letters, which too frequently hath happened in ſuch caſes. In which march, you ſee, we come to Ratæ, or Ratas, certainly the name for Leiceſter in thoſe days[8]; and that by reaſon of its ſituation upon the military Foſs way, and the true proportion of diſtance that it holds between Vennones, now High Croſs, or Cleybrook, an old town near it; and Verometum, which was a noted ſtation on the other ſide, at the town now called Burrow, where, at the place called Burrow-hills, are ſtill the remains or veſtigia of a very great fort or camp-place; and this old name Ratæ twinkles a little, as Mr. Camden conceives, in Radikes or Rawdikes, as if ſhould be meant thereby the rampire or ditch of the Ratæ: probably a ſort of ſoldiers of that agnomination, but whether from their country, weapons, diſcipline, or other caſual occurrence, now uncertain; for it is more than probable, that that huge ditch, rampire, or trench, ſo called[9], without the South gate of Leiceſter, was made for ſome defence to the Roman camp, or ſtation there ſet; and a ſtupendous work it ſeems to have been, which I can never view without paying a due reſpect, as well to the memory of the Romans, as to their ſingular and unexampled induſtry and ingenuity, in compaſſing and erecting ſuch vaſt and laſting monuments, the very relicks of which, even in their moſt deformed ruins, move reverence and aſtoniſhment in the beholders, whilſt the vulgar celebrate them as the works of giants."

In 1752 a ſurvey of theſe collateral mounds was taken from eleven different places by Mr. William Lee, of Leiceſter, who thus reports to Dr. Stukeley:

"At the end neareſt the town of Leiceſter,

Breadth acroſs the top.	Breath acroſs the bottom.
1. 22 yards 1 foot.	1. 14 yards 3 inches.
2. 20 yards 18 inches.	2. 12 yards 5 inches.
3. 20 yards 1 foot.	3. 12 yards.
4. 20 yards.	4. 13 yards.
5. 22 yards.	5. 14 yards 2 feet.
6. 22 yards 18 inches.	6. 10 yards 1 foot.
7. 26 yards.	7. 9 yards.
8. 26 yards 18 inches.	8. 11 yards 2 feet.
9. 23 yards.	9. 11 yards 1 foot.
10. 24 yards.	10. 10 yards 2 feet.
11. 24 yards.	11. 12 yards 2 feet.

"Length within the banks, 634 yards and 2 feet: breadth within the banks at bottom 15 yards 10 inches; breadth from top to top 17 yards[10].

---

[1] Jo. Twine, Com. Brit. lib. ii.

[2] Solin. Polyhiſt. cap. 27.

[3] Jac. Sannazarius de partu Virginis, lib. ii.

[4] Mille paſſus, or miles.

[5] Lege, Bennavena.

[6] Camden.

[7] Burton, Comm. Itin. Antonini.

[8] Though Mr. Camden, in his ſecond edition, was inclined to place the ſtation of Ratæ at Ratby, a village about three miles diſtant, where there are ſtill remains of a camp (which will be noticed under Ratby); there can be no doubt that Leiceſter was the RATÆ of Antoninus, ΡΑΤΑΙ of Ptolemy, &c. by ſome derived from Rhedyn, fern, which Dioſcorides ſays is called in Celtic Ratis, in Iriſh Raith. See Gough's Camden, vol. II. p. 209. Some Fern, it has been obſerved, grows hereabouts; but in general the ſtrong ſoil of Leiceſterſhire is much better ſuited to Gorſs and Furze.

[9] Mr. Thomas Roberts, of Leiceſter, who furniſhed Dr. Stukeley with the fourth ſketch here re-engraved in Plate I. ſays, "I dare not put any title, or give any reaſon for the uſe or intention of the ſaid work; but only inform you that it now continues 36 feet (all the way) wide in the bottom; about 76 feet at the top; and at the S. W. end 16 feet deep. From the South-gate to the outmoſt end of the town, called St. James's Chapel, is 1600 feet. And from St. James's Chapel to the N. E. end of Rawdike is 2180 feet."

[10] "Rather 23." W. STUKELEY.

"The breadth of the top of each bank is about 8 feet the whole length."

The following admeaſurement, from the ſpot where the banks were higheſt, and in every reſpect moſt regular and leaſt impaired, was taken in 1787 by the late Mr. Bickerſtaffe, with the aſſiſtance of Mr. Roſs:

"From the centre of the top of the bank, on the Soar ſide, or North-weſt, the ſlope is twenty-eight links of the meaſuring chain. Twelve links and a half perpendicular height, on the Soar ſide. Thirty-eight links internal ſlope on the other ſide of the ridge or ſame bank. The breadth of the bottom, or ſpace between the parallel ridges from ſlope to ſlope, forty-one links. The height of the other hill-ſlope or mound oppoſite, internal, on the Knighton hill ſide, parallel to that on the Soar ſide, forty-one links, South-eaſt. On the Knighton hill ſide, the ſlope of the mound is but twenty-one links, meaſuring from the middle of the ridge or mound at top; terminating or rather interſecting a very large field, near the bottom of the eaſy deſcent or declivity from Knighton hill. Humoured by this natural declivity, it is an excellent retreat from the very ſpacious South field, including the inconſiderable riſe of Knighton hill, whoſe back ground is a fine continuation of ſurface, all convenient for an army of horſe or foot, or horſe cars.

"The whole length of the Rawdykes is 667 yards, one foot 6 inches; and they are not 500 paces from the South gate, ſays Camden. He muſt mean that gate by the ſecond magazine, which makes part of the breach, and was ſtrictly South from the town; for the other gate, though called South, was South-eaſt, and at a much greater diſtance than 500 paces from the Raw or Roman dykes; which are upon the edge of the meadows, about half a mile to the South of Leiceſter; and though at bottom they are chiefly in the interval with the field, they do not preſent a ſide to the town, but to the Soar in its progreſs to Leiceſter, opening towards the Infirmary cloſe, and could neither be an offence or defence to the town, but may rather countenance the conjecture that it was a curſus. If Bensford bridge, however, in its firſt ſyllable alludes to Bennones, as abbreviated by Camden, there is leſs force and diminution in calling the Roman dykes, or corruptly Rawdykes, the paſſage over the firſt mound or line of the ridges or aggeres; for there is no ſuch depth in the intermediate ſpace, if any, below the common ſurface, to merit the name of trench or ditch.

"The late alderman Phipps, about the year 1760, aſſiſted by the military then in Leiceſter, began to mutilate the dykes, by ſubducing part of one ridge to the extent of 163 paces, parallel with the dyke on the Weſt, at an eaſy diſtance from the main river; an abridgement attended with ſome loſs to the community, as a monument of antiquity, and an eminence of double ridges or aggeres, which interſects and is interſected by the race-ground, of which it commands a compleat proſpect on both ſides.

"The Rawdykes reduced are two yards deep; the ſolid depth is 13 feet 6 inches; their width 16 yards. From the back ſtyle of Mr. Davie's cloſe to the firſt end of the lowered Rawdyke is 610 yards; from the ſmall Rawdyke neareſt the infirmary to the longeſt end, 315; from thence, on the ſide leveled, 163; from the great dyke, beyond the level, 130; to the beginning of the cut for the race interſecting the dyke, 190."

Mr. Throſby, aſſiſted by Mr. Everard, an ingenious ſchoolmaſter and land-ſurveyor at Braunſton, again examined theſe veſtiges of antiquity in 1792; and finds, that Mr. Lee's admeaſurements are more accurate than Mr. Bickerſtaffe's; the exact length of the whole being 629 yards, 2 feet. A ſketch from this later ſurvey is given in Plate *I; accompanied by a plan of the camp at Ratby, mentioned in p. 4.

Dr. Stukeley was the firſt who ſuggeſted that theſe Rawdykes were the bounds of a Britiſh curſus[1] antecedent to the ſettlement of the Romans; and has illuſtrated his ideas by four different views, which are all copied from the Doctor's ſketches in 1722. And we may readily admit his idea that theſe mounds are actually Britiſh, without danger of wanting proofs in abundance that the Romans were formerly ſettled in Leiceſter and its neighbourhood.

Mr. Brewin, an old man who kept the Rawdyke turnpike, found not long ſince ſome Roman coins near the ſurface of the dyke; and even in the beginning of the laſt century their coins and medals had turned up in great abundance. Mr. Burton had ſeen ſeveral, both in ſilver and copper, of Veſpaſian, Trajan, Hadrian, Antonine, and others; and had ſome of them in his own cabinet.

On the 30th of April, 1717, on Mr. Barwell's building a ſtreet in an antient part of the town, formerly called The Lord's Place[2] (from its being for a century the dwelling of the earls of Huntingdon), in digging the foundation there was found a coin of Conſtantine; and two others ſome days afterwards.

April 1, or 2, 1718, in digging a cellar for a new houſe then erecting by Mr. Noble at the entrance into the White Friars, near the North gate, at about ſix feet underground, there was found an earthen jug, holding about three pints or two quarts, full of antient Roman coin. "The mouth of the jug," Mr. Carte ſays, "lay declining towards the Weſt. The chief of the coin were taken out before I had notice of it; thoſe which I ſaw were a ſort of copper, ſome of them nearly as big as a copper halfpenny, but many of them not much bigger than a ſilver twopence. Upon weighing three parcels of them, I found that ſixteen, eighteen, or twenty, made the weight of an ounce avoirdupoiſe. Among them I obſerved the coins of Titus, Trajan, Diocleſian, Conſtantine the Great, Conſtantine Junior, Conſtantius, Valentinian, Theodoſius, Gratian, Arcadius, and Honorius. The jug was of common materials, and its mouth about an inch in diameter; and there were no urns, or other thing remarkable, found near it. Upon conſidering the circumſtances, I conjecture that it was depoſited in the earth between the year 422, when Honorius died, and 449, when the Saxons firſt came into this iſland; and that either by ſome inhabitant, upon apprehenſion of the approach of the Picts in their incurſions, or by ſome Roman ſoldiers going on one of the two expeditions that were made in that interval for repelling the Picts, who being ſlain, and ſo not returning to take it up again, it remained there till it was diſcovered as above related. Single coins alſo have been found in ſeveral parts of the town, and in the fields about it, eſpecially to the North-weſt ſide near the Foſs-way; and urns and coins in great numbers have been taken up in the brick-works near the Horſe-fair leas, on the South of the town."

Many coins of Conſtantine, with broken urns, a human ſkull, &c. were found, in 1721-2, on the other ſide of the river Soar, in the neighbourhood of Wanlip.

There are few parts of the county, indeed, in which Roman coins have not been brought to light. Near Bensford-bridge and Lutterworth, particularly, a vaſt quantity was found in 1725; of which Dr. Stukeley ſaw, Feb. 9, 1726, in the poſſeſſion of Mr. Walter Reynolds, ſteward to the earl of Denbigh, many of Trajan, Hadrian, Nerva, Veſpaſian, two large braſs Trajans, and many others[3]; which being all of the Higher Empire, and many excellently well cut, indicate that they were hid early, and perhaps about the time that the Watling-ſtreet was made[4].

Six hundred braſs coins, of Diocleſian, Maximian, Maxentius, Conſtantine the Great, &c. were found near the town of Leiceſter in 1730[5].

---

[1] Theſe hippodromes were called in the language of the country rhedagua, the racer rhedagwr, and the carriage rheda. Pownall on the Study of Antiquities, p. 277.

[2] This manſion is frequently mentioned in the town-books. It was purchaſed by Henry earl of Huntingdon in 1569 for 400*l.*; and became the property of the corporation in 1649, when it was referred to the mayor and juſtices "to conſider what ſhall be given to Mr. Garland for his great aſſiſtance about the purchaſe of the great houſe." In 1700 it was agreed to ſell the whole for 500*l.*; and in 1702 it was purchaſed in fee by Simon Barwell, gent. with all the garden, orchards, and appurtenances, for 400*l.* A part of the building is ſtill occupied by Mr. Freer, in which a fine ſtone turret remains, but it has been covered with brick.

[3] Of which a more particular account will be given under the townſhip of Claybrook.

[4] Stukeley, Itin. vol. I. p. 112.

[5] Gough's Camden, vol. II. p. 209; from Gale's MS. in the Minutes of the Society of Antiquaries.

About the year 1788, in digging a well near St. Nicholas's church [1], a ſingle copper coin was found engraved in plate III. fig. 4; a large-featured buſt, perfect; legend, MAXIMIANVS NOB. C. S. On the reverſe, a tall figure, with an altar before him, and emblems of plenty in his hands; at his back a B; inſcription, GENIO POPVLI ROMANI; exergue, P. L. C. 4.

In 1791 a beautiful coin of Nero was found near the Belgrave-gate; one of Fauſtina, ſome time earlier, near the Weſt-bridge; and one of Hadrian in High-ſtreet, on digging the foundation of the King's-arms inn. Theſe ſhall be engraved under the parochial hiſtory of Leiceſter, with a beautiful urn of red clay [2], found in digging for the foundation of the new county-goal, and now in the poſſeſſion of the Rev. Mr. Pigot.

Another indubitable teſtimony of Roman reſidence was diſcovered, in July 1771, at Thurmaſton, by ſome workmen making a new turnpike road from Leiceſter to Melton. Not far from where the preſent Leiceſter road paſſed from Foſs, they found a heap of ſtones ſet in lime, ſo hard as to baffle their eagerneſs to demoliſh it. It had ſerved as a baſe to a large cylindrical ſtone, three feet ſix inches high, five feet ſeven inches round, which lay by it.

The firſt public notice of this curioſity was in 1773 [3]; and in 1781 the following account was communicated to the Society of Antiquaries by Mr. Bray:

"Although Antiquaries in general agree in ſuppoſing that Leiceſter is the Ratæ Coritanorum [4] of the Romans, yet Camden and Biſhop Gibſon [5] ſpeak of it with ſome doubt. Horſley ſays it is undoubtedly ſo; and endeavours to fix it by the diſtances between Vennonæ, Ratæ, and Verometum, as mentioned in the Itinerary [6]. Stukeley affirms it, without aſſigning any reaſon [7]. A miliary ſtone has however been lately diſcovered, which demonſtates the certainty of it. The Foſs-way from Vennonæ to Newark on Trent leaves the town of Leiceſter a little on the right; croſſes the river Soar beyond Belgrave, and comes into what is now the turnpike road from Leiceſter to Melton Mowbray a little before it reaches the village of Thurmaſton: beyond which the turnpike leaves it, and goes off on the right; but the Foſs-way continues in a ſtrait line to Newark.

"On the ſide of this road, where the turnpike is carried along the Foſs way, about two miles beyond Leiceſter, there was a kind of ſtepping-block, little noticed; but in mending the road they removed the earth that was round it, and by ſo doing diſcovered a ſtone lying at the foot of it, for which it had ſerved as a pedeſtal. This ſtone was two feet ten inches long, five feet five inches and an half in circumference. On it is the following inſcription [8]:

IMR CAES
DIV. TRAIAN. PARTH F. DIV.
TRAIAN. HADRIAN. AVG.
POT. IV COS III \A RATIS
H

The ſtone is of a gritty ſort, ſuppoſed by maſons to be from a quarry in Derbyſhire. The letters in the upper line are four inches long; in the others but three. The ſecond and third lines ſeem to have been continued round it, ſome traces of letters being viſible on the back part. The two ſtrokes at bottom probably denote the diſtance from Ratæ, or Leiceſter, with which it agrees, being about two miles. Whether the figures in the fifth line ſtand for II [9] or III miles, it determines the antient name of Leiceſter to have been Ratæ and not Rage. It is the oldeſt milliare known in Britain (the others beginning with Philip), as well as the firſt inſcription in this iſland."

After the ſtone had remained ſome time for inſpection in the garden of the turnpike-houſe near the place where it was found, the corporation of Leiceſter, conceiving it worthy of more attention, placed it near the Belgrave gate; and it now forms the centre of a neat obeliſk ſurmounted with a lamp, the following inſcription on a braſs plate recording its hiſtory:

"This Roman mile-ſtone was found in the road near Leiceſter;
and placed here,
at the expence of the corporation at large,
in the mayoralty of James Biſhop, Eſq; in 1783."

However well-meant this removal may have been, the total loſs of the inſcription muſt eventually be the conſequence. The parts damaged by the workmen when it was firſt diſcovered are aukwardly ſupplied with modern maſonry, whereby the chain of the inſcription is much interrupted; and, by being within the reach of every idle paſſenger, ſeveral of the letters are much defaced; and the rude ſcratches of modern Vandals will probably in no long time eclipſe every

---

[1] See further on this head, p. 12.

[2] Other curioſities of a like nature will be noticed hereafter.

[3] In Gent Mag. vol. XLIII. p. 16; where a very indifferent repreſentation of it is given. G. A.

[4] "Antiquaries," ſays Mr. Carte, "generally agree that this is the place which is called Caer Lerion by Nennius, in his Catalogue of the 28 Cities, which are ſaid to have flouriſhed in Britain before the invaſion of it by the Romans; and that the Romans, making it one of their ſtations, called it Ratæ. Whether the Britiſh name proves it to have been a city ſo antient as ſome aſſert, I think doubtful; but no doubt can be made of its being very conſiderable in the time of the Romans, ſeeing ſo many of their remains have been, and are, daily diſcovered among us. Some of theſe are mentioned by Mr. Burton. Mr. Baxter, in his Britiſh Gloſſary, pp. 137. 200. is of opinion, that upon a Roman colony being ſettled at Lindum, or Lincoln, Leiceſter became the chief city or metropolis of the people called Coritani; and for that reaſon, in Ravennas, it is called Ratæ Corion, and in the Vatican Ratæ Coritanorum." Carte, MS.

[5] Gibſon's Camden, vol. I. p. 415.

[6] Britannia Romana, p. 437.

[7] The trace of the Roman wall quite round," Dr. Stukeley ſays, "is diſcoverable without difficulty, eſpecially in the gardens about Senvey-gate. There was a ditch on the outſide, very viſible in the gardens thereabouts. It is 2500 Roman feet long, and as much broad towards the South-eaſt; 2500 Roman feet long, and as much bread to the North-weſt" Itin. Cur. vol. I. p. 108. This will be better illuſtrated by the Doctor's plan of Roman Leiceſter, here given in Plate III. It may be candid, however, to obſerve, that this plan was pronounced, by the late Mr. Ludlam, who had conſidered the matter with much attention, to be a "mere figment." In a letter with which he favoured me in 1781, he ſays, "There are two Roman works, and no more; the mount near the river (as was their cuſtom), and the ruins of a bath near St. Nicholas's church. Two teſſellated pavements have been found there; the lateſt and largeſt in 1750." Theſe pavements, which are engraved in plates VII, VIII, and deſcribed p. 11, are thus noticed by Mr. Aſtle, in a letter to Dr. Farmer, Dec. 11, 1766: "On Thurſday laſt two fine drawings of teſſellated pavements were exhibited at the Society of Antiquaries; they were found at Mr. Ruding's, near Leiceſter; are very curious, and different from any I have yet ſeen. They will be great ornaments to your work."

[8] See it engraved, from Mr. Bray's drawing, in Plate *III. fig. 1. a. b.

[9] Mr. Bickerſtaffe, who imagined the ſeeming "H" to be two ones, or miles from Leiceſter, ſuggeſted that the ſtone might have been brought nearer to Leiceſter, than where it was firſt erected, before it was interred, if the place of its diſcovery was ſhort of two Roman miles. "The town-wall, which ran parallel with the Eaſt-gate, he obſerved, muſt be more than the third of a mile to the end of the Humberſtone-gate, ſo called from its leading to Humberſtone. In October, 1783, ſome perſons digging for gravel, in a yard in Humberſtone-gate, when they had got about two yards deep, came to a leaden coffin in the gravel; the length 5 feet 4 inches, the breadth 18 inches, on the outſide a parallelogram. On opening, they found a complete human ſkeleton; the head Eaſtward, inclining to the left ſhoulder, teeth perfect, the bones lying in their natural order, but the jaw fallen on the breaſt. The lid was ſupported on the inſide by iron reſts acroſs, about an inch broad, and a competent thickneſs; though through ruſt eaſily broken; forked and bent at the extremities, ſo as ſtrongly to ſuſtain the lid and under part. The coffin half an inch thick, and 500lb. weight. On its outſide, towards the feet, ſtood an earthen vaſe; there were alſo ſix or ſeven ſmall urns, all plain, and of red clay not glazed. On the right ſide, near the middle of the coffin, within, ſeveral dark balls lying together, as if ſtrung, which might have been held by the right hand, none an inch in diameter, and all to appearance of an equal ſize; whether they could not ſuſtain the touch, but went to duſt, or the mob-virtuoſi, who made free with the teeth, thought them worth their notice, they ſuddenly diſappeared. In the ſame yard, at times, have been found human and other bones, and many ox-horns. W. B."

BRITISH
12 JN 1928
MUSEUM

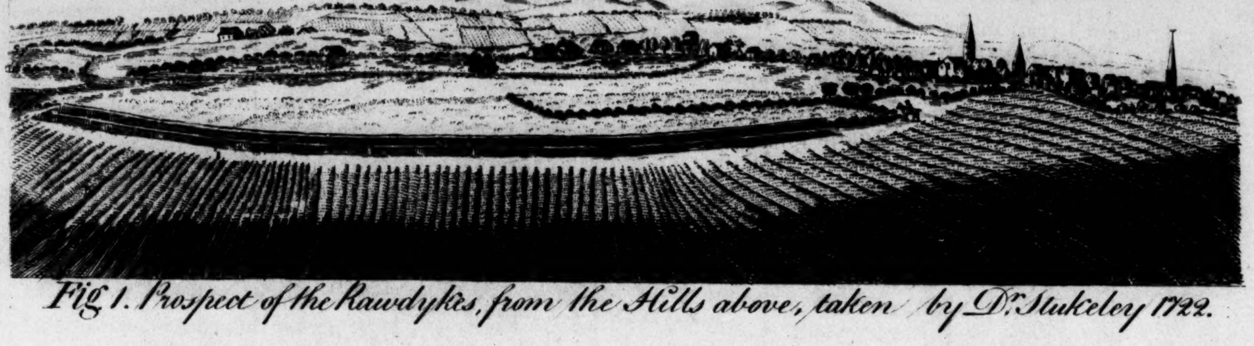

Fig. 1. Prospect of the Rawdykes, from the Hills above, taken by Dr. Stukeley 1722.

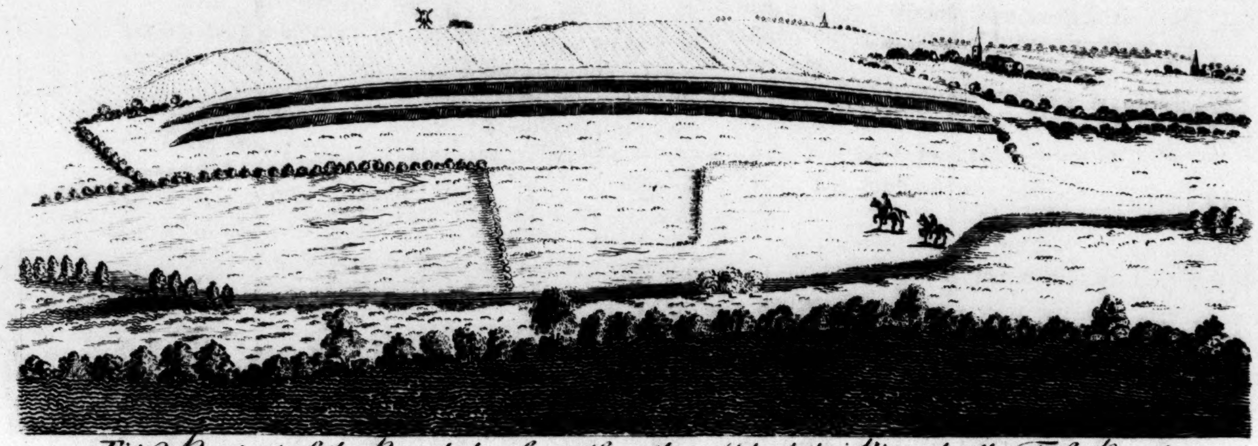

Fig. 2. Prospect of the Rawdykes, from the other Side of the River by the Foss Road.

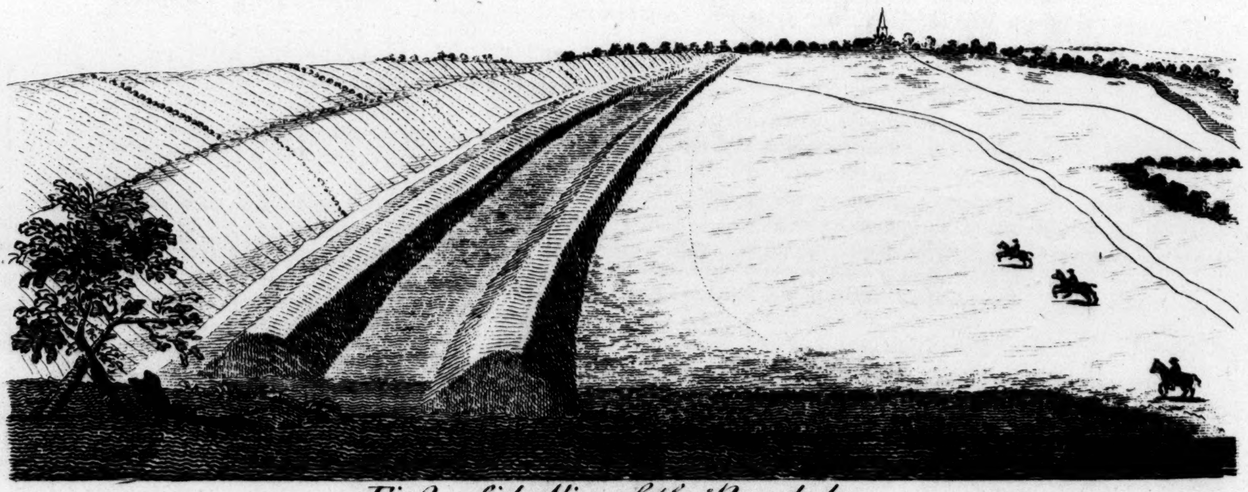

Fig. 3. Side View of the Rawdykes.

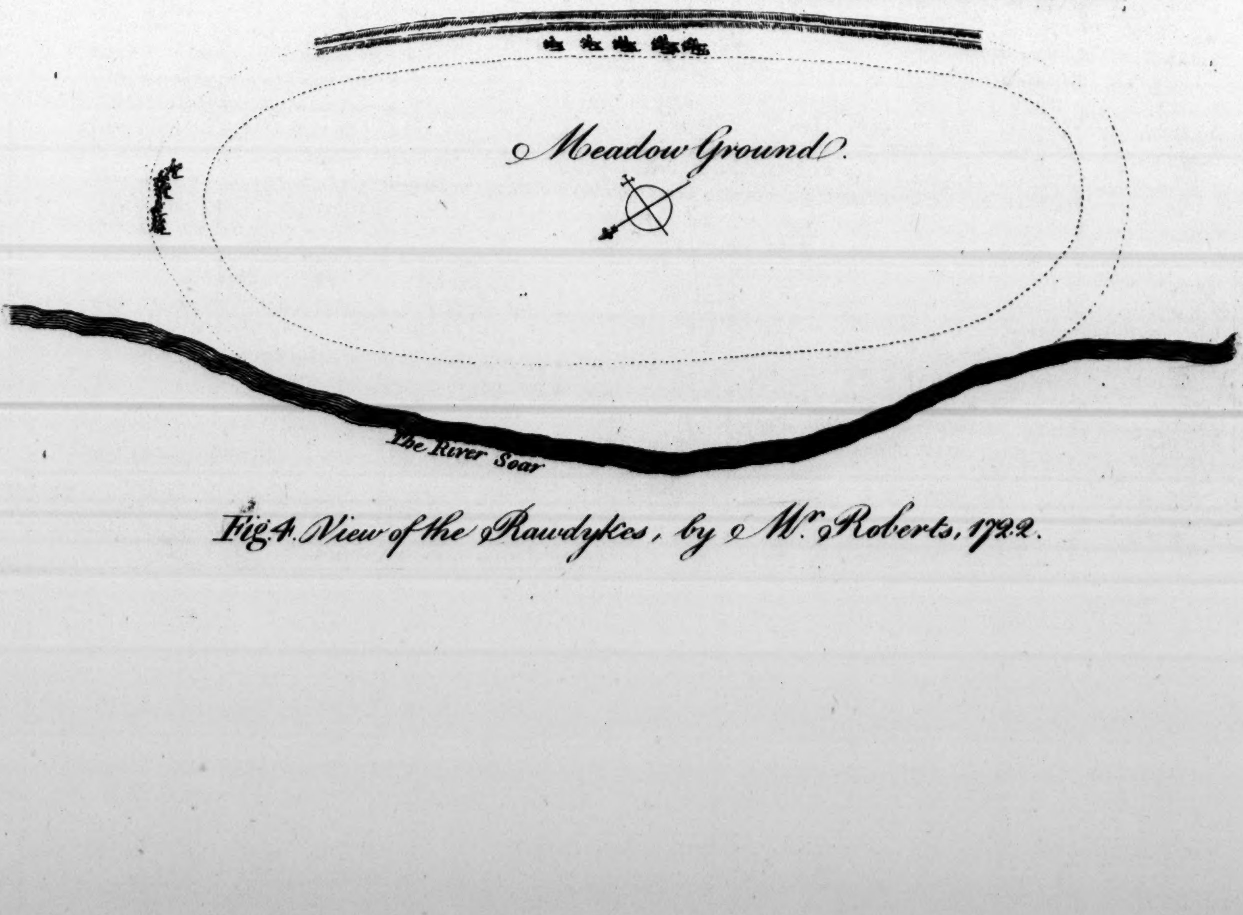

500
1000 feet
Meadow Ground
The River Soar

Fig. 4. View of the Rawdykes, by Mr. Roberts, 1722.

BRITISH
12 JN 1923
MUSEUM

Fig. 8. p. 6.

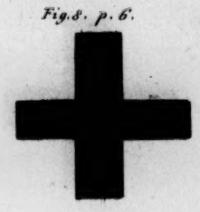

Fig. 4. p. 5. 12.

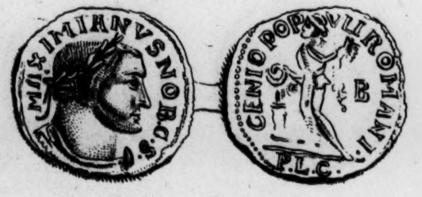
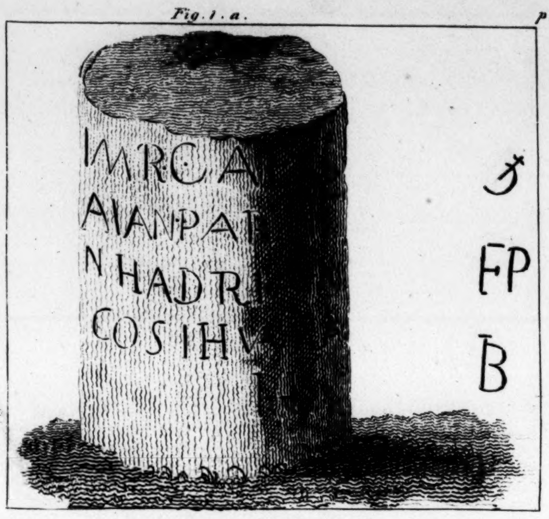


MAXIMIANVS NOB C S
GENIO POP ... ROMANI
B
PLC

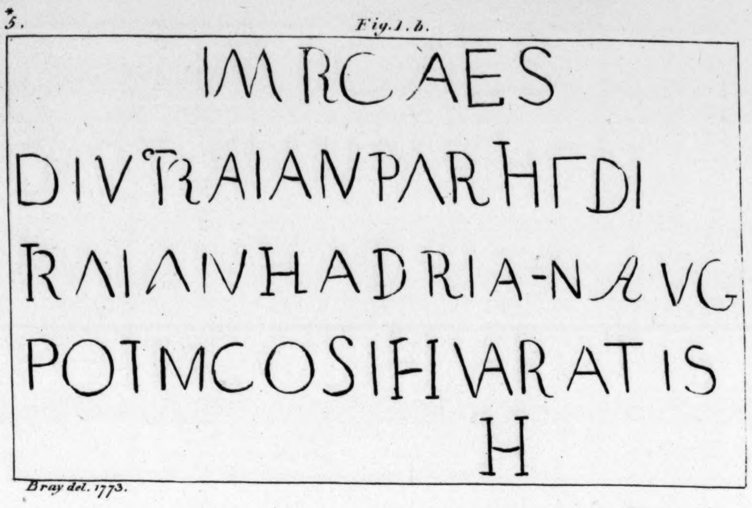
Fig. 9. p. 6.

Fig. 1. a. p. 5.



IMRCA
AIANPAI
N HADR
COS IH
EP
B

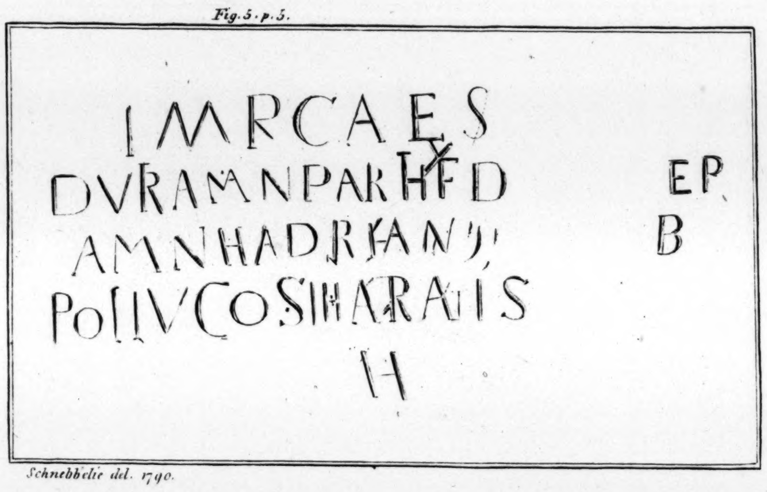
Fig. 1. b.



IMRCAES
DIVTRAIANPARHFDI
RAIANHADRIA-NAVG
POTMCOSIFIVARATIS
H

Bray del. 1773.

Fig. 5. p. 5.



IMRCAES
DVRAMNPARHFD
AMNHADRYAN
POLIVCOSIHARATIS
H
EP
B

Schnebbelie del. 1790.

Fig. 2. p. 5.

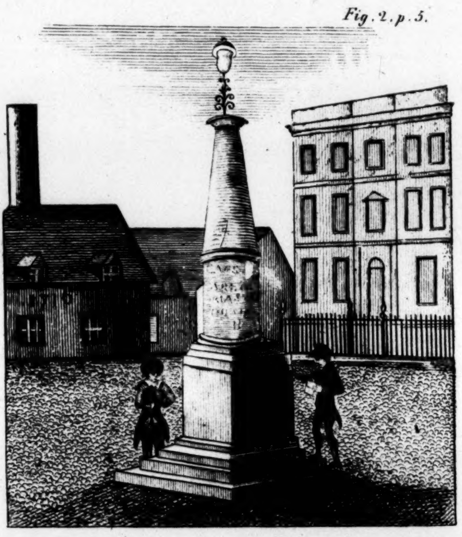


Fig. 6. p. 5.

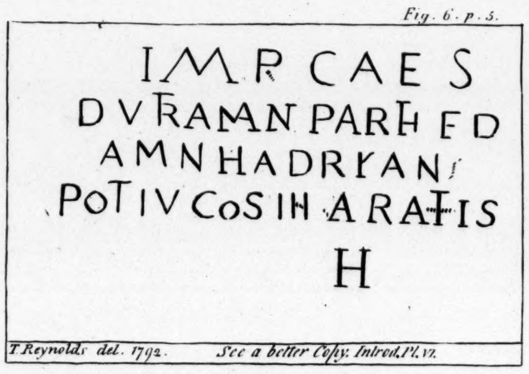
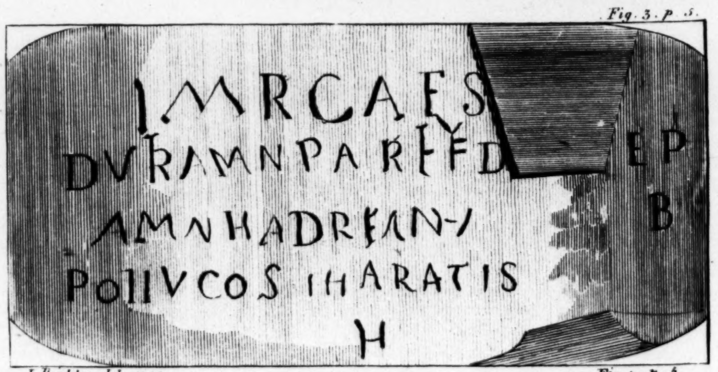


IMR CAES
DVRAMN PARH ED
AMNHADRYAN
POTIV COS IH ARATIS
H

T. Reynolds del. 1792. See a better Copy. Introd. Pl. VI.

Fig. 3. p. 5.

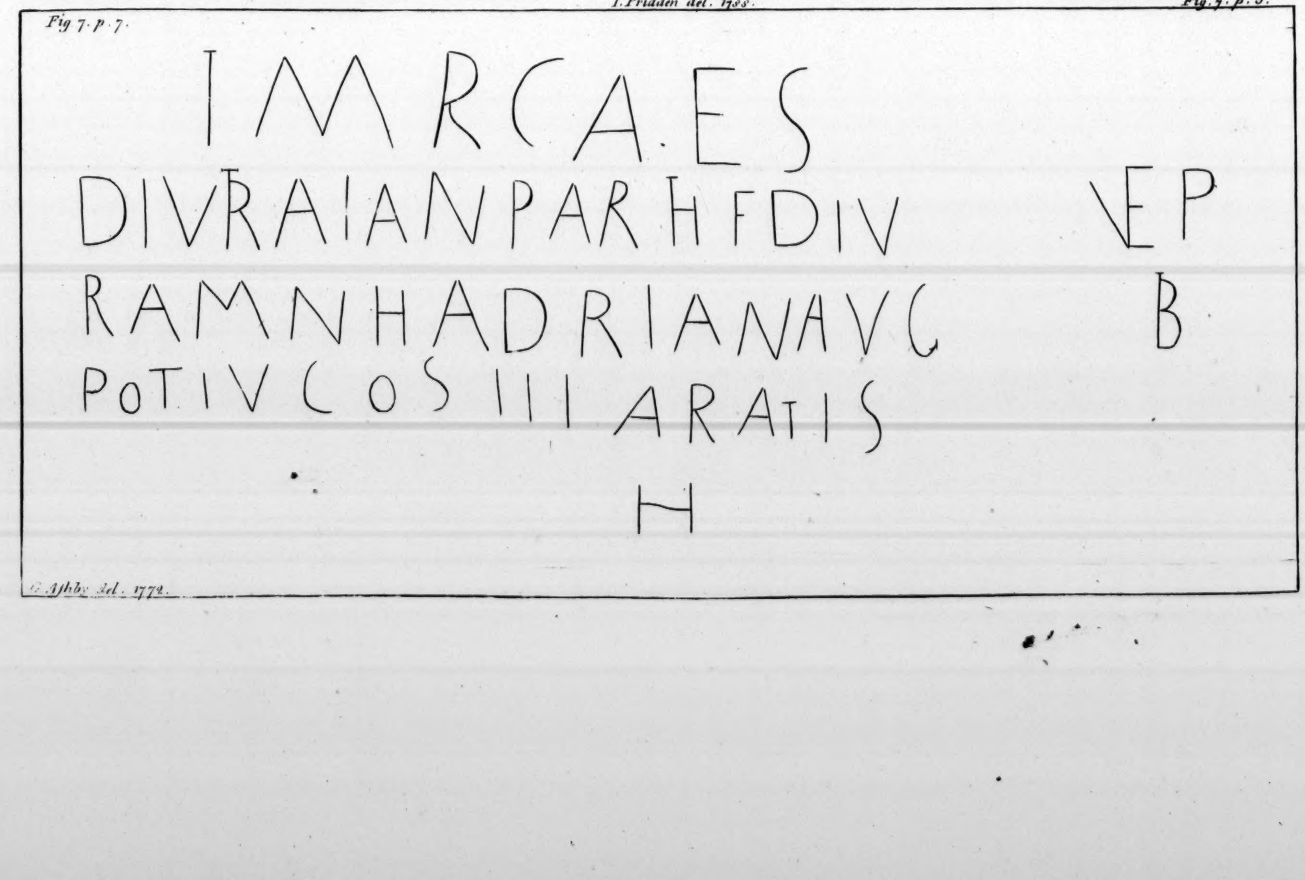


IMRCAES
DVRAMNPARFFD
AMNHADRYAN
POLIVCOS IHARATIS
H
EP
B

I. Pridden del. 1788.

Fig. 7. p. 5.

Fig 7. p. 7.



IMRCA.ES
DIVRAIANPARHFDIV
RAMNHADRIANAVG
POTIVCOS III ARATIS
H
EP
B

G. Ashby del. 1772.

trace of antiquity. Theſe obſervations will appear evident on a view of its preſent ſtate, Plate *III. fig. 2, 3; where the inſcription, with all its lately acquired injuries, is given from a drawing taken by Mr. Pridden in April 1788.

Deſirous of giving every poſſible illuſtration of this remarkable remnant of antiquity, three other delineations of it are here exhibited.

Fig. 5. was taken by Mr. Schnebbelie[1] in April 1790.

Fig. 6. has been obligingly communicated, in 1792, by the Rev. Mr. Reynolds; whoſe reading is thus:

Imperator Cæſar
Divi Trajani Parthici Filius Divus
Trajanus Hadrianus
Poteſtate IV Conſulatu III A Ratis
II

'On the back of the ſtone, and in the ſame character, E P B

"The only inſcriptions we have of Hadrian," ſays Mr. Whitaker, "have been ſo inaccurately copied, "that we cannot judge concerning the ſtructure of "their characters." The above inſcription has, on this account, been repeatedly and carefully examined, to ſupply this defect.

'The letters are in excellent preſervation, and have ſuffered much leſs injury from time than might be expected from its age.

'The ſtrokes of the letters are of one uniform thickneſs, not varied as in modern letters; N, not N.

'The firſt line is larger than the reſt.

'No appearance of any ſtop in it.

'The firſt P has a ſhort, ſmall ſtroke from the head, but does not appear an original part of the letter; as if it had been IMR.

'The mark under the E, ſeems to have been originally cut in the ſtone, perhaps the century mark.

'There appears no reaſon to think this inſcription ever contained more words, or even letters, than are now upon it; for the ſtone is very ſmooth and perfect where we might expect a deficiency. In the third line TR is wanting, but there is not the leaſt defect as if letters had been obliterated; perhaps, the word being a repetition of the word above, it might ſeem to excuſe cutting all the letters again.

'The ſlight ſtroke at the end of Hadrian, and which has been conſidered as the firſt ſtroke of A in Auguſtus, has not the appearance of part of a letter, at leaſt of a ſimilar letter to the reſt of the inſcription.

'The upper part of the T in Ratis is not ſo plain as here repreſented, but ſufficiently clear on a careful inſpection.

'Hadrian is ſaid to have been in England in his third Conſulſhip, with which this inſcription agrees. It is from hence probable the Foſs road was made by his order about the year of Chriſt 120.'

Thus far Mr. Reynolds.

By the Rev. Mr. Aſhby alſo, who, on the firſt diſcovery of this remarkable curioſity, employed great attention in the inveſtigation of its hiſtory, I have been lately favoured with the reſult of his valuable reſearches; which may be ſeen at large among the diſſertations introductory to theſe volumes; and his delineation of the milliary in Plate *III. fig. 7.

Among other proofs of the Roman ſettlement here, Mr. Burton adduces "the antient temples dedicated to Janus, which had a flamen or high prieſt here reſident; in which place great ſtore of bones of beaſts (which here have been ſacrificed) have been digged up and found, and the place yet called thereof The Holy Bones[2]; which all hiſtories do agree to have been here, and ſurely was the foundation of the Romans, as appeareth by their god Janus Bifrons, to whoſe honour the firſt temple was built in Rome by Romulus and Tatius; or, as others ſay, Numa Pompilius, in a place called Argiletum; and not founded by that feigned king Leir, to the honour of Janus, as Geoffrey of Monmouth, and (of later days) John Harding, and John Rous of Warwick will have it; which, how fabulous and improbable it is, any ordinary capacity may conceive, in that it is known to all, that Janus was not adored, or thought-of ever, of any but the Romans. And this king Leir died (at leaſt) three hundred years before Rome was built, as by their own chronology and computation will appear: but this, and many ſuch improbabilities and contradictions, will eaſily confute this forged hiſtory of Brute and of his progeny. Part of this temple is yet ſtanding (1642) near the Weſt end of St. Nicholas's church, made of Roman bricks and ſmall tiles compacted together with ſo hard a mortar and cement, that no ordinary tool can pierce it[3]."

"I cannot but wonder," Mr. Carte ſays, "at what Mr. Burton writes concerning Janus's temple here. That which he ſo calls is commonly known by the name of Jewry Wall, and is ſituated at the Weſt end of St. Nicholas's church-yard; and though what remains of it ſerves for a wall, yet it was, as I doubt not, a building which took up a great deal of the area of the church-yard; and the ruins of it were in a great meaſure made uſe of in building that church, as appears by the Britiſh or Roman bricks, or tiles, viſible in the walls of it. It is difficult to judge now what the uſe of it was; but I am apt to think it was of the ſame nature with the Wery-wall[4] in Lancaſter, or the Old Work of Wroxeter[5]; and if one had an opportunity of viewing all theſe, and comparing them together, one might perhaps make a probable gueſs at their uſe. What remains of this wall is about 23 yards long, and on the outſide the height is about 9 or 10 yards, raiſed up by ſeveral ſtrata alternately of rough foreſt ſtone and of brick or tile (I will call it brick); each of the bricks being about 18 inches long, 15 broad, and about 2 thick or thereabouts (for ſome are bigger and ſome leſſer). The mortar between the bricks is full as thick as the bricks. I reckon 17 ſtrata, in the following order:

1. Four rows of ſtone, 27 inches high.
2. Three rows of brick, about 10 inches high.
3. Three rows of ſtone, 18 inches.
4. Three rows of brick, 8 inches.
5. Four rows of ſtone, 23 inches.
6. Three rows of brick.
7. Four rows of ſtone.
8. Three rows of brick.

---

[1] Mr. Schnebbelie, in 1790, deſcribes it to be "two feet ten inches long, and five feet nine inches in circumference." The difference in length may be accounted for by the ſtone's having been reduced to adapt it to the preſent ſituation.

[2] From this circumſtance it has been ſuppoſed that the antient Britons had a temple for ſacrifices even before the converſion of the Romans. "Some traces of this temple," ſays Salmon, "may be found in the place called Holy Bones, where the bones of oxen ſacrificed have been frequently, upon digging, turned up. Theſe muſt have been brought hither for ſacrifice, and nothing elſe. Where we find the name of a temple, and the reliques of their worſhip apparently together, we have all the evidence the nature of the thing admits." The quantity of bones here found have been with more probability accounted for by the recollection that this ſpot was the ſite of the old ſhambles.

[3] Burton, enlarged by MS. Chetwynd.

[4] "At the beautiful bridge over the Lane on the ſteep of the hill hangs a piece of very old wall of Roman work called Wery-wall, from the late Britiſh name of this town, as it ſhould ſeem; for the Britains called this town Caer Weird, or the Green City, perhaps from that green-hill." Gough's Camden, under Lancaſter, vol. III. p. 131.

[5] "I ſaw nothing here but a few pieces of walls (commonly called The Old Work of Wroxeter), built of hewn ſtone, divided by ſeven rows of Britiſh brick (ſeptemplici Britannicorum ordine, which Mr. Gale, MS n. explains, "opere lateritio & lapide interjecto (ut Eboraci & Coloniæ) diatonico;" and arched on the inſide. Where theſe ſtood I ſuſpect has been a caſtle, from the inequality of the grounds, the banks, and ruins of walls ſcattered up and down." Gough's Camden, vol. II. p. 397. "There is a piece of an old wall yet ſtanding, about 8 yards high, and 20 long, which has in it three regular ſtrata of Roman brick. A ſquare ſudatory with four rows of brick flues under its floor was diſcovered, but deſtroyed. A very good wooden model of it is preſerved in Shrewſbury-ſchool, and alſo one of the brick flues, and part of the teſſellated pavement. The Roman coins found here are chiefly of the Lower Empire, and called Wroxeter dynders, perhaps a corruption of denarii." Ibid. p. 412.

9. Three rows of ſtone.
10. Three rows of brick.
11. Three rows of ſtone.
12. Three rows of brick.
13. Four rows of ſtone: above this the front is defaced; but there ſeems to be,
14. Three rows of brick.
15. Four rows of ſtone.
16. Three rows of brick.
17. Four rows or more of ſtone.

“ In the wall, near the middle, at 5 yards diſtance from each other, there are two large arches, which ſerved for entrance into it, about three yards wide and 4½ high. There are alſo ſeveral holes in the wall, about 6 inches ſquare, viz. in the 3d, 6th, 9th, 13th, and 17th ſtrata. The holes in this laſt are as large again as the others, and paſs quite through the wall; whereas the reſt do not appear to do ſo, though there are ſome holes like them on the inſide.

“ The wall on the inſide (viz. in the church-yard) has no facing, being broken off roughly from the parts that were continued to it; and it now conſiſts of four arches. The two largeſt are in the middle, and in part anſwer the two on the outſide, which were made for entrances, but are much larger within, and the entrances are not in the middle of them. In the column between theſe two great arches there appears the remainder of an arch-work, which, in Dr. Stukeley's draught of it [1], is repreſented as a niche for a ſtatue, but which ſeems to me to be made for reverberating heat [2]; and in all the inſide the blackneſs of the ſtones and brick retain plain indications of fire and ſmoke. The two other arches are near as high, and in ſhape much like the other, but not ſo large.

“ In the South arch a poor woman has a little houſe, who ſhewed me two ſtones now placed on the outermoſt wall of her houſe, which, ſhe ſaid, ſhe was informed, were taken out of the arch within her houſe, and placed where they now are; that though the perſon living there was not at home, yet perſons of curioſity might ſee them. One of them is in the exact form of a croſs formy, or patée, as, I think, it is called; it is 13 inches over, and the breadth of each of the four arms at the decuſſation is 4 inches, and at the end 6 or 7. The other ſtone has a croſs excavated in it about 10 inches long [3]. I ſomewhat doubt of the truth of the woman's relation as to the place whence the ſtones were taken, becauſe I can diſcover no ſuch formed ſtones in any part of the work; and have given this account of the matter, becauſe of the odd fancies which ſome have had of it.”

In his account of the demoliſhed churches in Leiceſter, Mr. Carte adds, “ Another church that I find mentioned is, ‘ Eccl̄ia S̄ti Auguſtini Leyc;’ and in Charyte's ‘ Rentale [4]’ I meet with this memorandum: “ Quod eccl̄ia de Coſby pertinuit ad eccl̄iam S̄ti Auguſtini Leic'; que quidem eccl̄ia S̄ti Auguſtini ſita fuerat ad orientalem partem cancell' eccl̄ie S̄ti Nic̄i Leic'; & erat ipſa eccl̄ia conſtituta ſub duobus tect̄is conjunctis ſuper medias columnas, cujus una pars erat dedicata S̄to Auguſtino, & altera S̄to Columb'; modo nominatur Holybones Leyc'.” Upon this my conjecture, or opinion, is, that the church was dedicated to St. Auguſtine the monk, who converted the Engliſh Saxons, and to St. Columbus, who converted the Picts in Scotland [5]. It was not a pariſh church; and therefore the church of Coſby, lying five miles diſtant, was appropriated to the maintenance of it. I reckon that it was demoliſhed at the Conqueſt, or in the troubles enſuing in 1088; and therefore the church of Coſby (being freed from the charge of maintaining it) was given to the abbey by the founder. It was a general cuſtom to bury the reliques, or bones, of ſome martyr in the place where churches were erected; and I ſuppoſe that, after the demolition of the church, ſome attempt being made to find out theſe depoſited, and they not being found, it was ſaid that the holy bones were ſtill there, and that from thence the place came to be called Holy Bones, as it is to this day.”

The late excellent Dr. Lyttelton, biſhop of Carliſle, and preſident of the Society of Antiquaries, obſerves, in a letter to Dr. Farmer, that “ the old work in St. Nicholas's church-yard at Leiceſter, now called the Jewry-wall, and ſaid by Dr. Stukeley [6] to be compoſed of rag ſtone and Roman brick, differs from all the antient Roman buildings I have ſeen in England, the ſeveral materials being rudely amaſſed together; whereas the Romans generally laid their brick or pile in layers at equal diſtances [7]. Within this wall are ſeveral arched receſſes.—N. B. I obſerved a good deal of Roman tile worked up in the walls of the adjoining church, which is a ſtructure purely Gothic, and not above 500 years old at fartheſt.”

As Mr. Carte's deſcription of this curious remain was written ſo long ſince as 1712, Mr. Throſby's more recent account [8] ſhall be given, to ſhew in what particulars it now differs either by decay or error:

“ Some years ago I examined the woman who at preſent occupies the little dwelling ſpoken of above, if ſhe had ever ſeen, or been aſked for, two particular ſtones I deſcribed to her; but was unable to learn any thing from her reſpecting them. I then examined the inſide of her abode; but to no purpoſe; till, on ſtrictly examining the outſide, I found the laſt-mentioned nearly covered with mortar; which I ſoon picked off, with a trowel, to the extremity of the ſtone on all ſides.

“ The length and the height of the Jewry-wall ſeem to have undergone no material alteration ſince Mr. Carte's time. The front of the broken part towards the little dwelling muſt be ſuffering almoſt daily by the heedleſs boys who play in the church-yard; and who, to ſhew their dexterity in climbing, often obtain the ſummit by the help of the projecting ſtones.

“ The South arch, wherein the woman lives, ſeems to be of the ſame magnitude as the ſecond and fourth. The ſecond is 13 feet high and 12 feet wide. The third is a little jutting arch 4 feet over. The fourth is the ſame as the ſecond. The fifth is 12 feet by 6.

“ There are ſome few errors in Mr. Carte's admeaſurement of the layers of brick and ſtone, or elſe I did not find the exact place where he meaſured. When I had gained admittance into the garden on the Weſt ſide, where I made a drawing of an arch that ſeems to have been over the entrance, I there found the wall, in its thickeſt part, to be ſeven feet over. This front has a very different appearance to the view in the church-yard: its ſurface ſomewhat indicates the outſide of a building, and has only two arches; and they do not in the leaſt project from the wall, as on the other ſide. Theſe arches I take to have been the entrances; they are made with two rows of brick, and are ſingularly curious of their kind. In every part of this wall, on this ſide in particular, the mortar takes up as much ſpace as the brick [9]; from its being made of gravel, as I take it, inſtead of ſand. On this ſide the layers of brick and ſtone are in the following order from the ſurface of the ground:

1 — 4 rows of ſtone 22 inches high.
2 — 3 —— of brick 10 inches.
3 — 3 —— of ſtone 18 inches.
4 — 3 —— of brick 10 inches.
5 — 5 —— of ſtone 2 feet.
6 — 3 —— of brick 10 inches.
7 — 4 —— of ſtone 22 inches.
8 — 3 —— of brick 9 inches.
9 — 3 —— of ſtone 12 inches.
10 — 3 —— of brick 9 inches.
11 — 2 —— of ſtone 11 inches.
12 — 3 —— of brick 9 inches.
13 — 3 —— of ſtone 15 inches.

“ Above which are about 6 feet of ragged ſtone and brick, whoſe front, or conjoined parts, is gone.

“ Being deſirous of learning ſomething that might

---

[1] See our Plate IV. fig. 1.

[2] This ſeems to be ſimilar to the Wroxeter ſudatory.

[3] They are copied in plate *III. fig. 8, 9.

[4] Fol 147. ſect 148.

[5] “ Floruit Columba, Pictorum Septentrionalium Apoſtolus, circa A.D 570.” Pinkerton, Vitæ Antiquæ Sanctorum, &c p. 27.

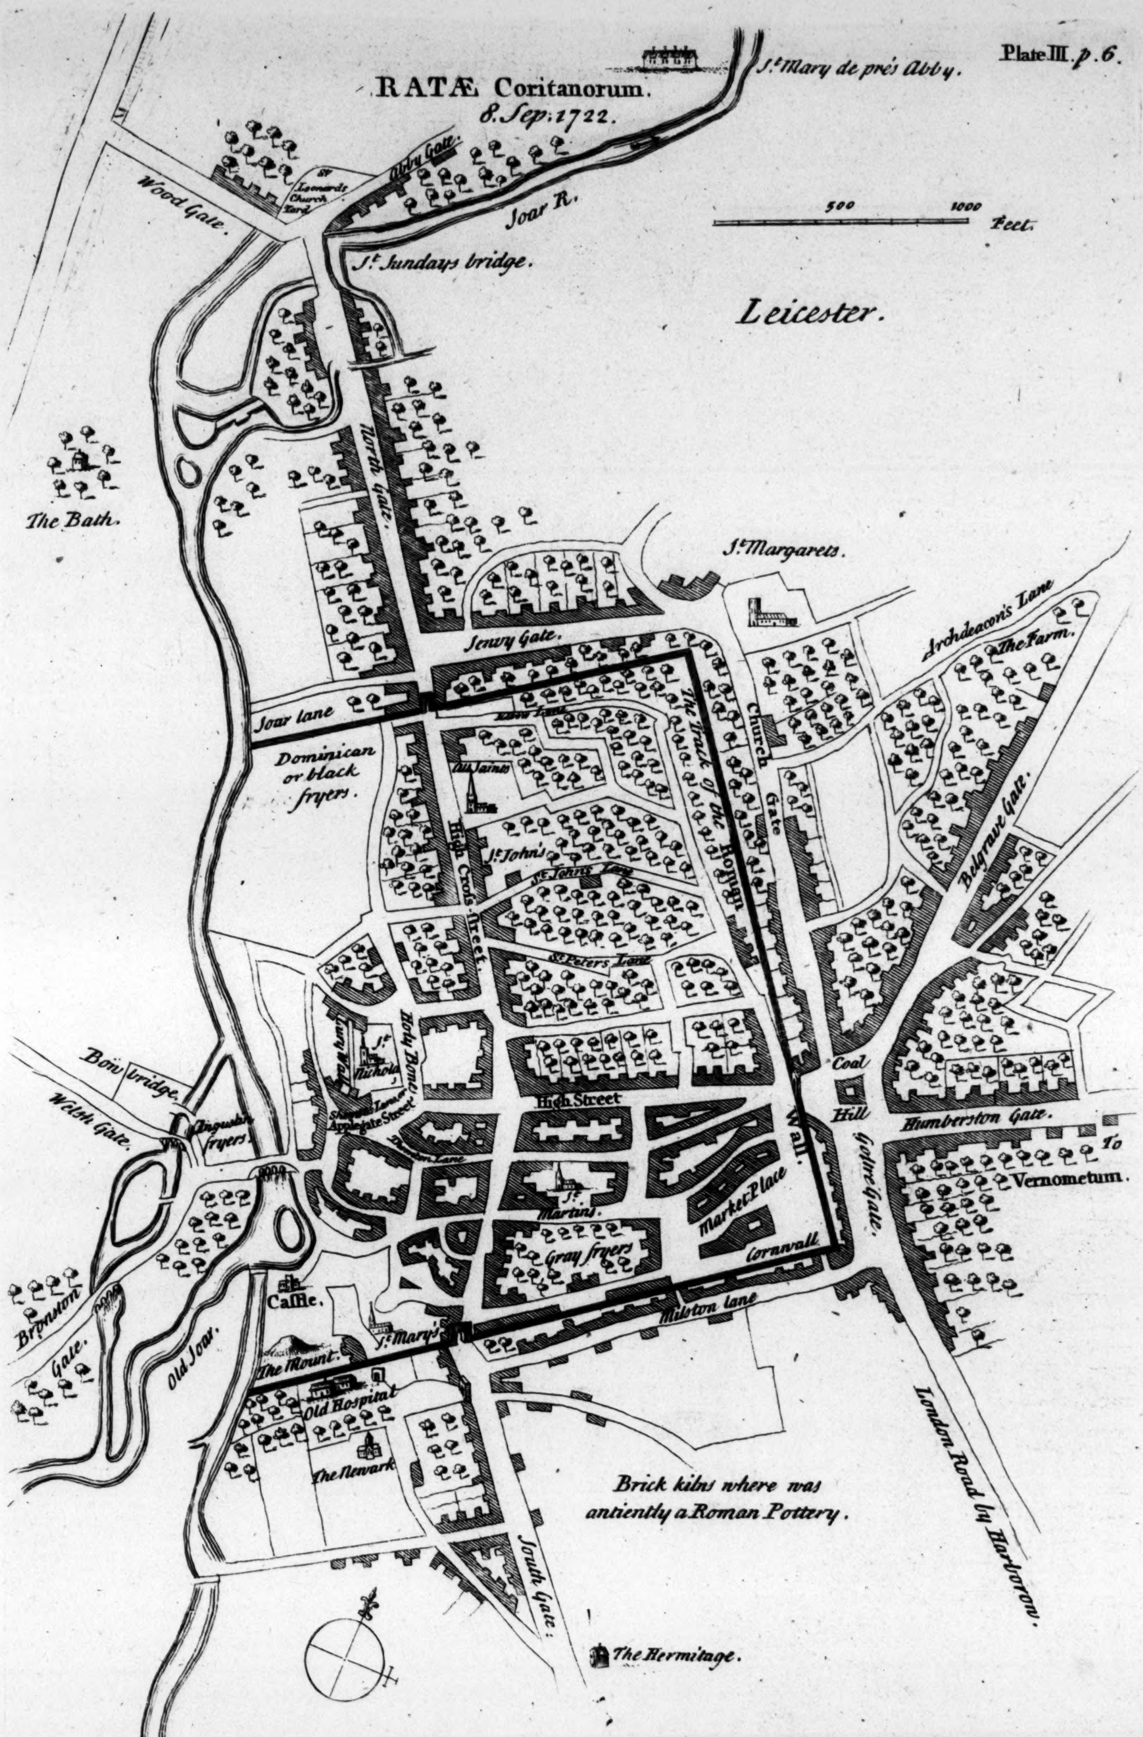
[6] Itin. Cur. p. 103.

[7] The deſcriptions both of Mr. Carte and Mr. Throſby ſhew that there was more regularity than the learned Biſhop ſeems to have been aware of.

[8] Hiſtory of Leiceſter, p. 5.

[9] So at Cheſterford, in Eſſex. G. A.

Plate III. p. 6.



RATÆ Coritanorum.
8. Sep: 1722.
Sᵗ Mary de prés Abby.
500
1000
Feet.
Leicester.
Wood Gate.
Sᵗ Leonards Church Yard
Abby Gate.
Joar R.
Sᵗ Sundays bridge.
The Bath.
North Gate.
Sᵗ Margarets.
Jewry Gate.
Archdeacon's Lane
The Farm.
Joar lane
Dominican or black fryers.
All Saints
High Cross Street.
Sᵗ John's
Sᵗ Johns Lane
The Track of the Roman Wall.
Church Gate
Belgrave Gate.
Sᵗ Peters Lane
Holy Bone.
Sᵗ Nicholas
Bow bridge.
Welsh Gate.
Augustin fryers.
Applegate Street
High Street
Coal Hill
Humberston Gate.
To Vernometum.
Gosling Gate.
Sᵗ Martins.
Market Place
Gray fryers
Cornwall
Castle.
Bronston Gate.
Old Joar.
Sᵗ Mary's
Milston lane
The Mount.
Old Hospital
The Newark
Brick kilns where was antiently a Roman Pottery.
London Road by Harboro.
South Gate.
The Hermitage.

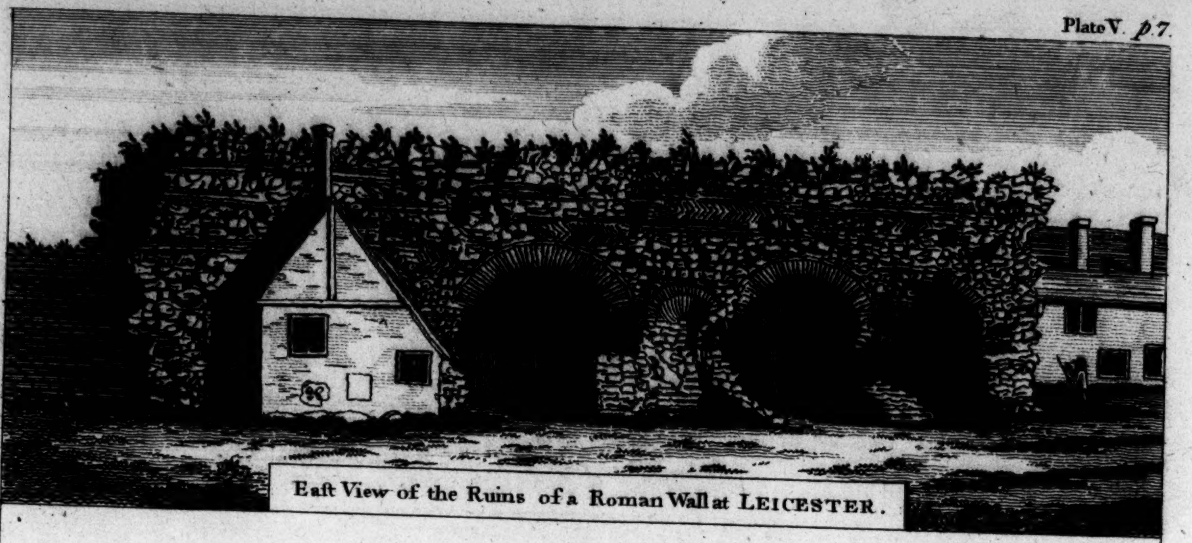
Viro Reverendo & erudito Samueli Carte A.M. d.d. W. Stukeley.

Stukeley delin.

BRITISH
12 JN 1923
MUSEUM

BRITISH
12 JN 1928
MUSEUM

Plate V. p 7.



East View of the Ruins of a Roman Wall at LEICESTER.

West View of the ſame Ruins, with Part of the Church of St. NICHOLAS.

J. Pridden, del. July 8, 1786.

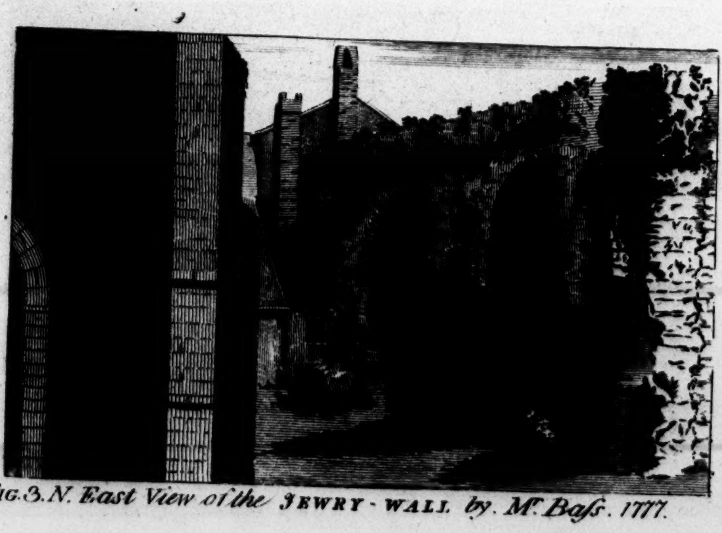

FIG. 3. N. East View of the JEWRY - WALL by Mr. Baſs. 1777.

BRITISH
12 JN 1928
MUSEUM

PLATE IV. P. 7.

Fig 1. East View of JANUS'S TEMPLE; from a Drawing by Dr. Stukeley. 1722.

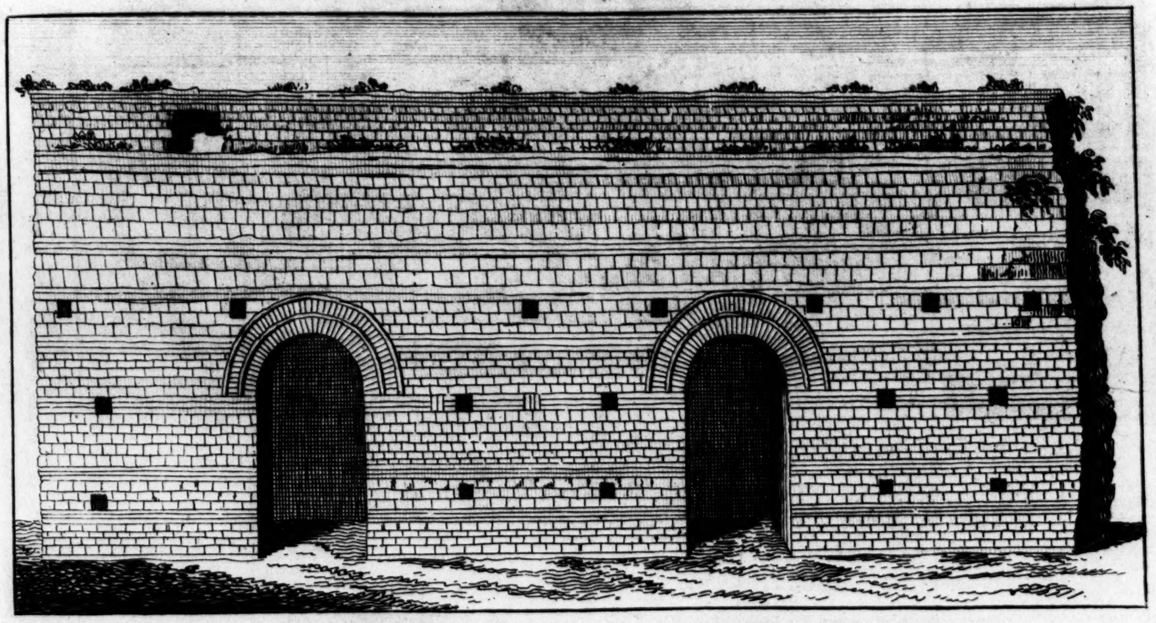

Fig 2. West View of the same Building by Dr. Stukeley. 1722.

lead to a diſcovery of its former magnitude (for I fear its uſe will never be diſcovered) I employed ſome workmen to dig, on the Eaſt ſide, tranſverſely, and in a right direction with the wall, thinking to find a foundation, which I intended to have traced to its extent; but it no where continued a foot beyond the projecting parts."

Reſuming the ſubject, Mr. Throſby adds, "A long reſidence in Leiceſter, and at times having paid ſome attention to its hiſtory, tempts me to ſay ſomething more of the Jewry-wall, about which, in his account of the Foſs, the biſhop of Corke and Roſs[1] has given ſome new, and ſenſible, remarks. His lordſhip is of opinion, that the ruin we call Janus's Temple was the Janua, or gate, of the city; and that there was a Roman bridge which led into the city, over the river, at the ſame place where now ſtands what is generally called Bow-bridge. I believe it has long been a received opinion, that the river which runs by or ſkirts the Weſt ſide of Leiceſter is the old river Leir, now Soar, and that which is called the Back-river was cut about the time that the Lancaſter hoſpital was built. But if the contrary be the caſe, that the former is the modern cut, and the latter the old river Leir, which I have been lately convinced is true; then nothing, in my opinion, is more likely than that in the time of the Romans there was a bridge over the old river, where Bow-bridge now ſtands, and that in a right line with Jewry-wall, the ſuppoſed Janua of the Roman city. Whoever looks at the preſent ſtreets at the Weſt end of the town will not diſcover the leaſt traces of a Roman road: the zigzag direction from one to the other is inimical to the idea we entertain of their lineal paſſages from, and through, one ſtation to another. The ſpace before the Rev. Mr. Andrewes's houſe cannot eaſily be accounted for, but upon the ſcore of the gate of the antient city and wall continuing from the South end of the ruin, right acroſs that broad way, to the houſe known by the name of the Recruiting Serjeant, where the Jewry-wall has recently been proved to have continued, by the diſcovery of its foundation, made of the like materials and thickneſs; near which was found, at the ſame time, a fine Roman coin, of Maximian. This conjecture in no ſhape takes from the opinion that a great temple once ſtood near the ſite of St. Nicholas' church. Churches were frequently built upon the ſite of heathen temples, and on old Roman roads; the former practice evidently accounts for the materials; and the latter, perhaps, for a foundation, and ſometimes elevations[2]. Mr. Carte tells us of a church which ſtood near St. Nicholas, in a place called The Holy-bones, which was demoliſhed about the time of the Conqueſt, dedicated to Columbus and Auguſtine: perhaps that and St. Nicholas were both built out of the ruins of the temple. Roman walls near the grand entrance into cities had ſuch niches as are preſerved in this wall; whence many have concluded that they are the remains of temples. However, the argument againſt the temple, and for a gate, is in ſome meaſure done away by the frequent diſcovery of the foundations of amazingly thick walls leading from the church to the river: one of theſe, which I ſaw in a cellar of the Talbot-inn, was almoſt impenetrable[3].

Whatever may have been the firſt deſtination of theſe walls, there can be no doubt but that they were originally of Roman conſtruction; and that the name of Jewry was adopted when that part of Leiceſter became the peculiar reſidence of the Jews, who, in all great towns, were cuſtomarily limited to a particular diſtrict[4]; and who were at a very early period removed from Leiceſter by an expreſs injunction from one of its earls[5], quod nullus Judeus neque Judea, in tempore meo, ſive in tempore alicujus heredum meorum uſque in finem mundi, infra libertatem ville Leiceſtrie, habitabit neque manebit, nec reſidentiam obtinebit."

Impreſſed with an idea ſomewhat ſimilar to that which I have juſt ſubmitted to the reader, my learned friend Mr. Gifford has ſuggeſted that "The Jews ſeem to have been confined to particular parts of the city of London[6]; for there is a place called The Jewry within the liberties of the Tower; another called Poor Jewry Lane near Aldgate; and The Old Jewry[7] is well known. It appears alſo from Dugdale[8], that ſo long ſince as 1262, a place in Worceſter, called The Jewry, was deſtroyed in the fury of a civil war.

"By being confined to particular ſpots, their evil practices might be the more eaſily guarded againſt, if indeed they were at any time guilty of ſuch as obliged Government to have a watchful eye over them; and, guilty or not, they could, in ſuch ſituations, be the more readily fleeced whenever the neceſſities of kings and the rapaciouſneſs of miniſters called for an immediate ſupply.

"We cannot ſuppoſe that a people, circumſtanced as the Jews were in this country for many ages, ever choſe to be crowded together in one ſpot, as they would have had a much better chance of eſcaping the malice of their enemies if they had been diſperſed in different parts. We may, therefore, reaſonably conclude, that it was the policy of a people, ever jealous of the induſtry of thoſe who were more knowing in buſineſs and more active than themſelves, to confine them to particular parts of theſe towns they permitted them to inhabit. And the Jewry Wall in Leiceſter ſeems to point out to us the place where theſe poor, perſecuted wretches were ſuffered to live.

"It was not, indeed, in every town that they were indulged with a place of reſidence, even under ſo diſadvantageous a condition. The burgeſſes of Derby paid a fine to Henry III. on this expreſs condition, that their borough ſhould not be peſtered with ſuch inmates: for the king ſays in his charter, 'Pro fine quem burgenſes de Derb. fecerint nobiſcum, conceſſimus eis, pro nobis & heredibus noſtris, quod ipſi & eorum heredes in perpetuum habeant hanc libertatem, ſcilicet, quod nullus Judeus vel Judea per nos & heredes noſtros, aut per alios de cetero, maneant aut commorentur in villâ predictâ.'

---

[1] See the Diſſertation on the Roman Roads, introductory to theſe volumes.

[2] A third reaſon is, becauſe the ſpot was common, and unoccupied, no man's property. In Suffolk there are ſeveral churches in Roman camps, &c. G. A.

[3] The late Mr. Bickerſtaffe once obſerved upon this expulſion of the Jews from Leiceſter, "that the Jewry-wall might be the fornaces or fire-places to burn their ſacrifices;" [Q. Did the Jews ever ſacrifice after the deſtruction of the Temple? G. A.] and the little cottage at the South end of it, with the figure of a croſs engraved in front, on a freeſtone, he ſuppoſed, might be placed there in ludibrium erga Judæos, in contempt of the Jews religion.

[4] In a Statute "De Judaiſmo," paſſed in the reign of Edward the Firſt, the Jews are declared to be "les ſerfs du roy," and in many particulars are treated with much ſeverity; yet, by the laſt chapter of this law, a Jew had the privilege (denied in the preſent enlightened age) of purchaſing a houſe and curtilage. In the ſecond year of Henry the Third, particular judges were appointed by that king to decide any diſputes between ſuch Jews as were taken under his ſpecial protection (Judeis noſtris) and the Engliſh Chriſtians. See Mr. Juſtice Barrington on the Statutes, p. 224.

[5] The ſecond Simon de Montfort; whoſe charter will be given at large in a future page.

[6] And ſo at Cambridge, &c. &c. It is common in towns of Germany to a ſhameful degree towards harmleſs men; or, if otherwiſe, by ill uſage. G. A.

[7] In two deeds, both dated 55 Hen. III. mentioned is made of a tenement in Milk-ſtreet, with a vacant plot of ground, "infra Judaiſmum civitatis noſtre London', contiguam ibidem, per quod itur ad Haſtingium London', infra parochiam Sancti Laurencii." The houſe and ground, here referred to, had been the property of Leo le Blunt and Genta his wife, whoſe ſon Aaron and grand-daughter Flavia joined in a conveyance of them to Aaron the ſon of Vynes, who is ſtyled "Judeus Edmundi filii noſtri cariſſimi." In another part it is mentioned, that Flora Blunt, the grand-daughter of Aaron, become poſſeſſed of the houſe and ground "infra Judaiſmum" by the will of her brother, whoſe widow M. enjoyed all the reſt of his property "ſecundum legem & conſuetudinem Judaiſmi." In a grant alſo of queen Elizabeth to John Farnham, a copy of which is among the MSS. of Mr. Carte, ſome property is given to him in Veteri Judaiſmo.

[8] Bar. vol. I. p. 263.

"The ſame king, among other privileges, granted to the merchants of Newcaſtle, and their heirs, that no Jew ſhould ſtay or dwell in their town[1]. And Mr. Gough informs us[2], that the Jews were not permitted to reſide in the borough of Caernarvon."

Mr. Bickerſtaffe has elſewhere noticed[3], that "in the year 1784, on digging a grave under the ſteeple of St. Martin's church, in the ſpace between the nave and the chancel, ſeveral ſcuttles full of cattle-bones, horns, and jaw-bones of the herd, came to light, the teeth in many inſtances entire, five feet deep from the ſurface, and a foot deep in bones, with an appearance of a lateral continuation. Some months before, a few yards diſtant South of the above diſcovery, near the ſteeple, or belfry door, were met with (in making a grave, within a foot of the ſurface, continuing on all ſides, as well as through the cut, and not terminating with it) a vaſt quantity of very large pebbles, wedged, or heaped together, without inſterſtices of earth or mortars. Foundations, well ſet in mortar, have likewiſe ſometimes occurred to the preſent ſexton, within the precincts of this church[4]. About a quarter of a mile on the Weſt of this church, is a place called Holy Bones, a few yards from St. Nicholas's church eaſterly; where many like bones of victims have at times been diſcovered; and on the Weſt ſide, within four or five yards of this latter church, are the remains of an antient work, called Jewry Wall, compoſed of rude unequal foreſt-ſtones, with a kind of bricks two inches in thickneſs, in mortar of the ſame dimenſions. In this wall, over narrow diameters of ſeemingly imperfect furnaces, are wide and high arches, ſtrongly blackened like the under parts, and edged abruptly as a ruin; probably a place for ſacrifice, correſponding with The Holy-bones. It was not unuſual, in early times, to convert Heathen temples into Chriſtian churches; or to raiſe on their ſite places for the worſhip of the true God[5]."

Among other traditions of Geoffrey of Monmouth, it is ſaid that king Leir built a vault under the river, which he dedicated to Janus, under the which his daughter Cordelia cauſed him to be buried; and that Archigallo, another king of the Britons, was alſo buried there. On this particular Mr. S. Carte, the ſolicitor, thus writes to Dr. Ducarel, from Leiceſter, Sept. 21, 1751:

"I have not omitted any proper opportunity to enquire after ſuch traditions in this place as can be ſuppoſed to have any relation to the contents of Mr. Lambarde's[6] account of Leiceſter, or the remarkable piece of architecture which he mentions as undertaken, and carried on, by king Leir, whom he ſuppoſes to have been the founder of this place, and to have given the name to it. In reſpect to this latter part, viz. the king and his name, I cannot find any one perſon here that has ſeen either the original work of Geoffrey of Monmouth, or even our Thomſon's tranſlation of it. Indeed, I find ſeveral who are acquainted with the Britannia of Mr. Camden, and the ſeveral editions thereof by the late Biſhop of London; whence they have imbibed not only a diſbelief of Geoffrey's ſtory, but alſo a prejudice to his name and character; both which they ſtigmatize as beneath the notice of an Antiquary. Indeed, as to the tradition of a vaulted paſſage under the river Soar, I find ſome remainders of it; but they are ſo confuſed, both in reſpect to the place, extent, and uſe or deſign of it, as not to admit of any inference from thence in ſupport of Geoffrey's narrative, as you will ſoon perceive from the terms of my information; which (however inconſiderable for itſelf) I chooſe to communicate to you in the order that I received it.

"I begin with the account which was firſt delivered: according to which, one mouth of, or entrance into, the vault's paſſage is ſaid to have been in a ſtreet lying contiguous or near to the Southern wall of the yard or cemetery of the pariſh church of St. Nicholas; of which ſtreet you may ſee ſome mention in Dr. Stukeley's map of this place, by the name or ſtyle of Applegate-ſtreet, or Shambles-lane; and the other mouth, or entrance, is ſaid to have been at, or very near, to the ſite of what was an antient ſeat, near the foreſt of Charnwood, heretofore and ſtill called Bradgate houſe. But as to the particular place when this pretended paſſage was carried under the channel or courſe of the river, this tradition is abſolutely ſilent.

"The other tradition places one mouth of, or entrance into, the vault at or near to the remainder of the moſaic work in the cellar of the houſe of Mrs. Bracebridge[7], over againſt the elm-trees, which trees you will find diſtinguiſhed in the map of Dr. Stukeley; whence this tradition repreſents the paſſage to have been carried on through what was heretofore part of the pariſh of St. Clement (but now united to that of All Saints), to and under a part of the river contiguous to a parcel of meadow ground called the Pingle[8], and lying beyond or out of the walls of this town, and from thence to Bradgate, which place this tradition repreſents as the boundary or mouth of the paſſage. It may deſerve your regard on this occaſion, that both theſe traditions repreſent the vault, as undertaken, and carried on, by the means, or for the uſe, of ſome religious houſe or houſes, heretofore in town; to which part of the tradition one gentleman here has attempted to give ſome colour, from a vault, or paſſage, from the cathedral of Worceſter, or from the priory there, to the extremity of, or beyond the walls of, that city, and (if my information be right) ſtill remaining, and notoriouſly diſtinguiſhed there. But whatever colour this narrative in reſpect to Worceſter may ſeem to give to either of theſe traditions, yet it muſt of neceſſity be removed, upon a conſideration of the ſites, and ſtates, of the ſeveral religious houſes heretofore in this place. Applegate-ſtreet is too remote from each of thoſe houſes, to be conſidered as containing any appendage to either of them. Indeed, the hoſpital of St. John was over-againſt the houſe now belonging to Mrs. Bracebridge, viz. on the other ſide of the ſtreet; but then the ſtreet here is very wide. I am alſo to obſerve, that behind the houſe of Mrs. Bracebridge, and at the diſtance of more than three breadths of the ſtreet from thence, there was heretofore a Dominican friery, now quite demoliſhed: but theſe houſes are modern; and the latter of them without any revenue whatſoever, and the income of the former very inconſiderable; and conſequently neither of them can be ſuppoſed to have had abilities to carry on ſo expenſive an undertaking; nor does it appear to me, after all my enquiries, that ſuch a paſſage could be of any real uſe to either of theſe religious houſes. There is yet another objection to this part of the tradition, which ariſes from the place, or ſeat, where the paſſage is ſaid to have ended. Bradgate never was a religious houſe, nor any thing but a hunting-ſeat; and there is reaſon to believe that, in point of time, it is ſubſequent to the reign of Edward II. There is one other tradition concerning a vaulted paſſage to Bradgate; according to which, the beginning thereof was within the ſite of Groby caſtle; and the uſe or deſign of the paſſage is diſtinguiſhed to be for a private communication from ſuch caſtle to Bradgate. And, indeed, if there be any real foundation for either of the traditions concerning a vaulted paſſage, I incline to believe that this latter muſt be conſidered as delivering the true ſtate of it. SAM. CARTE."

---

[1] Madox, Hiſt. Excheq. ed. 1759. p. 259. [2] Ed. Camden's Brit. vol. II. p. 556. [3] Leiceſterſhire Collections, p. *512.

[4] A book of the liſt of the mayors mentions this church being burnt in 1556, yet there is nothing in the pariſh books that gives reaſon to ſuppoſe that it was a fire of material conſequence.

[5] Or rather to hallow, and conſecrate, the ſpot for its new purpoſe. G A.

[6] Topographical Dictionary, p. 108; from Geoffrey of Monmouth.

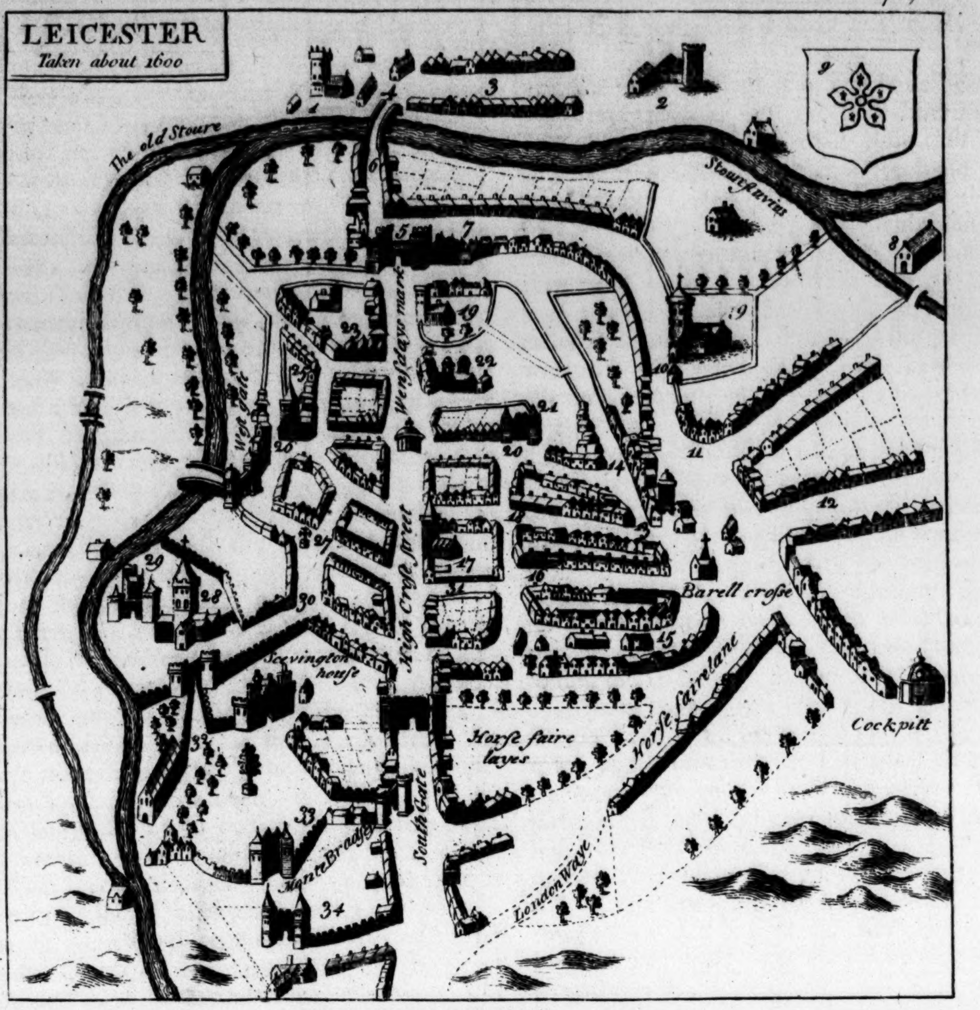
[7] See p. 10.

[8] A large cloſe on the ſide of North-Gate-ſtreet, towards the bottom of Soar-lane, edging on the Soar Weſtward, not far from the North-Gate.

BRITISH
12 JN 1928
MUSEUM

Plate VI. p. 9

LEICESTER
Taken about 1600

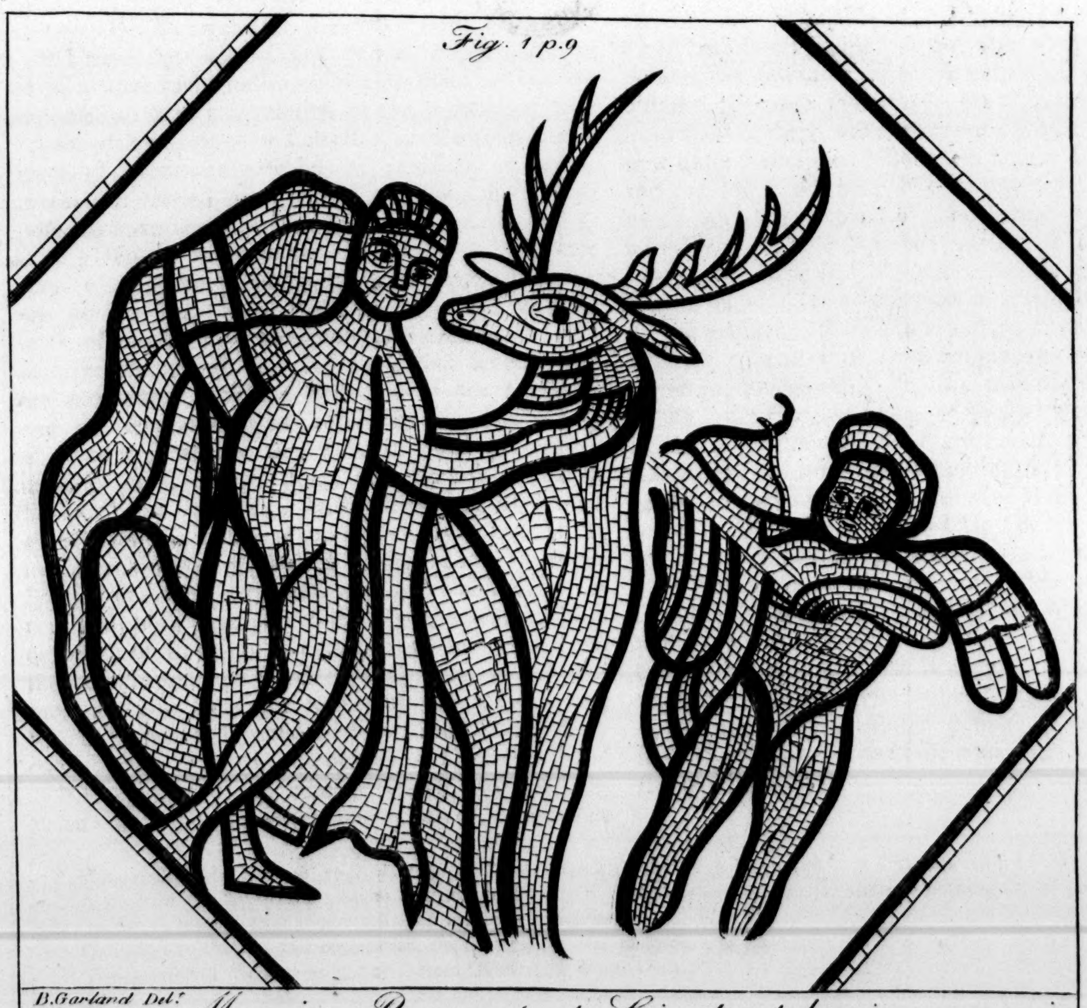


The old Stoure
Stoure river
Barell crosse
Cockpitt
Scevington house
High Crosse street
South Gate
Horse faire leyes
Horse faire lane
London Waye
Monte Bradge

Cheife places of ye Citie by figurs Noted

1 S. Leonards
2 Leiceſter Abbay
3 Abbay gate
4 Sundaye Bridge
5 North gate
6 North gate ſtreet
7 Sinuis gate
8 The Spittle
9 S. Margrets
10 Churche gate
11 Belgrave gate
12 Humberston gate
13 East gate
14 Swines market
15 Satterdayes market
16 Cankwell Lane
17 S. Martines
18 S. Martins Street
19 Alhallowes
20 High Street
21 Huntington place
22 Woole Hall
23 Graye fryers
24 Graye fryers gate
25 S. Nicholas
26 S. Nicholas ſhambles
27 Redd croſse ſtreet
28 S. Maryes
29 The Caſtell
30 Caſtell ſtreet
31 Black fryers lane
32 Ould Hoſpitall
33 The newe warke
34 The Grange

Fig. 1 p. 9



B. Garland Del.t Mosaic Pavement at Leicester taken in 1710.

About the year 1612 a vault was diſcovered, near the town of Leiceſter, ſomewhat deep in the ground, arched over, the ſtones very ſmall, about an inch long, and half an inch broad and thick, finely jointed together with a thin mortar, It was in length about five or ſix yards, in breadth about four, the roof covered with a ſquare kind of quarry, with ſmall earthen pipes therein. The arch and vault, with the walls and pavement, were wrought in moſaic work of ſtone and divers colours, repreſenting flowers, knots, birds, fretts, &c. In the roof were many ſmall earthen pipes, probably deſigned for one of thoſe ſtoves or bathing-houſes ſo common and coſtly among the Romans, that, as Seneca [1] ſaith, he ſeemed to be of poor and mean eſtate, whoſe baths did not ſhine with precious ſtones and moſaic work, the vaults arched with chryſtal, and the cocks of ſilver to ſpout out water; nay, ſo great was the Roman vanity and luxury, that in ſome the whole ſide-ſeats and pavements were of pure ſilver [2]. As Vitruvius writeth, the Romans growing to the exceſs of vitiouſneſs, through the abundance of their wealth, uſed thoſe kind of baths to purge and clarify themſelves. Theſe baths or bagnios were of two ſorts. The firſt, of which Seneca ſpeaks, had only the uſe of warm water, conveyed in pipes, and let in by cocks: the other was heated by fire, of which kind was this here mentioned; and that wherein the firſt Chriſtian Emperor, Conſtantine the Great [3], cauſed Flavia Maximiniana Fauſta, his ſecond wife, to be ſtifled, for having by falſe ſuggeſtions occaſioned him to put his eldeſt ſon Criſpus Cæſar to death [4].

Another Roman pavement was found, about 1675, in a cellar over againſt the Elm Trees, near All Saints church; of which Mr. Carte[5], in a letter to Mr. Humphrey Wanley, dated "Leiceſter, Aug. 7, 1710," gives this account, accompanied with a drawing by Mr. Benjamin Garland (reverſed in Plate VI. fig. 1.)

"This opus teſſellatum was diſcovered in digging the cellar, at about a yard and half under the common preſent ſurface of the earth. What extent the whole pavement was of is not known; but this figure, which by order of the maſter of the houſe was preſerved, is an octagon, ſurrounded by a liſt, as you ſee in part repreſented in the corners of the picture herewith ſent you. Without this, though not here repreſented, is a twiſt or wreath of various colours; and round that is a ſecond liſt like the former. Theſe two liſts, with the wreath between them, are 6 inches and a quarter broad. The downright and tranſverſe diameters of the area are juſt a yard; but the others, leading from corner to corner, are a yard and two inches and an half. The man, from head to foot, is two feet and 4½ inches. Cupid ſeems to be two feet; but his feet, as well as the bottom of the monſter, are ſpoiled, the teſſellæ repreſenting them being gone. You will eaſily underſtand that the whole area of the figure, which is here left blank, ought to be filled up with white teſſellæ, in like manner as you ſee ſome intervals of the figures here. I hope that what foregoes will ſerve to give you a juſt idea of this piece of antiquity; but forbear to make any reflections on it, as knowing that your genius and ſtudies qualify you for that much better than your affectionate friend, &c. SAM. CARTE."

In a ſubſequent letter to Browne Willis, Eſq; Mr. Carte adds, "This remarkable piece of antiquity is generally called, by ſuch authors as mention it, Actæon; but is indeed the repreſentation of that fable, which ſays, that a perſon finding fault with Venus, ſhe in revenge engaged her ſon Cupid to make him fall in love with a monſter; it conſiſting of the figure of Cupid with his bow drawn, and a man with one arm about a monſter's neck as going to kiſs it. The monſter has the head of a ſtag, which gave the occaſion to the calling it Actæon. What extent the whole pavement was of, is not known; but it paſſed at leaſt through the reſt of the cellar. This figure alone was preſerved, becauſe the maſter of the houſe was minded to have the cellar dug deeper; and a workman who was employed in it told me that he found the earth under the teſſellated pavement to conſiſt of little elſe but oyſter ſhells, and that to a great depth. The firſt time I ſaw the pavement was in 1680, and then the colours of the teſſellæ were much brighter than they now are."

Mr. Peck, on comparing the drawing with the original pavement, diſcovered its inaccuracy, and had another taken, under his own inſpection, by Mr. Richard Collins, an ingenious limner. His reaſoning on the ſubject is novel and ingenious: "Mr. Carte's account," he ſays, "is pretty enough; but, before it is allowed, we muſt firſt prove the figure itſelf is the figure of a man. For my part, I rather take it to be the figure of a woman, and that woman to be Diana. But though I allow the woman to be Diana, yet I do not take the ſtag to be Actæon; becauſe it is ridiculous to think Diana would be ſo fond of leaning upon a gentleman ſhe had turned into a beaſt. No! the repreſentation, I conceive, may be thus much better accounted for. Diana, it is well known, was a lover of fountains and bathing in them (Actæon for that). This made her picture a proper ornament for ſuch a floor. She was alſo the patroneſs of hunters, and the ſtag was a beaſt peculiarly ſacred to her. Thus there is a coin of Hadrian with a ſtag on the reverſe, circumſcribed Ἄρτεμις Ἐφέσια; and another of Gallienus, with a ſtag on the reverſe, circumſcribed DIANAE CONS. AVG. Both of theſe are mentioned by Pierius [6].

"Diana's averſion to men is a matter as much noted as any of the former. Whilſt therefore ſhe ſo fondly leans on her favourite beaſt, and thereby, in the language of painters, ſpeaks her delight in hunting, methinks I hear Cupid ſay, 'As much as you deſpiſe me, and value the ſports of the field, this arrow ſhall teach you better manners, and make you, as well as all other deities, confeſs the power of Love.' If this be not the hiſtory, the next moſt probable I can think of is the ſtory of Diana and Iphigenia; for that the principal figure is a woman, and not a man, I ſtill inſiſt. Iphigenia, we are told, was the daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemneſtra; whoſe father having accidentally killed a ſtag of Diana's, the goddeſs in a rage ſtopped the paſſage of the Greek fleet with contrary winds. Whereupon a ſoothſayer told them, Diana would not be ſatisfied without ſome of his blood was ſacrificed. Thereupon Ulyſſes ſtole Iphigenia away from her mother, pretending he carried her to be married to Achilles; but in pity to her, when ſhe was ready to be ſacrificed at Aulis, Diana put a hart in her ſtead, and carried her away into Taurica, where ſhe was made a prieſteſs of Diana by King Thoas, to ſacrifice, as was always done, with man's blood. After which, her brother Oreſtes coming thither, ſhould have been ſacrificed, but that ſhe knew him, and preſerved his life; who a while after ſtole both her and Diana's image away, and fled with them into Italy. Of all theſe things, Propertius, lib. iii. el. 7. Virgil, Æn. ii. 4. Ovid, Met. iii. Triſt. iv. 4. Juv. Sat. xii. Mart. iii. 49. make ample mention. Both theſe accounts, I think, agree well enough with the picture; for it is as natural for Diana to lean fondly on Iphigenia under the ſhape of a ſtag, to ſhew her pity for the lady and her reſpect for her prieſteſs, as it is for her to expreſs, by the ſame poſture, the great pleaſure ſhe took in hunting. But I rather incline to the firſt. And if any other produces a third hypotheſis, as probable as any of the former, I ſhall not take it as a contradiction, but a kindneſs; for I love to hear the ſentiments of good judges on the ſame thing, let them be never ſo different."

---

[1] Epiſt 86.

[2] Lib. xxxiii. c. 12.

[3] Aurel. Victor. f. 179. & Zoſimus, lib. ii.

[4] In both theſe ſorts of baths, men and women entered promiſcuouſly together; a cuſtom firſt brought to Rome by Agrippa, and for a long time continued there, notwithſtanding thoſe ſeveral laws by which it was prohibited, mentioned by Dio, lib. xlvi. and by Ælius Spartianus. Nor were the Clementine Conſtitutions (lib. i. c. 6. & 9.), or decrees of the Council of Laodicea (Canon 30.), ſufficient to keep the primitive Chriſtians from frequenting them; this incivil cuſtom remaining till the time of Juſtinian, who, among the lawful cauſes of divorce (Nov. 117.) ſets this down for one: "If a wife enter into a "bath with men, not having firſt obtained licence from her huſband." MS. Chetwynd.

[5] Phil. Tranſ. vol. XXVII. p. 324. Abridgement, v. V. p. 63.

[6] Hierogl. lib. vii. cap. 14. and are by no means uncommon.

In 1782, a drawing was ſhewn to the Society of Antiquaries by Mr. Blackburne, who ſuppoſed it to be Hercules having caught the brazen-footed golden-horned ſtag, ſacred to Diana, after purſuing it a whole year on mount Mænalus, drawing the lion's ſkin over his head with one hand, while the other careſſes and tames the ſtag. Cupid he imagined to have been introduced into the floor of the General's pavilion, as an accompanyment of Love with Valour.

Mr. Bickerſtaffe, inclining to the firſt idea of Diana and Actæon, thought "the arrow was aimed at the head of the ſtag, but not diſcharged from the bow. The figure that points it recalls to him the deſcription of the ſymbols of Apollo's vengeance on the Greeks, in the firſt book of Homer: his bow and arrow are there employed for nine days, to ſpread the plague among the Greeks. The ſame artillery is the frequent type of the execution of the wrath of the true God. The greater or female figure, which ſtands before the ſtag, views him in a poſture of modeſty, alarm, and averſion, agreeably to Ovid's deſcription[1]:

"Quæ quanquam comitum turba ſtipata ſuarum,
In latus obliquum tamen adſtitit: oraque retro
Flexit: & ut vellet promptas habuiſſe ſagittas,
Quas habuit, ſic hauſit aquas: vultumque virilem
Perfudit: ſpargenſque comas ultricibus undis," &c.

Thus tranſlated by Mr. Addiſon:

The Goddeſs ——
——tho' the crowded Nymphs her body hide,
Half backward ſhrunk, and view'd him from aſide.
Surpriz'd at firſt, ſhe would have ſnatch'd her bow,
But ſees the circling waters round her flow,
Theſe in the hollow of her hand ſhe took,
And daſh'd them in his face while thus ſhe ſpoke, &c.

The animal ſeems to turn away its head from the water, and the Goddeſs to be gathering her garment over her ſhoulders. When Mr. Bickerſtaffe examined this pavement, about the year 1765, Mr. Cooper owned the houſe (now Mr. Worthington's) over the cellar which contains it. Mr. Cooper re-built, and metamorphoſed this houſe, with the adjoining one, into the appearance of an elegant temple, with Gothic windows.

Another learned friend ſuggeſts, that the pavement is a repreſentation of the Fable of Cypariſſus. This young favourite of Apollo having by accident killed a beautiful large white ſtag[2], ſacred to the Nymphs, and of which he was himſelf particularly fond, laid its death ſo much to heart, that Apollo, in pity to the youth, changed him into a cypreſs, the emblem of mourning. In illuſtration of this idea, we cannot decline inſerting the ſtory at length as told by Ovid[3], with a tranſlation by Mr. Congreve:

"Adfuit huic turbæ metas imitata cupreſſus,
Nunc arbor, puer ante Deo dilectus ab illo,
Qui citharam nervis, & nervis temperat arcus.
Namque ſacer Nymphis Carthæa tenentibus arva
Ingens cervus erat: latéque patentibus altas
Ipſe ſuo capiti præbebat cornibus umbras:
Cornua fulgebant auro: demiſſaque in armos
Pendebant tereti gemmata monilia collo.
Bulla ſuper frontem parvis argentea loris
Vincta movebatur: parilique ex ære nitebant
Auribus in geminis circum cava tempora baccæ.
Iſque metu vacuus, naturalique pavore
Depoſito, celebrare domos, mulcendaque colla
Quamlibet ignotis manibus præbere ſolebat.
Sed tamen ante alios, Ceæ pulcherrime gentis,
Gratus erat, Cypariſſe, tibi. Tu pabula cervum
Ad nova, tu liquidi ducebas fontis ad undam:
Tu modo texebas varios per cornua flores:
Nunc, eques in tergo reſidens, huc latus & illuc
Mollia purpureis frænabas ora capiſtris.
Æſtus erat, medinſque dies: Soliſque vapore
Concava littorei fervebant brachia Cancri.
Feſſus in herboſa poſuit ſua corpora terra
Cervus: & arborea ducebat frigus ab umbra.
Hunc puer imprudens jaculo Cypariſſus acuto
Fixit: &, ut ſævo morientem vulnere vidir,
Velle mori ſtatuit. Quæ non ſolatia Phœbus
Dixit? & ut leviter, pro materiaque doleret,
Admonuit. Gemit ille tamen: munuſque ſupremum,
Hoc petit à Superis, ut tempore lugeat omni.
Jamque, per immenſos egeſto ſanguine fletus,
In viridem verti cœperunt membra colorem;
Et modo, qui nivea pendebant fronte capilli,
Horrida cæſaries fieri: ſumtoque rigore
Sidereum gracili ſpectare cacumine cœlum.
Ingemuit, triſtiſque Deus, Lugebere nobis,
Lugebiſque alios, aderiſque dolentibus, inquit."

"Amid the throng of this promiſcuous wood,
With pointed top, the taper Cypreſs ſtood;
A tree, which once a Youth, and heavenly fair,
Was of that Deity the darling care,
Whoſe hand adapts, with equal ſkill, the ſtrings
To bows with which he kills, and harps to which he ſings.
For heretofore, a mighty Stag was bred,
Which on the fertile fields of Cæa fed;
In ſhape and ſize he all his kind excell'd,
And to Carthæan Nymphs was ſacred held.
His beamy head, with branches high diſplay'd,
Afforded to itſelf an ample ſhade;
His horns were gilt, and his ſmooth neck was grac'd
With ſilver collars thick with gems enchas'd:
A ſilver boſs upon his forehead hung,
And brazen pendants in his ear-rings rung.
Frequenting houſes, he familiar grew,
And learnt, by cuſtom, Nature to ſubdue;
Till, by degrees, of fear and wildneſs broke,
Ev'n ſtranger hands his proffer'd neck might ſtroak.
Much was the beaſt by Cæa's youth careſs'd,
But thou, ſweet Cypariſſus, lov'dſt him beſt:
By thee, to paſtures freſh, he oft was led,
By thee oft water'd at the fountain's head:
His horns with garlands, now, by thee were ty'd,
And, now, thou on his back would'ſt wanton ride;
Now here, now there would'ſt bound along the plains,
Ruling his tender mouth with purple reins.
'Twas when the ſummer ſun, at noon of day,
Thro' glowing Cancer, ſhot his burning ray,
'Twas then, the favourite Stag in cool retreat
Had ſought a ſhelter from the ſcorching heat;
Along the graſs his weary limbs he laid,
Inhaling freſhneſs from the breezy ſhade:
When Cypariſſus with his pointed dart,
Unknowing, pierc'd him to the panting heart.
But when the Youth, ſurpriz'd, his error found,
And ſaw him dying of the cruel wound,
Himſelf he would have ſlain through deſperate grief;
What ſaid not Phœbus, that might yield relief!
To ceaſe his mourning, he the boy deſir'd,
Or mourn no more than ſuch a loſs requir'd.
But he inceſſant griev'd: at length addreſs'd
To the ſuperior powers a laſt requeſt;
Praying, in expiation of his crime,
Thenceforth to mourn to all ſucceeding time.
And now, of blood exhauſted he appears,
Drain'd by a torrent of continual tears;
The fleſhy colour in his body fades,
And a green tincture all his limbs invades;
From his fair head, where curling locks late hung,
A horrid buſh with briſtled branches ſprung,
Which, ſtiffening by degrees, its ſtem extends,
Till to the ſtarry ſkies the ſpire aſcends.
Apollo ſad look'd on, and, ſighing, cry'd,
"Then be, for ever, what thy prayer imply'd:
Bemoan'd by me, in others grief excite;
And ſtill preſide at every Funeral Rite!"

Theſe ſeveral conjectures will find advocates. But it may perhaps be doubted if the deſigners of this curious morçeau[4] extended their views to any of the ſubjects propoſed, though it muſt be confeſſed both Hiſtory and Fable have in their turn furniſhed ſubjects to divert us in antient Moſaic.

---

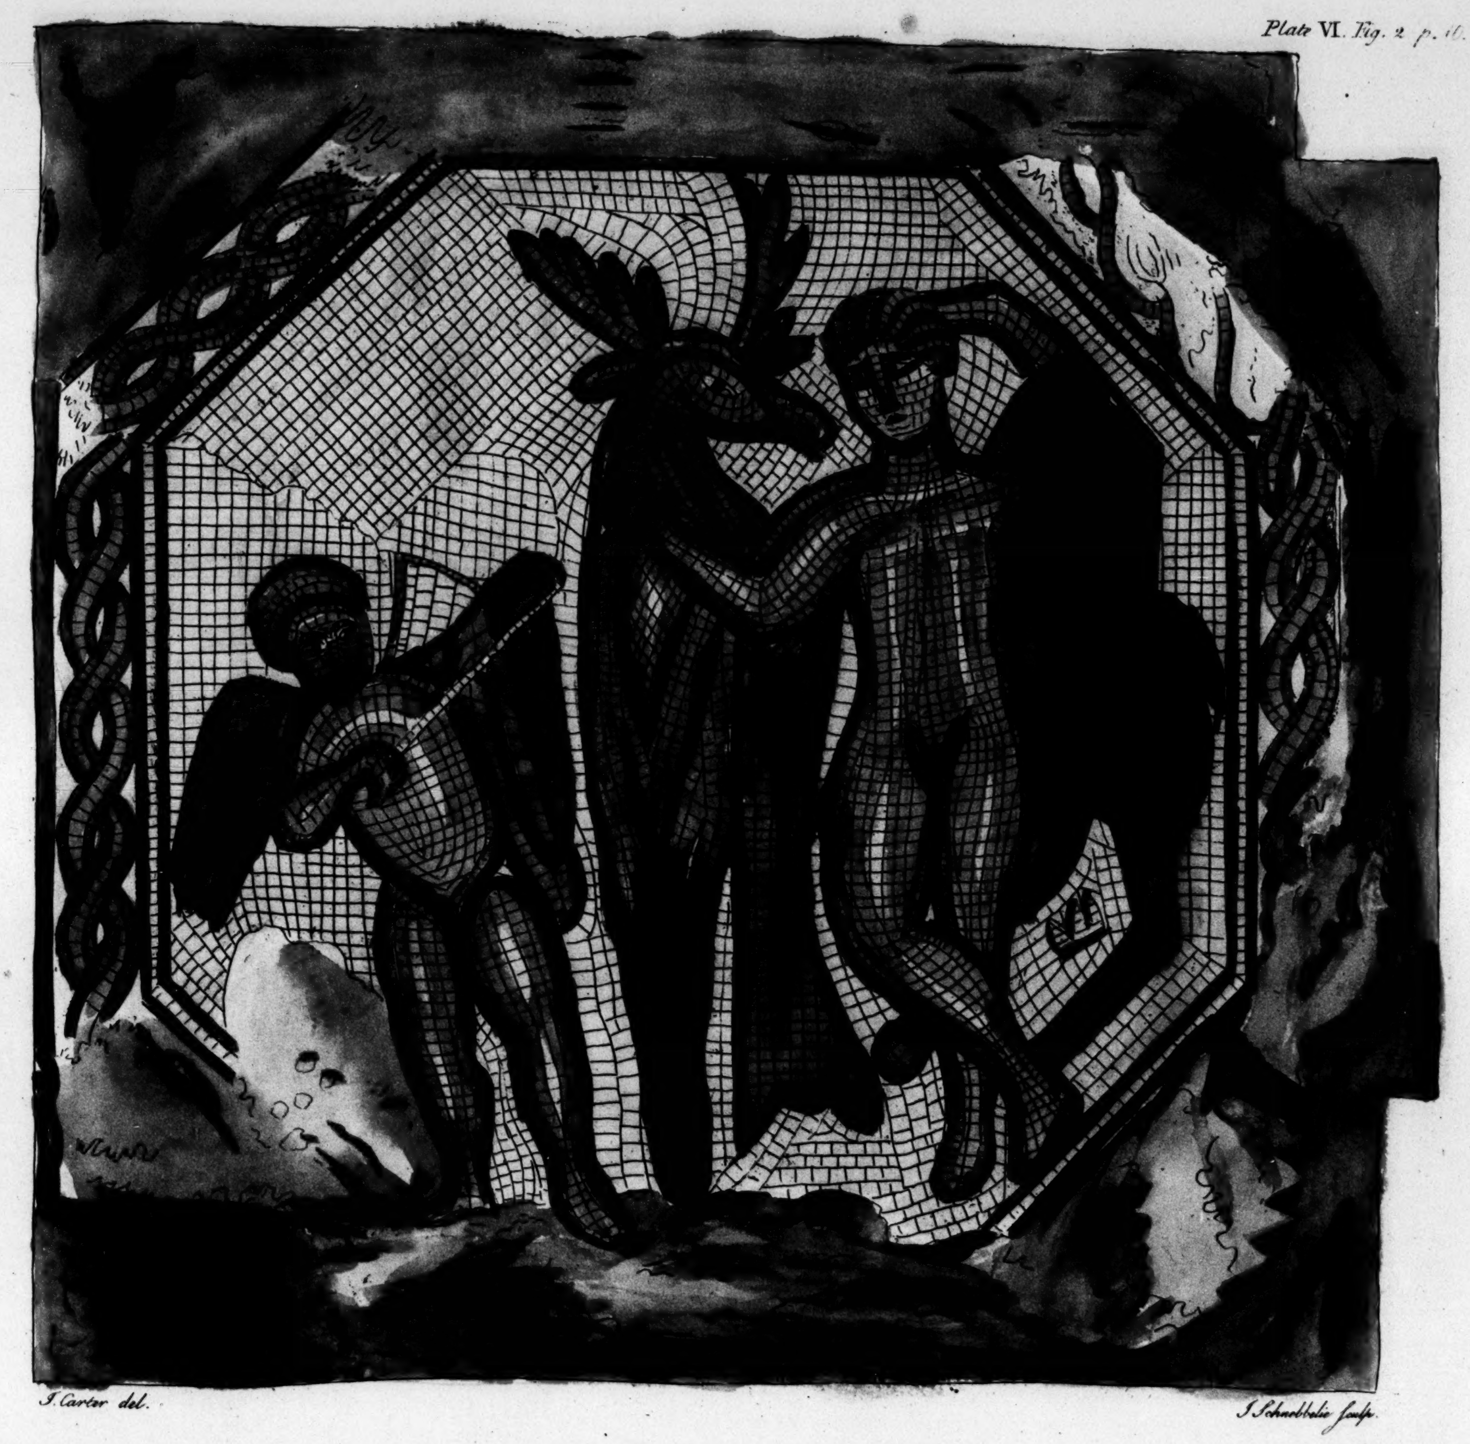
[1] Metam. III. 186—190.

[2] Servius, on Virgil's Georgics, I. 20, ſays Cypariſſus was the favourite of Sylvanus, and took ſo much to heart the death of a tame doe killed by Sylvanus inadvertently, that the God was forced to bring about this metamorphoſis.

[3] Metam. X. 106—142.

[4] It ſhould not be forgotten, that of what appears ſo beautiful in the eyes of a Leiceſterſhire Antiquary, Mr. Gilpin ſays, "This ſcrap of teſſellated pavement may be a piece of Roman antiquity; but it is a piece of miſerable workmanſhip." Obſervations on Cumberland and Weſtmoreland, 1772, I. 246.

Plate VI. Fig. 2 p. 10.



J. Carter del.

J. Schnebbelie Sculp.

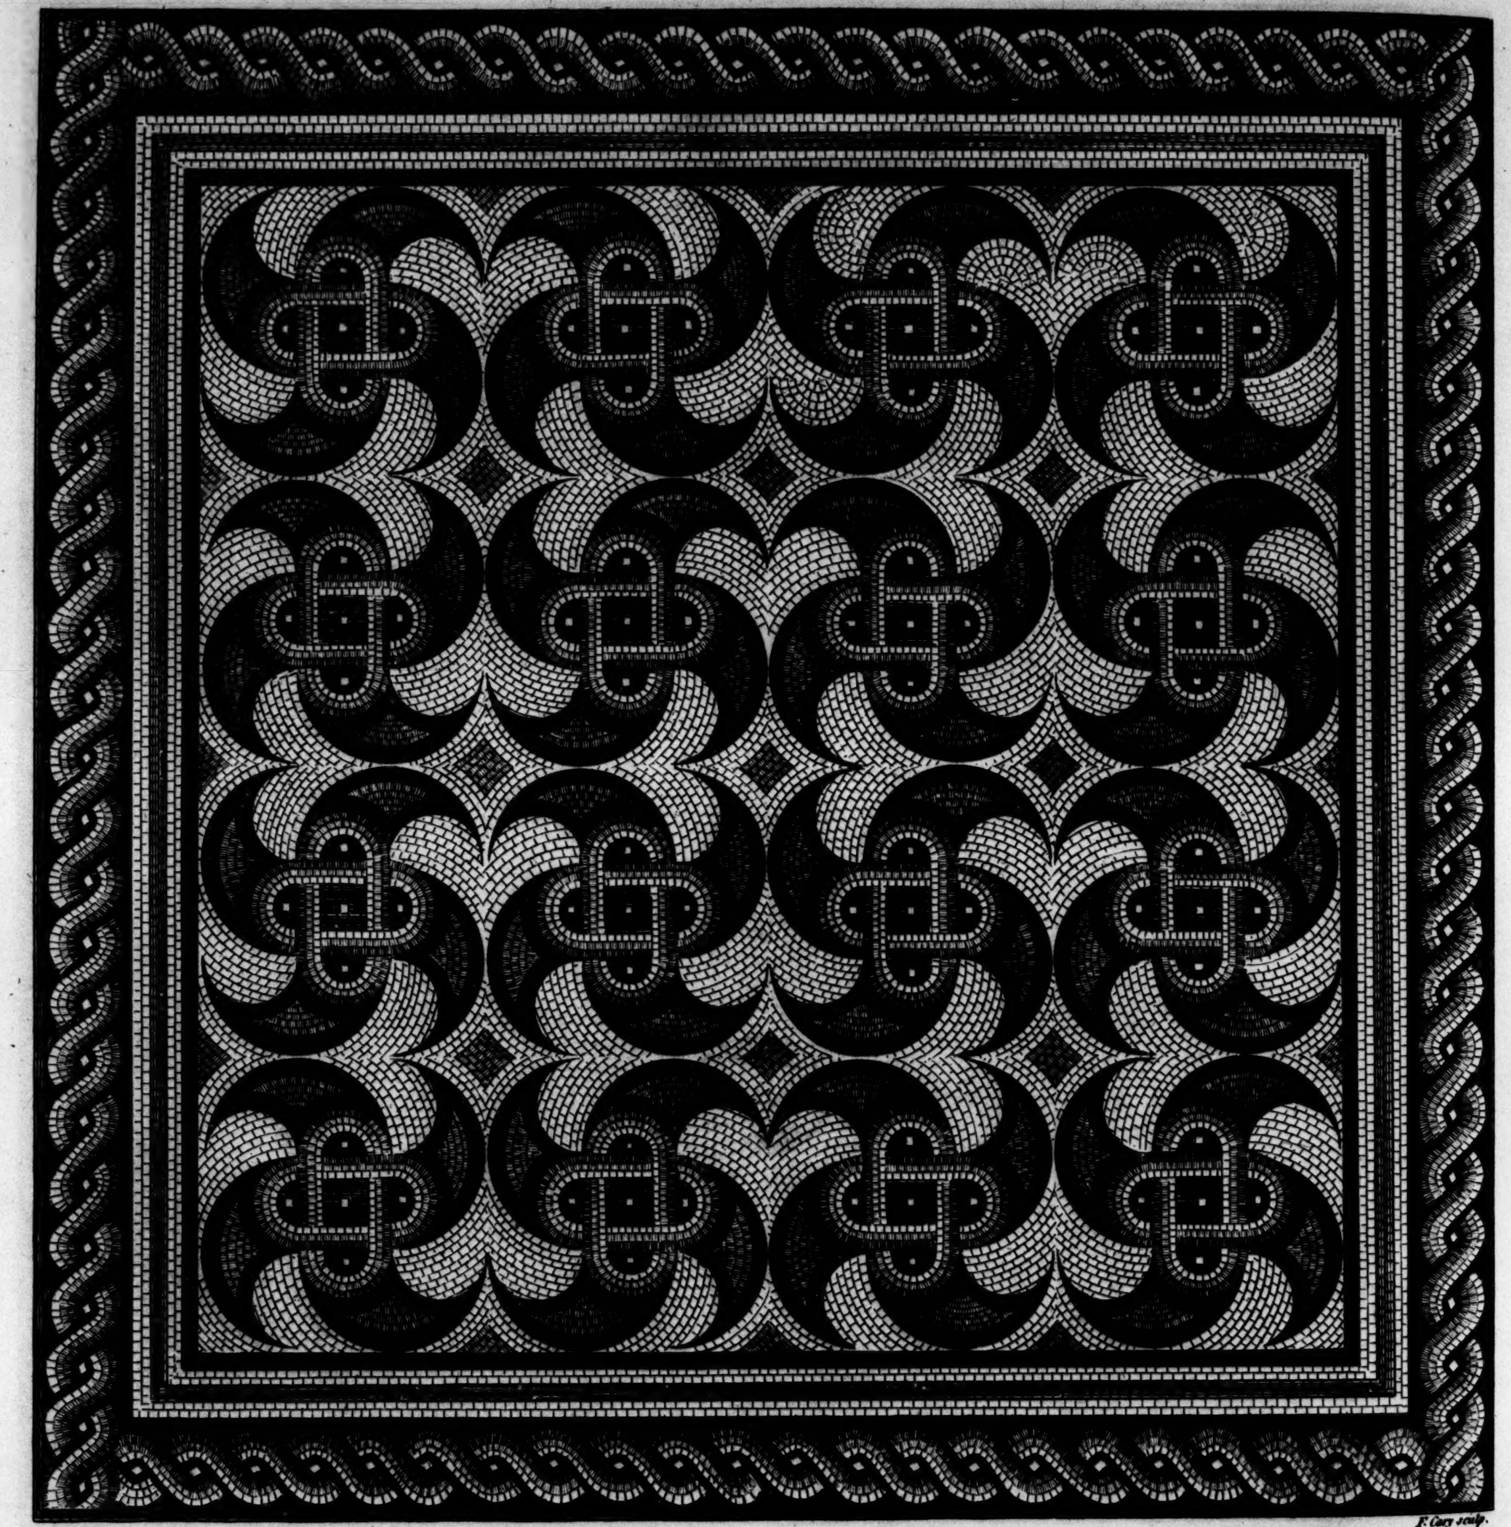
Mosaic Pavement at Mr. Worthington's in Leicester.

From a Drawing taken by Mr. Carter 1788, & now in the Library of the Society of Antiquaries.

BRITISH
12 JN 1923
MUSEUM

BRITISH
12 JN 1928
MUSEUM

Plate VIII. p. 11.

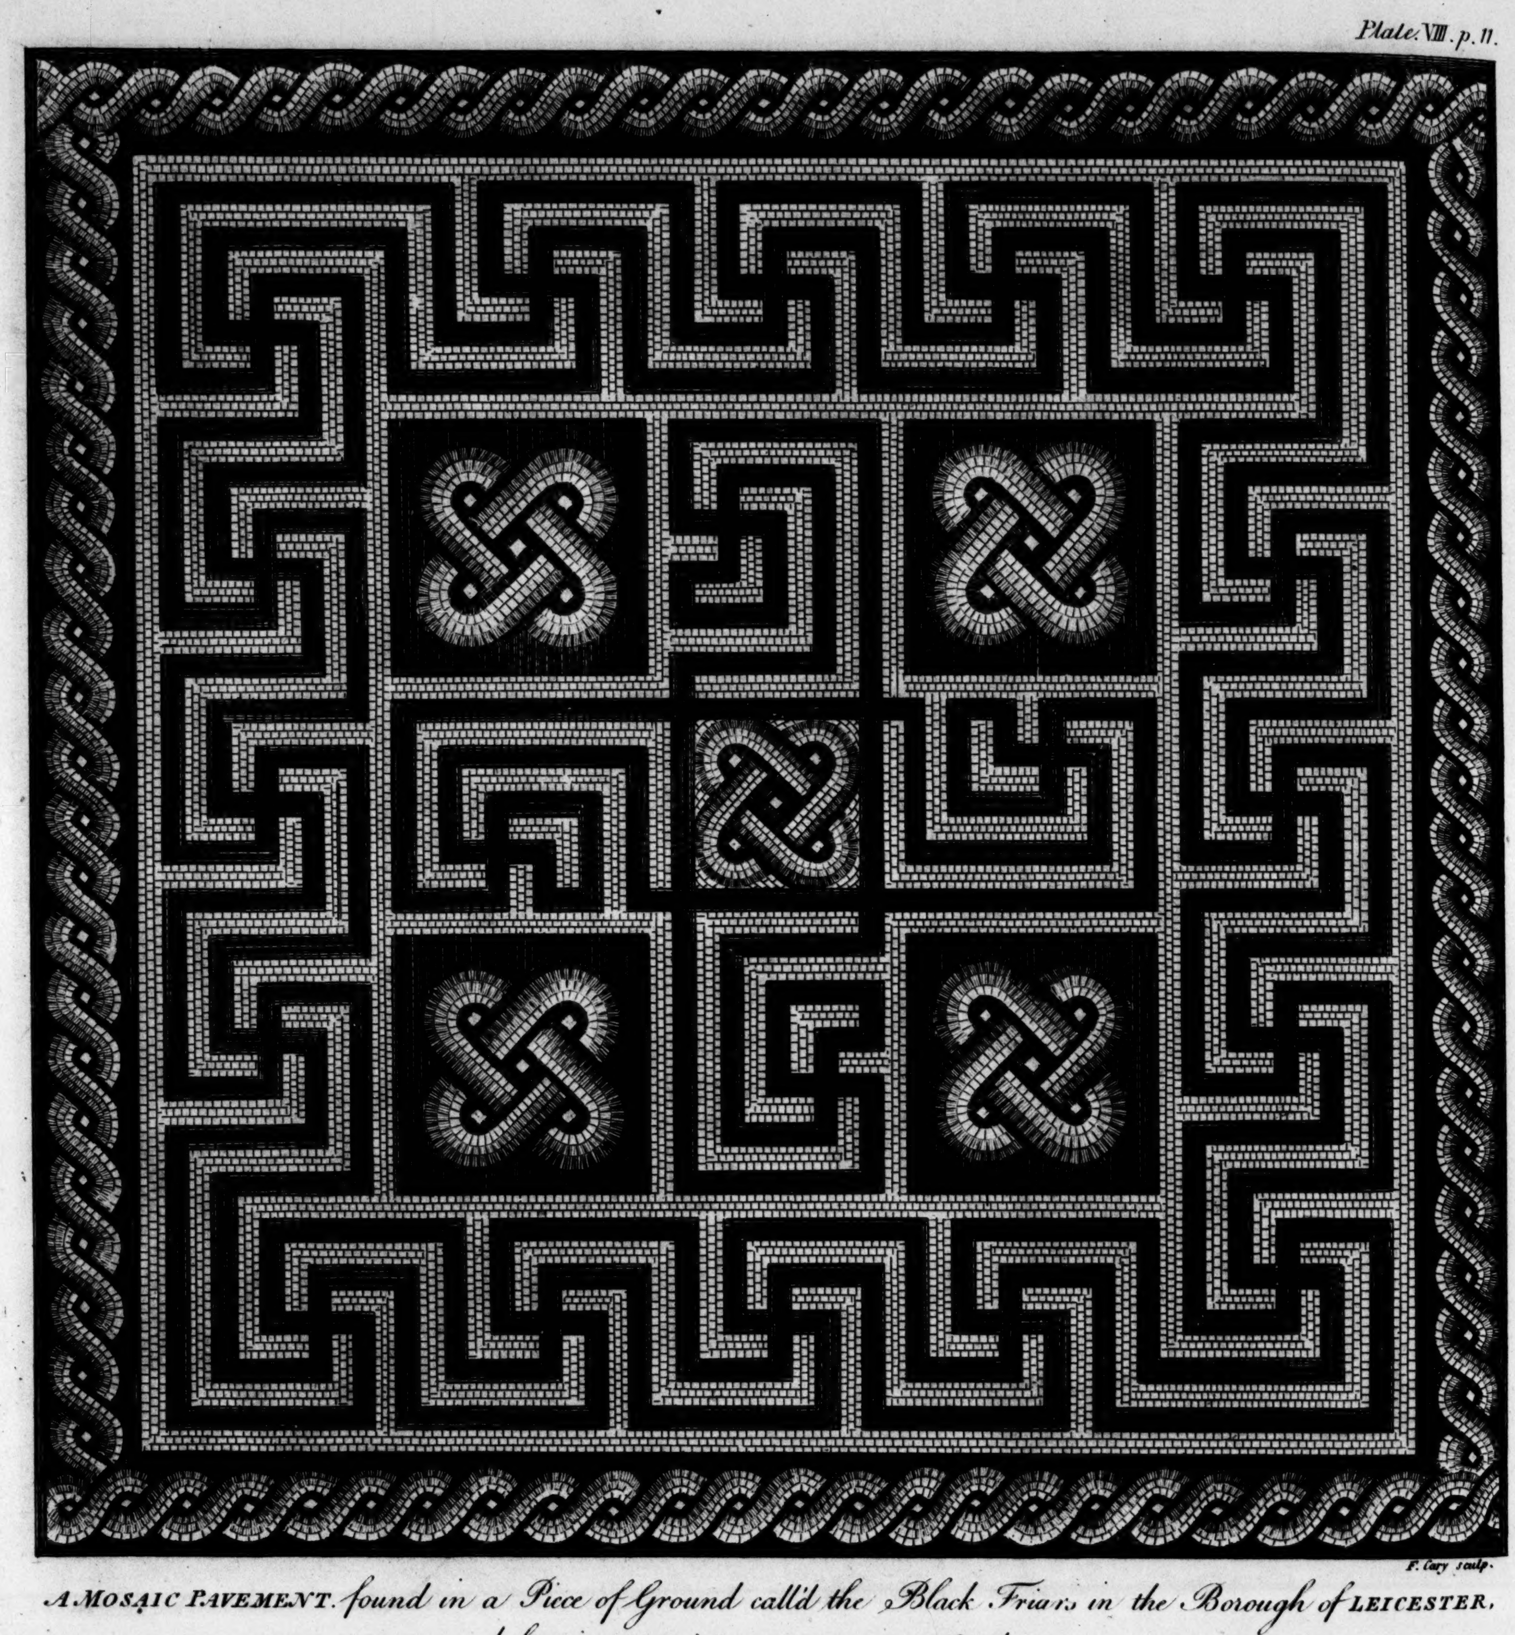


F. Cary sculp.

A MOSAIC PAVEMENT, found in a Piece of Ground call'd the Black Friars in the Borough of LEICESTER, belonging to ROGERS RUDING, Esq^{r}. October 1754.

BRITISH
12 JN 928
MUSEUM

Plate VIII. p. 11.



F. Cary sculp.

A MOSAIC PAVEMENT. found in a Piece of Ground call'd the Black Friars in the Borough of LEICESTER, belonging to ROGERS RUDING, Esq.r October 1754.

BRITISH
12 JN 1923
MUSEUM

Plate IX. p. 11.

A Third Mosaic Pavement, from the Black Friars, Leicester 1754.

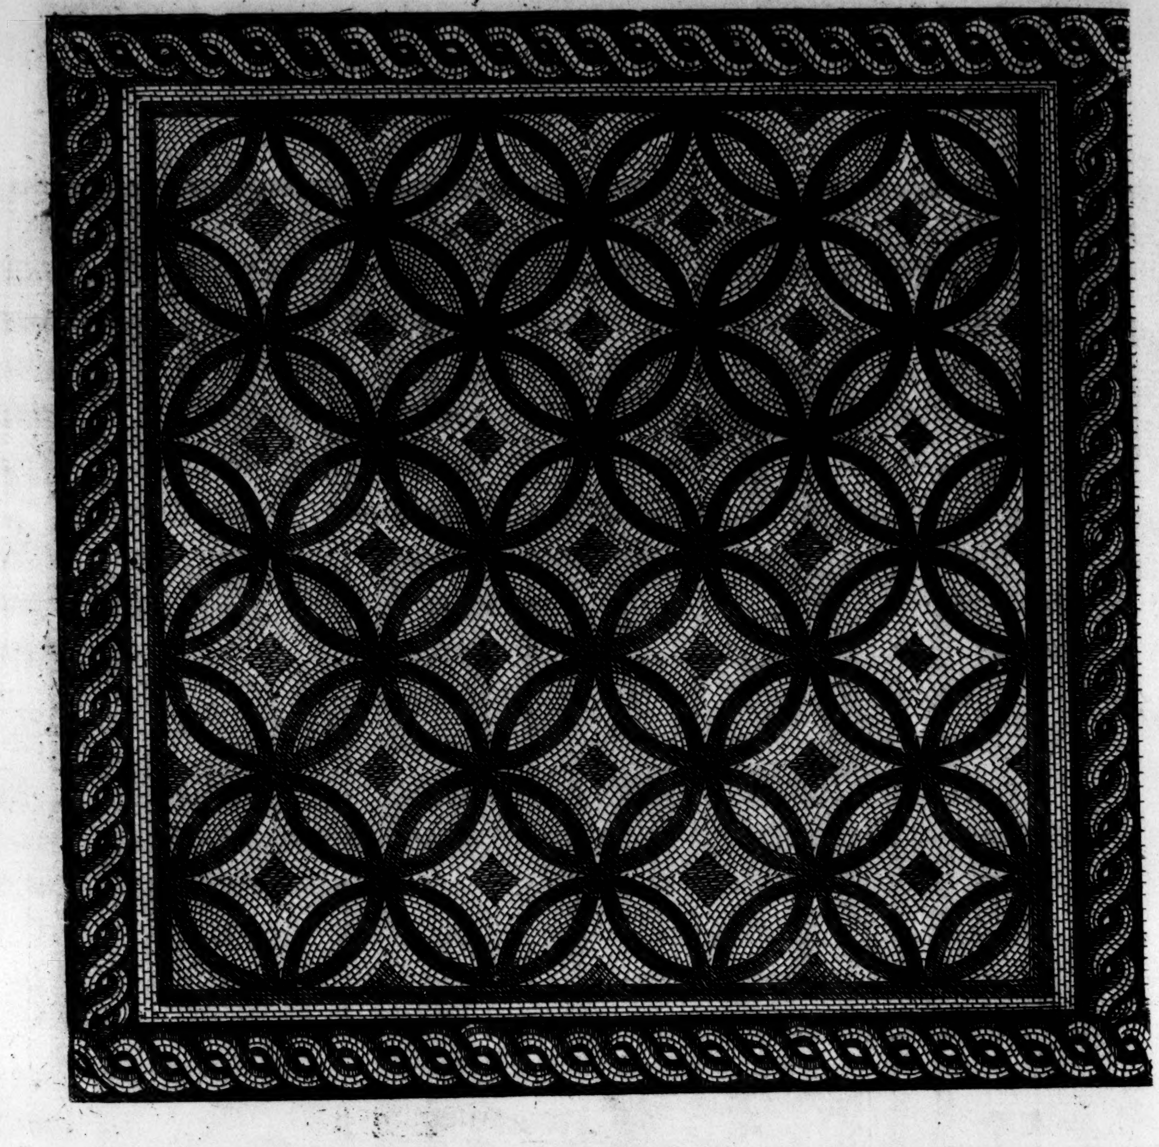


Fig. 2. p. 12. A Mosaic Pavement from the Cherry Orchard, Leicester. 1782.

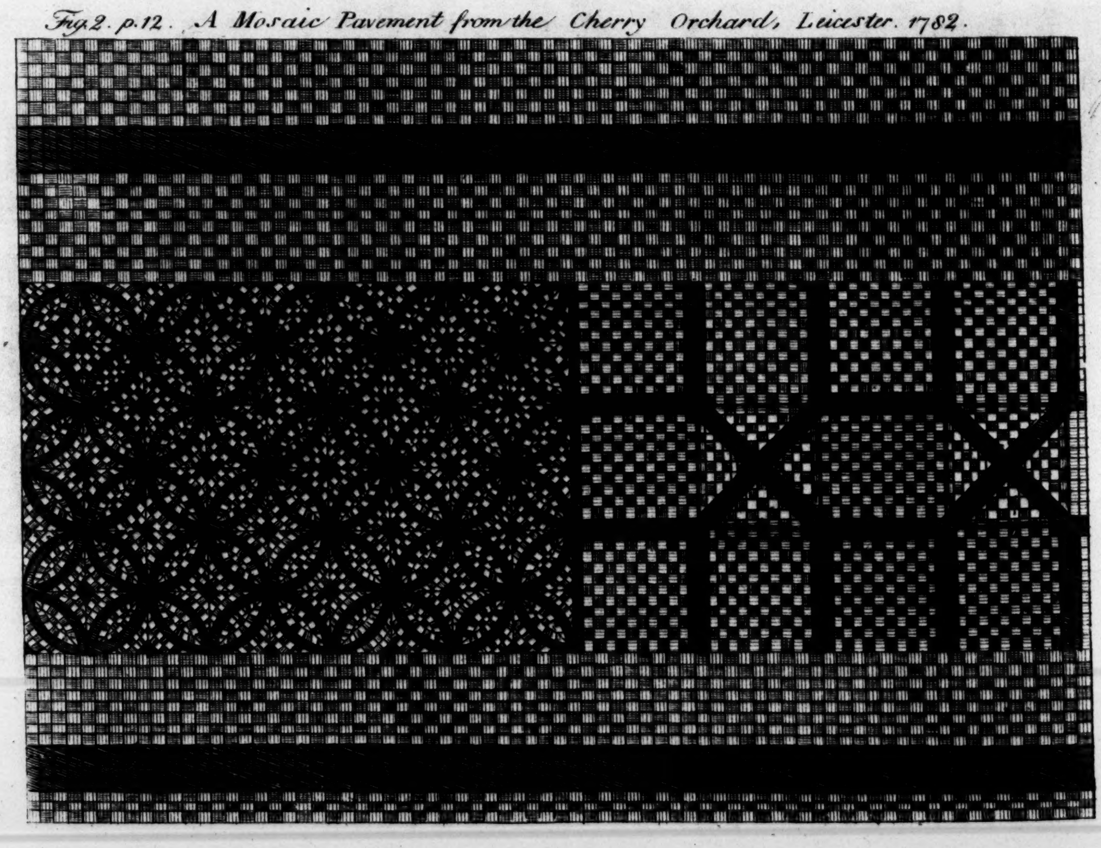

The drawing which was taken for Mr. Peck is not now to be recovered; but there is the leſs reaſon to regret the loſs, as a delineation was taken, in 1788, by Mr. Carter for Mr. Bray; and by him preſented to the Society of Antiquaries; from which, by their permiſſion, an accurate engraving is here exhibited, Plate VI. fig. 2.

In ſome detached remarks on what Mr. Carte calls Leiceſtria ſubterranea, he adds, "March 1, 1710-11, George Licoriſh and another perſon concerned in digging wells, &c. told me, that they find that about the middle of the town the made earth extends about 16 feet deep; but about the Horſe-fair head, e. g. where Auſtin Heyford lives, &c. it extends but to about 9 feet. About 27 years ſince, digging the cellar, at Mr. Somerfield's houſe, where the opus teſſellatum is, lower, they found the earth to conſiſt of little elſe but oyſter-ſhell; and that they dug in one place deeper than ordinary to find the bottom of them, but ſtill found the ſame ſort of ſhells as deep as they went.

"March 2, in a well now digging at Joſeph Smith's, next to the King's-arms, the made earth is 17 feet deep. They find, a yard under ground, a ſtone wall running towards the ſtreet.

"Oct. 15, 1711, John Wilkins, alderman, told me that about 1667 or 1668, digging in a yard belonging to a houſe in the High-croſs Street, near the Water-houſe, being the corner houſe, where the ſtreet grows narrower, (the yard is ſituate on the South ſide next the Weſt end of the Friars[1]); having dug about 12 feet deep, he diſcovered a very fine floor, which, upon examination, was obſerved to be made of lime mortar, about 6 or 7 inches thick, about 16 feet long, and about 14 feet wide. The walls [whether of brick or ſtone he forgets, but they] were finely pointed; and on the North ſide of the room, within about four yards diſtance of each other, ſtood two chimnies as high as to the mantle-tree. A little under this room, on the South part, digging for a houſe of office, he found ſome gravel; and, digging 6 or 7 loads of gravel, or ſomewhat more, he found under that gravel a great quantity of oyſter-ſhells; and digging in the middle of the cellar belonging to the ſaid houſe, next the ſtreet, for gravel, which there was about half a yard deep; underneath it he found a large foundation [of a wall as he ſuppoſes] of foreſt ſtone, laid dry, without mortar, and he took out two or three loads of that ſtone, and then made up a hole of half a yard diameter to drain the cellar, into which he uſed to pour down his waſte water, and it would receive whatſoever quantity he put into it, but which way it drained he cannot tell.

"About A. D. 1685, digging for laying pipes for conveyance of the water to the ſeveral parts of the town, he ſays, that near againſt Mr. Wells's houſe, on the Weſt ſide of the ſtreet, he dug about 12 feet deep in looſe earth, and in that found a great many old ſhoe-ſoals of a large ſize, 5 inches over (and a ſhoe-maker viewing them, ſaid that he never ſaw ſtitches taken cloſer and finer), and a great deal of other offal leather. He ſays alſo, that making the trench from about the Redcroſs-ſtreet down to the Elm-trees towards the North-gate, at a little diſtance, viz. 6 or 7 feet; from the houſes on the Weſt ſide of the ſtreet, they went along by the ſide of an old ſtone wall, which was well laid, but fallen down towards the houſes. He got many loads of ſtone from this wall which lay in his way.

"In coming up from the mill along Redcroſs-ſtreet, over againſt the lane, about the middle of it, running to St. Nicholas's church, he found ſome part of the foundation of the croſs, and part alſo of the cylinder, or pillar, which formerly had been erected on it; and there and near unto it, in the way towards the High-ſtreet, he found great quantities of ſlates and ſome pieces of old laths: ſome of the ſlates ſeemed to have been burnt.

"In coming from the South gate towards the Croſs, as they paſſed the lane leading to the caſtle, he found a large drain, whoſe bottom and ſides and top were framed of hewn ſtone, the cavity being about two feet diameter; the drain ſeemed to come from the Fryars, and pointed down towards the river.

"In digging from the Croſs towards the Eaſt gate, between Mr. Ludlam's at the Croſs, about as far as Mr. Clay's, or further, he obſerved a common-ſewer, or way, wide enough for a cart, with planks on each ſide held up by poſts, which ſtood up about a foot higher than the way; which planks and poſts were burned perfectly black: theſe were about 6 or 8 feet under the preſent ſurface.

"Sept. 7, 1716, upon notice given me by Mr. Spicer of a cellar's being digging at the ſecond houſe in the Highcroſs-ſtreet beyond the lane called Blue Boar-lane, croſſing of three bayes towards the ſtreet, I obſerved that there was, juſt even with the front of the houſe, a wall under ground, which how deep it was is uncertain (the workmen not digging to the foundation), but it was upright till within about a yard of the preſent ſurface at the entrance of the houſe. It was (as Mr. Licoriſh, upon meaſuring it, told me), 4 feet thick of ſtone, and Roman or Britiſh tile, with much mortar, viz. about two feet in height of ſtone; and then one and ſometimes two rows of Roman tile, each tile being an inch and a half thick, 12 inches broad, and 18 inches long. The upper part of the wall was caſt down, and lay declining towards the gutter, and ſeems to be the ſame as is mentioned by Mr. Wilkins in the foregoing page; and ſeeing that, by his account, it extended as far as where he dug for the water-works, which was four yards from the foundation of the houſe, it muſt have been ſo many yards, viz. four yards high. In the ſtreet the made earth above it was about two feet high; and under it there was a pavement of ſtone, like that of a ſtreet.

"May 2, 1717, in the midſt of the cellar next Mr. Carter's, ſeven feet under ground, about three yards from the ſtreet, the workmen found a well that was covered with a very large ſlate; it had been filled up, but the walls of it at top were plain enough, of which they got out many ſtones.

"In digging the foundation and cellars of the three firſt houſes next Mr. Carter's, they found, at about three or four feet under ground, ſigns of a great fire or conflagration, viz. great quantities of aſhes and cinders, which perhaps might be the effects of the general deſtruction of Leiceſter in 1173.

"In digging the cellar oppoſite the former on the Weſt ſide by the ſtrata of earth, &c. there were obſerved ſigns of three or four fires or conflagrations; but two eſpecially were very remarkable, the one about four feet under the ſurface, and the other five; probably the one was in 1173, the other ſoon after the Conqueſt, when Duke Edwin, or Hugh grand marſhal of his ſon Ivo, took up arms.

"In digging the ſecond cellar next Mr. Carter's houſe, at 7 or 8 feet under ground, was diſcovered a drain made of foreſt ſtone, the cavity being about a foot ſquare.

"In 1717 and 1718 ſeveral Roman coins were found, as has been already mentioned[2].

"Nov. 6, 1723, upon digging a well in the yard belonging to the White-Lion, at about two feet and an half depth, there was diſcovered a pavement compoſed of ſmall bricks, that were about one inch ſquare each; all of them red, except in one place about 4 or 5 inches broad, where they were white; they were all laid very even in lime mortar, declining to a certain line, and then riſing proportionably on the other ſide, which certainly was for the better conveying off any water from the place."

In October, 1754, two very fine moſaic pavements were found here in a piece of ground called the Black Fryars, belonging to Rogers Ruding, Eſq. The draughts of them given in Plates VII. and VIII. were taken by Henry Eames, of Shilton, ſurveyor of the road leading from Leiceſter to Hinckley. They were found, adjoining to each other, with a fragment of a third pavement, here exhibited in Plate IX. fig. 1. Some others ſeem to run under the preſent buildings.

Other pavements have been ſince found at Cooke's new Vauxhall, in a bathing room near the river, which [1] Under buildings adjoining to the Friary are caves, ſuppoſed to be near 2000 years old; 5 feet deep, 9 wide; length unknown.

[2] See p. 5; and ſome ſpecimens of them in Plate I.

now riſes over and damages them, but muſt formerly have been conſiderably lower, as at Saliſbury [1].

A curious fragment of moſaic work, not more than a foot over, but ſimilar to that found at the "Water-houſe," now "Johnſon's building," was taken up by the late ſexton of St. Martin's, when digging a grave in the South aile of that church, about 1773.

Another pavement [2] has ſtill more recently been diſcovered, of which a view is given in Plate IX. fig. 2.

"The Roman Foſs road," ſays a friend [3], "you well know, is Weſt of the town; about 75 yards Eaſt of which is this pavement, in a large cloſe, planted chiefly with cherry-trees (perhaps 80 years ago), and called The Cherry Orchard. On grubbing up the roots of one of the cherry-trees, the pavement was diſcovered. About the place where the tree was ſet the object is much (I may ſay totally) defaced, owing, I ſuppoſe, to the Barbarian's ſpade: the root ſtill remains in the ground [1782]; and how far the pavement goes, is at preſent uncertain. Mr. Bentley, the gentleman to whom this orchard belongs, dug yeſterday, in a Northern direction, about two yards from the part diſcovered, and found a continuation of it."

In digging a well lately, at the ſign of the Recruiting Serjeant, near St. Nicholas's church, at the depth of about eight yards from the ſurface of the ground, a plain Roman pavement was diſcovered, of a lightiſh cloſe grain friable, and by the ſide of it a thick wall built with very hard ſtone like that of the Jewry-wall, and in a direct line with it. In the ſpace of about forty yards from that place, in the ſame direction, is a houſe by the church-yard ſide, the foundation of whoſe cellar ſtands on the ſaid wall, S. W. of the church, as continued under the ſtreet, from the public houſe. Another ſubterraneous wall runs towards the Weſt, of the ſame impenetrable ſtone, in a perfect ſquare from the aforeſaid, which ſecond wall was an old window-place or frame. The coin in Plate III. fig. 4. was found twenty-four feet deep, the pavement twenty-nine. The public houſe cellar is nine feet deep; its floor is two feet lower than the top of the wall, which continues under riſing ground till it paſſes under the other cellar.

We ſhall purſue the early hiſtory of Leiceſter in the words of Mr. Staveley; who obſerves, that, "after the receſs of the Romans, the temporary name of Ratæ or Ragæ vaniſhed; and the Britains, and ſucceeding Saxons, with ſome variations mentioned before, reduced it to its priſtine nomination [4]; under which we are now to enquire in what ſtate it did continue. And here we muſt firſt reflect upon that moſt deplorable condition into which the whole land was caſt, firſt by the inundation of the barbarous Scots and Picts; and then by the total conqueſt of the Saxons: which, if any one would more fully and ſenſibly know, I refer him to the out-cry of the doleful Gildas [5], who moſt particularly ſighs out in mournful ſtrains the ſins and miſeries of thoſe times, in which our Leiceſter took its turn and ſhare. But then, after a long ſtruggle between the Britains and Saxons, and the Saxons at laſt becoming conquerors, they cantoned out the land into the famed Heptarchy of Seven Kingdoms; and of thoſe the kingdom of Mercia was the chief and largeſt, containing all that part of the land which takes up theſe counties, viz. Glouceſter, Hereford, Worceſter, Warwick, Leiceſter, Rutland, Northampton, Lincoln, Huntingdon, Bedford, Oxford, Buckingham, Stafford, Derby, Salop, Nottingham, and Cheſter; and thus Leiceſter ſtood, as it were, in the centre or heart of this new kingdom; and queſtionleſs was the ſcene of many great and notable actions; but the barbarity and confuſion of thoſe times hath buried all but the miſchiefs and miſeries of the ſame in deep oblivion.

"That this was antiently a city, not only in reputation, but reality, and none of the meaneſt rank, and that not only for a long time under Britiſh denomination, as is before noted, but in the ſucceeding Saxon and Norman times, is not to be doubted. William of Malmeſbury calls it 'an ancient city [6];' and this is further evident from the principal badges of a city, which it bore; a biſhop's ſee, and walls."

"The kingdom of Mercia," Mr. Carte adds, "conſiſted of the four people which in the time of the Romans were called Cattieuchlani, Dobuni, Coritani, and Cornavii; Leiceſter being one of the principal cities of the Coritani, and was therefore made the ſee of a biſhop: for whereas, from the firſt converſion of king Peada in 656, there had been but one biſhop for the whole kingdom of Mercia (whoſe ſee was at Lichfield), Theodorus archbiſhop of Canterbury, by the decree of a ſynod in 679, divided it into four dioceſes, Lichfield, Leiceſter, Lindiſſe, and Worceſter.

"At Leiceſter he placed Cuthwinus; who, for ſome reaſon unknown, ſoon quitted it; whereupon it was re-united to Lichfield, and ſo continued till

"St. Wilfrid, in 691, being baniſhed from York, had, by Æthelred king of Mercia, the biſhoprick of Leiceſter conferred on him; which he enjoyed till 703, when he was ejected by a decree of the ſynod of Neſtrefeld, whereupon the ſee reverted to Lichfield; whence in 737 it was finally ſeparated; and,

"1. Totta, or Torthelm, who may properly be called the firſt regular biſhop of Leiceſter, was placed in it; whom we find, among others, ſubſcribing at the famous council held under Archbiſhop Cuthbert, at Cloveſhoe (vulgò Cliff) in 747 [7]. He died in 764.

"2. Eadbert died in 768; to whom ſucceeded,

"3. Unwona, alias Unwora, or Inwona, in 768, according to Matthew of Weſtminſter; though by others his ſucceſſor Werenbert is placed before him. He was witneſs to a leaſe made by Beonna, abbot of Peterborough, in the reign of king Offa [8]; was preſent at the council of Celcyth, 789 [9]; and at the tranſlation of the body of St. Alban from his ſepulchre to the church, on kal. Aug. 794. He was alſo a ſubſcribing witneſs to a charter of king Kenwulf, 799 [10].

"4. Werenbert, who next filled the ſee, was king Offa's counſellor and very familiar friend [11]; and is mentioned as one of the biſhops whom that monarch, in his letter to pope Adrian, deſired might be made a ſuffragan to the archbiſhop of Lichfield. He had a controverſy with Eadulf biſhop of Sidnaceſter, or, as others ſay, with Aldulfus archbiſhop of Lichfield [12], about the extent of his dioceſe; which was not determined till the ſynod of Cloveſhoe [13], 4 id. Octob. A. D. 803, an. 7 Kenwulfi regis, where he ſubſcribed himſelf Mediterraneorum Anglorum Epiſcopus [14]. He was alſo preſent at another ſynod at Cloveſhoe, 804, and ſubſcribed a charter made by Æthelric ſon of Æthelmund [15]. And whereas Kenulfus king of Mercia founded the monaſtery of Winchelcumb in the 16th year of his reign, 5 Id. Nov. 811, Werenbert was a witneſs to it [16], by the title of Epiſcopus Leogerenſis. He was witneſs alſo to the charters of Kenwulf king of Mercia, whereby he granted certain lands to Denebertus biſhop of Worceſter, 814, anno regni 18 [1]. He ſubſcribed alſo another charter the ſame year [2].

---

[1] Gough's Camden, vol. II. p. 209.—The river there was kept up for ſome purpoſe: and it was apprehended would damage the foundations of the church. When all were afraid to remove the obſtruction, the biſhop went at the head of a poſſe, to give the firſt cut to the weir. Our anceſtors were ſometimes blamed unjuſtly for miſchiefs occaſioned by modern improvement and incroachments. G. A.

[2] Moſaic pavements have uniformly been found wherever the Romans had a ſtation, as at London, Kentcheſter, Caerwent, Caerleon, Cirenceſter, Colcheſter, and in the Iſle of Merſey; as well as where ſuch ſtations are not certainly fixed, as at Stunsfield, Oxford; Mansfield-Woodhouſe, Nottingham; Wellow, Weſt Dean, Wilts; Leyton, Eſſex; Pakenham, Suffolk; Nether Heyford, Drayton, Cotterſtoke, Northamptonſhire; Denton, Roxby, Winterton, Lincolnſhire. Moſt exquiſite ſpecimens of them are continually diſcovered in Italy; and particularly among the ruins of Herculaneum.

[3] Gent. Mag. vol. LII. p. 825.

[4] In the time of the Saxons it had the names of Legercieſter, Lygeraceaſter, Legraceaſter, Ligoraceſter, Ligora, &c. and ſometimes of Legeceſter by miſtake of the writer or tranſcriber; for that is properly the name of Weſt Cheſter, ſo called on account of the Legio Viceſima Victrix, which had its ſtation there. CARTE.

[5] Epiſt. de Excid. Brit.

[6] "Legeceſtria eſt civitas antiqua in mediterraneis Angliæ, à Legeceſtria fluvio præterfluente ſic vocata; cujus epiſcoporum nomine ſolùm ponem, quòd de ipſis nihil aliud ad nos manavit; Totta, Edbertus, Unwona, Werenberth, Bethun, Aldred, Celred." De Geſt. Pontif. Angl. lib. iv. fol. 289.

[7] Spelman, Concil. tom. I. fol. 242. 301. 318. 347. Wilkins, I. 94.

[8] Sax. Chron. A. D. 775.

[9] Heming. Chartular. p. 18.

[10] Hem. p. 453.

[11] "Werebertus, Legreceſtrenſis epiſcopus quartus, regis cancellarius & conſiliarius familiariſſimus." Matth. Paris, in Vitâ Offæ Secundi.—Dr. Denne, in his interleaved Le Neve's Faſti, under the title of Biſhops of Dorcheſter, made this entry: "Werebertus was biſhop of Legecaſter in 895, Reg. Temp. Roff. fol. 10. a. temp. Reg. Aluredi; but, from the date, Weſt Cheſter muſt be the place alluded to. S. D.

[12] See Johnſon's Collection of Eccleſiaſtical Laws in 803.

[13] Angl. Sacr. II. p. 430.

[14] Hem. p. 51.

[15] Ib. p. 474.

[16] Mon. Angl. I. p. 189.

“ 5. The next we meet with is Rethunus, or Bethunus, ſometimes ſtyled biſhop of the Mercians; who was witneſs to a charter granted by Kenwulf king of Mercia to Denebertus biſhop of Worceſter, 816, regni 20 [3]; to two others the ſame year [4]; and to another A. D. 817 [5]. He afterwards entered into the monaſtic order at Abingdon, became their abbot, and purchaſed in 821 an exemption for that monaſtery from the expence of entertaining the king and his officers [6]. He was preſent at the ſynod of Cloveſhoe, held under Beoxnulf king of Mercia, 824 [7]. In 835 he witneſſed at Dorcheſter the charter of Egbert, king of the Weſt Saxons, to the monaſtery of Mercham [8]; and in 837 ſigned, among many others, king Berthulf's grant to Croyland [9]: ‘ Ego Rethunus, ‘ Legrecenſis Epiſcopus, filius & famulus Sancti Guth‘ laci quamdiu vixero.’ He was alſo a witneſs to a charter of king Berthulf to Hubert biſhop of Worceſter, A. D. 841, regni 3 [10]. He died in 851.

“ 6. To him ſucceeded Aldredus, who was depoſed in 873; and to him,

“ 7. Ceolred, the laſt biſhop of Leiceſter; for, in the year following, viz. 874, the Pagan Danes at Repton, in Derbyſhire, totally defeated Burrhed, the laſt king of Mercia, who thereupon fled to Rome, where he at length died. Upon this occaſion it is ſuppoſed that Ceolred transferred his ſee to Dorcheſter, in the South part of his dioceſe, near the confines of the Weſt Saxon kingdom, where he might more confidently expect protection from the fury of the Danes.

“ His ſucceſſor, Halardus, or Elheardus, is regularly ſtyled Dorceſtrenſis Epiſcopus [11].”

Thus far we have nearly followed the account ſuggeſted by Mr. Carte; whoſe liſt is more complete than the one which appears in the MS. of Mr. Staveley.

Biſhop Godwin, p. 280, agrees that the eſtabliſhment of the ſee of Leiceſter was in A. D. 737; and that its duration was not long at that place, being ſhortly after removed to Dorcheſter in Oxfordſhire, which had been an epiſcopal ſee from 636. The liſt of biſhops who ſat there begins with Tota, whom we have already ſeen reckoned as the firſt biſhop of Leiceſter, at the head of the ſeries [12]. In this character he aſſiſted at the council of Cloveſhoe, A. D. 747. [13].

After the death of Penda, the tyrannical heathen king of Mercia, Oſwi king of Northumberland, and Peada, ſon of Penda, who was by him conſtituted king of Mercia, agreed to eſtabliſh a biſhoprick in that kingdom. The firſt biſhop was Diuma, or Dwina, A. D. 655 or 656, who ſat about 12 years. After the death of Peada, Oſwi was driven out of Mercia 658; Wulfere, ſon of Peada, ſucceeding him, and the ſee of Mercia being vacated by Cellach, 658 or 9, he appointed Trumhere; and on his death, about 692, Jaruman, who died 667. Mr. Wharton ſuppoſed theſe Mercian biſhops ſat at Leiceſter, which was the metropolis of the Middle Angles; but that, having no certain place of reſidence [14], they lived in the monaſteries. Jaruman's ſucceſſor Cedda was by king Wulfere appointed firſt biſhop of Lichfield. The number of Chriſtian converts increaſing, Theodore archbiſhop of Canterbury, with the concurrence of the ſynod of Herudford, whereever that was, A.D. 673, propoſed dividing this large province, which then comprehended near half England, into ſeveral ſees, and conſtituted Wilfrid ſucceſſor to Cedda [15]. But he, not conſenting to have his dioceſe divided, was depoſed by the archbiſhop 674 or 5. His ſucceſſor Sexulfus, to gratify Theodore, eſtabliſhed a ſee at Hereford under Putta, to whom he allotted a ſmall portion of his own dioceſe. But the archbiſhop could not carry his point till king Egbert having defeated Wulfere, and made himſelf maſter of Lindſey, ſeparated it from the dioceſe of Mercia, and annexed it to that of Northumberland, which was at that time filled by Wilfrid; and Theodore having ordained ſeveral biſhops in Northumberland againſt the will of Wilfrid, Eathed was appointed biſhop of Lindſey, and his ſee fixed at Sidnaceſter. This he was compelled to quit within a year, on Mercia being recovered from Egbert, and reſtored to the dioceſe of Lichfield. This however did not laſt long; for the ſame year the archbiſhop called a council at Hethfeld, and reſumed his former plan of diviſion, to which king Ethelred of Mercia conſenting, the dioceſe of Lichfield was, 679, divided into four; Lichfield, Leiceſter, Lincoln, and Worceſter; whoſe ſees were at the cities of their reſpective names, except Lincoln, whoſe ſee was Dorcheſter in Oxfordſhire; Saxulfus ſtaid at Lichfield; Cuthwin took Leiceſter; Ethelwin, Lincoln; and Tatfrith, Worceſter. Hereford made a fifth ſee. The ſee of Leiceſter became vacant ſhortly after, either by the death or reſignation of Cuthwin; and his dioceſe fell under the management of Saxulfus, biſhop of Lichfield, till his death, about 691. Wilfrid, achbiſhop of York, being expelled from his ſee, returned to his firm friend Ethelred, king of Mercia, who committed to him the adminiſtration of the vacant ſee of Leiceſter, while Hedda was promoted to Lichfield. Wilfrid being diſplaced by the council of Neſtrefeld 703, the ſees were again united in the perſon of Hedda, and his ſucceſſor Aldwin from 721 to 736. On the death of the latter, they were again divided, and Lichfield conferred on Huicta, and Leiceſter on Totta. From henceforth Lichfield remained a diſtinct ſee. Such is the moſt probable account of the ſee of Leiceſter, and the manner and time of the diviſion of the dioceſe of Mercia, collected by Mr. Wharton [16], founded partly on conjecture; but ſuch conjectures as, after the moſt accurate examination, ſeemed to him the moſt probable.

Mr. Staveley thus reſumes the ſubject:

“ During the continuance of the biſhops at Dorcheſter [17] the ſee of Sidnaceſter was brought thither about 950, by Leofwinus; till Remigius, the laſt biſhop there, ſon of a monk, and himſelf having been a monk at Feſchamp, in the year 1070, in the fifth year of the reign of the Conqueror, affecting a place of greater ſtate and eminence for his ſee than Dorcheſter was, tranſlated it to Lincoln; upon which Sidnaceſter quite vaniſhed, no footſteps either of the name or thing being now to be found. Mr. Camden ſays, ‘ This city is now ſo far out of all ſight and knowledge, that, together with the name, the very ruins alſo ſeem to be periſhed; for, by all my curious inquiry, I could learn nothing of it.’ To the ſame purpoſe alſo Biſhop Godwin; though Mr. Camden conjectures the place to have been about Gainſborough in Lincolnſhire; his Editor, biſhop Gibſon, at Stow, or Marieſtow, in that county;” [and Mr. Pegge, and other antiquaries, at Kirkton, in Lindſey [18].]

---

[1] Hem. p. 24. [2] Ib. p. 375. [3] Ib. p. 3. [4] Ib. 338. 383. [5] Ib. p. 379.

[6] “ Quidam epiſcopus nomine Rethunus, de regno Merciorum contumeliis & vi hoſtilitatis coactus, epiſcopatui ſuo renun“ ciavit; & in monaſterio Abendoniæ monachatum ſuſcipiens, abbas & pater poſtea eſt effectus.” Liber Abendoniæ. And ſee Angl. Sacr. I. 164. [7] Heming. p. 469. [8] Godwin, p. 280, ex Libro Abendoniæ.

[9] See Ingulphus; and Hiſtory of Croyland, in Bibl. Top. Brit. N° XI. Append. p. 13. [10] Heming. p. 71.

[11] See Chron. Sax. 897. Matthew Weſtm. 897. Angl. Sacr. I. 554. Burton, p. 160. Godwin, 280, 308 ed. Richardſon.

[12] Godwin's expreſſion is ſo vague, that at firſt ſight one does not ſee whether Leiceſter or Dorcheſter was the ſee.

[13] Malmſb. de geſt. pont. I. 112. [14] In the margin of the next page is a paſſage from Leland, which mentions the remains of a palace at Leiceſter belonging to the biſhop of Lincoln. Is is not likely that the biſhops of Leiceſter might reſide in it before that ſee was tranſlated to Dorcheſter, which was afterwards removed to Lincoln?

[15] So Wharton, Angl Sacr. I. 423; but Bede, who gives the acts of this council, ſays nothing of this diviſion, Hiſt. Eccl. IV. c. 5; only that the ninth canon, “ in commune tractatum eſt ut plures epiſcopi, creſcente numero fidelium, augerentur, ſed de hac re ad præſens ſiluimus;” ſo that it may be doubted if the diviſion took place at this time. [16] Angl. Sacr. I. 423—428.

[17] “ A.D. 960, Leſſius Legerenſem et Dorcaſtrenſem diœceſim conjunxit.” Chron. Johan. Abb. St. Petri de Burgo, ed. Sparke, p. 27.

[18] “ The preſent privileges of Stow, which is a peculiar, prebend, and archdeaconry, are greater than any thereabouts except Lincoln, and they have formerly exceeded even that. It was famous before Lincoln was a biſhop's ſee; and the tradition of thoſe parts is, that Stow was the mother church to Lincoln.” Gough's Camden, II. 279; from Mr. Pegge's “ Conjectures concerning the Site of the ancient Sidnaceſter,” which, by that learned Antiquary's permiſſion, will be now firſt printed in the Appendix to the preſent Hiſtory, N° I.

"Dorcheſter continues ſtill a competent town, ſhewing the ruins and relicks of its former ſtate; but Leiceſter, more fortunately as it proves ſituated, bears up ſtill in very good faſhion, and ſuch as we ſhall in ſome meaſure afterwards deſcribe: only it was great pity, that either by overſight, neglect, want of friends, or ſome other ill fate, when the Monaſteries and Religious Houſes, in the reign of king Henry VIII. were diſſolved, and ſome new Biſhopricks by that king erected and endowed with the poſſeſſions of thoſe Religious Houſes, Leiceſter ſhould not have been pitched upon as a proper and fit place for a foundation, if not a reſtoration of an Epiſcopal ſee[1], conſidering its convenient ſituation, with other regards ſuitable to ſuch a purpoſe. Indeed I am given to underſtand[2], that archbiſhop Cranmer, to whom much of the care was committed in managing and appointing what that king deſigned for ſuch new erections (or rather the king himſelf), had made a large draught or deſignment of many more new Epiſcopal foundations than what was brought to effect, and amongſt thoſe Leiceſter was one; but the occaſions of thoſe buſy times obſtructed the performance.

"Thus much for the acts and monuments left us of theſe ancient biſhops. For the walls, another chief note or badge of a city; how ſubſtantially Leiceſter was walled, and how and in what manner the ſame were overthrown, we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of more particularly hereafter upon ſeveral occaſions."

In the account which we have given of its biſhops, it appears that Leiceſter, during the Heptarchy, was part of the kingdom of Mercia; which began to be an independent monarchy from the reign of Cridda in 542.

In the above period there occur alſo two earls or dukes of Mercia; who (like ſeveral of the modern princes in Germany) had a kind of ſovereign authority; and under them were ſeveral great men, having the government of certain diſtinct diſtricts, who were alſo ſtyled earls or dukes; and ſuch, probably, were thoſe who by Mr. Camden, Mr. Burton, and others, are repreſented as the firſt earls of Leiceſter; and whom we ſhall preſently trace in ſucceſſion from the year 716 till the Conqueſt.

1. The firſt duke or earl of Mercia that we find is, Hugh, ſurnamed the Great, who, being patron of the priory of Tewkeſbury, buried Brictric, king of the Weſt Saxons, 799, in the chapel of St. Faith the Virgin there; and dying himſelf in 812, was buried in that monaſtery[3].

2. Not long after him Witlaſe was duke or earl of Mercia; and in 826 we find him advanced to the title of king[4]. He died in 839; and was ſucceeded by Berthulph, who died in 852: and whoſe ſucceſſor Burrhed was expelled by the Danes in 874; and dying at Rome in the ſame year, was buried there in the church belonging to the Engliſh College. Ethelwith, his queen, took the habit of a nun, and was honourably buried at Padua in 889.

His armorial bearing, Azure, a ſaltire Arg. may be ſeen in Plate X. fig. 1.

The whole kingdom of Mercia was conferred by the Danes in 874 on Ceonwulf durante beneplacito; but in 877 they took from him the Coritani, particularly Derby, Nottingham, Leiceſter, Lincoln, and Stamford, where they domineered, when the reſt of Mercia was placed, by king Alfred, under the government of duke Æthelred, to whom he had married his daughter Æthelfleda. This fixes the advancement of Æthelred to the dukedom of Mercia, and his marriage with Æthelfleda, to an earlier period than has been aſſigned to it by Dugdale, who places theſe events in 886[5]; but, in confirmation of what is here advanced, we have a charter, dated 880, Indict. 5, in which he ſtyles himſelf "dux Æthelred—et patricius gentis Merciorum, cum licentiâ et impoſitione manus Ælfredi regis," &c.; and to his ſubſcription is ſubjoined, "Ego Æthelflæd conjux ſubſcribens confirmavi[6]."

In the tenth year of Edward the Elder, A.D. 911, the Danes from Northampton and Leiceſter made an expedition into Oxfordſhire, and ſlew a great number of the Engliſh at Hookenorton and the country adjacent[7].

Duke Æthelred dying in 912, the government of his portion of Mercia devolved wholly upon his lady Æthelfleda, who appears to have adminiſtered it with extraordinary prudence, courage, and ſucceſs.

From Leiceſter the Danes again made a predatory excurſion in the year 917, being then amply furniſhed with horſes; and as ſoon as they were returned home with their ſpoils, they preſently ſent forth another party towards Leighton, in Bedfordſhire; but the country thereabout, having ſome notice before-hand of their deſign, were prepared to encounter them; and, defeating them, recovered the ſpoils they had ſeized, and took a great part of their horſes and arms[8]. In their poſſeſſion, however, Leiceſter continued till the ſpring of the year 920, when it was reduced to the obedience of Æthelfleda.

On the authority of Simeon of Durham[9], Henry of Huntingdon[10], Roger Hoveden[11], and other ancient writers, the rebuilding of the walls, and reſtoration of the city of Leiceſter, has been attributed by Mr. Burton, and after him by Mr. Staveley, to the bounteous hand of this lady; who is ſaid "to have repaired and ſurrounded Legaceſtre with new walls, and enlarged it to almoſt twice its former ſize; ſo that the caſtle there, which before was without the walls, and placed near the water, might now ſeem within the walls[12]." But the whole of this repreſentation proceeds on an ambiguity ariſing from the name of Legaceſtre; the city which Æthelfleda rebuilt being Weſt-Cheſter: for Leiceſter, as we have juſt obſerved, was in the poſſeſſion of the Danes till the beginning of the year 920; and Æthelfleda lived only till the 12th of June that year, in which ſhort time it was not poſſible ſhe could accompliſh ſo great a work.

"For the merit of this renowned lady Æthelfleda," ſays Mr. Staveley, "it is pity her memory ſhould periſh, who hath been the reſtorer of cities; and therefore, by grateful poſterity, let here be recorded theſe ſubſequent memoirs of her. She was daughter of the renowned king Alfred; and had, as a ſymbol of his deareſt affection, the whole earldom of Mercia given her by her father; married ſhe was to the prince Æthelred; who dying, ſhe took the goverment upon herſelf, and managed the ſame, being contemporary with her brother king Edward, commonly called the Elder, in thoſe boiſterous times, to admiration, beſtirring herſelf notably againſt the common enemy the Danes. Æthelred abbot of Rivall gives her this eulogium: 'The king's ſiſter, Ælfleda, augmented much his honour, being woman in ſex, but in mind and virtue more than man. She built Bruneſburgh, Bridgenorth, Scoriate, Tamworth, Stafford, Ediſbury, Warwick, Monks-kirby, Warrebirk, Runcorne, and Legaceſtre.' She fought againſt the Welſh, and conquered them; ſhe ſubdued and took Derby; and ſo much excelled in fortitude, that by many ſhe was ſtyled a king[13].

---

[1] The original ſee at Leiceſter is ſuppoſed to have been where St. Margaret's church now ſtands; and in confirmation of that idea, the manor which the biſhops held lay in the ſuburbs on the Eaſt ſide of the town, in the pariſh of St. Margaret and in Knighton, containing of old two churches, and ſtill called the Biſhop's Fee; of which ſee hereafter, p. 17; and there ſtill remains The Biſhop's barn cloſe.—"St. Margaret's is thereby the faireſt paroche church of Leiceſter, wher ons was cathedrale chirch, and therby the biſhop of Lincoln had a palace, wherof a little yet ſtandeth." Leland's Itin. I. p. 18.

[2] In Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation, vol. I. p. 251, in a paper under the king's hand, under the head of "Biſhopricks to be made," it appears that Leiceſter was intended for one, and to have included the two counties of Leiceſter and Rutland.

[3] Dugd. Bar. I. 7. [4] Ibid. [5] Ibid. [6] Hem. p. 61, 62, and 449, 440. [7] Brompton, Chron. [8] Saxon Chronicle.

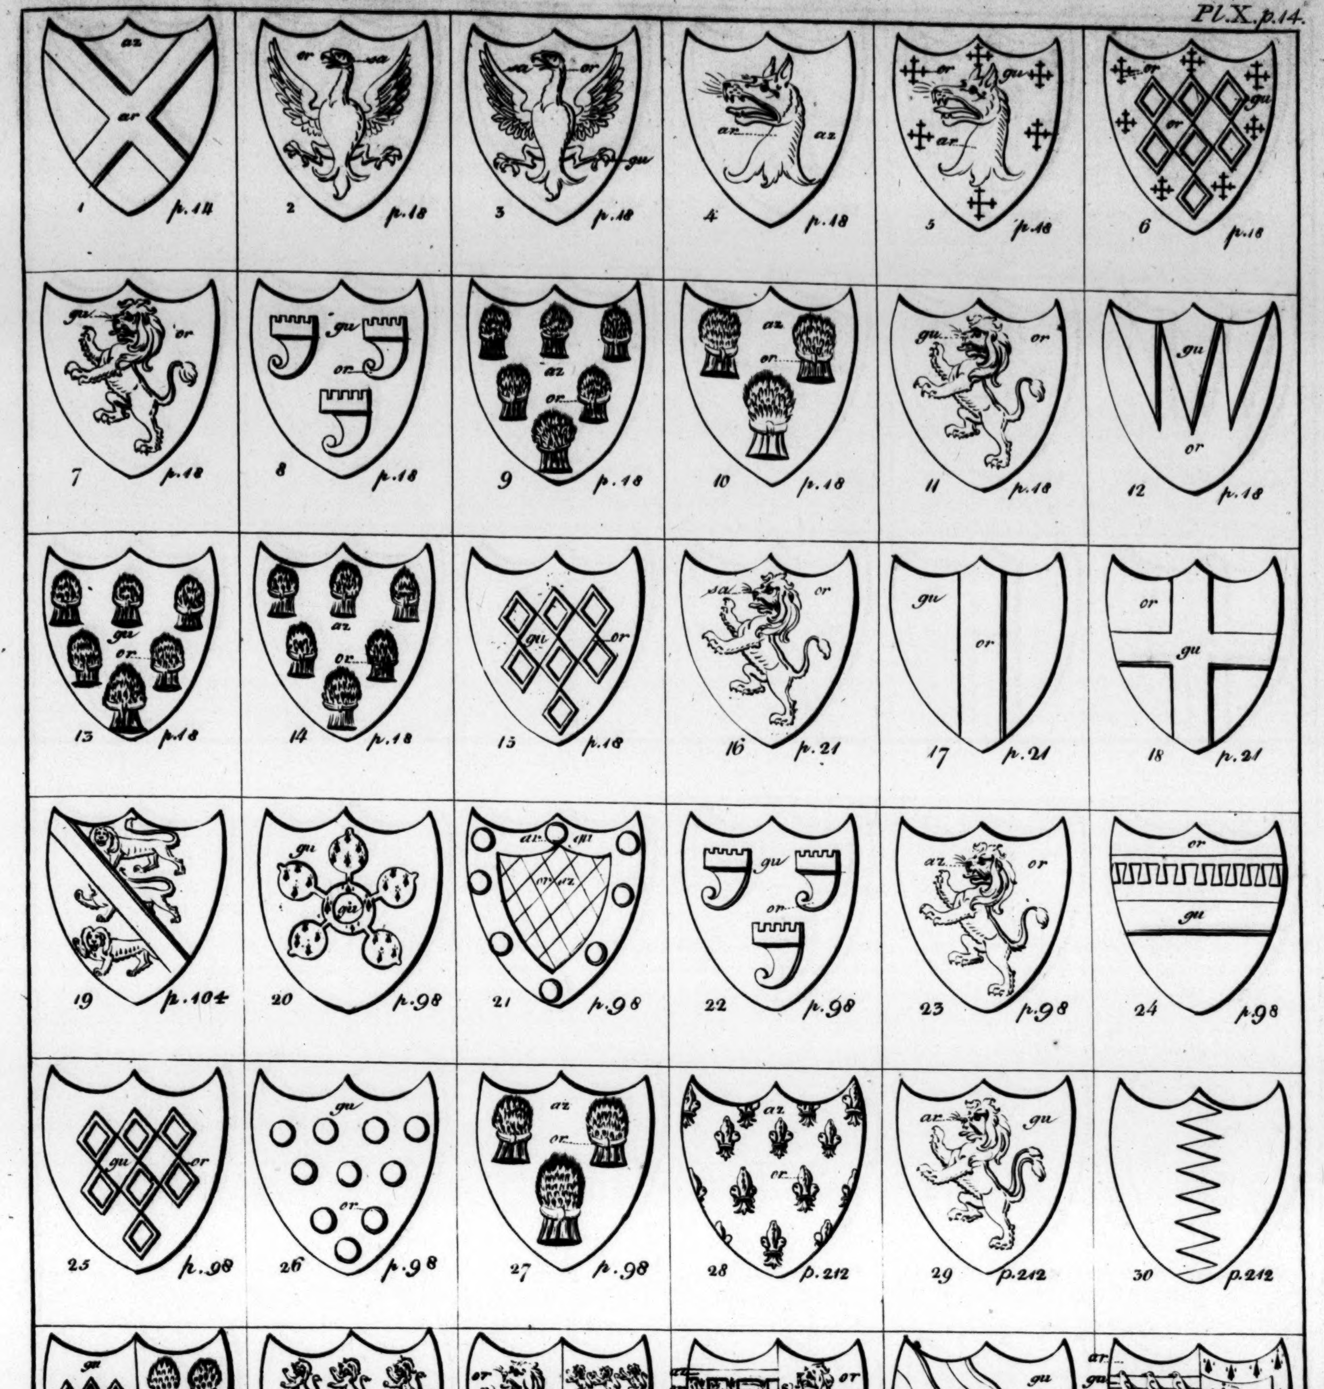
[9] "Anno 907, Civitas quæ Kair-Leir Britannicè, et Legaceſtre dicitur Saxonicè, juſſu Ethelredi ducis et Egelfledæ reſtaurata eſt." Sim. Dunelm. Hiſt. p. 155. [10] Annal. pars prior, p. 421.

[11] "Quarto anno (Edwardi Senioris) Legeceſtria renovata eſt." Hen. Huntingdon, lib. v. p. 353.

[12] "Hoc anno, 901, civitas quæ Britannicè Karlegium, Anglicè Legeceſtre, ope Ethelredi Ducis Merciorum, et Elfledæ uxoris ſuæ, reſtaurata eſt, et novis muris circundata, ac pene ad duplum quam prius ampliata, ita quod caſtrum ibidem ab olim extra muros ad aquam poſitum nunc infra muros videatur." Chron. Jorval. p. 833.

[13] "Adjecit etiam decoris plurimum ſoror regis (Edwardi) Ælfleda, ſexu quidam fœmina, ſed animo ac virtute plus viro, quæ conſtruxit Brimeſburch, Bruge, Scergate, Thamworth, Stafford, Edebirath, Werewicam, Cireſbirith, Warebirick, Runconere, Legaceſtre: ipſa pugnâvit contra Wallenſes, et vicit; et Derbei expugnavit, et cepit; tantaque fortitudine emicuit ut a pluribus rex diceretur." Abb. Rivall. de Gen. Reg. Angl. p. 356.

Pl. X. p. 14.



1 p.14
2 p.18
3 p.18
4 p.18
5 p.18
6 p.18
7 p.18
8 p.18
9 p.18
10 p.18
11 p.18
12 p.18
13 p.18
14 p.18
15 p.18
16 p.21
17 p.21
18 p.21
19 p.104
20 p.98
21 p.98
22 p.98
23 p.98
24 p.98
25 p.98
26 p.98
27 p.98
28 p.212
29 p.212
30 p.212
31 App.p.33
32 App.p.33
33 App.p.33
34 App.p.33
35 App.p.33
36 App.p.33
37 App.p.33
38 App.p.33
39 App.p.33
40 App.p.33
41 App.p.33
42 App.p.34
43 App.p.34
44 App.p.34
45 App.p.34
46 App.p.34
47 App.p.34
48 App.p.34
49 App.p.34
50 p.22
51 p.136
52 p.239
53 p.242
54 p.242

BRITISH
12 JN 923
MUSEUM

At the taking of Derby, poſſeſſed by the Danes, ſhe loſt four of her principal commanders, to her great grief. In her expedition againſt the Welſh, ſhe took priſoner the king's wife, whom, without doubt, ſhe treated royally, and many of his people [1]. The men of York made application to her, and liſted themſelves, under oath, to ſerve under her banner againſt the common enemy. Amongſt her famous works of building, the city of Warwick was not the leaſt; where, as Mr. Dugdale [2] collects out of John Rous, ſhe erected a very ſtrong fortification, called the Dungeon, upon an hill of earth artificially raiſed near the river ſide, as is yet to be ſeen, on the Weſt part of the caſtle. After all which noble and royal performances, in the eighth year of her reign or government, ſhe died at Tamworth, and was buried at Glouceſter, in the porch of St. Peter's church there, leaving only one child, a daughter, named Alwina, or Algyva, whom her uncle, king Edward the Elder, not thinking fit to ſucceed her mother in that her adminiſtration, diſpoſed of in marriage to one of his Weſt Saxon noblemen; and, ſeizing upon Mercia, incorporated it again into the Engliſh monarchy. Henry Huntingdon, in contemplation of the virtues of this renowned lady, ſets his Muſe on work in her celebration thus [3]:

"O Ælfleda potens! O terror virgo virorum!
Victrix naturæ, nomine digna viri!
Tu quoque ſplendidior fecit Natura puellam,
Te probitas fecit nomen habere viri.
Te mutare decet, ſed ſolum nomina, ſexus;
Tu regina potens, rexque trophea parens.
Jam nec Cæſarei tantum meruere triumphi;
Cæſare ſplendidior, virgo, virago, vale!"

"Ælfleda great, though thou a virgin art,
Thou ſtrik'ſt a terror in each manly heart.
Thou Nature doſt ſo conquer and refine,
Thy virtue makes thee more than maſculine.
A royal changeling thou, only the name;
A queen in that, a king in worth and fame:
The virtues of each ſex in thee are found;
Farewell, brave dame, than Cæſar more renown'd."

From the death of Æthelfleda to that of her brother Edward in 925, Leiceſter appears to have enjoyed a ſmall interval of tranquillity; which continued alſo during ſome part of the reign of his ſon and ſucceſſor Athelſtan, under whom we firſt find here the veſtiges of a royal mint. Yet the calm was of ſhort duration; for, during the reign of that monarch, the Danes[4] were again maſters of this harraſſed city.

When Edmund the brother of Athelſtan was promoted to the kingdom in 940, being zealous for the Chriſtian faith, and diſdaining that the glory of his kingdom ſhould be ſtained with the worſhiping of idols by the relics of Paganiſm, he wreſted out of their hands the five moſt noble cities where they had neſted themſelves, viz. Leiceſter, Lincoln, Stanford, Nottingham, and Derby; which, having been for many years the more peculiar poſſeſſion of the Danes in Mercia, were emphatically ſtyled the Fiꝼbuꞃᵹaꞃ, or five cities [5]; and which, being purged of all infidelity, he cauſed to be illuminated with the Chriſtian faith [6].

Matthew of Weſtminſter ſays, Onlaf king of Norway and Edmund king of England encountered each other apud Legeceſtriam, by which it is probable he meant Leiceſter; for, as Simeon of Durham informs us, Onlaf marched from York Southward, and beſieged Northampton; but, not ſucceeding there, he led his army to Tamworth; and having ravaged the country about it, upon his return, coming as far as Leiceſter, Edmund with his army there met him; and, after a drawn battle, by the mediation of the archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, Odo and Wulfſtan, they came to an agreement that Onlaf ſhould enjoy all England on the North of Watling-ſtreet; and Edmund all on the South; and that the ſurvivor ſhould have the whole. Onlaf dying in 941, king Edmund in 942 recovered the Fiꝼbuꞃᵹaꞃ out of the hands of the Danes.

4. The next duke or earl of Mercia that we have met with after the deceaſe of Æthelred is Ælfhere, who, A. D. 956, in the firſt of king Eadwi, ſubſcribed a charter of his granted to the church of Worceſter, by the title of Alfhere dux; but the firſt time that we find him ſtyled dux Merciorum is in a charter of Oſwald, biſhop of Worceſter, A. D. 962; and, if we are not deceived, he was advanced to the dignity of being governor of Mercia by king Edgar, upon his ſucceeding his brother Edwy in the whole kingdom, in the year 959. This Ælfere ouſted the monks which king Edgar had placed in divers monaſteries, and introduced in their ſtead ſecular married prieſts. In 979 he came to Wareham, where the body of king Edward the Martyr lay buried, and, cauſing it to be waſhed and adorned with new veſtments, carried it to Shafteſbury, and moſt honourably interred it in that abbey. He died in 983; and was ſucceeded by

5. Ælfric his ſon; whom we find in the year 986 an exile from his country, encouraging a new invaſion from the Danes; and from this period in a continual ſtate of perfidy, till in 1007 he was degraded from his rank, and in 1016 was killed at the battle of Aſhdown in Eſſex. He left one ſon, Algar, whoſe eyes were put out for his father's treachery.

Wearied with ſlaughter, the Danes as well as the Engliſh were, in the year 1002, inclined to peace; which was concluded on the payment of a large ſubſidy from this country, for which purpoſe the heavy tax, called Danegeld[7] was impoſed by Æthelred. The general maſſacre of the Danes, which almoſt immediately followed, is an event well known. Among the victims who fell on that occaſion was Gunnilda, ſiſter to Sweyn king of Denmark, who having been married to Paling, an Engliſh nobleman, and embraced the Chriſtian faith, had generouſly offered herſelf, her huſband, and her ſon, as hoſtages for the fidelity of her countrymen; and fell a ſacrifice with them to the perfidy of Edric Streona. This treachery was bitterly revenged by repeated ravages till the end of the year 1007, when peace was again made by the payment of 30,000*l.* to the Danes.

6. Ælfric's ſucceſſor was Edric Streona, to whom, with the title of duke of Mercia, king Æthelred in 1007 gave his ſecond daughter Edgith in marriage. The character of this earl is thus ſtrongly marked by an hiſtorian of credit: "That he was the very dregs of men; the diſhonour of the Engliſh; a wicked deſtroyer, a ſubtle knave, whoſe nobleneſs had not obtained him wealth, but his bold language; he always lay in wait to deceive, and was ready prepared to cheat: he attended the king's counſels as a faithful perſon, but diſcloſed them like a traitor. Being often ſent to the king's enemies as a mediator for peace, he kindled the flame of war; whoſe perfidiouſneſs appeared upon all occaſions in this and the ſucceeding king's days [8]."

In 1009 the Danes again commenced hoſtilities, and continued their depredations till 1013, when Æthelred formally abdicated his throne; and Sweyn becoming for a time the lordly tyrant of the kingdom, his oppreſſion in a few months was felt ſo grievous, that he was killed by his own officers, and Æthelred recalled by the almoſt general voice of the nation.

---

[1] H. Huntingdon, p. 353.

[2] Warwickſhire, p. 298.

[3] Lib. v. p. 354.

[4] "In ſpeaking of the Danes, it perhaps may not be unacceptable to obſerve, that about four miles from Leiceſter, a land's length from Ratcliffe on the Wreke, there is a tumulus placed on a low ground between the foſs-road and the river, and therefore is not viſible afar off. This I mention, becauſe it is of an unuſual form; for whereas all others that I have ſeen are of a round ſhape, this is oblong, and indeed exactly agrees with the deſcription which Olaus Wormius gives of the ſepulchres of the moſt ancient Daniſh kings, which he ſays were made ad magnitudinem et figuram carinæ maximæ navis regni; whence I conclude, that this was the monument of ſome Daniſh king." CARTE.

[5] Peck's Annals of Stanford, book III. p. 25.

[6] "Promotus vero in regnum, zelo zelatus eſt pro fide Chriſti, nimiſque ægrè ferens paganorum reliquias culturâ idolorum regni ſui fœdare decorem, quinque nobiliſſimas civitates, Lincolniam, Leiceſtriam, Stanfordiam, Snottingham, et Derbei, quas eatenus incoluerant, de manibus eorum extorſit, omnique infidelitate abraſa Chriſtianæ fidei lumine illuſtravit." Abbas Rivallenſis, p. 358.

[7] For an account of this tax, ſee the Diſſertation on Domeſday.

[8] Dugd. Bar. I. p. 8.

Canute, who ſucceeded his father on the throne of Denmark, and was equal to him in ambition, and ſuperior to him in ability, continued to make incurſions into this kingdom with various ſucceſs.

During all theſe commotions, Leiceſter experienced by turns the ravages of the contending parties; and early in 1016, being then in the poſſeſſion of Canute, was plundered by the army of prince Edmund Ironſide, which penetrated into Staffordſhire, Shropſhire, and Leiceſterſhire, ſeizing all the booty they could find [1].

Æthelred died April 23, 1016, and was ſucceeded in the monarchy by his ſon Edmund Ironſide; who encountered the Danes with various ſucceſs. In the Rogation week of 1016, at Penham, near Gillingham, in Dorſetſhire, the invaders were defeated. On the 20th of June another battle was fought at Sheroſtan, in Worceſterſhire, which laſted two whole days with doubtful ſucceſs, owing principally to the treachery of Edric: and, ſhortly after, a third, ſtill more ſevere, was fought at Aſhdown, near Saffron-Walden, in Eſſex; when the Danes gave way, till Edric having joined them, the betrayed Engliſh were completely routed, and many of their prime nobility ſlain, with ſeveral of the dignified clergy, who attended to pray for the ſucceſs of the army. The veſtiges of this dreadful carnage are ſtill viſible on the ſpot, where the remains of bones, armour, &c. are frequently dug up.

This battle was followed by a treaty, in which the kingdom was divided between Edmund and Canute; the former retaining that part which coaſted upon France; and Canute the reſt, which included the Mercian diſtrict.

Edmund enjoyed not long his faded portion of ſovereignty: for the perfidious Edric, whoſe life ſeems to have been one uniform ſyſtem of treachery, "glutted with the favours of both theſe kings, to ſcrew himſelf deeper into Canute's conceit, contrived the end of renowned Edmund: who being retired to a place for nature's neceſſity, was thruſt from under the draught into his body with a ſharp ſpear; which done, the treacherous Edrick cutting off his ſovereign's head, preſented it to Canute, with theſe fawning ſalutations: 'All hail, thou now ſole monarch of England; for, here behold the head of thy copartner, which for thy ſake I have adventured to cut off.' Canute, though ambitious enough of ſovereignty, yet of princely diſpoſition, abaſhed and ſore grieved at ſo unworthy and diſloyal an attempt, replied and vowed, that 'in reward of that ſervice, the bringer's own head ſhould be advanced above all the peers of his kingdom.' Which high honour while this prodigious wretch greedily expected (and indeed for a time, ſaith Malmeſbury, he found ſome ſhew of favour with the king:) ſoon after, by the king's command, his head bad his ſhoulders farewell, and was placed upon the higheſt gate to overlook London [2]."

After this event, the town of Leiceſter, having ſome breathing time of reſt, recovered itſelf in ſome meaſure; for, at the entrance of the Normans, it was very well frequented and peopled, and had many burgeſſes in it.

The earldom of Mercia was, in 1017, conferred on Leofwine then earl of Leiceſter; of whom, and of his predeceſſors and ſucceſſors, earls of Leiceſter, an account ſhall here be given, with ſome ſlight corrections, in the words of Mr. Staveley:

"Mr. Camden, in his excellent Britannia, ſays, that Leiceſterſhire hath been more famous from time to time, by reaſon that the earls thereof have been very renowned; for, under the government of the Saxons, Leiceſter had earls by inheritance; and ſeeing that the city of Leiceſter was ſituated almoſt in the middle of the kingdom of Mercia, and, as it were, the metropolis of that kingdom; as that was the moſt ſpacious and potent kingdom in the Heptarchy, ſo the earls of Leiceſter we find frequently ſtyled earls of Mercia; and Mr. Burton, when he comes to ſpeak of the earls of Leiceſter, of which he gives us the names and deſcents only, ſays thus [3]: 'Of the old earldom of Leiceſter I may (under favour) uſe this eulogium; that for antiquity, territories, caſtles, dominions, monaſteries, colleges, foreſts, chaſes, parks, manors, tenancies, demeſnes, ſervices, land, great command, and delicate ſeats, it was in no ſort inferior to the chiefeſt earldoms in the land.'

"But of all this the reader himſelf may be pleaſed to judge, from thoſe remarks of the earls of Leiceſter, which, from the moſt authentic records, hiſtories, and evidences, we come now to exhibit: and in the catalogue of theſe earls we muſt begin with,

"1. Leofric, the firſt earl of Leiceſter of whom we have any notice tranſmitted to us by record or hiſtory. He was a Saxon; and all that we find of him is this, that when Ethelbald, king of the Mercians, founded and endowed the famous abbey of Croyland in 716, this Leofric earl of Leiceſter [4] ſigned as a witneſs, amongſt others, according to the Saxon mode of affixing croſſes, to the foundation charter of that abbey, exemplified by Ingulphus. Of his marriage or iſſue no traces are diſcoverable. At the diſtance of 120 years, the next earl we find is,

"2. Algar the firſt, of whom nothing is known, but that he was living about 838, when Witlafe was king of the Mercians; and left his ſon and ſucceſſor,

"3. Algar, the ſecond of the name, who is reported to have been a gallant warrior againſt the Danes, and to have killed with his own hand three of their principal leaders; but was himſelf ſlain by the Danes at Keſteven in 870.

"After a ſecond interval of about 120 years, we find,

"4. Another Leofric, who was earl in the time of Alfred and of Edward the Elder. Of him we only know that he was the father of,

"5. Leofwine, who held the earldom under Æthelred about the year 1000; and left three ſons, Leofric, Norman, and Edwin [5]. Of theſe Leofric ſucceeded his father in the earldom; Norman, the ſecond ſon, was a powerful friend and ſpecial agent for the monks of Croyland, and a great companion and friend to Edric Streona, with whom he was murdered by Canute; and more lamented had he been, ſays my author [6], if he had not ſo fallen with ſuch bad company. Edwin, the third ſon, appears in 1032 as a witneſs, ſigning, with his elder brother Leofric, to a charter of king Canute, of privileges by him granted to the monks of Croyland [7].

"6. Leofric, a man of ſingular piety and excellent wiſdom, came to the title in the time of king Æthelred, and was confirmed in it by king Canute. As he was earl of Leiceſter, ſo ſometimes he was called Merciorum comes, and ſometimes comes Herefordienſium, as alſo ſometimes earl of Cheſter [8]; and that might be by reaſon of his reſidence at certain times at thoſe places; it being not unuſual in former times to call thoſe perſons earls of ſuch places whereat they did reſide, as may appear in thoſe of Striguill, Arundel, Tutbury, Chicheſter, and others [9]; though in fact they were earls of other counties or places in or near whereunto thoſe caſtles they then lived in ſtood. Upon the death of king Canute, there being no ſmall controverſy amongſt the great-ones touching the ſucceſſion to the crown, this Leofric, with other principal perſons, advanced Harold Harefoot, ſon of Canute, to the throne; and upon the death of Hardicanute, in 1045, he was one of the chief of thoſe who raiſed king Edward the Confeſſor (at that time in Normandy) to the crown. In a ſhort time after that event, earl Leofric founded the great monaſtery at Coventry, endowing it with 24 fair lordſhips; and beſtowed on it ſo many goods and ornaments, that no religious houſe in England had ſuch quantities of gold, ſilver, precious ſtones, and jewels, as were in this [1]. Nay, William of Malmeſbury affirms, that it was enriched and beautified with ſo much gold and ſilver, that the walls ſeemed too narrow to contain it; inſomuch, that Robert de Limeſie, biſhop of Coventry, in the time of king William Rufus, ſcraped from one beam that ſupported the ſhrines five hundred marks of ſilver. And Egelnoth, archbiſhop of Canterbury, in his return from Rome, bought at Pavia the arm of the great St. Auguſtin for one hundred talents of ſilver and one of gold, and for the love which he bore to earl Leofric, ſent it to this monaſtery, which precious relick was there long kept in a ſilver ſhrine [2]. This earl married Godiva, a beautiful and virtuous lady, ſiſter to Thorold ſheriff of Lincolnſhire; who, bearing an extraordinary affection to the city of Coventry, earneſtly ſolicited Leofric, her huſband, that he would make that city free from certain burdens and ſervitudes, to which it was then ſubject: to which he ſeeming much averſe, and ſhe preſſing him the more; that he might quite put her off, he told her at laſt, that he was reſolved not to do it, except ſhe would ride naked on horſeback from one end of the town to the other: to which condition ſhe conſented; and, upon a day appointed, got upon a horſe naked, with her hair looſe, ſo that it covered all her body but her legs, and ſo rode quite through the city, returning with joy to her huſband, who thereupon granted to the city a charter of freedom [3]; but which, whether it was a kind of manumiſſion from ſome ſervile tenures, cuſtoms, and exactions, as Jorvallenſis [4] intimates; or a freedom from all manner of toll, except horſes (becauſe the lady's horſe neighed, forſooth, as ſhe rode on him), as the vulgar tradition is, I ſuppoſe it not neceſſary in this place to examine. Certain at leaſt it is, that the remiſſion of the tolls by Godiva's unremitted interceſſion was commemorated in the portaits of herſelf and her huſband, ſet up in the South window of Trinity church in the reign of Richard the Second [5].

---

[1] "Prædaveruntque ſimul in Staffordſhire, et in Shropſhire, et in Legeceſtre." H. Huntingdon, lib. vi. p. 362.

[2] Speed, p. 428.

[3] Leiceſterſhire, p. 167.

[4] Hiſt. p. 852; and Bibl. Top. Brit. N° XI. Append. p. 2. "Ego Leuricus comes Leyceſtriæ aſſenſum præbui;" which Sir William Dugdale ſuppoſes to be Cheſter; Mr. Selden (in his notes on the Polyolbion) aſcribes with us to Leiceſter.

[5] Sim. Dunelm. Hiſt. p. 189. Rog. Hoveden, p. 437.

[6] Ingulph. Hiſt. p. 892, 893.

[7] Bibl. Top. Brit. N° XI. Appendix, p. 23; and ſee Roger Hoveden, p. 444; W. Malmeſb. de Geſt. Pontif. p. 289; Sim. Dunelm. p. 189.

[8] Malmeſbury.

[9] Camd. Brit. pp. 307. 633.

In 1051 there was at Leiceſter, about Whitſuntide, a great concourſe of perſons of the higheſt quality, particularly Wulfin, biſhop of the dioceſe, attended with three of his chaplains, Tumer, Wulnar, and Sitric; earl Leofric with his counteſs Godiva, and their ſon and ſucceſſor Algar; Wulgate abbot of Croyland, Lefwin abbot of Thorney, with many others; in whoſe preſence, on Whitſunday, Thoroldus, ſheriff of Lincolnſhire granted to the abbot of Croyland his charter for the founding and endowing the monaſtery of Spalding, Lincolnſhire, to be a cell of Croyland [6]. Leofric died in his own town of Bromley, Auguſt 31, 1057, and was honourably buried at Coventry in the abbey that he had founded; leaving to ſucceed him his ſon [7],

"7. Algar, who, for ſome miſdemeanors, had been baniſhed by king Edward the Confeſſor, in a council held at London 1055; and ſome time after, coming over into England, with the aſſiſtance of Griffin prince of Wales, had committed many ravages at Hereford; but by the well-timed interpoſition of his friends, the king was reconciled to him [8]. In 1058 he once more rebelled, was baniſhed, and was again received into favour; but died in 1059, and was buried near his father in the monaſtery at Coventry. He had large poſſeſſions, which are enumerated in Dugdale [9]; and left iſſue two ſons, Edwin his ſucceſſor, and Morcar earl of Northumberland; and two daughters, Algitha wife to Harold king of England; and Lucia (afterwards heireſs to her two brothers), who was thrice married; 1. to Ivo Talbois earl of Anjou; 2. to Roger de Romara; and laſtly, to Ranulf earl of Cheſter.

"8. Edwin, ſon and ſucceſſor of Algar, was a right noble and virtuous perſon, and deſerved better fortune than he found: for, after duke William of Normandy had conquered and ſlain king Harold, this Edwin, with his brother Morcar, with ſome other Engliſh, diſdaining a foreign yoke, raiſed forces to oppoſe the Conqueror: Morcar betook himſelf to the Iſle of Ely, where he was beſieged by the Norman; and Edwin, whilſt he was buſy in gathering forces to relieve his brother, was betrayed by ſome of his own followers, againſt whom valiantly defending himſelf, in 1071 he loſt his life: which being told to the Conqueror, he compaſſionately wept for the loſs of ſo brave a man in ſuch a treacherous manner; baniſhing all thoſe that betrayed him, inſtead of rewarding them as they expected. "His death," ſays Ordericus Vitalis, "was very generally lamented, not only by the Engliſh, but even by the Normans, in regard he was of ſuch noble extraction, and of ſuch devout parents; as alſo a perſon very beautiful, and an eſpecial lover of the clergy, of the monks, and of the poor [10]." His ample poſſeſſions may be ſeen in Dugdale [11]; who could find no memorial of his having had either wife or iſſue; ſo that in him this line of earls of the Saxon race became extinct.

In an old MS. cited by the author of the "New Peerage, 1711," Simon de Silveſter is ſaid to have been earl of Leiceſter at the time of the Conqueſt [12]; and that, doing homage for the ſame to king William, he remained earl during all that and the ſucceeding reign: but this is clearly a miſtake; the perſon here ſpoken of was Simon St. Liz [13], the firſt earl of Northampton of that name; who obtained a conſiderable property in Leiceſter, by marrying Maud, the eldeſt daughter of the counteſs Judith, of whom ſome account has been already given among the landholders at the time of the ſurvey.

The large portion of the town of Leiceſter, which had belonged to earl Edwin, was given by the Conqueror to Hugh de Grenteſmainell [14]; and included a very conſiderable manor, four churches, more than two thirds of the houſes then in the town, together with the caſtle, which had been the ancient reſidence of the earls, ſituated a little to the Eaſt of the South-gate, on the banks of the river; a cut having been made to draw it from its general courſe to the ſide of the caſtle, where now is the principal channel.

The biſhop of Lincoln poſſeſſed another manor here; which lay in the ſuburbs on the Eaſt ſide of the town, in the pariſh of St. Margaret and in Knighton. It is ſtill called The Biſhop's Fee, and remains out of the juriſdiction of the borough; though attempts were made in the reigns of Edward VI. and queen Elizabeth to have it united to, and reduced under, the government of it; but without effect. The biſhops made the parſonage of St. Margaret a prebend of Lincoln; and the manor remained in them A.D. 1138 [13], as appears by the bull of pope Innocent the Third, dated 4 kal. of May in that year, confirming it to Alexander the then biſhop, and his ſucceſſors; but it was very ſoon after this transferred to Robert Boſſu earl of Leiceſter, in exchange for the manor of Weſtcote with its appurtenances, under the title of the manor of Cnihtintone, and the ſuburbs, with the appurtenances [15]; and, by that earl, who was the founder of Leiceſter abbey, was again exchanged with the monks there for lands in Eſfordeby and Segrave, which were ſettled on the church of Lincoln, as part of the compenſation for Knighton [16].

But the cleareſt account of the ſtate of Leiceſter at this period will appear by the epitome of Domeſday, which ſhall be exhibited immediately after we have laid before the reader the beſt genealogical table that can be made of the earls of Leiceſter of the Saxon race.

---

[1] Rog. Hoveden, p. 444.

[2] W. Malmeſb. de Geſt. Pont. lib. iv. p. 289.

[3] "A ſervitude, malis cuſtumis, et exactionibus, liberavit."

[4] Hiſt. Jorvall. fol. 949. See ſome remarks of Mr. Wells on this ſubject, Gent. Mag. LVII. p. 463.

[5] See the new edition of "Camden's Britannia, 1789," vol. II. p. 345. where the whole tranſaction is ably canvaſſed by Mr. Pegge.

[6] Bibl. Top. Brit. N° XI. Append. p. 29.

[7] Dugdale, Warwickſh. Coventre. Sim. Dunelm. Hiſt. fol. 139.

[8] Chron. Joh. Brompton, p. 952.

[9] Bar. I. 10.

[10] Ord. Vital. p. 511; Knighton, Hoveden, &c.

[11] Bar. I. 11.

[2] Vol II. p. 186.

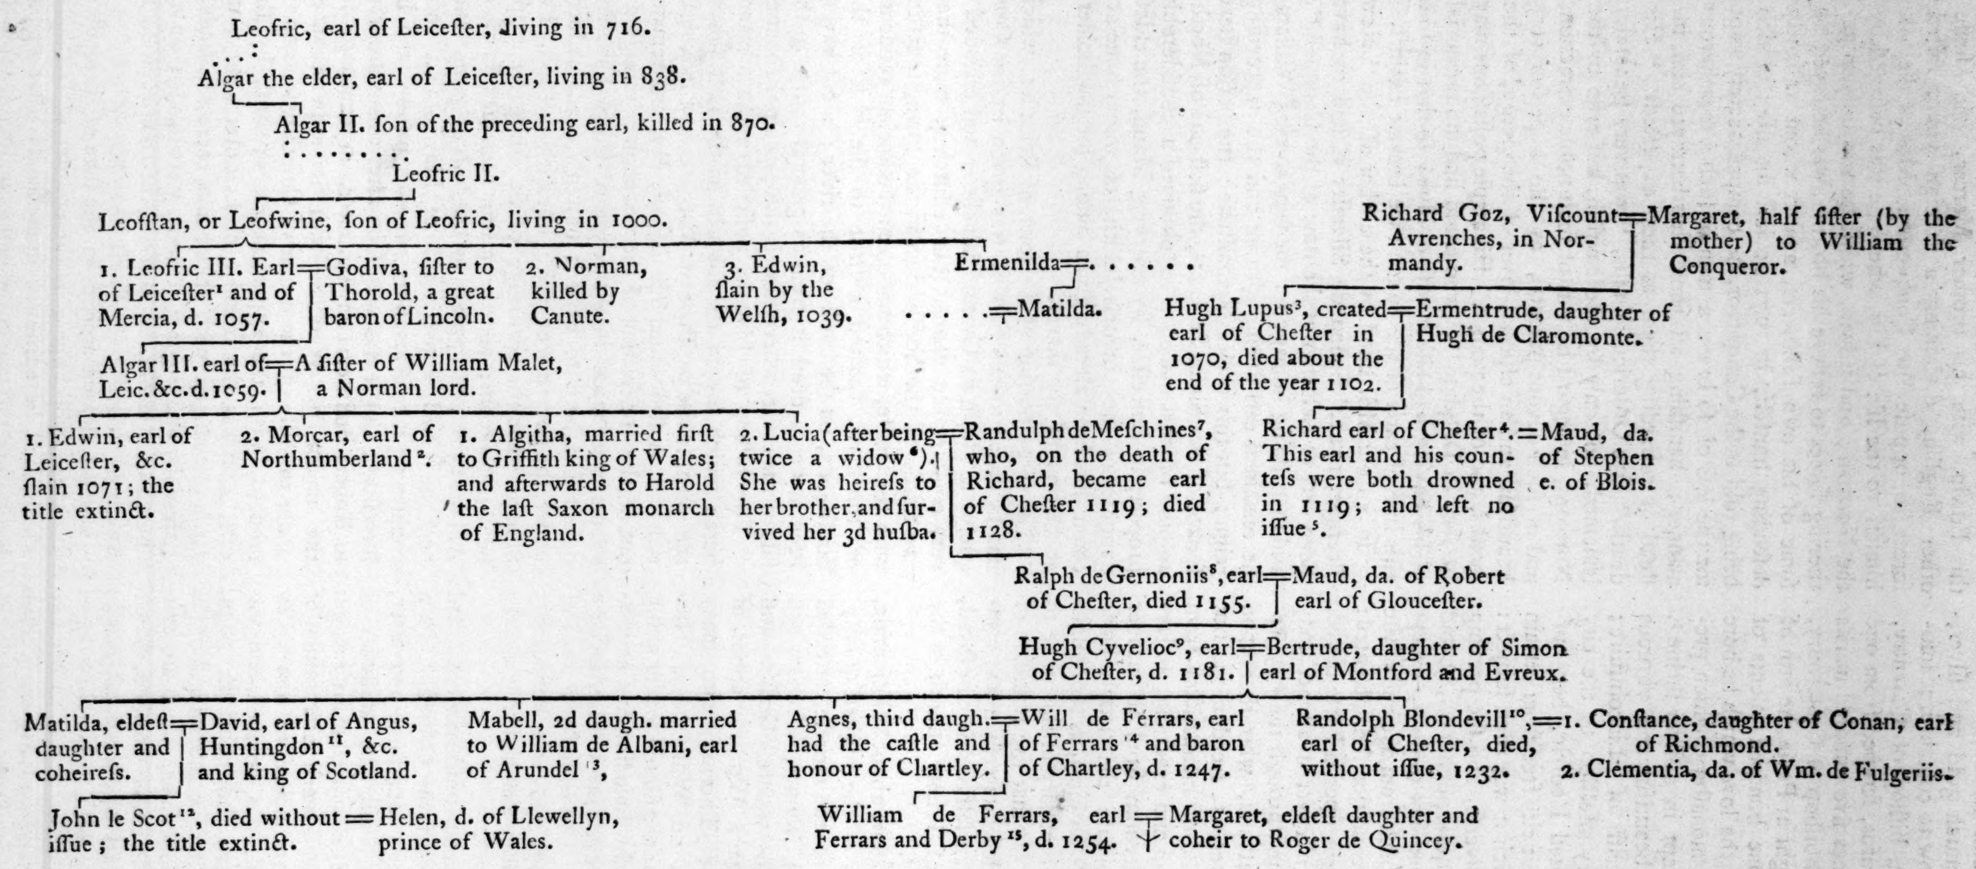
[13] This is the earl Simon alluded to by Ordericus Vitalis in the paſſage which will be cited in p. 21.

[14] Dugd Bar. I. 84.

[15] "Weſtcote, cum omnibus pertinentiis ſuis, quas Robertus comes dederat eccleſiæ Linc. in eſcambium pro manerio de Cnihtintone & ſuburbio Leirc. cum pertinentiis ſuis." Dugd. Mon. Ang. II. p 315.

[16] "Quas dedit eccleſiæ Linc. pro pace reformanda inter ipſum & eccleſiam Linc. ſuper prædicto manerio de Cnihtintone & ſuburbio Leirc. cum pertinentiis ſuis." Ibid.

Genealogy of the SAXON Earls of LEICESTER, and of the NORMAN Earls of CHESTER; compiled from Mr. BURTON, Sir WILLIAM DUGDALE, Sir PETER LEYCESTER, &c.



Leofric, earl of Leiceſter, living in 716.

Algar the elder, earl of Leiceſter, living in 838.

Algar II. ſon of the preceding earl, killed in 870.

Leofric II.

Leofſtan, or Leofwine, ſon of Leofric, living in 1000.

1. Leofric III. Earl of Leiceſter[1] and of Mercia, d. 1057. = Godiva, ſiſter to Thorold, a great baron of Lincoln.

2. Norman, killed by Canute.

3. Edwin, ſlain by the Welſh, 1039.

Ermenilda = ...

. . . . . = Matilda.

Richard Goz, Viſcount Avrenches, in Normandy. = Margaret, half ſiſter (by the mother) to William the Conqueror.

Hugh Lupus[3], created earl of Cheſter in 1070, died about the end of the year 1102. = Ermentrude, daughter of Hugh de Claromonte.

Algar III. earl of Leic. &c. d. 1059. = A ſiſter of William Malet, a Norman lord.

1. Edwin, earl of Leiceſter, &c. ſlain 1071; the title extinct.

2. Morcar, earl of Northumberland[2].

1. Algitha, married firſt to Griffith king of Wales; and afterwards to Harold the laſt Saxon monarch of England.

2. Lucia (after being twice a widow[6]). She was heireſs to her brother, and ſurvived her 3d huſba. = Randulph de Meſchines[7], who, on the death of Richard, became earl of Cheſter 1119; died 1128.

Richard earl of Cheſter[4]. This earl and his counteſs were both drowned in 1119; and left no iſſue[5]. = Maud, da. of Stephen e. of Blois.

Ralph de Gernoniis[8], earl of Cheſter, died 1155. = Maud, da. of Robert earl of Glouceſter.

Hugh Cyvelioc[9], earl of Cheſter, d. 1181. = Bertrude, daughter of Simon earl of Montford and Evreux.

Matilda, eldeſt daughter and coheireſs. = David, earl of Angus, Huntingdon[11], &c. and king of Scotland.

Mabell, 2d daugh. married to William de Albani, earl of Arundel[13],

Agnes, third daugh. had the caſtle and honour of Chartley. = Will de Ferrars, earl of Ferrars[14] and baron of Chartley, d. 1247.

Randolph Blondevill[10], earl of Cheſter, died, without iſſue, 1232. = 1. Conſtance, daughter of Conan, earl of Richmond. 2. Clementia, da. of Wm. de Fulgeriis.

John le Scot[12], died without iſſue; the title extinct. = Helen, d. of Llewellyn, prince of Wales.

William de Ferrars, earl Ferrars and Derby[15], d. 1254. = Margaret, eldeſt daughter and coheir to Roger de Quincey.

---

[1] Arms: Or, an eagle diſplayed, Sa. [Plate X. fig. 2.]

[2] Arms: Sa. an eagle diſplayed Or, membered and beaked, Gules; fig. 3.

[3] Arms: Az. a wolf's head eraſed, Argent, fig. 4.

[4] Arms: Gu. cruſulé, Or, a wolf's head eraſed, Arg. fig. 5.

[5] The following elegant verſes, occaſioned by this accident, are tranſcribed from Ordericus Vitalis, p. 869.

"Accidit hora gravis, Thomæque miſerrima navis,
Quàm malè recta terit, rupe ſoluta perit.
Flebilis eventus, dum nobilis illa juventus
Eſt immerſa mari perditione pari.
Jactatur pelago Regum generoſa propago;
Quoſque Duces plorant, monſtra marina vorant.
O dolor immenſus! nec nobilitas, neque cenſus,
Ad vitam revocat, quos maris unda necat.
Purpura cùm byſſo liquida putreſſit abyſſo;
Rex quoque quem genuit, piſcibus eſca fuit.
Sic tibi fidentes ludit fortuna pudentes;
Nunc dat, nunc demit; hinc levat, inde premit.
Quid numerus Procerum, quid opes, quid gloria rerum?
Quid, Gulielme, tibi forma valebat ibi?
Marcuit ille decor regalis, & abſtulit æquor
Quod factus fueras, quodque futurus eras.
Inter aquas iſtis inſtat damnatio triſtis,
Ni pietas gratis cœlica parcat eis:
Corporibus merſis animæ ſi dona ſalutis
Nactæ gauderent, mœſta procul fierent.
Certa ſalus animæ verùm dat tripudiare
His, benè qui caros commemorant proprios.
Hinc dolor eſt ingens, humana quod inſcia fit mens,
An requies ſit eis, quos capit uda Thetis."

[6] Her firſt huſband was Ivo Talboys earl of Anjou. By the ſecond, Roger de Romara, ſhe was mother to William Romara, earl of Lincoln 1141; Arms G. ſeven maſcles, and ſemy of croſlets, Or; ſee fig. 6.

[7] Arms: Or, a lion rampant, Gules; fig. 7.

[8] Arms: Gules, three reſts, Or; fig. 8.

[9] Arms: Az. ſix garbs, Or; fig. 9.

[10] Arms: Azure, three garbs, two and one, Or; fig. 10.

[11] Arms: Or, a lion rampant, Gules; fig. 11.

[12] Arms: Or, three piles, Gules; fig. 12.

[13] Arms: Gules, ſix garbs, Or; fig. 13.

[14] Arms: Az. ſix garbs, Or; three, two, and one; fig. 14.

[15] Arms: Gules, ſeven maſcles conjoined, three, three, and one, Or, fig. 15.—From this marriage deſcended Robert earl of Ferrars and Derby, who loſt his life in the civil wars 1278; and whoſe ſon John was ſummoned to parliament 27 Edw. I. as baron de Ferrars of Chartley, which barony and peerage is now veſted (as will be ſhewn hereafter) in George Townſhend earl of the county of Leiceſter and baron de Ferrars.

We are now arrived at a period when authentic documents will in general accompany our reſearches.

During the reign of William the Conqueror the city of Leiceſter was in the king's own hands, excepting what was held of him in capite: at leaſt, it was ſo when Domeſday was made, and we do not diſcover that the king had made any grant of it, or that any of his tenants in capite enjoyed it during his reign. We learn from Ordericus, that Yvo de Grentemaiſnell, ſon of Hugh de Grentemaiſnell, was vicecomes, municeps, & firmarius regis, ſoon after the acceſſion of Henry I. Theſe appointments Yvo ſeems to have received from the king, as ſon of Hugh, who is reported by writers near the time to have been earl of Leiceſter; and Ordericus ſeems to intimate that his ſon Yvo was ſomething very like it: but Hugh was certainly never earl of Leiceſter, becauſe he has not the title of earl in Domeſday, which is very exact in noting this title where it belonged; and Yvo, ſon of Hugh, is no where, I believe, expreſsly called comes Leiceſtriæ. That this town was in this king's own hand ſeems further probable, from its having been a town of royal demeſne in the time of the Conqueror's predeceſſor Edward the Confeſſor. It was uſual at that time for the towns and manors of the Crown to be held at firm. And this ſeems to be the meaning of firmarius in Ordericus, which may mean either leſſee, or renter at will (here probably is meant the former); as municeps ſeems to denote his being the cuſtos of the caſtle for the king, and vicecomes, the king's lieutenant of the county, or, as it would be then called, viſcounty, vicecomitatus.

In the time of Edward the Confeſſor, the City of Leiceſter (for ſo it is called in the record) paid yearly to the king an annual rent of thirty pounds by tale, and fifteen ſextaries of honey; and the burgeſſes of the king, i. e. who held of him in capite, were bound in part of their ſervice to ſend twelve of their own body to attend the king whenever he went to the wars in perſon; and if he made a voyage by ſea againſt his enemies, they were to ſend four horſes to carry armour or other neceſſaries as far as London[1].

In 1086 we find theſe cuſtoms continuing in full force; and that the king then received, as a compoſition for all rents from the city and county, forty-two pounds and two ſhillings in weight; and, inſtead of a hawk, ten pounds by tale were paid to him; and twenty ſhillings inſtead of a ſumpter-horſe. By the mint-men, or coiners, was paid annually to the king 20*l*. at the rate of 20 in ore; of which Hugh de Grentemaiſnell had the third penny[2].

“There was afore the Conqueſt a collegiate chirch “of prebendes intra caſtrum, the lands whereof “gyven by Robert erle of Leiceſter to the abbay of “chanons made by him withoute the walles. A new “chirch of the reſidew of the old prebendes was “erectid withoute the caſtelle, and dedicate to S. “Marie, as the old was[3].”

The churches in Leiceſter at the period of the Conqueſt were ſix; of which four belonged to Hugh de Grentemaiſnell, and two to the biſhop of Lincoln.

There are only four inſtances in which the number of the burgeſſes is particularly pointed out. In the poſſeſſions of Hugh de Grentemaiſnell twenty-four are enumerated as belonging to Hanſtigie, and thirteen to Sileby. The biſhop of Lincoln had ſeventeen burgeſſes, who paid him a rent of thirty-two pence; and nine others held lands under him in Poultney. Henry de Fereires, with Robert the king's ſteward, had one[4] burgeſs. The amount of theſe is only ſixty-four.

The number of houſes may in ſome degree be aſcertained; as it appears that the king had			39
The archbiſhop of York had, belonging to Carlton, —	2	From all theſe the king had a rent.	32
Hugh Lupus earl of Cheſter had ten belonging to Barrow, ſix to Kegworth, and one to Loughborough, —	17
The priory of Coventry —	10
Croyland abbey had[5]
Hugh de Grentemaiſnel had —			110
He had alſo, in common with the king,			24
And, beſides theſe, he had, belonging to Ingarſby, 3 houſes; to Merdegrave, 10; to Broughton, 4; to Stoughton, 9; to Great Wigſton, 4; to Arneſby, 7; to Shilton, 3; to Burſtall, 10; to Burton, 3; to Bruntingthorp, 1; to Desford, 2; to Langham, 3; to Letitone, 1; to Thurleſton, 1[6]; —			61
He had ſtill two other houſes; and 4 that were decayed[7],
Hugh de Witwile, an under-tenant of Hugh, had[8], — —			5
Robert de Veci had 6 belonging to Newtown, and 3 belonging to Chiborne[9],			9
Goisfrid de Wirce had one belonging to Dalby, and one to Pickwell[10] —			2
To the town of Shepeſhed belonged			4
To Sadington			1
To Thorp[11] — —			1
The counteſs Judith had, —			28
which makes the whole number of tenements in the king's own domaine, and held of him in capite — —			322

This does not, however, ſhew the complete number of houſes; for theſe burgage-tenants had their tenants, who were not tenants in capite, either of the king, or of his tenants in capite.

There were at the ſame time two mills, of which the whole of one and half the other were the property of the biſhop of Lincoln; the remaining half was the counteſs Judith's, who held without the town ſix ploughlands belonging to the borough, where ſhe employed one plough, and her tenants three ploughs.

---

[1] “Civitas de Ledeceſtre tempore regis Edwardi reddebat per annum regi 30 libras ad numerum de viginti in orâ, & 15 ſextarias mellis. Quando rex ibat in exercitu per terram, de ipſo burgo 12 burgenſes ibant cum eo. Si verò per mare in hoſtem ibatur, mittebant ei 4 equos de eodem burgo uſque Londinum, ad comportandum arma, vel alia quæ opus eſſet.” Domeſday.

[2] “Modo habet rex Willielmus, pro omnibus redditibus civitatis ejuſdem & comitatûs, 42 libras & 10 ſolidos ad pondus. Pro uno accipitre 10 libras ad numerum, pro ſummario 20 ſolidos. De monetariis 20 libras per annum de viginti in orâ. De his 20 libris habet Hugo Grentemaiſnil tertium denarium.” Domeſday. Note, if he had been earl, he would have had the third penny out of the iſſues of the hundred and county courts.

[3] Leland, Itin. vol. I. p. 16.

[4] “In ipſo burgo habet Henricus de Fereires & Robertus diſpenſator 1 burgenſem.”

[5] “Rex habet in Ledeceſtre 39 domos. Archiepiſcopus Eboracenſis 2 domos cum ſacâ & ſocâ pertinentes ad Cherlintone. Hugo comes 10 domos quæ pertinent ad Barrou, & 6 domus pertinentes ad Cacheworde, & unam domum pertinentem ad Locteburne. Abbatia de Coventreu habet 10 domos. Abbatia de Cruiland habet 3 domos. De quibus omnibus habet rex geldum ſuum.”

[6] “Hugo de Grentemaiſnil habet 110 domus, & 2 eccleſias. Præter has habet in commune cum rege 24 domos in eodem burgo. Exceptis his habet idem Hugo in Ledeceſtre 24 burgenſes pertinentes ad Hanſtigie, & 13 burgenſes pertinentes ad Sigleſbie; & 3 domos pertinentes ad Inwareſbie, & 10 domos pertinentes ad Merdegrave, & 4 domos pertinentes ad Brohtone, & 9 domos pertinentes ad Stotone, & 4 domos pertinentes ad Wichingeſtone, & 7 domos pertinentes ad Andreteſbie, & 3 domos pertinentes ad Sceltone, & 10 domos pertinentes ad Burſtelle, & 3 domos pertinentes ad Burtone, & unam domum pertinentem ad Bruneſtineſthorp, & 2 domos pertinentes ad Diresford, & 3 domos pertinentes ad Legham, quas emit de Oſberno, & unam domum pertinentem ad Letitone, & 1 domum pertinentem ad Turchiteleſtone.”

[7] “In eodem burgo habet idem Hugo 2 eccleſias, & 2 domos, & 4 domos vaſtas.”

[8] “Hugo de Witwile tenet de ipſo Hugone 5 domos cum ſacâ & ſocâ. Hæ ſunt de mutuatione de Watford.”

[9] “Robertus de Veci habet 6 domos cum ſaca & ſoca pertinentes ad Newtone, & 3 alias cum ſacâ & ſocâ pertinentes ad Chiborne.”

[10] “Guisfridus de Wirce 1 domum pertinentem ad Dalby, & aliam pertinentem ad Pickewelle.”

[11] “In Ledeceſtre ſunt 4 domos pertinentes ad Scepeheſde, & 1 pertinens ad Sadintone, & 1 pertinens ad Torp.”

She had alſo eight acres of meadow, and a wood ſix furlongs long and three broad. The whole was rented for four ſhillings a year[1].

The biſhop of Lincoln alſo held of the king in capite, by right of his ſee, certain lands and tenements, both within and without the wall of the city of Leiceſter. In Leiceſter he held 10 carucates, and had a mill, and half a mill, and the advowſon of two churches, and ſeventeen burgages. On one part of the land without the wall he had a rent of five ſhillings and four pence, and three villans, with a prieſt, and twelve bordars, having four ploughs. There were there twenty acres of meadow[2]. He poſſeſſed alſo the manor of Knighton, where he had two parts of one hide[3], equivalent to twelve ploughlands; with lands in Leir, Sharnford, Toniſcote, Poultney, Miſterton, Walcote, Kilncote, Swinford, Haliach, Dalby, Croxton, Braunſton, Buckminſter, and Holwell[4].

The wood of the whole ſheriffwick, called Hereſwode (q. d. Lord's wood), was at that time four miles long, and one broad[5].

The very conſiderable ſhare of property which was held in Leiceſter by HUGH DE GRENTEMAISNELL, ſo called from his ſeat in Normandy built by Grento, (the name is compounded of Grentonis Maiſnel, in Latin Manſio) entitles him to particular notice[6]. He was the ſecond ſon of a potent Norman baron, of the famous family of the Geroians; and, coming over in the train of the Conqueror in 1066, behaved himſelf ſo valiantly, that the king rewarded him with many lordſhips in various counties[7]. He occurs in 1067 as a witneſs to a charter given by the king to Weſtminſter abbey[8]; in 1068 was conſtituted one of the aſſiſtants to Odo biſhop of Bayeux and William Fitz Oſbern in the adminiſtration of juſtice throughout the whole kingdom; in 1069 was made ſhire-reeve of Hampſhire; and upon the ſettling of ſuch garriſons as were thought fit to keep the ſubdued Engliſh in awe, he had, as ſome writers affirm, the caſtle of Leiceſter committed to his charge, being alſo honoured with the office and title of Viſcount of Leiceſterſhire[9]; and, beſides theſe great truſts, the king richly married him to Adeliza, lady of Brokeſburne[10], a great inheritrix of noble family; and, according to ſome writers, beſtowed on him, at the ſolemnization thereof, the manor of Hinckley, to hold of the king in capite, by the ſervice of Steward of England[11]; a title and office of very high diſtinction in all the courts of Europe, and which, as we learn from a record of Henry the Fourth[12], had attached from antient time to the earldom of Leiceſter[13]. In 1079 this Hugh was one of the nobles who by earneſt ſuit endeavoured to effect a reconciliation between the king and his ſon Robert Curthoſe; and in 1088, the firſt year of the reign of Rufus, this powerful Norman lord, in confederacy with many of his countrymen, appeared in arms againſt that king, in behalf of Robert eldeſt ſon of the Conqueror[14]. By the ſpirited conduct of Rufus, this inſurrection was ſpeedily quelled; but not till the town of Leiceſter had experienced the moſt fatal conſequences; the caſtle, with the church adjoining, and a conſiderable part of the town itſelf, falling a ſacrifice to the royal vengeance[15].

The brave Grentemaiſnell, after making ſuitable conceſſions, was taken by Rufus into ſtill greater favour than before, and became one of the moſt ſtrenuous oppoſers of Curthoſe; but at the cloſe of life, being aged and infirm, he took upon him in 1094 the habit of a monk at St. Ebrulf's abbey[16] at Utica in Normandy, which under his auſpices had emerged from obſcurity, and where he had been a bountiful benefactor, having endowed it with ample poſſeſſions both in England and France[17]; and dying ſix days after, viz. Feb. 22, his body, after being ſeaſoned with ſalt and wrapped in an hide, was honourably buried in the South ſide of the chapter-houſe of that abbey[18], where this epitaph was placed to commemorate his merits and his liberality:

"Ecce ſub hoc tumulo requieſcit ſtrenuus Hugo,
Qui viguit multos multâ probitate per annos;
  Manſio Grentonis munitio dicitur ejus,
  Unde fuit cognomen ei multis bene notum.
Guillelmi fortis Anglorum tempore Regis
Inter præcipuos magnates is claruit heros:
  Militiâ fortis fuit & virtute fidelis,
  Hoſtibus horribilis, & amicis tutor herilis;
Sumtibus officiis augens, & pinguibus armis,
Cœnobium Sancti multum provexit Ebrulfi,
  Dum cathedram Sancti celebrabat plebs pia Petri,
  Occidit emeritus, habitu monachi trabeatus:
Eccleſiæ cultor, largus dator, & relevator,
Blandus egenorum; lætetur in arce polorum. Amen."

---

[1] "Judita comitiſſa habet in eodem burgo 28 domos, & de medietate molini 5 ſolidos & 4 denarios. Extra burgum habet ipſa 6 carucatas terræ pertinentes ad burgum; & ibi habet 1 carucam, & homines ejus 4 carucas. Ibi 8 acræ prati. Silva 6 quarentenæ longitudinis, & 3 quarentenæ latitudinis. Valet 20 ſolidos totum." Domeſday.

[2] "Epiſcopus Lincolnienſis tenet in Ledeceſtre 10 carucatas terræ. In dominico habet ibi 5 carucas, & molinum & dimidium de 10 ſolidis & 8 denariis, & 2 eccleſias de 15 ſolidis; & 17 burgenſes 32 denarios per annum reddentes. De unâ parte terræ extra murum habet 5 ſolidos & 4 denarios; & 3 villani cum preſbytero & 12 bordarii habent 4 carucas. Ibi 20 acræ prati."

[3] "Idem epiſcopus tenet Cnihtetone. Ibi ſunt duæ partes unius hidæ." Ibid.

[4] The property of the biſhop in theſe ſeveral pariſhes will particularly be diſtinguiſhed under each place.

[5] Silva totius vicecomitatis, Hereſwode vocata, habet 4 leucas in longitudine, & 1 levam in latitudine."—The different interpretations that have been given to leuca, ſome calling it a mile, others a mile and a half, two miles, or even three miles, may be ſeen in the Diſſertation on Domeſday-Book.

[6] See Dugdale, Bar I. 425.

[7] In Leiceſterſhire, it appears by Domeſday-Book, he had ſixty-ſeven lordſhips; in Northamptonſhire twenty; in Bedford ſhire four; in Glouceſterſhire five; in Hertfordſhire one; in Suffolk one; in Nottinghamſhire one; and in Warwickſhire five. He had alſo the manor of Lippard in Worceſterſhire, which he held of the church of St. Mary in Worceſter.

[8] Vincent on Brooke, p. 198.

[9] Shire reeve was always latinized by vicecomes. Theſe officers were of two ſorts. The one had a grant of his office in fee; the other held at the will of the king. The firſt may be called feudal viſcounts; the other, ordinary ſhire-reeves.

[10] Adeliza uxor Hugonis de Grentemaiſnel occurs in Domeſday as a landholder in various places. Beſides Brokeſborne in Herts, whence ſhe took her title, ſhe had three manors in Leiceſterſhire, three in Warwickſhire, and four in Bedfordſhire.

[11] Of this important office a full account ſhall be given in our Appendix, N° II.—The barony of Hinckley is ſaid to have been held of the king in capite, by the grand ſergeanty of Seneſchalſia Angliæ; ſo ſays Knyghton. But by others it has been doubted whether either the ſeneſchalcy or the barony of Hinckley were ever in the poſſeſſion of the Grentemaiſnels. This point will be diſcuſſed more at large in that part of the preſent work which treats of the town of Hinckley.

[12] See the Rolls of Parliament.

[13] No more than four perſonages occur in our hiſtorians, as having held this office earlier; and thoſe appear rather to have been ſtewards of the houſehold, much reſembling the chamberlains of after-times. Haraldus, ſteward in 1066 to Edward the Confeſſor, was ſucceeded by Houelin; and William Fitz-Oſbern, who had been created earl of Hereford and lord of Wight in 1066, was made ſteward in 1067. He married, 1. Adeliza daughter of Roger de Todenei, ſtandard-bearer of Normandy; 2. Richildis, daughter and heireſs of Henault; and died in 1072. [Arms: Or, a lion rampant, Sa. fig. 16.] Henry Beauclerc, ſon to the Conqueror, was the next ſteward.

[14] "Hugo de Granteſmaiſnelo Legerceſtriæ provinciam, Rogerus Bigot Eſtanliam deprædati ſunt." Diceto, inter X Script. col. 490.—"Rogerius Bigod apud Norwich, & Hugo de Grentemeiſnel apud Legeceſtre, ſuis quiſquis partibus rapinas urgebant." W. Malmeſb. lib. iv. p. 68.

[15] "Deſtructâ civitate Leiceſtriæ cum caſtello, & eccleſiâ infra caſtellum, tempore prædicti Conqueſtoris." Dugd. Mon. Ang. II. 312; from Charite's Rentale, p. 188. a.

[16] Ses an account of this religious foundation, Appendix, N° VII.

[17] "To the monks of Thorney in Cambridgeſhire he had given one yard-land in Wenge. He is ſuppoſed alſo to have been a liberal benefactor to the abbey of Lira in Normandy; of which an account will be given in the Appendix, N° III.

[18] Dugd. Bar. I. 425. & auctores ibi cit.

Adeliza ſiſter to Hugh de Grentemaiſnell was mother to Robert of Rothelent, or Ruthelan, one of the barons of Hugh Lupus earl of Cheſter [1].

Hugh had iſſue five ſons and ſix daughters. Yvo, the third ſon, obtained the Engliſh fief of his father; Robert, who ſurvived him 28 years, but died without iſſue; William, a perſon of great conſequence in the court of William Rufus (who, after having refuſed the daughter of the earl of Meriton, married Mabel, daughter to Robert de Wiſcard, and died at Antioch); Hugh the fourth ſon, with Alberic the fifth ſon, who was educated a ſcholar, and afterwards knighted [2], are ſaid to have been ſhipwrecked, Nov. 25, 1119, with William and Richard, ſons of Henry I, Richard of Ruthelan their couſin, Richard earl of Cheſter, and many other perſons of eminence [3].

Yvo inherited his father's poſſeſſions in England; and was warden of the caſtle of Leiceſter, and the viſcount of that viſcounty, and likewiſe the king's firmer. He probably ſucceeded his father in theſe offices; but I do not find he held them as of his fief and inheritance. Ordericus calls him municeps Leiceſtriæ, vicecomes, & firmarius regis. Had he been a feudal viſcount, I conceive, he would have been ſtyled ſimply by the Norman author, vicecomes Leiceſtriæ, the wardenſhip of the caſtle being appendant thereto, together with the iſſues and perquiſites of the town and ſhire. About the year 1107, Robert Curthoſe made his laſt puſh for the crown of England. This Yvo was one of his moſt active partizans, and invaded and waſted the lands of king Henry and his friends. The earl of Meulan marched againſt Leiceſter; and directing his attack againſt that quarter of the city, which was the poſſeſſion of Yvo, made himſelf entire maſter thereof. And thus, continues Ordericus, being made an earl in England, he exceeded all the nobles of England in riches and power.

Yvo being through the king's indignation fined at a vaſt ſum, he made his addreſs to this Robert earl of Meulan, then the king's principal counſellor, hoping by his means to obtain ſome favour; who ſubtily adviſed him to perform a long pilgrimage; for effecting whereof he would aſſiſt him with 500 marks of ſilver, taking his lands in pawn for 15 years, with promiſe that at the end of that term they ſhould be returned to Yvo his ſon, to whom he would give the daughter of his brother (Henry earl of Warwick) in marriage; for the performance of which agreement the earl of Meulan gave his oath, the king himſelf alſo aſſenting thereto; but Yvo dying in this pilgrimage, his ſon neither obtained the lady, nor his paternal inheritance. So writes the monk of Utica, contemporary with the facts, and belonging to a monaſtery of the foundation and patronage of Grentemaiſnell. For the health of the ſouls of his father and mother, he gave Brokeſburne, which he had inherited in right of his mother, to the monks of Bermondſey in Surrey, where her body was interred [4].

---

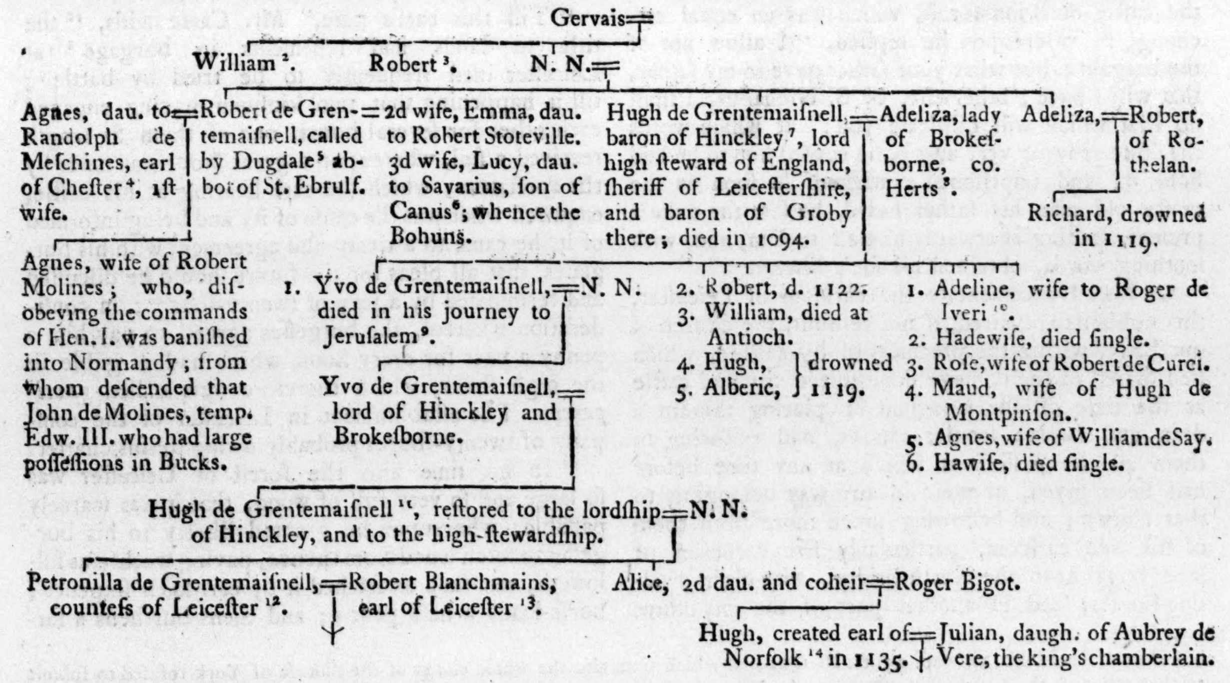
[1] Sir Peter Leyceſter, p. 104.

[2] Dugd. Bar. I. 425.

[3] There were about 300 in this unfortunate ſhip, who were all drowned except one Berolde, a butcher of Roan in Normandy, who was taken up the next morning by three fiſhermen, after a cold froſty night's ſhipwreck, and he was with difficulty recovered, and lived twenty years after. Sir P. Leyceſter, p. 115; and ſee the Latin verſes already cited in p. 18.

[4] Dugd. Bar. I. 425. ex Reg. de Bermondſey, 108, a.

Genealogy of the Family of GRENTEMAISNELL [1]; from Segar's MS Baronagium, p. 503, &c.



Gervais

William [2]. Robert [3]. N. N.

Agnes, dau. to Randolph de Meſchines, earl of Cheſter [4], 1ſt wife. = Robert de Grentemaiſnell, called by Dugdale [5] abbot of St. Ebrulf. = 2d wife, Emma, dau. to Robert Stoteville. 3d wife, Lucy, dau. to Savarius, ſon of Canus [6]; whence the Bohuns.

Hugh de Grentemaiſnell, baron of Hinckley [7], lord high ſteward of England, ſheriff of Leiceſterſhire, and baron of Groby there; died in 1094. = Adeliza, lady of Brokeſborne, co. Herts [8].

Adeliza, = Robert, of Rothelan.

Richard, drowned in 1119.

Agnes, wife of Robert Molines; who, diſobeving the commands of Hen. I. was baniſhed into Normandy; from whom deſcended that John de Molines, temp. Edw. III. who had large poſſeſſions in Bucks.

1. Yvo de Grentemaiſnell, died in his journey to Jeruſalem [9]. = N. N.

Yvo de Grentemaiſnell, lord of Hinckley and Brokeſborne.

2. Robert, d. 1122.
3. William, died at Antioch.
4. Hugh, } drowned
5. Alberic, } 1119.

1. Adeline, wife to Roger de Iveri [10].
2. Hadewiſe, died ſingle.
3. Roſe, wife of Robert de Curci.
4. Maud, wife of Hugh de Montpinſon.
5. Agnes, wife of William de Say.
6. Hawiſe, died ſingle.

Hugh de Grentemaiſnell [11], reſtored to the lordſhip of Hinckley, and to the high-ſtewardſhip. = N. N.

Petronilla de Grentemaiſnell, counteſs of Leiceſter [12]. = Robert Blanchmains, earl of Leiceſter [13].

Alice, 2d dau. and coheir = Roger Bigot.

Hugh, created earl of Norfolk [14] in 1135. = Julian, daugh. of Aubrey de Vere, the king's chamberlain.

---

[1] In a pedigree preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum (Harl. MSS. 6160. 17. b.) the Grentemaiſnells are called "Earls of Leiceſter and Hinckley;" and in a MS. written 1578 by Robert Cook Clarencieux, in Emanuel college library, and by another, a copy of it, written in 1589, in the collection of the late Rev. Mr Cole of Milton, it is ſaid that "Geoffrey earl of Hinckley was ſo created by William Rufus, of whom deſcended Hugh Grauntmaines earl of Hinckley, and lord ſteward of England, whoſe daughter and heir called Pernell was married to Robert Beaumont third earl of Leiceſter, who, in her right, was lord ſteward of England."

[2] Dugd. Mon. Ang. II. 900.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Sir P. Leyceſter, p. 120.

[5] Bar. I. 434.

[6] Sir P. Leyceſter, p. 120.

[7] Arms: Gules, a pale Or; ſee Plate X. fig. 17.

[8] In the pedigree of Say, Segar calls her "Alice, daughter to Ivo count of Bellomont."

[9] He was witneſs to a charter of William II. Mon. Ang. III. 260.

[10] A Norman ſoldier, to whom the Conqueror gave ample poſſeſſions in Oxfordſhire, which, at the making of Domeſday, were enjoyed by Adeline. This lady, who died at her capital manſe at Fencot near Biceſter in the year 1111. was a benefactreſs to many monaſteries. She gave a mill at Iſlip to the abbey of Bec in Normandy; the manor of Brocthorp to St. Peter's abbey at Glouceſter; to the monaſtery of St. Ebrulf at Utica in Normandy her manor of Charlton in Wiltſhire. In her laſt ſickneſs, ſhe gave to the abbey of Abingdon one hide of land at Fencot. Her corpſe was conveyed into Normandy, and interred in the abbey of St. Ebrulf at Utica, founded or reſtored by her father, near the bodies of her father and mother. She died ſeiſed in dowry of the manors of Iſlip and Ottindon, or Oddington. Warton's Hiſt. of Kiddington, p. 30; from Mon. Ang. II. 954. 966; III. 8; and Ord. Vit. p. 585.

[11] This Hugh and his grandfather are confounded by ſeveral of the old hiſtorians.

[12] She is ſo called in a record. See Mon. II. In an old regiſter of Leiceſter ſhe is ſaid to be the daughter of an Hugh Grentemeſnel, and great-grand-daughter of the illuſtrious Hugh de Grentemeſnell, whoſe fief, which had been poſſeſſed by the Bellomonts for near 100 years, was claimed (6 John) by her as her juſt inheritance. I conceive that her ſon Robert Fitz Parnell aſſumed this patronymic as her heir, in the earldom of Leiceſter, and fief of the firſt Hugh her great-grandfather. No trace, I believe, in hiſtory of her father, or grand-father. The regiſter of Leiceſter makes her the daughter of an Hugh de Grentemeſnell; but this ſeems dubious.

[13] See his deſcendants in the pedigree of the Norman earls of Leiceſter.

[14] Arms: Quarterly, Or acroſs Gules; ſee Plate X. fig. 18.

It was about this period that Anſelm, archbiſhop of Canterbury, having cauſed prieſts marriages to be prohibited in a council at London [7], that conſtitution was preſently publiſhed at Leiceſter, but received with great heat, and rejected by many of the married prieſts, who ſaid, they would part with any thing but their wives in obedience to the church.

In the year 1107, according to Ordericus, the earldom of Leiceſter was beſtowed by Henry I. on his chief counſellor and firm adherent Robert de Bellomont, earl of Meulan. The grant was to this earl in feodo; and with it he had the wardenſhip of the caſtle, and the demeſnes of the king within and about Leiceſter. He was the ſon of Roger de Bellomont, lord of Pont-Audomare (a perſon of great eſteem with William duke of Normandy, being one of his prime counſellors), by Adelina daughter of Waleran, and ſiſter to Hugh, earl of Meulan. This Hugh taking the habit of a monk, and dying without iſſue, Robert obtained the caſtle of Meulan from the king of France for a ſum of money, and ſucceeded his uncle in the title of earl. Of his ſpecial valour in the famous battle with duke William whereby he got the crown of England, William Pictavenſis ſaith [1], "A certain Norman young knight, ſon of Roger de Bellomont, making the firſt onſet in that fight, did what deſerveth laſting fame, boldly charging and breaking-in upon the enemy with that corps which he commanded in the right wing of the army." For which eminent ſervice he had vaſt poſſeſſions [2] beſtowed on him in this kingdom; viz. in Warwickſhire [3] ſixty-four lordſhips, and in Leiceſterſhire ſixteen, or the greateſt part of them; beſides ſeven in Wiltſhire, three in Northamptonſhire, and one in Glouceſterſhire, which Roger his father had poſſeſſed.

Earl Robert was a man of a high ſpirit; for in the year 1090, being exceedingly puffed up by rewards and promiſes from king William II, he went to Roan, and boldly required of Robert Curthoſe duke of Normandy the caſtle of Ivery; to whom the duke anſwered, that "he had given to his father the caſtle of Brion for it, which was an equal exchange:" whereupon he replied, "I allow not of the bargain; but what your father gave to my father, that will I have; otherwiſe, by S. Nichaſius, I ſhall do that which will diſpleaſe you;" at which words the duke growing very angry, he cauſed him to be laid hold on and impriſoned; whereof ſo ſoon as the crafty old man his father heard, he ſent the duke a preſent, haſting afterwards himſelf to him, and, with ſoothing words, obtained his ſon's liberty.

On his advancement to the earldom of Leiceſter, this nobleman repaired, if not re-built, the church of our Lady, within the precincts of his caſtle [4], which had ſhared in the damage done to the city and caſtle at the time of the Conqueſt [5]; placing therein a dean and twelve ſecular canons, and reſtoring to them all the poſſeſſions which at any time before had been given, or were in any way belonging to that church; and beſtowing much more unto them of his own earldom, particularly five carucates of land lying near the North bridge, with eight dwelling-houſes; and in another part of the city three virgates and three oxgangs, with ſix pounds of his own annual rents; and all the churches that were within the ſokes of Shepeſheved and Halſo; with many other churches, lands, and yearly rents.

He appropriated to them all the churches in Leiceſter and its ſuburbs, except St. Margaret's, which was of the fee of Lincoln; and particularly confirmed to them thoſe of All Saints, St. Peter, and St. Martin, which Ralph Boteler had beſtowed on them in augmentation of their prebends, with the church of Lileburne, the lands and tithes thereunto appertaining, three pounds yearly rent out of that lordſhip, and thirty ſhillings yearly rent from Blingeſſet and Tormodeſton. The earl gave them beſides three carucates, and one virgate, with a mill at the North bridge, for cloathing of the ſick people in their charge. His counteſs Elizabeth (by ſome erroneouſly called Iſabel) gave them alſo one carucate at Burton.

"Concerning this foundation," ſays Carte, "I find in a manuſcript of Sir William Dugdale, containing "Analecta breviſſima ex quibuſdam rotulis in turri London'," as follows: "1103, 2 Hen. I. In nomine Sancte & Individue Trinitatis. Notum ſit omnibus Sancte Dei eccleſie filiis preſentibus & futuris, quatenus ab incarnatione Domini anno 1103, regnante H. rege Anglorum, Robertus comes Mellenti conſulatum Leiceſtrie adeptus, ibi in honore Sancte Dei genetricis Marie, ac omnium ſanctorum veneratione, pro animâ Willielmi regis Anglie expugnatoris, ejuſque uxoris Matildis regine, & ejus filii Willielmi Secundi regis, in futurâ memoriâ animæ Henrici regis, & ejus uxoris Mathildis ſecunde, & eorum liberis, & pro animâ Rogeri de Bellomonte & ejus uxoris Adelize, & pro ſeipſo & ejus uxore Elizabeth, & eorum filiis, & pro animâ Albrede ſororis ſui abbatiſſe, & pro animabus omnium Henrici regis & ſuorum predeceſſorum, & fidelium defunctorum, eccleſiam reedificavit, in quâ canonicos & decanum, & eorum capitulum, conceſſu regis Henrici & Roberti [6] epiſcopi, canonicè diſpoſuit [7]."

"Till this earl's time," Mr. Carte adds, "the title to lands and tenements in burgage [8] at Leiceſter uſed frequently to be tried by battle [9]; till it happening that two kinſmen having engaged each other for ſeveral hours, one of them at length received a foil, whereupon a great ſhout was made by the ſpectators; which the earl hearing at his caſtle, enquired what was the cauſe of it; and being informed of it, he came to a treaty and agreement with his burgeſſes, that all pleas for the future ſhould be diſcuſſed and terminated by a jury of twenty-four [10]; in conſideration whereof, the burgeſſes agreed to pay him a penny a year for every houſe which had a gable in the high ſtreet, which therefore were called gavelpence. The eſtabliſhment in Leiceſter of the company of twenty-four is probably owing to this charter.

"In his time alſo the foreſt of Leiceſter was ſo large and ſo very full of wood, that it was ſcarcely paſſable; whereupon he granted liberty to his burgeſſes to fetch wood from thence, paying weekly as followeth, viz. ſuch as fetched it by cart-loads ſixpence; horſe-loads a half penny; and mens burthens a far-

---

[7] Ranulf. Ceſtr. lib. vii. cap. 13. A. D. 1102; at which time alſo the whole clergy of the dioceſe of York refuſed to ſubmit to that canon of the council for putting away their wives, as was notified by Girardus, archbiſhop of York, in an epiſtle of his to Anſelm. Ant. Brit. 119. Spelm. Concil. tom. II. p. 25.

[1] Geſt. W. Ducis Norm. p. 197.

[2] "Ingentia prædia in Angliâ." W. Malmeſb. p. 90.

[3] He had twelve houſes in the borough of Warwick, where Hugh de Grentemaiſnell alſo had four. Dugd. War. I. 424.

[4] Infra & juxta caſtellum.

[5] See note 15, p. 20.

[6] obert Bloet, lord chancellor of England 1089; and biſhop of Lincoln 1092—1123.

[7] A farther account of this church will be given in its regular order in the parochial hiſtory of Leiceſter.

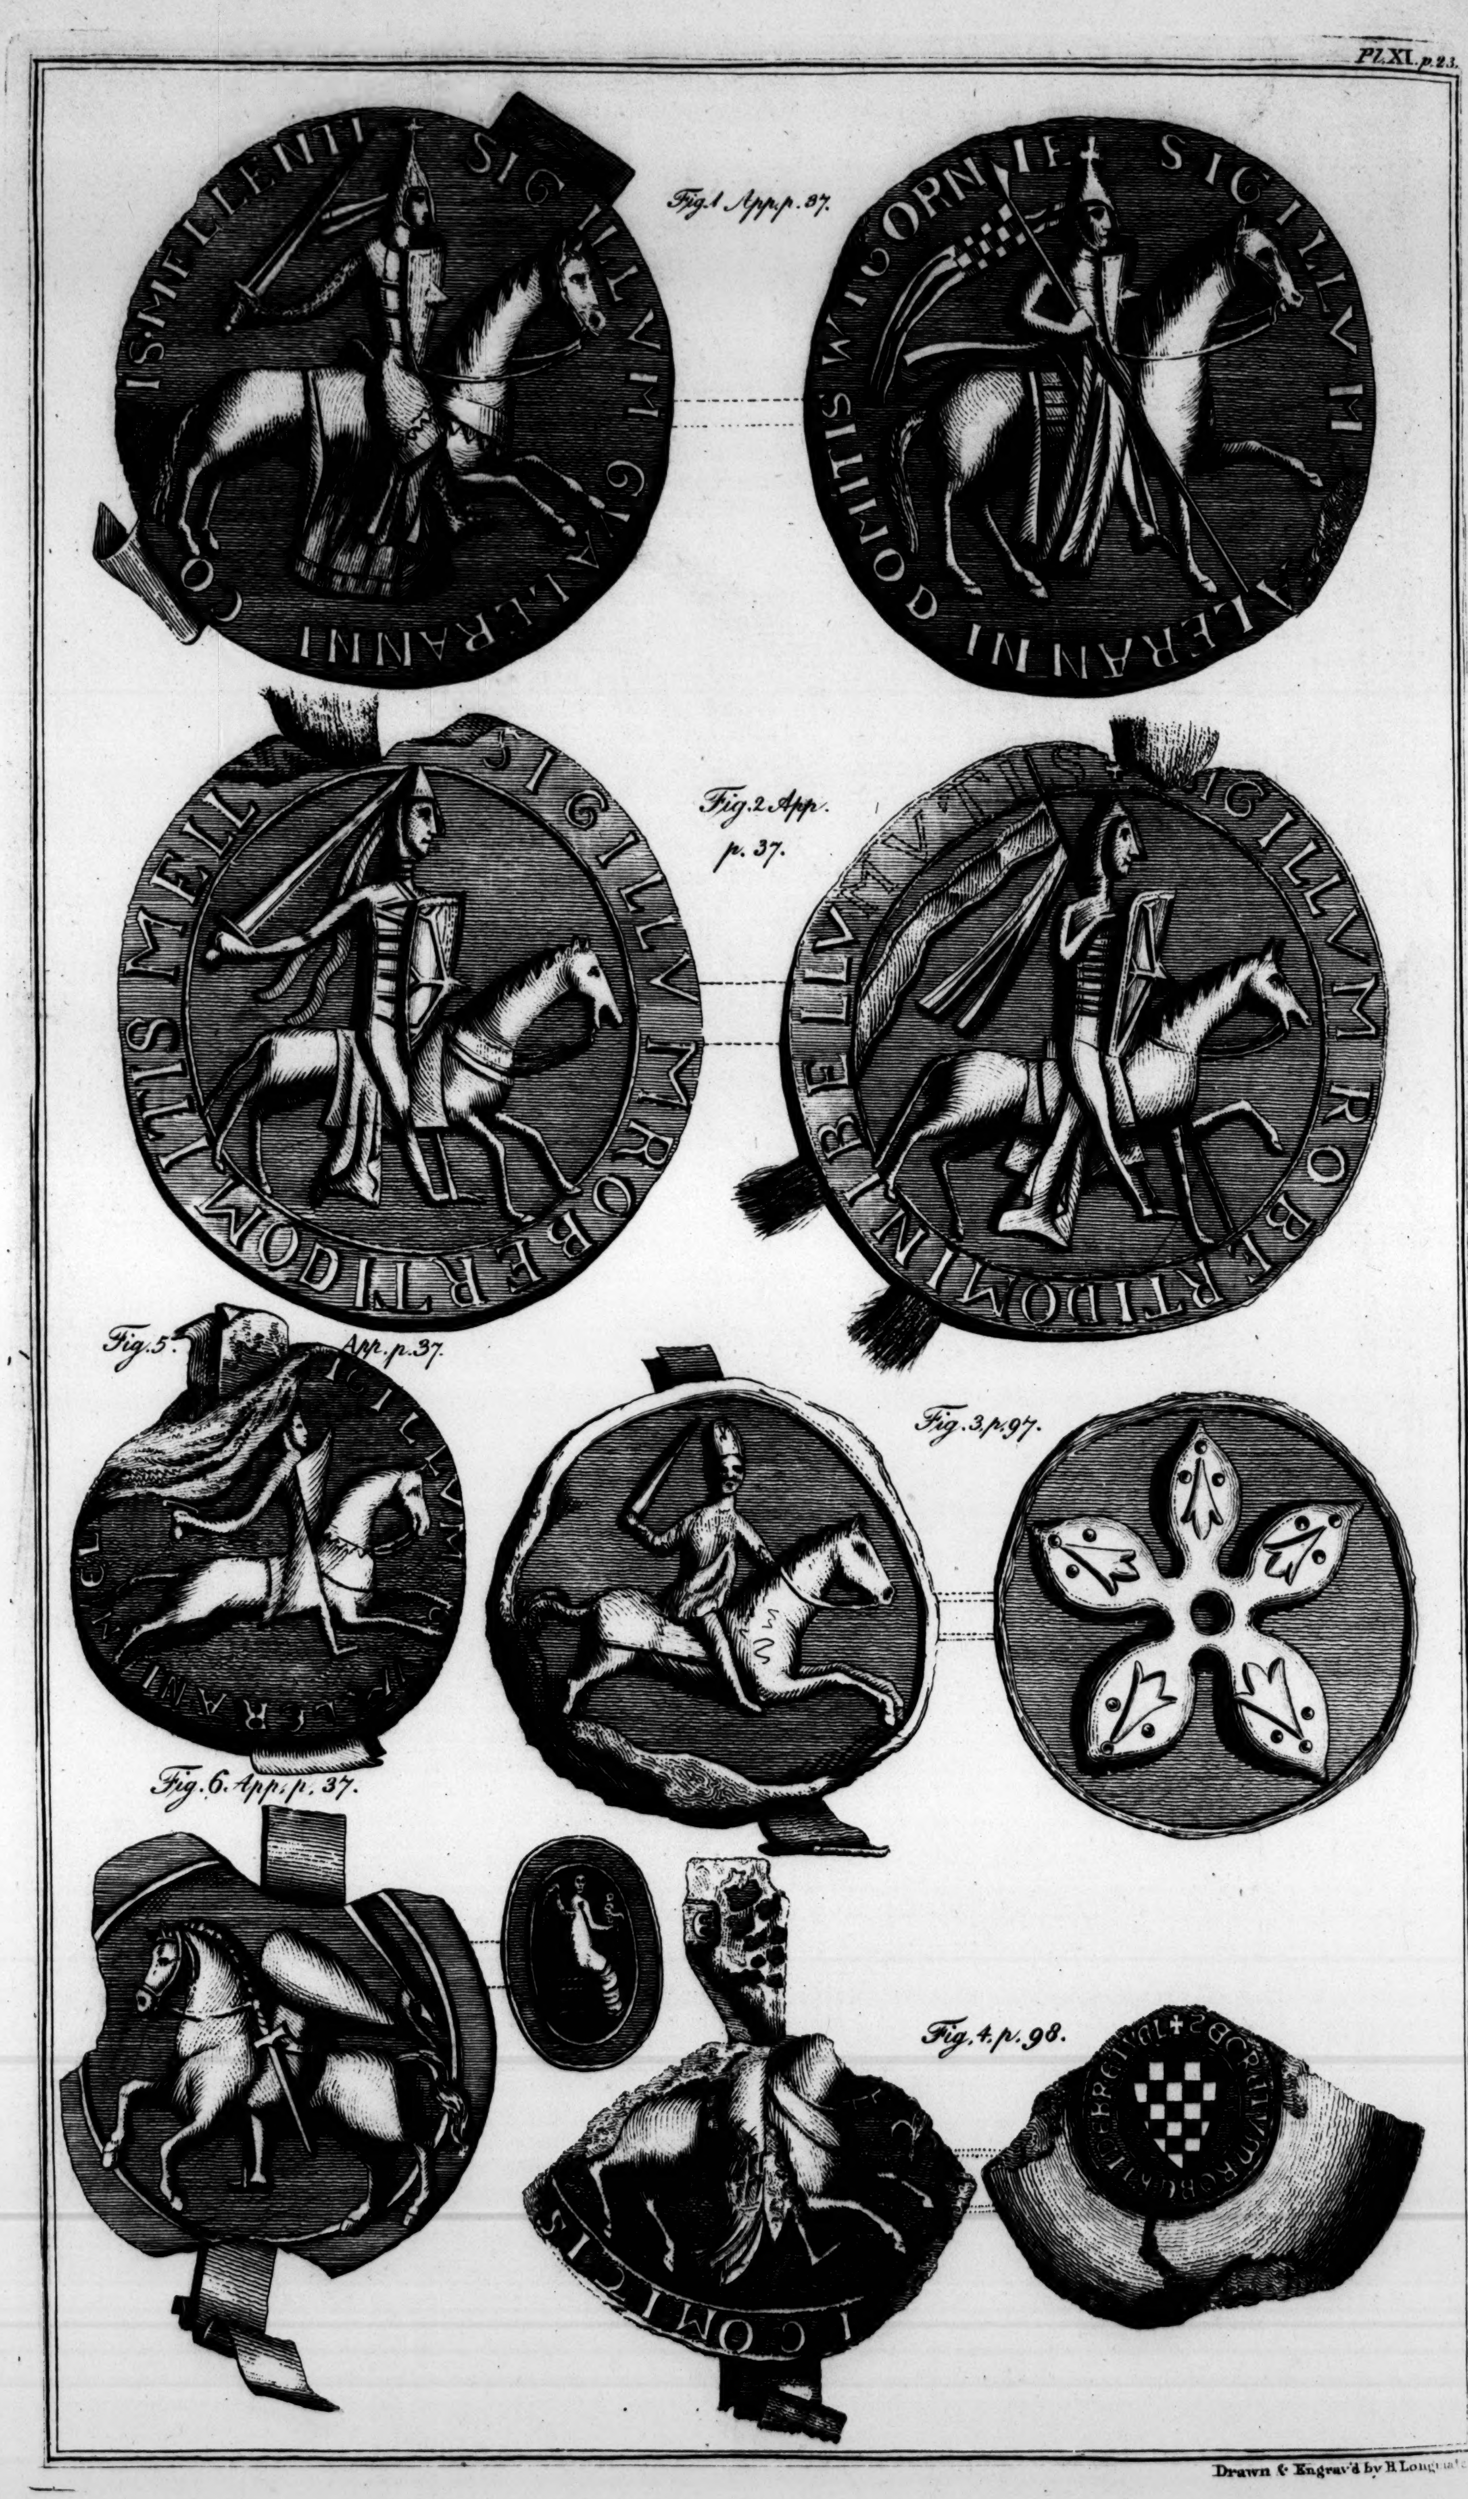
[8] The tenements were thoſe of the earl's burgeſſes in capite. He could make no alteration as to the burgeſſes of other lords. Henry II, to correct the evil of trial by battle, introduced grand aſſiſes. See Glanville.

[9] "The trial of camp-fight or duel was introduced here by William the Conqueror; before the Conqueſt there being not one law or example of this practice here." Kennet, Gloſſ. to Parochial Antiquities, voc. Bellum.

[10] Biſhop Nicolſon ſays, "The method of trial by a jury of twelve men, which was brought out of Aſia by Woden and his Getes into the Northern parts of Europe, growing into diſuſe, the way of trial by ordeal and duel prevailed; till, about 820, Regner Lodbrog, king of Denmark, reſtored the trial by twelve men there, as Alfred and Guthrun did here in England, in all matters of leſſer moment; though the trial by battle was allowed to great men in cauſis gravioribus. And in the year 1163, Waldemar, the firſt king of Denmark, abrogated the trial by ordeal; revived that by twelve men; and about the ſame year Henry the Second of England made a law, that the perſon accuſed ſhould have his choice, whether he would have his trial by duel, or by a jury of twelve men [his country]." Pref. to Leges Saxonicæ.

thing.

BRITISH
12 JN [illegible]
MUSEUM



SIGILLVM GVALERANNI COMITIS MELLENTI
SIGILLVM GALERANNI COMITIS WIGORNIE
SIGILLVM ROBERTI COMITIS MELL
SIGILLVM ROBERTI DOMINI BELLIMVNTIS
SIGILLVM . . . ALERANNI . . . EL COMITIS

Fig.1 App.p.37.

Fig.2 App. p.37.

Fig.5. App.p.37.

Fig.3.p.97.

Fig.6. App.p.37.

Fig.4.p.98.

Drawn & Engrav'd by B. Longmate

thing. This at firſt was collected at the entrance of the wood; and afterwards at the town's end next the wood; and at laſt at the bridges of the town. The firſt who gathered it there was one Penbrioch, to whom the earl gave a piece of ground near the bridge to build on, for his more convenient gathering of theſe pennies, which from the place where they were collected came to be called brigg-ſilver [1]."

Robert earl of Leiceſter and Meulan wedded Elizabeth [2] (or Iſabel), daughter to Hugh the great earl of Vermandois [3]; by whom he left iſſue two twin ſons; Robert, his ſucceſſor in the earldom of Leiceſter; and Waleran, who ſucceeded him in that of Meulan [4]; a third ſon called Hugh, ſurnamed Pauper [5]; and five daughters; Adelina, married to Hugh Montford; another, married to Hugh de Novo Caſtello; another, to William Lovel, or Lupellus, ſon of Aſceline Goell lord of Ivery in Normandy; another, married to Almaric de Montford; and Elizabeth, married to Gilbert de Clare, ſurnamed Strongbow, earl of Pembroke [6]. At the cloſe of life he became a monk in the abbey of Preaux; and, dying June 5, 1118, was buried in that abbey; but his heart was ſent, preſerved in ſalt, wrapped up in lead, to the hoſpital which he had founded at Brackley in Northamptonſhire [7]. His widow was afterwards married to William earl of Warren and Surrey.

It has been ſaid, but without ſufficient authority, that this nobleman, as a foreigner, was by birth, inclination, and intereſt, too much inclined to conſider England only as a conquered province; and he has been repreſented as having been the author of ſome pernicious ſchemes for ſupplying Henry the Firſt, to whom he was prime counſellor (that is, his high juſtice), with the means of acquiring and preſerving his foreign territories. But his general character ſeems more fairly delineated by Henry of Huntingdon [8]; who ſays, "He was in worldly affairs the wiſeſt of all men betwixt England and Jeruſalem; eminent for knowledge, plauſible of ſpeech, keen and crafty, a ſubtle genius, of great foreſight and prudence, not eaſily over-reached, profound in counſel, and of great wiſdom; by which means he acquired vaſt poſſeſſions; honours, cities, caſtles, towns, villages, rivers, and woods. The firſt of theſe he held not only in England, but in Normandy and France; inſomuch that he made the kings of France and England friends and foes to each other at his pleaſure. If he was diſpleaſed with any man, he forced him to ſubmiſſive humiliation; if pleaſed, he advanced him as he choſe: by which means he got an incredible proportion of wealth in money, jewels, and drapery. But in the height of his glory, another earl ſeduced his wife by every intrigue and artifice, which brought exceeding vexation and trouble of mind to him in his old age." Broken down with exceſſive grief, and drawing near his end, being required in his laſt illneſs by his confeſſor to make reſtitution of whatſoever he had got by force or fraud from any man [9], and to bewail that ſin with tears: he anſwered, "If I do ſo, what ſhall I leave my ſons?" to whom the confeſſor replied, "Let them be content with their ancient and juſt inheritance, and what you have lawfully gotten for them; and do you reſtore the reſt, otherwiſe your ſoul will go to hell."—"Nay," quoth he, "I will rather give all to my ſons, and they ſhall do works of mercy for the health of my ſoul." But, notwithſtanding this ſharp reflection, his own works of piety were neither few nor ſmall; for, beſides the [10] collegiate church which he rebuilt near his caſtle at Leiceſter, he reſtored to the church of Lincoln ten burgeſſes within the walls of Leiceſter, in recompence for the damages he had done to the church [11]. He gave alſo to the priory of Lenton, co. Nottingham, the church of Winchingſtone, with three yard lands, and three tofts and crofts there; and to the priory of Preaux in France (the foundation whereof was begun by Humphrey de Vetulis his grandfather [12], and perfected with large endowments by Roger de Bellomont his father), he gave the manor of Thoftes in Norfolk, which afterwards became a cell to that foreign monaſtery [13]; with free warren in the pariſhes of Thoftes, Haddeſcho, and Thorp [14]; the patronage of the churches of Thoftes, Haddeſcho, Eſtone, Wyley, Cherlintone, and Newbury [15]; the tithes of all his lands and revenues in Newbury; and the whole village of Arleſcote in Warwickſhire [16]; and all this (according to the devotion of thoſe times) for the health of the ſouls of William the Conqueror, of queen Maud his wife, of king William Rufus, king Henry I. and Maud his wife, and their children; for the ſouls of Roger de Bellemont his father, and of Adelina wife of the ſaid Roger; for the health of his own ſoul, and for the ſoul of Elizabeth his wife, and the ſouls of all his children; and for the ſoul of Henry earl of Warwick his brother, the ſoul of Albreda his ſiſter, and the ſouls of all the faithful deceaſed. He gave them alſo the manor of Spetteſbury, co. Dorſet, where they placed a cell, which afterwards was made an alien priory [17].

Waleran ſucceeded to the earldom of Meulan, and the greater part of the paternal poſſeſſions in Normandy; and in 1119 we find him a zealous partizan of the Engliſh monarch Henry I. againſt his Norman rebels; but in 1123, ungratefully revolting againſt the king (in whoſe court he had been bred with many proofs of affection), and manning all his caſtles, his town of Brion was burnt, all but the caſtle; ſo likewiſe Pont Audomare, except the caſtle, which held out ſeven weeks ſiege[1]. In 1124, aſſociating to himſelf Hugh de Montfort (who had married Adelina his daughter) and others, he entered Normandy in an hoſtile manner; but was encountered and taken priſoner, March 26, by William de Tankerville; who delivering him up to the king, he was kept in priſon full five years; nor on his releaſe were any of his caſtles reſtored[2]. Becoming afterwards an adherent to king Stephen (who had betrothed him to one of his daughters, a child two years old), he fought valiantly for him in 1135; was placed in 1137 at the head of his friends and forces in Normandy; and in 1141 commanded a conſiderable body of horſe at Lincoln[3], in the battle in which that king was taken priſoner[4]. For theſe ſervices he was created earl of Worceſter, and had that city given to him; but in 1143, abandoning the king, he joined the earl of Anjou. In 1145, aſſuming the croſs, he went to the Holy War; and after his return, in 1151, his city of Worceſter, into which he had thrown himſelf, was aſſaulted and taken by ſtorm by Stephen, who giving it up to be pillaged by the ſoldiers, it was ſet on fire; but the caſtle was ſo bravely maintained by Waleran, that the king could not take it. The next year Stephen beſieged it with ſtill greater forces, but was again repulſed. About two years after, he was taken priſoner by his nephew, Robert de Montfort, and ſhut up in the caſtle of Orbec; where his own ſoldiers endeavoured his reſcue by a ſiege, but in vain: ſo that he could not obtain his liberty, till he had ſurrendered the caſtle to Montfort[5]. He left iſſue a ſon, Robert, earl of Meulan[6], who was afterwards excommunicated by the pope for adhering to John earl of Moreton, againſt Richard king of England[7].

---

[1] This appears by an inquiſition taken 37 Hen. III. for the purpoſe of enquiring into the original of gavel-pence and brigg-ſilver.

[2] Ord. Vital. p. 805.

[3] This earl of Meulan eſpouſed a daughter of Hugh the Great, count of Vermandois, who acquired the name of Great from his proweſs in the Holy War, towards the end of the eleventh century. Her name was Elizabeth. We read alſo of a wife of this earl of Meulan by the name of Iſabella, who, as ſome ſuſpect, ought to have been called Elizabeth; but, perhaps, Iſabella might be a firſt wife, which may account for a daughter of this earl's being a miſtreſs of Henry I. He ſeems to have eſpouſed Elizabeth in the decline of life, and when ſhe was in her bloom. This may in part account for her want of chaſtity. She had an intrigue with another earl, ſays Huntington, while her huſband lived. I ſuppoſe this gallant was William de Warenne earl of Surrey, whom ſhe married after the earl of Meulan's death, and to whom ſhe bare five or ſix children.

[4] W. Gemet. p. 314.

[5] Ord. Vital. pp. 806. 953.

[6] Vincent on Brooke, p. 300.

[7] "Robertus comes de Meulan hoſpitale de Brackley fundavit & ditavit, ubi cor ejuſdem, adhuc integrum in plumbo, ſale ſervatum habetur." Mon. Angl. II. 375. Knighton, col. 2346.—The foundation charter may be ſeen in the Appendix, N° IV.

[8] "Fuit Robertus Conſul de Meulano in rebus ſecularibus ſapientiſſimus omnium hinc uſque in Hieruſalem degentium. Fuit ſcientia clarus, eloquio blandus, aſtutia perſpicax, providentia ſagax, ingenio verſipellis, prudentia inſuperabilis, conſilio profundus; ſapientia magnus. Poſſeſſiones igitur magnas & varias, quas vulgò vocant Honores; urbes & caſtella, vicos & villas, & flumina, & ſilvas, prædictis adquiſivit inſtrumentis. Erant autem Honores ejus non ſolum in Angliâ, verum & in Normannia & Francia; pro libitu igitur ſuo reges Francorum & Anglorum nunc concordes muniebantur, nunc diſcordes præliabantur. Si adverſus aliquem inſurgebat, contritus humiliabatur; ſi proeſſe volebat, glorioſus exultabatur. Hinc theſauri copia, auri ſcilicet & argenti, gemmarum & palliorum incredibiliter ei confluxit. Cum igitur in ſummo ſtatu gloriæ ſuæ degeret, contigit quendam alium Conſulem ſponſam ei [probably William earl Warrene's, who married her after Meulan's deceaſe,] tam factione quam doloſis viribus arripuiſſe; unde in ſenectute ſua mente turbatus, & angaria obnubilatus, in tenebras mœroris incidit; nec uſque ad mortem ſe lætum vel hilarem ſenſit." Huntingd. de Contemptu Mundi.

[9] See p. 24.

[10] Alluding probably to his manner of getting the fief of Grentemaiſnell.

[11] "Decem burgenſes inter muros, pro ſatisfactione dampnorum per me," &c.—This curious fact is given on the authority of the original regiſter of biſhop Remigius, fol. 37. b. See the Appendix, N° VIII.

[12] Ord. Vital. p. 460.

[13] Ibid. p. 709.

[14] Toft Monks, Hadiſcoe, and Thorpe near Hadiſcoe.

[15] Ex ipſo autographo, nuper in caſtello de Pontefract.

[16] Dugd. Mon. Angl. I. p. 599. See the deed at large in the Appendix, N° V.

[17] Hutchins, II. p. 189, 190.

To Hugh Pauper, the youngeſt ſon of Robert earl of Leiceſter, king Stephen gave the earldom of Bedford, with the daughter of Milo de Beauchamp, upon the expulſion of Milo: but, being careleſs and negligent, and committing the cuſtody of his caſtle to Milo, he fell from the dignity of an earl to the ſtate of a knight; and, in the end, to miſerable poverty[8].

We now come to our memoir of a very diſtinguiſhed perſonage, viz. ROBERT BELLOMONT; by ſome called LE BOSSU[9], and le Goczen[10] (from the cuſtom in that age of giving nick-names to ſupply the want of ſurnames); by others, earl Robert the elder[11]; and again, earl Robert the ſecond; (which appellations were adopted to diſcriminate this earl from his ſon the ſubſequent earl;) but, in records, more diſtinctly Robert Fitz-Robert de Meulan; which indicates his deſcent from the late earl of Meulan, or Mellent, his father. This Robert, and his brother Waleran, of whom we have been juſt now writing, were twins. Upon their father's death, in 1118, Waleran obtained the French earldom of Meulan; and Robert the Engliſh earldom of Leiceſter, with all the lands and poſſeſſions in England which had belonged to his father, whoſe ſteps he followed. Malmeſbury, a coeval writer, ſpeaking of the father, ſums up his character for wiſdom in a very ſtrong eulogium: "—— habebat ejus conſilium, quaſi quis divinum conſuluiſſet ſacrarium." So wiſe a father was not likely to neglect the education of his ſons. The ſame writer acquaints us with the ſucceſs of his parental care by a remarkable anecdote. In the year 1119, pope Calixtus paid our Henry I. a viſit in Normandy. His errand was to expoſtulate with the monarch of England on his cruelty to Robert Curthoſe, who, although Henry's own brother, and a pilgrim of the holy ſepulchre, had been deprived of ſight, and kept a cloſe priſoner for many years in Cardiff caſtle. To pacify the pope, apologies were to be accompanied with entertainment ſuitable to the occaſion. Accordingly the king exhibited the ſons of the count of Meulan to contend with the cardinals in the field of Dialects. Their illuſtrious birth drew the attention of the auditory. And the manner wherein they acquitted themſelves put the pope into great good humour, and drew from the cardinals this compliment, "That the Weſtern parts of Europe flouriſhed in literature a great deal more than they had ever heard, or could have believed without this convincing proof of it." The pope was ſo delighted, that he ſuppreſſed his whole diſpleaſure, and departed with admiration of the king of England's juſtice, wiſdom, and eloquence.

Peter of Blois, the rebuilder of Croyland abbey, and abbot of that church, mentions our earl in the number of thoſe great and good perſons who laid foundation-ſtones, and liberally contributed to the new works carrying on there[12]. He places this event in 1114[13]; and calls the earl of Leiceſter, "Inclytus comes Leiceſtriæ Robertus tunc validiſſimus adoleſcens." The title of earl of Leiceſter was given, I ſuppoſe, by anticipation, as our chroniclers place his father's deceaſe in the year 1118. And the annaliſt of Waverley ſays expreſsly, that he was made earl of Leiceſter after that event.

Theſe two young noblemen were bred in the palace of Henry I, and treated like his own children; and when they had attained the proper age, they both received the honour of knighthood from his hand. This was conſidered in that age, not only as a great mark of royal favour, but as a cement of the ſtrongeſt union reciprocally, and as a ſpecial obligation on the part of the knight to be faithful to his lord. To rebel againſt the perſon who had arrayed any one with the habiliments of a chevalier, was reckoned in that age felony of the worſt ſort, a kind of treaſon bordering on parricide. Nor did the king's kindneſs ſtop here; for he beſtowed upon Robert earl of Leiceſter a rich heireſs whom he had intended for his natural ſon Richard. In the printed chronicle of William of Jumieges ſhe is called Itta. But, as I do not find ſuch a name in that age, I ſuſpect it to be a miſtake, and that her name was Amicia, as ſhe is called both in the chronicles and documents of that time. She was the daughter and heir of Ralph de Wayer, or Gauder, a brave man, and a ſtrenuous friend of Henry Beauclerc, and lord of Breteuil, a fair honour in the heart of Normandy, and of many other lands which had belonged to this Guader's maternal anceſtor, William Fitz Oſbern, lord of Breteuil and earl of Hereford.

Beſides the magnificent honour of Leiceſter, the earl acquired the manor, town, and ſoke of Hinckley. Knyghton, a canon of Leiceſter abbey in the reign of Henry IV. reports, that the honour of Hinckley, together with the ſtewardſhip of England, came to the earls of Leiceſter, who were of the family of Beaumont, by Petronilla of Grentemaiſnell; but, I think, it came by this Amicia, and was of the inheritance of William Fitz-Oſbern her anceſtor. Petronilla was the wife of Robert the younger, or Blanchmaines; but records[14] in Dugdale ſhew, that Hinckley was the poſſeſſion of Robert the elder, whoſe memoir we are now writing. The church of Hinckley had likewiſe been appropriated to the monaſtery of Lyra, which was of the patronage of the lords of Breteuil, by William Fitz-Oſbern earl of Hereford, and lord of Breteuil; which ſeems to ſhew pretty clearly, that at ſome time after the making of Domeſday, the town, manor, and ſoke of Hinckley had been given to earl William Fitz-Osbern. Robert Fitz-Robert de Meulan did probably only confirm the grant of earl William.

[1] Sim. Dunelm. p. 50.
[2] Matt. Weſt. in ann. 1124 Gemet. p. 302. Ord. Vit. p. 373.
[3] H. Hunt. p. 224.
[4] R. Hoveden, p. 279.
[5] Chron. Norm. p. 989.

[6] Robert, who married the daughter of Reginald earl of Cornwall, and ſet up the ſtandard of rebellion againſt Henry II; and Peter the ſon of Robert, who revolted to the French 1203, uſed only the title of Meulan, and not Worceſter. Camden.

[7] R. Hoveden, p. 402.
[8] Geſta Regis Steph. p. 953.
[9] Dugd Mon. II. 313.
[10] Ibid.
[11] Annal. Waverl.

[12] He laid the South-eaſt ſtone in cono capitis (that is, according to Mr. Eſſex's plan, at the circular Eaſt end) in the preſence of 5000 perſons; and gave to the monks 40 marks. Bibl. Top. Brit. N° XI. pp. 46. 84.

[13] Pet. Bleſ. p. 118.
[14] Dugd. Mon. II. 985.

In 1124 the county of Leiceſter appears to have been infeſted with a banditti of robbers; for in an Iter of Ralph Baſſet and his aſſociates, the king's juſticiars, held at Huncote in December that year, no leſs than eighty-four thieves were hung, and ſix others deprived of their eyes and their virility. This fact is recorded in the Saxon Chronicle; but not without ſome reflection on thoſe who on this occaſion were the judges; as if many were poſſibly included in the ſentence, that their property might with the more plauſibility be confiſcated [1].

By a bull of pope Honorius, 3 kal. Feb. 1125, "manerium ſitum juxta Leiceſtram [2] civitatem" was, amongſt other poſſeſſions of the ſee of Lincoln, confirmed to Alexander the then biſhop; and in a ſucceeding bull of pope Innocent, 4 kal. Maii, 1138, it was again confirmed, and ſtyled "manerium de Legeceſtriâ extra muros & infra, ubi ſunt duæ eccleſiæ cum XXXII manſionibus burgenſium [3]."

The earl of Leiceſter was much attached to Normandy, which he frequently viſited; and, in the true ſpirit of feudal dignity, conceiving himſelf to have been ſomeway injured by Roger de Toney, a neighbouring Norman chieftain, he proceeded to open hoſtilities; which ended in the deſtruction of Toney's houſes, and the waſting of his lands.

In 1135 he was one of the grandees of king Henry's council, and actually preſent at that monarch's deceaſe, which happened that year on the firſt of December, at his favourite ſeat, the caſtle of Lions in Normandy [4].

Some hiſtorians report, that it was in conſequence of the ſolemn teſtimony of Hugh Bigot, then ſteward of the king's houſehold, who affirmed that the king, by a nuncapatory deviſe juſt before his death, had bequeathed his dominions to his beloved nephew Stephen, and diſherited the empreſs his daughter, that Stephen was elected by the grandees of England to ſucceed him. Our earl muſt have known the truth of this report, being one of the king's chief counſellors, and in his court when he died. It is ſome preſumption in favour of Stephen, that this earl favoured his elevation, and was afterwards his ſtrenuous partizan.

He was in Normandy with king Stephen in 1137; and hearing of the troubles which then grew in England, our earl attended him thither [5], and in 1138 was one of the opponents of Roger biſhop of Saliſbury [6], who had been high juſticiar of England, and the king's treaſurer under Henry the Firſt; and at Oxford killing many of that biſhop's ſervants, took him and the biſhop of Lincoln [7] priſoners [8].

On the peace being concluded in 1139, our earl and his brother Waleran were preſent at the marriage of their half ſiſter, Adelina, daughter of the earl of Warenne, to Henry, ſon of David king of Scots [9].

He uniformly adhered to king Stephen [10] for a long while; and among the fruits of his attachment to that king we may reaſonably place our earl's reſtoration [11] to the earldom of Hereford. The creation charter has been preſerved in the archives of the Dutchy of Lancaſter [12]. It is dated at Niveton, which I conceive to be Newtown in Montgomeryſhire, on the borders of Shropſhire. Stephen made his expedition into thoſe parts in the year 1139, when, among other places which had ſtood up for Matilda, and were reduced to the obedience of Stephen, was the city and caſtle of Hereford. This being a likely time for Stephen's ſtopping at Niveton, and diſpoſing of the earldom of Hereford, the grant may be referred to the above year 1139.

By examining this matter attentively we may eaſily account for Stephen's beſtowing that earldom on earl Robert; for indeed it ſeems to have been his inheritance. Ralph de Guader, or, as ſome call him, Ralph de Wayer (by ſome hiſtorians named erroneouſly Ralph de Wayett) was made earl of Norwich by William the Firſt. About the year 1075, he married the daughter of William Fitz Oſbern, earl of Hereford, and lord of Breteuil. This marriage was accompanied with certain ſymptoms of a conſpiracy between Ralph de Guader, and Roger, brother of the counteſs of Norwich, and ſome others, to rebel againſt king William. The plot was diſcovered, and ended in the ruin of the principal leaders. Roger ſon of William Fitz Oſbern, and his ſucceſſor in the earldom of Hereford, being attainted according to the principles of the Norman juriſprudence, incurred the confiſcation of his Engliſh earldom, and impriſonment for life. In the Norman part of his inheritance William Fitz-Oſbern was ſucceeded by his other ſon, namely, William de Britolio, who accordingly enjoyed the honour of Breteuil, with its appendages, to his death; when it devolved upon his ſiſter, the wife of Ralph de Guader, or her ſon; who ſeems to have been the father of Amicia counteſs of Leiceſter. By this re-union of the honours of Hereford and Breteuil, the earl of Leiceſter became proprietor of the whole fief of William Fitz-Oſbern: which of itſelf was one of the moſt princely that belonged to any nobleman at that time, and when added to the fief of Grentemaiſnel, which the earl of Leiceſter continued to enjoy, be his title what it might, and the Engliſh lands which the count of Meulan had received as the gift of William the Conqueror, muſt have been prodigious. Our earl ſeems not to have enjoyed the earldom of Hereford for more than a ſhort time, for we find it ſoon after beſtowed by Matilda, the opponent of Stephen, upon her favourite Milo. Matilda's charter to Milo has likewiſe eſcaped the wreck of time. The learned Selden has printed it in his Titles of Honor, with an obſervation that he believed it to be the oldeſt inſtrument we had which coutained the form of creating earls in England. But, from what has been obſerved, our earl's charter was of anterior date. I will place them both before the reader as ſubjects of ſome curioſity, and for the opportunity it will give the writer of this memoir of throwing in a remark or two with which the antiquary may be gratified.

The charter of Stephen runs thus:

"Stephanus rex Anglorum, archiepiſcopis, &c. ſalutem. Sciatis me reddidiſſe hereditariè Roberto comiti Legreceſtrie & heredibus ſuis burgum Herefordie, & caſtellum, & totum comitatum de Herefordſcyre, preter terram epiſcopatûs, & terram abbathie de Radings, & aliarum eccleſiarum & abbathiarum, que tenentur de me in capite; & excepto feodo Hugonis de Mortuo-mari, & feodo Oſberti filii Hugonis, & feodo Willielmi de Braioſo, & feodo Gotſonis de Dinan, quod fuit Hugonis de Laci. Et hâc conditione, quod ſi comes Legeceſtrie poterit facere verſus prefatum Gotſonem, quod ipſe voluerit feodum illum predictum tenere de eo, bene concedo. Quare volo, quod prefatus comes & heredes ſui poſt eum teneant benê & in pace, & liberè, & quietè, & honorificè, in boſco & plano, &c. cum aliis omnibus rebus & libertatibus que ad omnia prefata pertinent, cum quibus Guil. filius Osbern. unquam meliùs vel liberiùs tenuit, &c. Teſtibus Roberto de Gant cancellario, & Willielmo comite de Warennâ, & Willielmo comite Lincolnie, & Willielmo comite de Albemarle, & comite Simone, & Willielmo Martel, & Turgiſio de Abrincis, & Willielmo de Albeni Britone. Apud Nivetonam."

---

[1] "MCXXV. Poſt Sancti Andreæ feſtum, ante Chriſti feſtum, tenuerunt Radulphus Baſſet & regis Thani procerum concilium in Læthecæſtreſcira apud Hundehoge [oppidum in agro Leiceſtrenſi hodie opinor Huncot in hundredo de Sparkenhoe; GIBSON]; & ſuſpenderunt ibi tot fures quot antea nunquam; ſcilicet in parvo temporis ſpacio omnino quatuor & quadraginta viros, ſex item viros privarunt oculis & teſticulis. Multi fide digni homines dixerunt ibi fuiſſe complures admodum injuſtè interfectos: ſed noſter Dominus Deus qui omnia occulta conſpicit & cognoſcit videt oppreſſum eſſe miſellum populum contra jus omne: primo ſpoliantur poſſeſſionibus, deinde trucidantur." Chron. Sax.

[2] See before, p. 20

[3] Both theſe bulls are printed at large in Dugdale's Monaſticon, vol. III. p. 269

[4] Ord. Vit. pp. 851. 910. 905.

[5] Ibid. pp. 903. 905. 911.

[6] He was biſhop of Saliſbury 1107—1140.

[7] Alexander biſhop of Lincoln 1123—1147; and ſome time the king's chancellor under Stephen.

[8] Ord. Vit. p. 919.

[9] Chron. Mailros, p. 166.

[10] Ord. Vit. p. 919.

[11] An example of a reſtitution or livery of an earldom in Stephen's time, is in that of his reſtoring the borough of Hereford, and the caſtle, & totum comitatum, in Herefordſhire (excepting the lands of the biſhopric and other churches) to Robert earl of Leiceſter, and his heirs, with this, that he ſhould hold it "benè & in pace, & liberè, & quietè, & honorificè, in boſco, & in plano, &c. cum omnibus aliis rebus & libertatibus, quæ ad omnia præſata pertinent, cum quibus filius Gulielmus filius Pibemi unquam melius vel liberius tenuit." Selden's Titles of Honor. Works, vol. III. col. 683.

[12] Vincent on Brooke, p. 236. A fair copy of it is in the Coucher Book of the Dutchy office.

From the word reddidiſſe, we ſee, it is a charter of reſtitution, which proves our earl's claim to the earldom of Hereford. The matters granted are the burg of Hereford, and the caſtle, and the whole earldom, excepting ſuch fiefs as were held of the king in capite, by certain churches, and by certain of the laity. It was an important part of the feudal law at that time, that a fief [1] could not be aſſigned at the will of the lord without the expreſs concurrence of the tenant or feoffee.

The charter of the queen to Milo, which was made in 1140 or 1141, is thus expreſſed [2]:

"Matilda imperatrix, Henrici regis filia, & Anglorum domina, archiepiſcopis, epiſcopis, abbatibus, comitibus, baronibus, juſticiariis, vicecomitibus, prepoſitis, miniſtris, & omnibus fidelibus ſuis, Francis & Anglis, totius Anglie, ſalutem. Sciatis me feciſſe Milonem de Gloceſtriâ comitem de Hereford, & dediſſe ei motam Hereford, cum toto caſtello, in feudo & hereditate, ſibi & heredibus ſuis, ad tenendum de me & heredibus meis. Dedi etiam ei tertium denarium placitorum totius comitatûs Hereford. Dedi etiam ei tria maneria in ipſo comitatu de meo dominio, videlicet, Mawardinam & Luggewordinam & Wiltonam cum omnibus appenditiis ſuis. Dedi etiam ei haias Hereford & foreſtam de Trivelâ cum hoc quod ad hoc pertinet. Dedi etiam ei ſervitium Roberti de Chandos & Hugonis filii Williielmi & Richardi de Coremil, & omnia feuda eorum ubicunque ea habeant. Et hec omnia ſupradicta dedi & etiam conceſſi in feudo & hereditate ſibi & heredibus ſuis ad tenendnm de me & heredibus meis. Hanc autem donationem feci ei apud Oxinford die ſancti Jacobi apoſtoli, videlicet, octavâ die ante feſtum ſancti Petri ad vincula, pro ſervitio ſuo quod mihi fecerat, & ita quod tunc habebam in captione meâ apud Briſtol regem Stephanum, qui Dei miſericordiâ & auxilio Roberti comitis Gloceſtrie fratris mei & auxilio ipſius Milonis & aliorum baronum meorum captus fuit in bello apud Lincolniam die purificationis S. Marie proximo ante predictum diem S. Jacobi apoſtoli. Quare volo & firmiter precipio, quod hec omnia ſupradicta teneat de me & heredibus meis, ipſe & heredes ſui, ita bene & in pace, & honorificè, & plenariè, & liberè, & quietè, in boſco & in plano, in foreſtis & fugaciis, in pratis & paſturis, in aquis & molendinis, in ſtagnis & vivariis, in viis in ſemitis, in foris & feriis infra burgum & extra in civitate & extra, & in omnibus locis, cum ſocâ & ſachâ, & toll & team & infangentheof, & cum omnibus conſuetudinibus & libertatibus & quietudinibus ſicut unquam aliquis Comes melius, & honorabilius, & quietius, & liberius, & plenarius, aliquod tenementum vel dominium de me in Angliâ vel unquam tenuit de aliquo anteceſſore meo. Teſte Theobaldo archiepiſcopo Cantuarienſi, & Roberto epiſcopo Londonenſi, & Alexandro epiſcopo Lincolnienſi, & Bernardo epiſcopo Sancti Davidis, & Nigello epiſcopo Elienſi, & David rege Scotie, & Roberto comite Gloceſtrie, & Reginaldo comite Cornubie, & Roberto Reginaldi filio, & Brientio filio comitis, & Umfrido de Bohun, & Alex. de Buch. & Johanne filio Giſleberti mareſcallo, & Pagan. de claris vallibus, & Roberto de Curceo, & Radulfo Paganello, & Willielmo de Doura, & Elia Giffard, & Walkenio Maminot, & Eruulf de Heſding, & Giſleberto de Laſceio. Apud Oxinfordiam."

In 1143 or 1144, by the conſent of Alexander biſhop of Lincoln, our earl founded that opulent and ſtately abbey for canons regular of the order of St. Auguſtine, called De Pratis, in the ſuburbs of Leiceſter [3], in honour of the Aſſumption of the Bleſſed Virgin Mary [4], and endowed it with the ample poſſeſſions which his father had beſtowed on the ſecular canons of the church of St. Mary juxta caſtrum [5], and with much more of his own proper gift; but yet, that he might not ſeem totally to deſtroy his father's foundation, he, with the conſent of Richard the firſt abbot of Leiceſter, placed eight canons in the church of St. Mary de Caſtro, whereof one was dean, and endowed them with the oblations.

Mr. Carte attributes to this earl Robert a charter directed to Ralph the ſheriff, and all his barons and homagers, both French and Engliſh; whereby he confirmed to his burgeſſes of Leiceſter all the cuſtoms and privileges that were granted to them by his father, that they ſhould enjoy them as peaceably and honourably as they had done under his father; teſt. Ernaldo de Boſco, Gaufr. Abbate, Radulpho juniore, &c. and another [6]; directed to all his ſtewards, bailiffs, and foreſters, commanding them to ſuffer his burgeſſes of Leiceſter to go wherever they pleaſed into his woods, to fetch wood and other neceſſaries, &c. as freely as they had done in the time of his father, whoſe charter they had for that purpoſe. This ſame earl alſo remitted the payment of the gavel-pennies, pro ſalute anime patris ſui [7].

In 1149, Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury, being then at Leiceſter, called thither the monks of Coventry, to chooſe a biſhop for that ſee; who there elected Walter Durdent [8], prior of Canterbury.

About the year 1151, we meet with the following engagement; which, as Sir Peter Leyceſter obſerves, is no bad ſpecimen of the tumultuouſneſs of that age, and of the mode in which the great men of the kingdom then divided the ſpoils [9].

"This is the agreement between earle Ranulf of Cheſter and Robert earle of Leceſter, and the finall peace and concord that was agreed uppon and deviſed of them, before the ſecond Robert [10] biſhopp of Lincolne and their men. On the earle of Cheſter's ſide were Richard of Lovetot, William Fitznigell, and Ranulf the ſheriff. On the earle of Leceſter's part, were Ernald de Boſco, Geffrey the Abbott, and Reginald of Bardney. To wit, that earle Ranulf hath given and granted to Robert earle of Leceſter the caſtell of Mountſorell, to him and his heirs, to be holden of him and his heirs enheritably, and according as the charter of the ſaid earl Ranulf doth teſtifie; and in ſuch ſort that the earl of Leceſter is bound to receive the ſaid earle Ranulf and his family in the borough and balliwicke of Mountſorrel to warre whenſoever he liſteth, as of his own fee; and in ſuch ſort that the earl of Leiceſter ſhall not be able therefore to for-fait to earl Ranulf for any one; and if it be needful for earle Ranulf, his body ſhall be received into the demeaſne caſtle of Mountſorrel; and that in ſuch ſort, that the earle of Leceſter ſhall bear unto him fayth (always the faith due to his leidge lord reſerved); and if it be behoofful that the earle of Leceſter go againſt the earle of Cheſter with his liege lord, he may not cary with him above 20 knights. And if the earle of Leiceſter, or thoſe 20 knights, ſhall take any part of the earle of Cheſter's goods, it ſhall be all reſtored again; nether may the earle of Leceſter's liedge lord, nor any other, forfeit to the earle of Cheſter, nor unto any of his, none of the ſaid earle of Leceſter's caſtells and lands; and in ſuch ſort, that the earle of Leceſter may not, for ayny caſe, ympeach or hinder the body of the earle of Cheſter, except he hath defied him 15 dayes before; and the earle of Leceſter is bound to ayde the earle of Cheſter agaynſt all men, except the ſayde earle of Leceſter's liedge lord and earle Symon[r]. Earle Symon he may ayde in this manner: that if ſo be earle Ranulf ſhall forfeit to the earle of Leceſter, then, in that caſe, he may ayde him; and if earle Symon ſhall forfeit to the earle of Cheſter, and will not reform himſelf to the earl of Leiceſter, then ſhall not the earle of Leceſter ayde him. And the earle of Leiceſter is bound to keep ſuch lands and goods of the earle of Cheſter's as are in the power of the ſayde earle of Leceſter, without fraud. And the earle of Leiceſter hath compounded with earle Ranulfe, that the caſtell of Raveneſton ſhall fall, unleſs it remayne with the allowans of earle Ranulfe; and in ſuch ſort, that if ayny woulde houlde that caſtell agaynſt the earle of Leceſter, earle Ranulfe ſhall helpe to deſtroy that caſtell without fraud; and if earle Ranulf doe make claime of William of Alnetto, the earle of Leceſter in his court ſhall doe him right ſo long as the ſayde William ſhall remayne the earle of Leceſter's man, and ſhall houlde his land of him; and in ſuch ſorte, that if William, or ayny of his, depart from the fidelity of the earle of Leceſter for the raſinge of the caſtell, or becauſe he will not anſwere to right in the earle of Leceſter's court, they ſhall not be received into the earle of Cheſter's protection, nether William nor his, to do any harm to the earle of Leceſter. In this agreement, there remayneth to the earle of Leceſter the caſtell of Witewyke, ſtrengthened with his other caſtells. And on the contrary part, earle Ranulf ſhall owe fidelity to the earle of Leceſter, reſerving the faith due to his liege lord; and if it ſhall be behoofull for the earle of Cheſter to goe agaynſt the earle of Leceſter with his liege lord, he may not cary with him above twenty knights: if the earle of Cheſter, or theſe twenty knights, ſhall take any of the earle of Leceſter's goods, it ſhall be wholy reſtored; nether may the earle of Cheſter's leige lord, nor ayny other, forfeit to the earle of Leceſter, or any of his, any of the earle of Cheſter's caſtells, nor any of his lande; and in ſuch ſorte, that the earle of Cheſter cannot, for ayny cauſe, nor in ayny wiſe, impeach or hinder the earle of Leceſter's body, unleſs he have defyed him 15 days before. And the earle of Cheſter is bound to help the earle of Leceſter agaynſt all men, excepting the earle of Leceſter's liege lord and earle, Robert of Ferrars: earl Robert he may ayde in this manner; if the earl of Leceſter ſhall forfeit to the earle Ferrers, and he the ſayde earle of Leceſter will not reforme the forfeit for the earle of Cheſter, then may the earle of Cheſter help him; and if earle Robert of Ferrars ſhall forfeit to the earle of Leceſter, the earle of Cheſter ſhall not ayde him; and the earle of Cheſter ſhall keep the lands and goods of the earle of Leceſter's which are in the power of the ſaid earl of Cheſter, without any fraud. And the earle of Cheſter hath compounded with the earle of Leceſter, that if ayny would keep the caſtell of Ravenſton agaynſt the earle of Leceſter, earle Ranulf ſhall, without fraud, help to deſtroy the ſame caſtell; nether may the earle of Cheſter, nor yet the earle of Leiceſter, fortifie ayny new caſtell betweene Hinckley and Coventry, nor betweene Hinckley and Hardreſhull, nether between Coventry and Donington, nether between Donington and Leiceſter, nor yet at Grataham, nether at Cheneldeſtam, nor at Belvoir, nether between Belvoir and Hocham, nor between Hocham and Rockingham, nether ayny neerer, except it be done with the conſent of either parties: and if any in the aforeſaid places, or within the aforeſaid bounds, ſhall fortifie any caſtell, ether ſhall be ayding unto the other, without fraud, owntell the ſayde caſtell be deſtroyed. And this agreement, as contained in the preſent deed, the earls of Cheſter and Leiceſter have ſworn to obſerve, and have placed their reſpective oaths in the hands of Robert biſhop of Lincoln. And uppon this agreement each doth pledge his Chriſtianity, in ſuch ſort, that if ayny ſhould ſtart from this accorde, and would not reforme himſelf within 15 dayes after, then the biſhopp of Lincolne and the biſhopp of Cheſter ſhall doe juſtice uppon him, as uppon one that hath falſified his faith. And the biſhop of Lincolne and the biſhop of Cheſter ſhall deliver pledges, both of them two, which they have receaved for the houlding of theſe agreements; that is to ſay, unto him that ſhall keepe and houlde theſe former agreements."

---

[1] Regiſtr. Roffenſe.

[2] Vincent on Brooke, p. 237; and Selden, Titles of Honour, Works, vol. III. p. 681.

[3] H. Knighton, p. 2346. Mon. Angl. vol. II. p. 308.

[4] Of this famous abbey a full account will be given in its proper place.

[5] "Conceſſi eis prebendas & poſſeſſiones quæ fuerunt canonicorum ſecularium eccleſiæ S. Mariæ infra caſtellum de Legreceſtria. . . . . . . Robertus comes de Mellenti pater meus, et Iſabella mater. . . . . . . Facta hæc donatio tempore Hen. I. & Alexandri epiſcopi Lincoln." Lel. Coll. I. 28.

[6] Mr. Carte, from whoſe MS collections this is tranſcribed, adds, "This earl's charter, with many other writings, being in cuſtody of one Lambert, were with his houſe burnt."

[7] A long time after, a certain clerk, taking præpoſituram Legeceſtriæ to farm, exacted gavel-pennies, and ſtill doth. CARTE.

[8] Biſhop of Coventry and Lichfield 1149—1162.

[9] The agreement is printed in Latin, by Sir Peter Leyceſter, from Cott. MSS. Nero, c. 3. p. 125. The Engliſh copy here uſed is from the Harl. MSS. 5805, p. 399.

[10] Robert de Querceto, or de Katineto, was conſecrated in September 1146, and died in 1166 or 1167.

We have placed this deed about the year 1151, upon the following grounds. Robert, as the deed ſhews, was then biſhop of Lincoln, and Gilbert earl of Clare is a ſubſcribing witneſs. The continuator of Florence of Worceſter reports, that this Robert was advanced to the ſee of Lincoln anno 1147; but John of Hexham, a contemporary writer of good judgement and information, whoſe account of this period ſeems to be the fulleſt of any we have, places that event in the year 1150. The earl of Cheſter's confederation with the king and prince of Scotland, and Henry duke of Normandy, had furniſhed Stephen with employment the year before, and made it a lucky incident for that prince, that he was able to apprehend the earl's perſon in 1151. This apprehenſion produced the ſurrender of the earl's caſtles; and the earl himſelf obtained his deliverance upon ſuch act of ſurrender, together with the earl of Clare's becoming his hoſtage to Stephen for the performance of his engagements. Theſe tranſactions are incompatible with the nature of this deed, and it could not be after them. The earl of Clare deceaſed in 1152.

Several other obſervations ariſe from the ſtudy of this deed. Each earl puts himſelf under the authority of the two biſhops (who were the biſhops of their reſpective dioceſes) to enforce the performance of the articles by ſpiritual penalties; which intimates that there was then no temporal juriſdiction then exiſting ſufficient for the purpoſe, and well agrees with all the accounts of the dreadful anarchy of that time. It alſo appears from the face of the deed, that the earls (who, either for their own intereſt, or public good, were diſpoſed to preſerve quiet in the parts provided for in the agreement) had ſeparate liege lords, which could only be Stephen and duke Henry; which ſhews that the earl of Leiceſter had not yet at leaſt declared for the duke.

As the meeting of Carliſle abovementioned is the key to the ſubſequent tranſactions of this reign, which, although of moment to the Engliſh hiſtorian, have been careleſsly and erroneouſly ſtated, I ſhall relate this paſſage concerning the intrigue at Carliſle from the prior of Hexham.

"In the year 1150 Henry Fitz Geffry, count of Anjou, came at the feaſt of Pentecoſt to Carliſle. There king David received him with great reſpect, and entertained him with the utmoſt ſtretch of magnificence; for he girded him with the ſword of knighthood, aſſiſted by his ſon Henry and Ranulph earl of Cheſter; and then the ſame Ranulph remitted the indignation, wherewith he had been wont to demand the city of Carliſle by right of inheritance. For in converſation it was agreed, that for Carliſle the earl ſhould have the honour of Lancaſter; and the ſon of earl Ralph was to marry one of the daughters of Henry ſon of king David. At this time king Stephen came to York. And king David, and young Henry duke of Normandy, and Ranulph earl, came into one way of thinking, and agreed with their joint forces to march againſt king Stephen. And king David began his march, and proceeded with duke Henry to Lancaſter, where the earl of Cheſter had promiſed to meet them, and join his forces to theirs. But he performed no part of his promiſes, and rendered their whole ſcheme abortive. Upon which duke Henry returned into his own country, and employed himſelf in military exerciſes, being very ſtrong of body, and in diſpoſition reſembling thoſe who were grown wiſe by age."

---

[r] Simon de St. Liz, the firſt earl of Northampton of that name. See his ſeal, vol. I. plate V. fig. 1.

In the year 1151, the earl of Cheſter, having been detected in a repetition of his plots againſt Stephen, was committed to cloſe impriſonment; and by the force of torture obliged to ſurrender Lincoln, and his other fortreſſes, to king Stephen. After ſome days he was diſcharged from his bonds upon the earl of Clare becoming his pledge to king Stephen; but he was no ſooner ſet at liberty than he broke every engagement which he had made, and left his pledge to take the conſequences of his perfidy. But being highly enraged upon the loſs of his fortreſſes, he ſought a remedy for his misfortune in the perſon of the duke of Normandy, by recalling him into England, and promiſing him his own aſſiſtance, and the concurrence of many others, towards his acquiſition of the realm.

In the year 1152 happened an affair which has given room for ſuſpicion, that the earl of Leiceſter was ſecretly abetting the cauſe, wherein the earl of Cheſter was now decidedly ſupporting.

"King Stephen," ſays my author, "made a ſecond attack upon Worceſter. And becauſe he had not been able to take the caſtle the former year, he now applied his whole force to accompliſh his wiſh; and as he found the beſieged make a moſt ſtrenuous defence, he erected two anti-caſtles to enſure his ſucceſs; and leaving ſome of his nobles at the place, he went elſewhere. But as it was this king's cuſtom to begin many things manfully, and finiſh but very few to his praiſe; by the advice of earl Robert of Leiceſter the king's caſtles were demoliſhed, and by a ſtroke of cunning the ſiege raiſed. Thus the king's deſign was fruſtrated, and his labour loſt, as was uſually the caſe." So Gervas of Dover. Huntington relates the ſtory in nearly the ſame words, but with a bolder inuendo on the conduct of the earl of Leiceſter. "The anti-caſtles of the beſieging king," ſays he, "were demoliſhed by the art of the earl of Leiceſter, and the ſiege cunningly abandoned. For the ſaid earl was brother to the earl of Meulan," whom the king had made earl of Worceſter to his own great coſt, with a grant of the city and caſtle. I relate this tranſaction cloſely after the two hiſtorians, and, without ſpeaking of the earl in ſharper language than they have done, will only obſerve, that his conduct on this occaſion naturally prepares us to find him ſoon afterwards follow his brother's example, who had joined the houſe of Anjou againſt Stephen ſix or ſeven years before.

In the beginning of the year 1153, duke Henry, having eſtabliſhed quiet in his foreign dominions, and acquired the complete poſſeſſion of Normandy, came into England to help thoſe who were preſſed hard by king Stephen. He was immediately joined by thoſe earls and barons who were of his party, and went and ſet down before Malmeſbury. Stephen marched againſt him, and ſeemed inclined to bring him to battle, and force him to raiſe the ſiege. But when he was got very near him, he induſtriouſly avoided an action, which he could not prudently venture, both on account of the dreadful ſeverity of the weather, and of the ſtorm beating full in the face of his army; while the wind was at the back of the enemy. The king therefore retired, and took his march towards London; of which the Tower was no longer in his intereſt, but had been, in conſequence of the impunity allowed to rebellion by his abſence, given into the hands of the duke. Soon after this, the noble Robert earl of Leiceſter began to ſide with the duke, and did for ſome time adminiſter neceſſaries to him. Thirty, or even more caſtles, with their proprietors and appurtenances, yielded themſelves, by the earl's advice, to his authority [1].

Things now ſeemed to be drawing to an awful criſis between the competitors to the Engliſh crown. Hitherto the ſtruggles made by the houſe of Anjou ended only in diſappointment; but Stephen had now very ſerious cauſe of alarm. Henry of Anjou was compleat maſter of Normandy, which acknowledged him as its duke; which thing alone was ſufficient to make all thoſe Anglo-Normans friends to his cauſe, who had eſtates in both countries; it being very certain, that if England and Normandy were ſeparated, they muſt loſe all their fiefs in one of thoſe countries; and the houſe of Anjou was now got ſo powerful on that ſide the water, that not the ſmalleſt hope could be entertained of Stephen being ever able to recover that dutchy. Beſides this advantage over Stephen, Henry of Anjou had many others. By his father's death he had lately come into the poſſeſſion of the earldom of Anjou; and by his marriage with Eleanor of Guienne he got that dutchy, with Gaſcogne, Poitou, and other fiefs, which made him lord of all the country from the Loire to the Pyrannees. His genius was active and aſpiring, his mind ſubtle and inſinuating, his ambition inordinate; to carry a point of intereſt, he could ſtoop to the loweſt abaſement, or aſſume a martial and heroic courage. Every thing abroad was put into a ſtate of arrangement to ſecure order and quiet there, while he went to England to make his grand puſh for the throne of that country; which had reaſon to rejoice that the conteſt was now likely to come to an iſſue, upon which alone depended the reſtoration of peace and order there, and the ceſſation of anarchy, and every ſpecies of public calamity. But the conflict between the houſes of Blois and Anjou ſeemed not likely to end, but by a very ſharp and bloody conflict. Stephen himſelf was a man dauntleſs in the field, and his ſon Euſtace of as enterprizing a ſpirit as Henry of Anjou. Stephen was much weakened by the revolt of many of his Engliſh nobles, who now fought againſt him, and much ſtrengthened the army of Plantagenet. Of theſe the chief were Geoffry of Mandeville earl of Eſſex, Ranulph earl of Cheſter, whoſe ſeigniories are ſaid to have comprehended a third part of the kingdom, and Robert earl of Leiceſter, who, for ſome reaſons not tranſmitted to us, had now joined the duke of Normandy. On a late occaſion the two armies would have engaged; but king Stephen thought the diſadvantages on his ſide, in reſpect of the weather, ſo great, as to juſtify him in declining battle. Soon after the two armies approached each other at Wallingford in Berks. The camps were now within three ſtadia of each other; and the king was actually employed in arranging his forces for action, when his horſe three times rearing an end, to the great danger of the king's perſon, filled ſome of his nobles with apprehenſions for the fate of the day; judging this to be a ſure omen of diſaſter. The earl of Arundel made uſe of this interval to repreſent what a ſhocking action this muſt be; in which friends, countrymen, ſons, fathers, brothers, and nephews, muſt commit parricide by ſpilling each other's blood. Theſe objections were enforced with ſuch moving oratory that the troops were induced to make a pauſe; and overtures for ſuſpending the action upon the ſame plea were ſent to the adverſe hoſt. This ſuſpenſion of the engagement ſeems to have been agreeable to king Stephen, and was ſubmitted to on the part of duke Henry, though reluctantly; for he regretted the bringing together ſo large a force, which had been attended with a very heavy expence, and making no uſe of it. And Euſtace, ſon of Stephen, was in ſuch a rage about it, that he left his father in wrath; and, to glut his vengeance, ſpared not to attack the moſt holy places. Thus the armies parted; and the forces of each ſide returned to their old buſineſs of plundering the lands of their reſpective adverſaries, and deſtroying their caſtles and chateaus.

---

[1] Gervas, p. 1373.

This marching towards each other, and when they ſeemed ready to engage declining action, ſeems very extraordinary; and reflects no great honour upon thoſe who adviſed ſuch a meaſure. For as nothing ſhort of a compleat victory on one ſide, and a total defeat on the other, could put an end to the competition, it ſeemed better for the kingdom at large, and not contrary to the intereſts of the principals, that the matter ſhould be decided as ſoon as poſſible; eſpecially as each party ſeemed equally prepared for battle.

While Euſtace was living, who was determined to ſupport his right to the crown, no compromiſe could take place ſhort of Henry's death, or renunciation of his pretenſions. And as this was a ſacrifice not at all likely to be made, it can hardly be thought that any thing but the death of one or other of theſe princes could eſtabliſh the public peace. But before either of them were taken out of the way by the ſword, the civil diſtraction might continue much longer, the nation be more waſted, and brought nearer to ruin, and a great deal of innocent and valuable blood might be ſhed. When all theſe evils were to be dreaded, a moſt fortunate event, which can hardly be aſcribed to any thing but a merciful Providence, relieved the fear and diſtreſs of the nation, which was nothing leſs than the ſudden death of prince Euſtace. He was no ſooner removed, than the prelates and nobles of the realm were determined to prevent a continuance of the late troubles, by bringing the king and duke of Normandy to a firm and effectual agreement. For this purpoſe it was reſolved and ſettled, that king Stephen ſhould have the free and honourable enjoyment of the crown during life; and in order to give Henry a title to the ſame in reverſion, he ſhould adopt him for his ſon and heir. This deed of ſettlement was approved, confirmed, and witneſſed, and made a ſolemn legiſlative ſtatute by the king, the prelates, and nobles, in great council or parliament, preſent. Stephen was content to hold the crown for life without further contention; and the duke of Normandy ſubmitted to forego the poſſeſſion of it, till fate ſhould gather Stephen to his fathers. Which event took place a ſhort time afterwards. This final concord was concluded juſt before Chriſtmas, A. D. 1153; and Stephen cloſed his laſt day on the 23d of October, 1154.

As our earl, ſo famous for wiſdom, piety, and learning, took a deep part in advancing Stephen to the crown, who has been generally reputed an uſurper, our time may not be loſt in making a few obſervations on that ſubject.

If Stephen was an uſurper, I would aſk whoſe right he did invade? The advocates of indefeaſible hereditary right will immediately anſwer, that of the ex empreſs Matilda, only daughter and heir of Henry I. and wife of Geoffry, count of Anjou.

But no ſuch notion of Matilda's right to the crown was entertained at that time; nor was it ſuppoſed that any one, not even the king's eldeſt ſon, could be inveſted with royal authority, till he was actually elected king by thoſe whoſe right it was to chuſe him. As this aſſertion may be ſuſpected of being void of truth, I will endeavour to ſhew what were the maxims of Engliſh government before and after the Conqueſt with reſpect to the crown.

After the diſſolution of the Heptarchy, and the reduction of the kings and princes, whoſe dominions were ſituate within this iſland, or its dependences, to the monarch of Britain, the crown of England was denominated a diadem, and the ſovereign an emperor, and the realm an empire. Theſe titles were taken from the Roman, French, and German diplomas, to mark the tranſcendent dignity of the king of the Angles, and the ſimilitude between England and thoſe empires in the rule of ſucceſſion, which depended on election. Accordingly the coeval Engliſh hiſtorians, both before and after the Conqueſt, ſpeaking of a new king, ſay he was elected. Nor was this language adopted in peculiar caſes, which ſeem to impugn the regular hereditary ſucceſſion; but it was uſed in reſpect of ſuch as were what we call heirs apparent of former kings. Thus Edward the Confeſſor, the ſon and heir of Ethelred, was elected king. Deſtitute of heirs of his body, he exerciſed a right formerly allowed to the Roman emperors, and authorized by the civil law of making for himſelf an heir, and accordingly declared William duke of Normandy, his maternal couſin, to be ſo. This, being done with the conſent of the eſtates, opened a paſſage for ſuch perſon to ſucceed to the throne on the next demiſe: but it conferred no indefeaſible right; for the heir ſo adopted muſt ſtill be elected after the king's demiſe, or he could be no legitimate king. And therefore hiſtorians, who ſpeak of William the Conqueror's coming to the crown jure hereditario, ſtill adhere to the uſual term, and ſay, he was elected. And as the king could make to himſelf an heir that was not of his begetting, ſo he could exclude from the rights of ſonſhip an undutiful and rebel ſon, who being renounced by his father became obnoxious to political degradation, by the concurrence of the ſtates in his diſinheriſon. Thus William I. renounced his unnatural and rebellious ſon Robert Curthoſe, and tranſferred the privileges of primogeniture to his ſons Rufus and Beauclerc; whereby thoſe two princes becoming ſucceſſively candidates for the crown with the beſt pretenſions, according to the cuſtom of England, were elected kings of England. Upon what law or uſage was grounded the claim of Matilda? No woman had ever been elected ſovereign of this country; and as the ſame terms were applied here, ſuch as emperor, empire, and diadem, as were uſed in elective monarchies, it is a preſumption, that thoſe terms ſuppoſed the excluſion of female monarchs (if I may uſe ſuch a catachreſis) here, as well as elſewhere. If in that age Matilda was ſuppoſed to have an indefeaſible title, why did her father judge it expedient to ſwear the prelates and princes of England to elect Matilda? And after they had taken that oath, what induced them to break it when the time came for electing a ſovereign? Were they all groſsly perjured? was this oath wilfully violated? could they bring nothing to qualify their inconſiſtency? Men of ſacred profeſſions, and high civil diſtinctions, are not wont to act in this manner. Let us conſider then what might induce them to act as they did. If the king, taking advantage of his power, had brought them to take this oath againſt their inclinations, and contrary to law and the nation's welfare, ſome of them might think the oath deſtitute of obligation. In that age it was cuſtomary for the king to head his armies, to wield the ſword or battle-axe in battle, to be chief in action, and to hold councils of war with his barons, who had their reſpective corps, and each his proper banner, holding their lands and tenements of the crown by the ſervice of war. But this ſervice was due to the king's perſon.

According to Bracton, the very word baron imported robur belli; and imperator, the title of the Anglo-Saxon monarchs from Egbert to the Conqueſt, denoted a military chief. His barons or vaſſals held their fiefs of him upon condition of attending his perſon with a military corps in his war. How was this title or ſervice compatible with a female ſovereign? The council of Engliſh barons adjudged Matilda to be incapable of the imperial function. They ſaid they would not be ſubject to a diſtaff.

But were not the king's lieges, who had thus ſolemnly bound themſelves to ſupport Matilda, releaſed of their oath by the king himſelf in an act of council juſt before his death? Let us hear Gervas of Dover's account of this matter: "Stephen, as ſoon as king Henry was dead, haſtened over to England. He was repulſed by the citizens of Dover; and ſhut out of the city by the men of Canterbury; but received by the Londoners[1] and ſome of the grandees of England with reſpect. But when there aroſe a ſharp and cloſe debate between Stephen, himſelf, and ſome the firſt grandees of the realm, in the preſence of William archbiſhop of Canterbury, concerning the ſucceſſion; and when the archbiſhop primate of England, on account of the oath taken to Matilda, feared to put the diadem on his head, there ſtood up one of the chief grandees of the realm, who ſwore that he was preſent when king Henry had voluntarily in good faith releaſed that oath; which being heard, the aforeſaid Stephen was almoſt unanimouſly elected. And thus he was crowned by William archbiſhop of Canterbury, on the 11th kal. of January, at Weſtminſter. This relation is corroborated by that of Ralph de Diceto, another contemporary hiſtorian, who likewiſe tells us who this great perſon was that heard the king remit the oath that had been taken by his lieges. Hugh Bigot (ſays this author), the ſeneſchal of the king, coming into England, did in the preſence of the archbiſhop of Canterbury affirm by his oath, that while the king was in extremity, ſome quarrel ariſing between him and the empreſs, he diſinherited her, and appointed Stephen count of Boulogne his nephew to be his heir. It may be worthy of notice, that according to Ordericus monk of Utica, Robert earl of Leiceſter was about the perſon of the king in his laſt illneſs, and one of his chief counſellors: and yet this earl, remarkable for his wiſdom and knowledge in the law, was one of Stephen's moſt ſtrenuous ſupporters both at his election and afterwards.

The conduct of another great perſon on this occaſion contributed very much to influence the electors in favour of Stephen. I mean Roger biſhop of Sarum, who had been juſtice of all England, and in that high function had adminiſtered and governed it during the whole reign of Henry Beauclerc. As he was one of thoſe who had ſolemnly pledged themſelves to Henry I. to ſupport the rights of Matilda after his deceaſe, his integrity became tarniſhed in the opinion of many perſons, when they ſaw him ſtrenuous for the earl of Boulogne. William of Malmeſbury affirms, that he himſelf had often heard the biſhop excuſe this part of his conduct, by alledging that he conſidered himſelf wholly diſcharged from his promiſe by the conduct of king Henry; for that he had ſolemnly made that promiſe to the king, upon condition that the king did not againſt his advice, and that of the other grandees of the realm, give his daughter in marriage to any perſon without the realm, whereas he had diſpoſed of her to the earl of Anjou, with the privity and council only of Robert earl of Glouceſter, Brian Fitz-count, and the biſhop of Liſieux[2].

Stephen being elected upon certain conditions, as ſoon as he was ſeiſed of royalty, pledged himſelf in a ſolemn manifeſto to rule according to the tenor of thoſe conditions which were beneficial to the nation[3]. In the ſet-out of this inſtrument, he ſtates his title to the crown in the following manner: "Ego Stephanus, Dei gratiâ, aſſenſu cleri & populi in regem Anglie electus, & a domino Willielmo archiepiſcopo Cantuarie, & ſancte eccleſie Romane legato conſecratus, & ab Innocentio ſancte ſedis Romane pontifice poſtmodum confirmatus;" &c. The ſame form is nearly adhered to in a ſpeech of one of Stephen's nobles juſt before the famous battle of the ſtandard[4]: An pro cauſa diffidimus? Sed non injuſtum bellum pro rege noſtro ſuſcipimus, qui regnum, non, ut hoſtes calumniantur, invaſit indebitum; ſed ſuſcepit oblatum; quem populus petiit, quem clerus elegit, quem unxit pontifex; quem in regnum apoſtolica confirmavit auctoritas." That is, "But do we diſtruſt our cauſe? But the war wherein we are engaged, is not an unjuſt one. It is for our king, who did not uſurp the crown, as the enemy falſely affirms, but accepted of it when actually tendered to him; whom the laity demanded; whom the clergy elected; whom the high prieſt anointed; whom the apoſtolic authority confirmed." Are not theſe facts enough to put for ever out of countenance the advocates of indefeaſible hereditary right?

The noble author of the reign of Henry II. reports, that as ſoon as this prince mounted the throne of England, he appointed our earl his high juſtice. This is very likely to be true, but I do not find any expreſs authority for aſſerting it. Certain, however, it is, that he filled this important ſtation in the ſecond year of Henry II. and he ſeems to have held it till his death[5]. His character for piety ſtands evinced by the abbey which he founded at Leiceſter, and his other magnificent charities. And the title given him by a contemporary writer is that of Juſtus Comes, which muſt have rendered him, in conjunction with his fame for wiſdom, peculiarly qualified for this office of the king's ſpecial repreſentative, in the adminiſtration of civil and criminal juriſprudence. Moſt of our antiquaries have entertained a notion that the high juſtice was but another name for the judicial dignity, modernly ſtyled the chief juſtice of the King's Bench. Even lord Coke was of that opinion, and therefore thought it no preſumption to ſtyle himſelf, in the frontiſpiece of his Reports, "Chief Juſtice of England." The diſtinguiſhed talents of that illuſtrious lawyer ought to have prevented the aſperity with which he was aſſailed for aſſuming this title by James I. and his abject flatterers. It cannot, however, be denied, that the chief juſtice of the King's Bench was a perſon much below, and quite different from, him who had the name of high or chief juſtice of England in the Anglo-Norman age. The chief juſtice of the King's Bench had never the appellations of the other, ſuch as, vicarius regis, regis locum tenens, pro-rex, cuſtos regni, & regni gardianus, gubernator totius Angliæ, ſecundus a rege, and the like. The pleas before the court of King's Bench were ſtyled, coram rege, ubicunque fuerimus in Angliâ; or ſimply coram rege. Whereas pleas before the high juſtice were not coram rege, but coram capitali juſtitia regni, or regis, to diſtinguiſh them from the former. In the times alluded to, the juſtices of the King's Bench followed the king's court, but the preſence of the high juſtice was ſuc-

[1] They were ſo powerful at that time, as almoſt to nominate the king.

[2] In the very beginning of the year 1127, a great council being then held—"omnes totius Angliæ optimates epiſcopos etiam & abbates rex Henricus ſacramento adegit, & obſtrinxit: ut ſi ipſe ſine herede maſculo decederet, Mathildam filiam ſuam quondam imperatricem incunctanter & ſine ullâ retractione dominam reciperent. Juraverunt ergo cuncti quicunque in eodem concilio alicujus videbantur eſſe momenti. Poſt Pentecoſtem verò miſit rex filiam ſuam in Normanniam, jubens eam per Rotomagenſem archiepiſcopum deſponſari filio prædicti Fulconis. Nec diſtulit, quin ipſe quoque Normanniam navigaret, eoſque matrimonio conjungeret. Quo facto, quodam vaticinio omnes prædicabant, ut poſt mortem ejus a ſacramento deciſcerent. Ego Rogerium Saliſberienſem epiſcopum ſæpe audivi dicentem," &c. as in the text. Malmeſb. Nowell. Partial as the monk was to the family and perſon of Henry I. and hateful to him as was Roger biſhop of Sarum, for ſiding with Stephen; yet we ſee, from his own account, that Henry I. did deceive the great men of the realm, and thereby in the general opinion of the nation render null and void the engagement he had extorted in behalf of his daughter, cedaneous to that of the king, and his tribunal ambulatory. The court of King's Bench (if, in the times of the four or five firſt Anglo-Norman kings, any branch of the king's curia was ſo called, and was the root of our modern court of that name) muſt have conſiſted, I think, of equal juſtices, members, together with others, of the king's council, but with ſeparate juriſdiction in the pleas, whereof by cuſtom it had cognizance. The king's council compoſing the king's curia (for we never hear of the king's courts, but of his court, and of which the members were ſtyled familiares regis,) included the juſtices of the Exchequer, called the barones ſcaccarii, the juſtices of the bench at Weſtminſter, afterward called juſtices of the Common Pleas, and ſome of the ſpiritual and temporal grandees, and a few others, who on account of their abilities, or the king's partiality, were at the king's diſcretion taken into that aſſembly. In affairs of ſo nice a nature as to require the preſence of a ſtill larger body of counſellors, the king ſummoned his prelates and magnates. It was a condition upon which both held their baronial tenements, to obey the ſummons, and aid their lord the king with their advice; but it ſeems to have reſted with the king whom he ſhould ſummon to reinforce his council, and by ſuch augmentation form his magnum concilium. The biſhops, however, and ſome of the chief barons of the realm, were integral, and perhaps the abbots who held of the king in chief, in the formation of ſuch aſſemblies. And the placita of the ſeparate chamber of the juſtices of the King's Bench (if a ſeparate court then exiſted), as well as thoſe before his other chambers of council and great council (denominated afterwards the privy council and parliament), were all ſtyled placita coram rege, becauſe the king was perſonally concerned in them, and ſeems frequently to have preſided in them, alſo to diſtinguiſh them from the court of common pleas. But the court of the high juſtice had none of theſe properties. If in ſome caſes he iſſued writs in his own name, in others he obeyed thoſe which came to him immediately from the king; who ſeems to have been conſtantly accompanied by his counſellors, ready to diſpatch at all times both the pleas appertaining to his council and his bench. There is ſtill another peculiarity in the office of high juſtice, which demonſtrates his diſcrimination from the modern chief juſtice of the King's Bench, which is this: the high juſtice was, or conſtitutionally ought to be, appointed by the king in the aſſembly of his great men, that is, in his great council or parliament; if during the reign of Henry II. no veſtige of ſuch controul upon the king's will is diſcoverable, it is either becauſe our chroniclers in their ſhort hiſtorical notices omitted to mention it, or becauſe, what is indiſputably true, king Henry, during his long reign, trampled upon all the rights of his people, and governed like a deſpot. But it appears very clearly, that in the reign of John the high juſtice was above the king's reach; and that in the baronial war of Henry III. the right to concur in the appointment of the high juſtice was claimed upon conſtitutional grounds to be veſted in the common council of the realm; by which expreſſion I underſtand the aſſembly afterwards called the parliament.

[3] Malmeſbury.

[4] Abb. Rieval.

[5] See the extract of a roll in Madox's Exch. vol. I. p. 62, note c.

Thoſe perſons have egregiouſly erred, and yet in this liſt we have our chief lawyers and antiquaries, who have aſſerted that the office of high juſtice was hereditary, and attached to the earldom of Leiceſter. The ground of this miſtake ſeems to be this. In France and Normandy, not to mention other European kingdoms and principalities, the ſame officer, who in England obtained the name of high juſtice, was ſtyled ſeneſchal; which office, if any one will give himſelf the trouble of making the ſearch, will be found to explain that of the Engliſh high juſtice. And as the French language and faſhions were almoſt excluſively in uſe in the times alluded to, it is no wonder if the words ſeneſchal and high juſtice ſhould be uſed as ſynonyms; and that at length theſe two offices, the ſeneſchallus Angliæ, and juſticiarius Angliæ, ſhould be thought the ſame thing. This ſeems to be a proper place for rectifying the miſtake, as our Robert earl of Leiceſter was both high juſtice of England and diſcriminately ſeneſchallus Angliæ. From elaborate enquiry made at the acceſſion of our Henry IV, in order to adjuſt the ceremonial of his coronation, it was fully ſhewn, that the office of ſeneſchallus Angliæ had attached from ancient times to the earldom of Leiceſter[1]. This office was ſtiled in various documents ſeneſchallus Angliæ de feodo, which might, one would think, have prevented his being confounded with the high juſtice, who ſo far from holding de feodo, or in perpetuity to him and his heirs, never did, nor poſſibly could be ſuppoſed to hold by ſuch ſort of tenure. The truth is, that the ſeneſchallus Angliæ, which was de feodo, and veſted in the earldom of Leiceſter, was the grand maſter of ceremonies, who attended upon the perſon of the king at coronations and great celebrities, and aſſigned to each vaſſal of the crown his feodal function upon ſuch occaſions, and preſided over ſuch ceremonials. It was preciſely the ſame department in the court of the king of England, as the hereditary ſeneſchalſhip of France, which was enjoyed by the French counts of Anjou; and which very office we find executed in quality of counts of Anjou by our two kings, Henry II. and his ſon. I ſhall bring only one more proof that the high juſtice of England, and the chief juſtice of the king's bench, were different offices; which is this:—The charge of high juſtice of England was wholly diſcontinued after the diſcomfiture of the barons at Eveſham, A. D. 1265. So we are expreſsly aſſured by an ancient writer[2]. And the truth of this aſſertion ſeems to be confirmed by the entire ſilence of our hiſtory from that time concerning any ſuch office; whereas the court of king's bench began ſoon after to attract the notice of hiſtorians, and to acquire an increaſing ſplendour.

To the office of high juſtice the king added in the perſon of our earl that of preſident of his court of Exchequer. How he acquitted himſelf in this great office an excellent judge of ſuch matters, who lived near the time, has told us in the following ſhort encomium. "Vidi ego ipſe (ſays the judicious author of the Dialogue de Scaccario[3]) qui loquor tecum temporibus modernis Legreceſtriæ comitem Robertum, virum diſcretum, literis eruditum, & in negotiis forenſibus exercitatum. Hic ingenitam habens animi virtutem, paternæ quoque prudentiæ æmulator effectus eſt; cujus induſtria pluribus[4] examinata eſt penes principem noſtrum Henricum ſecundum (quem nec palliata prudentia, nec diſſimulata fallit ineptia) ut ex mandato ipſius non ſolum ad ſcaccarium, verum etiam per univerſum regnum præſidentis dignitatem obtinuerit." The preſident through the whole realm is a periphraſis for the high juſtice, or juſticiar, whom therefore the ſame writer in another place ſtyles, "Primus in regno poſt regem ratione fori." In the account of ſome civil trials brought before our earl[5], he is charactered in his judicial department by "Qui tunc in Angliâ judicabat;" "Qui præerat cauſis cognoſcendis in Angliâ;" "Judex Robertus comes Leiceſtriæ;" "Robertus comes Leiceſtriæ;" "juſticiarius regis, & ſumma juſticia."

By the 7th Conſtitution of Clarendon it was enacted, that no tenant of the king in capite (which phraſe comprehended all the biſhops of England, and all the abbots whoſe houſes were of royal foundation, and all other eccleſiaſtics whoſe churches or lands were of royal grant, as well as earls, barons, knights, and eſquires, whoſe fees or hereditary eſtates were derived from the king, and held of him as of his crown), nor any of his perſonal or demeſne miniſters (i. e. officers), ſhould be excommunicated, nor their ſeignories or lands be put under an interdict, unleſs the lord king, if he were in the realm, ſhould have been previouſly reſorted to for redreſs; or his Justice, if the king were out of the realm[6]. The king's juſtice here is unqueſtionably the high juſtice of England. Here we ſee the ſame power veſted in the court of the high juſtice in the king's abſence, as accrued to the king himſelf in the court of his own audience, when he was in England. And this power was meant in the preſent inſtance to authorize the high juſtice to take cognizance of cauſes, which the Hierarchy wiſhed to bring before the ſpiritual juriſdiction, to the excluſion of the civil tribunal; and to conduct them under the pains and penalties appointed by the canons of the Catholic church; of which the chief were penance, excommunication, and interdict.

---

[1] MSS. in Muſeo Britannico, & Rot. Parl.

[2] See Camden in Britannia; he gives the paſſage without naming the author.

[3] Lib. I c. 11.

[4] Ita in Madox; forſan plurimum.

[5] Matth. Paris, apud Watts; & alii.

[6] See Conſtitutions of Clarendon in Lyttelton.

It was another great branch of the juriſdiction of the high juſtice, that when the king was out of the realm he had the power of appointing juſtices throughout the ſeveral counties of England three times every year [1]; which juſtices, with the knights (i. e. the principal freeholders) of each county, were to take recognitions in the ſeveral counties, concerning novel diſſeiſins, mort d'anceſtre, and of darrein preſentment. Theſe recognitions were called, when taken in this manner, aſſizes; and cauſes of this kind, which could not on account of difficulty be determined by theſe juſtices in aſſize in their eirs, were required to be referred to the king's juſtices of the common bench for their termination. This is a capitulum of Magna Carta.

In the time of our earl's juſticeſhip, the form of proceſs in real actions under the ſanction of his writ was, for the party plaintiff to procure a writ from the high juſtice, directed either to the chief lord, to do the plaintiff right in his court-baron, or to the ſhire-reeve in his county, according to the occaſion, as preſident of the county-court, and the king's ordinary juſtice within the ſame, to do right to the plaintiff; ſetting forth, that if he did not, the high juſtice ſhould do it, that the plaintiff might have no longer cauſe of complaint for lack of juſtice. When the cauſe was removed into the court of the high juſtice, he iſſued his writ to the ſhire-reeves, to ſummon the parties before him at ſuch time and place as he thought proper. We find our earl of Leiceſter ordering ſome very great perſons to attend him at various places, among others at Leiceſter [2], probably on account of his uſual reſidence there. It was not uncommon for the king to appoint certain perſons, one or two, or even three and four, to be coadjutors to the high juſtice in ſpecial and important buſineſs. If the ſuit involved any perſonal intereſt of the king, for inſtance if one of the parties was a tenant of the king in capite, or if the right in diſpute had reference to his perſon or dignity, the plea was removeable by the king's ſpecial writ to the king's own audience [3]; by which expreſſion I underſtand the court of the king's council, or progreſſively of the great council of the realm, that is, the parliament.

But the moſt diſtinguiſhed part of the high juſtice's function was his preſidency in the court of Exchequer [4]. The ſplendour of this court, and the preeminence therein of the high juſtice, are ſo forcibly deſcribed by the author of the Dialogue de Scaccario, that the reader will hardly be diſpleaſed at my reciting the following paſſage: "Habet enim hoc commune cum ipſâ domini regis curiâ; in quâ ipſe in propriâ perſonâ jura decernit, quod nec recordationi, nec ſententiæ in ea latæ licet alicui contradicere. Huic autem curiæ tam inſignis auctoritas eſt, tum propter regiæ imaginis excellentiam, quæ in ſigillo ejus de theſauro individuâ lege ſervatur; tum propter eos, qui aſſident, ut dictum eſt, quorum ſolertiâ totius regni ſtatus ſervatur. Illic enim reſidet capitalis domini regis juſticia, primus poſt regem in regno ratione fori & majores quique de regno, qui familiariùs regiis ſecretis aſſiſtunt, ut quod fuerit ſub tantorum preſentiâ conſtitutum vel terminatum, inviolabili jure ſubſiſtat. Verum quidam ex officio, quidam ex ſolâ juſſione principis reſident. Ex officio principaliter reſidet, imo, & preſidet primus in regno, capitalis ſc. juſticia." In this reign of Henry II. we read of another high juſtice, viz. Richard de Lucy. The author of the Dialogue, we ſee, deſcribes the office as veſted in a ſingle perſon, and attributes to our earl the plenitude of its dignity. Richard de Lucy, therefore, was probably our earl's delegate, or a ſpecial high juſtice of a limited and temporary authority.

From the Conqueſt down to the 5th Aug. ann. 1265, the office of high juſtice ſuſtained no long interruption of exiſtence, or any material diminution of dignity. On that fatal day, which was in the 49th year of Henry III. fell Simon de Montford earl of Leiceſter, at the battle of Eveſham, and with him the cauſe of liberty.

The office of high juſtice had been a ſevere check upon the tyranny of king John; and means had been taken in the reign of Henry III. to render the office ſubſervient to the arbitrary and corrupt purpoſes of of the crown. This abuſe was one article in the liſt of grievances urged againſt the government of Henry III; and at length induced the barons of the realm to declare, that the appointment of this officer was not conſtitutionally, or de jure, in the king alone, but in him with the advice and aſſent of the common council of the realm [5]. King Henry, not being then in a condition to reſiſt the barons, yielded to their ſcheme of reform, and a new high juſtice was made according to the Oxford proviſions. The blood of the barons, which was ſhed on the field of Eveſham, made a rich ſoil for the growth of deſpotiſm; and from that time to the preſent we have heard no more of an high juſtice of England.

While our earl was in the ſervice of Henry II, flouriſhed and declined the famous Thomas à Becket. They came into power nearly at the ſame time; they were both in great favour with Henry. They had between them the two higheſt departments in the ſtate. The moſt important affairs were entruſted to their management. In the court of Exchequer they did buſineſs together; in the court of king's council they muſt have very frequently met, to hear cauſes, and diſpenſe juſtice. Both are celebrated for a knowledge of Engliſh juriſprudence, and both concerned in judicial determinations according to the common law or uſage of the realm. Between theſe two great men, who, we ſee, muſt have been officially much together, there ſubſiſted a moſt intimate friendſhip; from whence, and the conſideration of ſome collateral circumſtances, it ſeems highly probable that Becket owed his promotion, when he was made the king's chancellor, in part to the earl of Leiceſter. For although hiſtory mentions no other inſtrument in the affair than Theobald archbiſhop of Canterbury, yet it is hardly to be ſuppoſed that he ſhould venture upon a ſtep ſo delicate and critical without the participation of the preſident of the realm, and the king's chief miniſter. And we may ſuppoſe the thing very likely upon another account. The primate and high juſtice had for above twenty years been aſſociated in the moſt arduous and confidential councils of three ſucceſſive kings; they had followed the ſame politics; they muſt have had much general as well as confidential intercourſe with each other; and were both men, as ſhould ſeem, likely to be reciprocally agreeable, from their common wiſdom, and diſtinguiſhed probity, and gravity of manners. Archbiſhop Theobald, out of regard to the nation at large, as well as to the king, wiſhed to ſee Becket the king's chief miniſter, and actually trained him for that ſtation. The earl of Leiceſter could not but know Becket while he was chaplain to the archbiſhop; and it is highly probable, that at that time the friendſhip between them had its commencement.

Archbiſhop Becket thus offering himſelf to the notice of this memoir, I cannot diſmiſs him without ſome ſtricture upon ſo very remarkable a character. And here I am ſorry to ſay, that, if I ſpeak of him as he ſeems to me to deſerve, and as the numerous judicious and well-informed writers of his own time have done, whoſe elaborate encomia ought to have had ſome weight with modern hiſtorians, I muſt differ widely from the latter,

It muſt be allowed a remarkable circumſtance in the accounts given of Thomas à Becket, that modern writers of the moſt oppoſite opinions ſhould concur in ſpeaking very unfavourably of him. It ſeems to me, however, that the difficulty is very eaſy of ſolution. Thomas à Becket was one of the moſt admired perſonages of the Roman martyrology, while Popery was the general religion of Europe: but at and after the Reformation, when to deify ſovereigns and vilify the church of Rome at all points gratified prejudice, and was thought the road to popularity and preferment, it would be to ſuppoſe a miraculous change of human nature, not to find a plentiful ſhoal of writers eager to fall foul upon ſo diſtinguiſhed a Catholic character as Becket was.

---

[1] Magna Carta.

[2] Matth. Paris, in vitis abbatum.

[3] Matth. Paris, ut ſupra.

[4] Madox, Exch.

[5] Matth. Paris; & Chronica & Recorda regni.

Other writers were no leſs eager to beſpatter the aſhes of Becket, from their zeal for prerogative, and the deſpotiſm of kings; being the advocates of paſſive obedience, they could not bear a man who reſiſted his ſovereign, and would ſet up the canons of the church above the ſuppoſed cuſtoms of the realm. Writers the moſt voluminous, and the moſt popular, having for the above reaſons moſt horribly blackened the primate, the public gave too eaſy credit to their miſrepreſentations. And ſuch was the received opinion both of his bigotry and factious ſpirit, that even writers who were thought moderate in their predilection for the Reformed church and the kingly government yielded to the general prejudice, and adopted the outcry againſt Thomas of Canterbury. From a wiſh to do juſtice to a much injured character, I will lay before the reader the account given of him by men of his own time, who knew him well, and are very worthy of credit. In ſpeaking of Becket, I ſhall briefly deſcribe the qualifications which raiſed him to his ſeveral high ſtations, his fame and conduct while he held them, and the cauſe and manner of his ruin.

About the year 1154, "Theobald archbiſhop of Canterbury, having ſuſpicions of the young king, whom certain bad men about him were labouring to corrupt by pernicious counſels, wrought with him to beſtow the chancellorſhip upon his favourite clerk Thomas, then the archbiſhop's archdeacon of Canterbury; for the primate ſaw, that Thomas was now by much experience become very adroit in buſineſs, briſk and ſpirited in the management of affairs, truſty in councils, not given to deſpond in circumſtances of doubt and danger; and in times of calamity firm and magnanimous; a man of heroic and princely liberality, diſpoſed to yield a ready obedience to orders; in points of complaiſance and courteſy remarkably accurate, and in every ſort of affair committed to his management ſagacious and diſcreet. If a perſon ſo fit for the court and ſervice of Henry was made chancellor, and the king's cloſe friend, the archbiſhop thought, that both the nation and the king would be made happy, the public tranquillity rendered ſecure, and the union between church and ſtate permanently preſerved[1]."

From other writers we learn, that Thomas à Becket was a perſon of great public ſpirit, heroic and magnificent in all his demeanour, and inwardly delicately conſcientious; gay and eaſy in his manners, but, in his private reckoning with his own ſoul, emulous of the moſt mortified examples of the Popſh kalendar, and adopting the ſevereſt leſſons of the Scriptures and Fathers: moreover, that he was remarkably well verſed in the laws and cuſtoms of England, his native country, a diſtinguiſhed and popular pleader, as well as one of the beſt canoniſts and civilians of his age; which ſciences, at that time, were much cultivated in England, and uſually paved the way for the higheſt promotions in the ſtate; whereas the municipal law was little underſtood or regarded by the Anglo-Norman kings, and their foreign juriſconſults. Becket had acquired a deep knowledge of the civil and canon law in foreign univerſities; and by travail and application was acquainted with the policy and intrigues of all the courts of Europe; of which he knew all the princes and great people, and their tempers, views, movements, talents, and reſources. In particular, he had a thorough knowledge of the chief perſons of the court of Rome, which then influenced and awed all the nations and princes of Europe.

This Thomas à Becket being thus made chancellor of England, ſoon diſplayed ſuch wonderful talents as ſeemed to prognoſticate that the public expectation would be fully gratified. He was the nation's idol, as well as the king's. The latter ſo admired his eaſy converſation, and agreeable manners, as to make him the companion of his feſtive hours; and ſo reſpected his wiſdom and ſkill in buſineſs (wherein the king himſelf was ſuppoſed to equal moſt young men) as to commit every thing to his management, and be a ſort of humble diſciple to him. And, as the crowning proof of his eſteem for, and admiration of, Becket, he committed prince Henry his eldeſt ſon to his care and tuition.

In this ſecond ſtage of his career, Becket is ſpoken of by the hiſtorian quoted above, who was perſonally acquainted with the character and ſtory of him, with the higheſt admiration. The paſſage I am going to tranſcribe is among the tranſactions of the year 1161, when Becket had now held the king's great ſeal ſeven or eight years. "Erat autem his diebus Thomas Cantuarienſis archidiaconus & regis cancellarius in Angliâ potentiſſimus, in omnium oculis glorioſus, ſapientiâ præditus, nobilitate cordis omnibus admirabilis, inimicis & æmulis ſuis terribilis, utpote regis amicus, & in regno ſecundus, regis rector, & quaſi magiſter." The ſum of what we are told of him during this ſtrong gale of proſperity is comprized in the following notes. His ſtyle of living was ſplendid beyond that of any ſubject of his time. For the great, who reſorted to his table, were prepared dainties of all ſorts, while himſelf took only a ſmall repaſt from the plaineſt diſhes. His only beverage was water, while that of his noble gueſts was the beſt wines of France. His robe was rich; but underneath, and next his ſkin, was a veſt of hair-cloth. In the adminiſtration of juſtice he was firm and independent; ſeduced by no perſuaſion; intimidated with no man's power or threatenings. His vaſt revenue was wholly employed in providing and leading troops in the king's expeditions (ſo campaigns were then called), in ſupporting the dignity of the king's chancellor, in hoſpitality, and in alms. His palace was the ſchool of philoſophy, divinity, logic, tactics, and both the laws. There the young nobility practiſed feats of arms; there the grandees were ſumptuouſly entertained, and converſed together upon public affairs. The houſe of Becket was the banqueting place of the luxurious, the table of the nobles of England, the univerſity of the clergy, the monaſtery of the devout, the larder of the poor; in ſhort, at once, an academy, a camp, an hoſpital, a convent, and the ſeat of good chear. King Henry, whoſe incontinence was remarkable, took ſome pains, in his looſer moments, to ſeduce his chancellor, a deacon of the church, to pleaſures like his own, but in vain. This chaſtity of Becket is celebrated by his biographers as a rare excellence.

That, amidſt all this glare of greatneſs, Becket, however, had his daſh of ſorrow, may be gathered from many circumſtances. In the quotation given above, it is ſtated that he was terrible to his enemies and detractors; which contains an intimation, that in the court of Henry II, there were not wanting perſons who hated the miniſter and favourite. This malignant influence, the ſource of his ſufferings, as he affirms himſelf in his letters, is thus accounted for by another hiſtorian: "Cancellarii fungens officio," ſays one of his panegyriſts[3], and indeed all our chroniclers are of that ſort, "audaciam milviorum repreſſit, qui regi adulantes diripere conſpiraverunt, tam provincialium, quam eccleſiæ facultates." The objects of the courtiers' greedineſs were the eſtates of the provincials[4], and of the church. By the provincials the author means the old Engliſh gentry (great numbers of whom had already been deſpoiled of their thane-lands by the Normans); and by the eſtates of the church we are to underſtand the lands that had been bequeathed by Anglo-Saxon kings, and pious benefactors, to religious and charitable uſes. It was natural for Becket, who was an Engliſhman, to reſiſt the rapacity of the Norman courtiers, who were continually plundering the Engliſh gentry his co-patriots. Nor can we ſuppoſe, that a conſcientious primate would look with indifference at the ſpoil continually committed, probably through the king's aſſiſtance, upon the poſſeſſions of the church, intended for the ſervice of God, and the maintenance of the poor.

---

[1] Brompton and Gervas. [2] Gervas. [3] Matth. Paris.

[4] "Et epiſcopus vicecomitis agens vices laicali foro immiſcuit, atque ab omnibus provincialibus, tam nobilibus, quam ſervis, inſolenter extorſit pecuniam infinitam." Matt. Paris, anno 1075. The writers of that age frequently divide the whole community of the realm into two claſſes, liberi & ſervi. Liberi, therefore, and nobiles, may be ſuppoſed to be ſynonymous. Take notice, he ſpeaks of the nobles, or libres hommes, of a county. In the Anglo-Saxon hiſtories they are ſtyled Thanes; their lands were allodial.—"The thing is known to all the valiant men in Kent and Suſſex, of Thanes, and of Churls." Somner on Gavelkind.

When we conſider the virtuous and firm ſpirit of Becket, and the arbitrary, inſolent, and rapacious, temper of Henry II, we cannot account for the king's ſtrong deſire to have him advanced to the primacy. In his former ſituation of chancellor, this upright miniſter had, upon various occaſions, been found intractable, when required to do things that he held to be oppreſſive, diſhonourable, or unjuſt. And in converſations with Henry before this promotion, he had plainly told the king, that he had no ſort of wiſh for the primacy, for that it would certainly be attended with the loſs of the king's friendſhip, and produce an unhappy breach between them. And he expreſsly told him, that, were he made archbiſhop, he ſhould inſiſt upon the manors, honours, and knights fees, being reſtored to the ſee, which had been embezzled by the crown and grandees. The king aſſured him that he ſhould be fully gratified in this favourite point, and be left entirely to his own liberty upon it; and forwarded his election to the utmoſt of his power, notwithſtanding this noble and frank declaration of Becket.

The other enemies of Becket in the court of king Henry, while he held the great ſeal, were thoſe who wanted to deſpoil the church. It was the practice at that time for the king to have full poſſeſſion during the avoidance, reſpectively, of all the ſees, abbeys, and conventual priories, of royal foundation. Likewiſe, in the caſe of an abbey founded by an earl or baron, although the ſame right attached to the founder, if he happened to be of full age, and in the ſeiſin of his barony, or fee, which he held of the king, as his immediate feudal lord; yet if ſuch a baron died and left an heir under age, the barony likewiſe eſcheated, pro tempore, with all its appendages, the cuſtody of the abbey among the reſt. This temporary lapſe of eleemoſinary eſtates afforded a ſpacious field of plunder. While the church was empty, the revenues were either collected by the ſhire-reeve, and accounted for at the exchequer, or intruſted to a ſpecial receiver, or ſold, or rented, or given gratuitouſly, or in diſcharge of ſome obligation, at the king's pleaſure. As this temporary poſſeſſion of ſome of the fineſt eſtates in the kingdom was a precious morſel to the king, or ſome fortunate courtier, it was quitted with reluctance, and the churches under this predicament were ſometimes kept without a paſtor for ſeveral years, while the king's officer, or grantee, was ſtripping the eſtate of its live and dead ſtock, cutting down the timber, neglecting the repairs, and ſometimes reducing it to a mere waſte. Another way which the higher orders of the laity had of embezzling the eccleſiaſtical eſtates was this: they prevailed upon the biſhops or abbots to grant them leaſes for life, or a long term of years. When the manor, for uſually it was nothing leſs, and oftentimes a whole honour, conſiſting of many manors, ought, according to the tenor of the firm or leaſe (the latter is the modern term), to return from a ſtate of ſervice, which was the term for this ſort of tenancy, into the lord, or, as we ſhould ſay, the proprietor's demeſne, or immediate and perſonal poſſeſſion, the leſſee himſelf, or his heir, according to the caſe, would pretend that the land in queſtion had been alienated, or granted in fee; and that, therefore, he was juſtified in holding it to himſelf and his heirs for ever, either by the ſervice of ſocage, frank firm, military tenure, or any other, according to the nature of his claim. So infirm was the poſſeſſion of landed property at that time, through the defective modes of infeoſment and enrollment, the perjury, effrontery, and the inacceſſible heighth of the great, and the bad conſtruction and corruption of the king's court, where judgement was generally given according to the king's orders, and juſtice precipitated or retarded by all manner of oblique and intereſted motives, that, in litigations where the right was as clear as day-light, frequently not even the appearance of juſtice was regarded.

It is not eaſy to explain how it fell within the province of the king's chancellor (for chancellor of England was not the language of thoſe times) to ſtem this torrent of corruption. He was not a juſtice of common pleas at Weſtminſter; he was not an aſſeſſor or coadjutor to the high juſtice; and, if the ſuperior bench, coram rege ubicunque fuerit in Angliâ (the periphraſis for the king's bench), was then formed, the chancellor cannot be ſuppoſed to have been one of its juſtices. But, notwithſtanding all this, we may be able to find a clue to his interference in civil pleas, without taking him out of his proper ſphere of action. In the tribunal of the king's council, before which civil pleas were frequently determined, he had always place; and in the great council of the realm he was the firſt PEER, if not officially prolocutor. Again, in the high court of exchequer, which took cognizance of all kinds of queſtions relative to the king's debts and fiſcal rights, the king's chancellor was one of the barons. Moreover, the chancellor could not but have great weight in adviſing the king privately and confidentially in the various applications that muſt be made to the ſovereign upon all kinds of affairs, and in preventing the king's religion from being ſurprized. And, to conclude, the great ſeal being the ſine quâ non in moſt great matters between the king and ſubject, a conſcientious and upright chancellor might prevent a deal of robbery by a guarded management of it.

In that age the king's chancellor was invariably a clerk, and one of the offices was the ſuperintendance of all the king's chapels; whence the chancellor of the king of Scots, whoſe office was the ſame as the chancellors of the king of Angles, was expreſsly ſtyled clericus regis de capellâ, a term ſynonymous with clericus regis de cancellis. As ſoon as he was made chancellor, he was uſually decorated with many benefices in the church, the better to ſupport his dignity, and eventually raiſed to ſome opulent biſhoprick.

Archbiſhop Theobald departed this life on the 18th of April, 1161. No one was thought by the publick in general ſo proper to ſucceed him as Thomas à Becket. The right of appointing the archbiſhop of Canterbury, primate of all Britain, was not either canonically, or conſtitutionally in the king[1]; but, on the other hand, it was not ſafe, either to the electors, or the elected, to proceed in this weighty affair, but with the king's privity and direction. On the preſent occaſion, the king ſpared no pains to get his chancellor elected. Thinking that the archbiſhop of Canterbury would be as pliant as the chancellor, he preferred him to all others; Becket was accordingly choſen on the 3d of June, 1162, and when he was in his 40th year, or, as ſome write, in his 44th.

That the reader may not form his opinion of an archbiſhop of Canterbury of the 11th and 12th centuries from an archbiſhop of the preſent age, the reader is detained a moment to hear what an archbiſhop of Canterbury then was.

The archbiſhop of Canterbury, primate of all England, nay, of all Britain, was the perſon next in rank to the king: in divers royal charters before the Conqueſt his ſignature precedes the king's[2]. His perſonal concurrence was deemed important in the making of ſtatutes. As the king decreed matters of a temporal ſort in the council of his barons with the concurrence of the prelates, ſo the primate convened a ſynod of his ſuffragans, wherein, concurrently with the aſſent of the king, and a delegation of the barons of the realm, allowed by the king to be aſſiſting in ſuch ſynods, he made laws and regulations for the ſuppreſſion of vice and immorality; of which, at that time, but little if any notice at all was taken in the king's court. Lanfranc (ſays Gervas of Dover), becauſe the uſe of councils (he means ſynods) was grown obſolete, celebrated them in divers parts, for extirpating inveterate vices, and advancing virtue. Anſelm, Lanfranc's ſucceſſor, was ſtill more eminent for his councils; in one of which he made a ſtatute, that human kind ſhould not be ſold as beaſts at market. In one of king Henry the Firſt's letters to this ſublime archbiſhop of Canterbury, he addreſſes him thus: "Quocirca, pater reverende, ſupplex & devotus genibus tuæ ſanctitatis advolutus te deprecor [1]." Nor was it uncommon to ſee the king actually at the primate's feet [2]. Although in the electing of the king others concurred, yet the perfection of election depended ſo much upon the perſonal aſſent and aſſiſtance of the primate, that he alone ſeemed to appoint him. "Mortuo poſtmodum in Normanniâ rege Willelmo I. anno regni ſui 21°, convocatis epiſcopis & primoribus Angliæ, Lanfrancus elegit Willelmum filium regis, ſacravit, & coronavit [3]." The chief primates of other empires exerciſed the ſame prerogatives according to the canons of the Catholic church, and the uſages of Chriſtian kingdoms. According to the ſame inſtitutions and cuſtoms, the perſon of the primate was inviolate. He was chief biſhop within his primacy, and ſubordinate only to the holy ſee. Biſhops could interdict, and excommunicate throughout their ſees, metropolitans throughout their provinces, the chief primate throughout the empire; the biſhops and archbiſhops within his rule were his ſubjects, although not in equal degree; he could ſummon them to his ſynods, he could ſuſpend them, he could lay any part, or even the whole of their dioceſes reſpectively under an interdict; he could excommunicate them or any of their flock: in one word, he could lay the king's whole realm under an interdict; he could excommunicate the king himſelf. This was within the plenitude of his power; but it was a ſtep further than Becket would venture to go, even with the expreſs permiſſion of the holy ſee. Such a ſentence amounted almoſt to a virtual depoſition, as it implied an injunction upon all perſons to avoid all ſort of communication with a prince ſo ſtigmatized, and to obey none of his commands, and to look upon him with horror and abomination, as the very outcaſt of heaven and earth.

---

[1] After the Death of Richard the ſucceſſor of Thomas à Becket in the primacy, the monks of Canterbury elected Peter biſhop of St. David's. The biſhops of England ſeparately and ſuddenly choſe Baldwin biſhop elect of Worceſter. The monks of Canterbury returned in great wrath to that city. "Subſecutus eſt eos rex, & in capitulo flexis genibus & lacrymantibus oculis conventum precatus eſt, ut prefatum ſuſciperet electum: ſic tamen, ut epiſcoporum penitus caſſaretur electio, & conventus de novo ſuam faceret electionem." Gervas.—This ſupplicant king was Henry II.

[2] Monaſt. Angl.

The manner of appointing the archbiſhop of Canterbury was ſuitable to the importance of his character, and the tremendous weight of his power. The ſolemn act of election was veſted in the prior and monks of Holy Trinity in the city of Canterbury. This act of theirs was eſſential; but it was by no means all that was required. The church of Canterbury derived all its temporalities from the bounty of kings; who were the chief lords, in a feudal ſenſe, of thoſe temporalities; and as ſuch ſtrove hard to maintain their ſovereignty over them. In this view, the archbiſhop was the king's liege man, and his tenement was a fief held of the king in capite. But, according to the univerſal law of fiefs, the vaſſal owed no other ſervice for his tenement, than was due either by long preſcription, or by the tenor of the charter of infeofment, or by the cuſtom of the realm, or by ſtatute law. The barony of Canterbury church was held of the king in capite, in frank-almoigne. But the king being willing to conſider the archbiſhop as his vaſſal, and the monks who choſe him as his ſubjects, did not ſuffer either one or the other to enjoy ſo ample a power, as ſeemed to accrue to elemoſynary lands by the canons of the church, and the charters of donation; by both which they were conſecrated ſolely to the ſervice of the church, and made, as it were, exempt of all feudal ſervice to an earthly ſuperior; and, to ſay the truth, the ſtatute law of the realm (for this matter had been ſolemnly ſettled in the reign of Henry I.) allowed the election of the archbiſhop to be in the monks of Trinity. The monks, therefore, inſiſted upon their right to chuſe their biſhop. The king ſaid, if they dared to do it without his leave (which imported their taking a perſon of his recommendation), he would confiſcate all their lands, and treat them as traitors. Again, if the monks of Canterbury had a right to chuſe their biſhop, the biſhops of England had a right to chuſe their primate. And accordingly the biſhops did, more or leſs, interfere in the election; and in ſo doing reaſon, as well as uſage, was, in ſome degree, with them. Nor were theſe the only checks upon the monks of Canterbury; for the nobles alſo of the common council of the realm, who were not eccleſiaſtics, aſſerted a ſort of right in the ſame buſineſs. In ſhort, the monks might, and muſt chuſe the archbiſhop; but to be admitted to his temporalities, he muſt at leaſt be approved by the king: yet this approbation ought to have been given by the advice of his prelates and barons, the conſtituent members of his great council, or parliament. But there was ſtill a ſuperior perſon, who, if he thought fit to take the election ſolely to himſelf, would ſuperſede all the others, namely, his holineſs the pope. And although he ſeemed ordinarily to forbear exerciſing this invidious ſtretch of power, yet he had an indirect method of controuling all proceedings on this affair, by granting or with-holding the archiepiſcopal pall or robe; without which, every thing elſe that had reference to the appointment was of little or no ſignification. Upon the whole, the leaſt invidious, and ſafeſt mode of chuſing the archbiſhop, in ordinary caſes, was for the monks to elect, and for the elected to be approved of by the king, with the counſel of the prelates and grandees of his parliament [4]. This mode I find adhered to in the reign of Stephen, as the moſt regular and legitimate way of chuſing biſhops; and had it been followed in all caſes, the canon and municipal law would have been in harmony, abuſe of power been prevented, and the honour of the church been ſaved.

By theſe ſolemn acts of church and ſtate, the primate of all England was placed in his exalted ſtation. His temporalities, though obnoxious to ſome of the conditions of vaſſalage, were protected from the graſp of rapacity, by papal privilegia, by royal charters, and by authentic deeds of donation.

Freehold honourable landed property conſiſted at that time chiefly of manors, within which the lord had a chief ſeat, exerciſed manerial juriſdiction in his court-baron, and alſo criminal juriſdiction if the crown had vouchſafed to grant him a court-leet, had his baſe tenants of various orders ſuitable to his ſituation, and his demeſne lands alſo, as well as lands in ſervice; of which latter ſort ſome were uſually within the precinct of the manor, and ſome without it; all taken together compoſing a feudum or fief. The fiefs of the archbiſhop, like the great landed eſtates of other chief lords of the realm, conſiſted of lands which were partly in demeſne, and partly in ſervice; which two terms comprehended the whole property; for the lands of the baſe tenants or vilains were under this diſtinction included in the demeſne. This term therefore comprehended, in a large ſenſe, all the land of a chief proprietor that was not in ſervitio, that is, in the ſervice of ſuch chief proprietor or lord (for in

---

[1] Eadmerus.

[2] This etiquette ſeems ſometimes to have been carried to a ridiculous exceſs. "Craſtino cum receſſiſſet a Cantuariâ, & Roffam appropinquaret (ſc. rex Ricardus I.) obviavit archiepiſcopo Cantuarienſi Huberto ſibi gaudenter occurrenti, equoque deſiliens genu flexo corruit in terram, & archiepiſcopus ſimiliter jacebat e regione tandemque ſurgentes oculis in amplexibus lacrymantibus, oſculis præ gaudio ſeſe refecerunt." Gervas. apud X Scr. p. 1586, anno 1194.

[3] Gervas.

[4] See the election of a biſhop of Bath in Stephen's time, in Madox. Exch. in notes.

this view of a fief, the baſe tenures were implied in demeſne). Service had no reſpect to ſervitude of tenure, or baſe tenancy; but to the ſervice or conſideration upon which a freehold tenement, or tenure by free infeofment, was held of or under the chief lord by his feoffee. The nature of feuds required ſuch diſtinctions. I beg the reader's indulgence, while I go a ſtep further on this ground. The king blended in his title of prince (or civil governor) that of chief, original, and ultimate proprietor of the whole land of his dominion. In conſtruction of law the whole was his, either in his own demeſne, or in his own ſervice. All that was not alienated by grant or infeoffment remained in ſuo dominico: Whatever was ſo alienated was ſtill, on account of the ſervice it owed him, in ſuo ſervitio. He continued the chief lord thereof, although his feoffee was ſeiſed of the ſame in his own demeſne as of his own fief or fee. The ſervice which attached to the perſon of the prince after the act of feodation was due from the immediate feoffee, who was called tenant in capite, to diſtinguiſh him from other feoffees of the ſame land in the deſcending ſeries of feodation. For, as part of the crown demeſne was by grant changed into free tenement, after which it was the king's fief only quoad ſervitium; ſo any part of ſuch free tenement, being alienated by its tenant in fee, from being his own demeſne, became his only quoad ſervitium. What the ſervice was, depended upon the tenor of each ſucceſſive infeofment; and each tenant, according to the order of ſucceſſive infeodation, was the tenant in capite of his immediate donor or grantor. Thus there were as many chief lords and tenants in capite as there were feodarions. The law reſpecting fiefs (which was reckoned the moſt honourable and eligible ſpecies of tenure) was, that no ſervice could accrue, but ſuch as was ſpecified in the act of infeofment, or reſulted from the cuſtom of the realm, or ſtatute law. But as lands held by ſpecific ſervices were the ſecurity for the performance of the ſervices, they could ultimately be ſeized into the demeſne of any lord upon non-performance of the ſervices by the immediate tenant in capite, let the tenement be in whoſe demeſne it might, and after how many ſoever infeodations. The temporalities of the ſee of Canterbury, like the lands of other great lords of the realm, who held lands and tenements of the king in capite, by reaſon of which they were his vaſſals, were of both ſorts, that is to ſay, ſome of them were in his own demeſne, and others were in his ſervice. Of the latter ſort, as many knights fees were held of his ſee, as made together fourſcore knights fees. Although the yearly revenue of the primacy was much injured by this profuſe alienation of its demeſne; yet the ſplendour of it was much increaſed, by the augmentation of its liſt of vaſſals, compoſed of eſquires, knights, vavaſors, barons, and earls.

Being thus exalted to the primacy, Becket became anxious to acquire that tranſcendent piety which, he thought, the firſt dignitary of the Britiſh church ought to have. He had ſhining examples of that ſort in his own predeceſſors, Lanfranc and Anſelm. And, perhaps, his contemporary St. Bernard, who had captivated, and, as it were, governed all Europe by his glowing zeal for religion, might help to make him enamoured of the character of a ſaint. That age is diſtinguiſhed by two very oppoſite features, religion and war. The lords of caſtles adjoining to each other revenged their own injuries reſpectively, by collecting their tenants and retainers, and marching in a tumultuous manner into each other's manors, and plundering their peaſants, burning their houſes, and carrying off both dead and live ſtock. For want of a good police, and the regular and pure adminiſtration of juſtice, perſons of great rank and property were concerned in theſe barbarous outrages. The familiar recourſe to arms rendered the manners of the people ferocious, and their poverty made them rapacious: and ſuch was the general ignorance, that very few people could write or read; printing not yet invented; the uſe of paper unknown; writing but little practiſed; and all the king's miniſters and juſtices, Normans, equally unapt both in the language and law of England. As to writing, it was all upon parchment or vellum. The language of the native Engliſh conſiſted of as many Anglo-Saxon dialects as there had been formerly kingdoms, and theſe different idioms were all equally deſtitute of grammatical preciſion. The language was ſtill more barbarous than the people. Latin was the general language of the learned clergy, who through that medium communicated very readily with thoſe of their own order in the neigbouring kingdoms, particularly with the court of Rome, the emporium of religion and politics. But, notwithſtanding the rough and barbarous genius of the age, a ſpirit of devotion mixed with the fermenting maſs of ignorance and ferocity; and from this heterogeneous mixture, were generated men, who were as eager to devote themſelves to religion, as others were to feats of arms. To this diſpoſition we owe the erection of our wonderful and magnificent cathedrals. While the abbeys ſtood, their lofty ſteeples and vaſt ranges of building demonſtrated the religious zeal of the æra which gave them being, and were hardly leſs attractive, and much more numerous, than the former. Religious foundations were ſo abundant in this age, that hardly any great perſon failed to be either a founder or benefactor of one or more of them. And Chriſtian perfection was founded upon ſuch acts and habits of mortification and ſelf-renunciation, as would in this age be thought down-right lunacy; and the votaries of ſuch zeal were ſtimulated to ſuch aſpirations by the memoirs of the Romiſh ſaints, which then made no ſmall part of the ſtudy of the devout.

Becket, as ſoon as he was archbiſhop, allotted a great part of his time to meditation. He rallied his ſcattered devotion, he invigorated his broken piety. He determined to do every thing honourably, elegantly, properly, and wiſely; but above all religiouſly. He referred every thing to the ſtandards of Scripture, the Fathers, and the Canon-law. He propoſed to have the perfect command of himſelf, and not to conſider what was popular or convenient, but what was right. He appointed for himſelf certain perſons to be his maſters in the art of holy living; to whom he accounted regularly for all his actions, and to whom he gave full power to correct every thing that was amiſs in his conduct. He reſolved to intrench himſelf in fortitude, and permit no ſort of trouble to undermine his virtue. He cheriſhed the idea, that he was born, not for himſelf, but for all who needed his help, particularly for the church, of which he was now become a chief, but, as he was wont to ſay of himſelf, an unworthy, governor. While he lived, he reſolved to exerciſe himſelf conſtantly in prayer and meditation, and to imitate Jeſus Chriſt, eſpecially in patience; to obey his commands, and love him truly; to ſeek his own ſalvation, and that of thoſe who were committed to his care. While he was the king's chancellor, the poor and outcaſt had conſtantly experienced his charity. Now he would ſearch after the wretched, and anticipate their applications, and redouble his beneficence. To the poor he was the miniſter, the father, and the friend: he waſhed their feet, he relieved their wants; and againſt the oppreſſions of the great he was their tower of ſtrength. Very ſoon after Becket's promotion, the diſagreement commenced between him and king Henry. While the former held the ſeal, and was the king's chief miniſter, every thing proſpered with that monarch; his glory was great abroad, and his popularity univerſal at home. No wonder that Henry wiſhed to retain him at the head of affairs; but the archbiſhop would ſurrender the king's ſeal. The king uſed all his intereſt and authority to prevail with him to retain it, but in vain. Becket urged his want of leiſure to do the buſineſs of chancellor, and its incompatibility with the primacy. The king became diſpleaſed; and beginning to entertain prejudices againſt him, the flatterers about him cheriſhed and fomented theſe prejudices, till the king conceived the moſt furious hatred againſt him. In this conteſt the archbiſhop not only incurred the wrath of the king, and ſeveral of his nobles, but the diſpleaſure alſo of certain biſhops and other eccleſiaſtics, of whom the former apprehended the confiſcation of their temporalities, if the king ſhould be angry with them; and the latter, who were in the royal ſuite, the benefices which they had irregularly acquired.

From his early youth Thomas had ſeen with deep concern the eſtates of the church torn from it by rapacious laymen, and its cleareſt rights moſt wickedly trampled upon; and had reſolved to repair the wrongs it had ſuſtained, if it ever ſhould be in his power. And here it cannot but ſeem ſurpriſing, that the king, who muſt know Becket's diſpoſition better than any other man (and this prelate was never accuſed of diſſimulation), ſhould be ſolicitous to place him in a ſituation ſo dangerous to his own tranquillity; and that the other ſhould conſent to an advancement, wherein, according to the rule of conduct he had reſolved to purſue, he might be morally ſure (for certainly no one knew the king better than he did) of being treated as he was.

The occaſional lapſe of the temporalities of the ſee of Canterbury into the hands of the king, whoſe fief it was, afforded good opportunity, and became a ſtrong temptation for embezzling certain portions thereof[1]. This had happened in the early part of the reign of William I. before the promotion of Lanfranc. On that memorable occaſion, king William allowed and encouraged the archbiſhop to bring his claims to a fair and ſolemn iſſue of law in the county court; and confirmed the judgement of the whole county of Kent, which had been given in favour of the archbiſhop, by himſelf and the common council of the realm. A ſimilar peculation had happened during the avoidance of the ſee by the death of Lanfranc. Anſelm ſucceeded, and immediately inſtituted proceſſes againſt the intruders, and recovered his lands and tenements. To embezzle the archiepiſcopal lands, or impair any of its rights, was both illegal and ſacrilegious, and expreſſly contrary to the oath which Henry had taken at his inauguration. And it was among the canons of the church, that although a dignitary thereof might improve, he could not impair, the rights of his church, and that no lapſe of time operated againſt its claim. Becket found many of the demeſne manors occupied by thoſe who had no colour of lawful poſſeſſion to them; and many tenements, held in capite of his ſee, torn from his ſervice[2]. Having previouſly obtained the king's licence to reſtore to his ſee both what his predeceſſors had illegally alienated, and what laymen had uſurped, he was minded to ſuperſede theſe depredations, let who would take offence at his ſo doing. He demanded therefore of the king himſelf the wardenſhip of the caſtle of Rocheſter, which king Henry I. had given and confirmed to archbiſhop William, who had built the fine tower thereof. Saltwode likewiſe and Hethe he required, which ought to return, he ſaid, into the demeſne of his church[3]. Demand was likewiſe made reſpecting other lands. Juſtifiable and commendable as was the archbiſhop for his active endeavours to prevent his church from being deſpoiled of its towns and caſtles, and tenements; yet his exertions, although they were not attended with any want of reſpect for the king, or with any malice to the perſons of the unlawful occupants, were conſtrued by the king as ſo many offences againſt his crown and perſon; nor was he content with continuing to hold the ſpoils of the church, but he would add to his injuſtice the crime of ruining the archbiſhop for daring to aſk, in regular courſe of law, for the property of which he was the right owner and guardian. We hear no more of this diſpute about the archiepiſcopal lands; excepting that, ſeveral years afterwards, Becket renewed his application for them in the treaty, which was then on foot, to bring about a reconciliation between the king and him.

The king conceived diſpleaſure, that a perſon, whom he had firſt made his chancellor, and afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſhould leave his ſervice, and in many other things thwart his wiſhes. Having conceived this prejudice againſt the primate, he eaſily yielded to the inſinuations of certain perſons of the clerical order who were about him, and apprehended, that from the ſtrictneſs of the archbiſhop they ſhould loſe the benefices they had unjuſtly acquired, and be defeated in their views of higher promotion; they therefore fomented the king's ill-humour, both by their own influence and through certain biſhops who were equally adverſe, from pique and envy, to the perſon of Becket. There was nothing at which the king took ſuch quick and violent alarm as the leaſt ſuſpicion of an encroachment upon his power and prerogative. He had been long jealous of the eccleſiaſtical order which, by drawing ſuch great quantities of buſineſs into their courts, ſeemed to abridge his civil authority, and, by making great profits of the cauſes brought to their tribunals, committed injury, as he ſuppoſed, to his revenue. He wanted to ſubject the Church as much to his power as the State was, and became incenſed to a degree of fury at the proſpect of oppoſition and diſappointment in objects ſo connected with his haughtineſs and avarice; both which vices were predominant parts of his character. The firmneſs of Becket galled him to the quick; and his ſpreading fame and unparalleled popularity afforded his detractors, who were about the king, a ſort of colour for infuſing into the royal ear, that if the power of the archbiſhop was not checked, there would be an end of the royal dignity, and if he did not guard againſt it by wiſe foreſight, ſuch perſon would be king[4] as the clergy ſhould elect, and that Henry would hold his crown at the pleaſure of the archbiſhop.

In the commencement of the breach between theſe two great perſons, the primate found himſelf deprived of the counſel and ſupport of many of the biſhops, who, for fear of loſing their temporalities and all their worldly comforts, if they ſhould offend the king, were diſpoſed to yield to him in all things. New cauſes operated to ſet the parties ſtill more at variance, and reinforce the king with an acceſſion of lay-partizans. Becket was minded to reſtore to his ſee the ſovereignty of the fair honor of Tunbridge, comprehending the caſtle, town, and bailiwic of that place, which had been ſome time back made a fief of the crown, although it was indiſputably a tenement of the ſee of Canterbury, being held of it by the ſervice of ſerjeantry; the lord of Tunbridge being the archbiſhop's high ſteward de feodo. On the 22d of July, 1163, the archbiſhop cited Roger earl of Clare, the lord of the honor of Tunbridge, to do his homage for this honor and its appurtenances, in the king's court at Weſtminſter[5]. This earl was connected by blood with the moſt potent families of the realm, and was a nobleman exceedingly rich and powerful, and in this buſineſs ſupported with the whole weight of the king, who for ſome time had affected the earl's ſiſter, reckoned the handſomeſt woman in England, to have her for his miſtreſs. The earl vehemently oppoſed the primate's claim, making anſwer, that the fief of Tunbridge, in military ſervice, and the payment of all public aids, acknowledged for its lord, not the archbiſhop, but the king[1]. The king directed the earl to act as he did[2].

---

[1] Chron. Sax. & Regiſtrum Roffenſe.

[2] Inquiſitio generalis facta eſt per Angliam, cui quis in ſervitio ſeculari eſſet de jure obnoxius. Inventum eſt autem in Cantiâ, procurantibus juſticiariis, quod Willelmus de Ros, in munere quolibet ſubeundo, regem deberet agnoſcere, non archiepiſcopum; ſic odium perſonæ redundavit in damnum eccleſiæ. Diceto in X Ser. p. 556, anno 1163 See this confirmed by Liber Niger apud Hearne.

[3] Gervas.

[4] The reader is deſired to attend to this circumſtance, which accounts for this king's precipitance in getting his ſon Henry crowned, and his ſubtle management in excluding Becket from any ſhare in that buſineſs; which went nearer to the primate's heart than all that Henry had done to provoke him to that period. The primate, ſaint as he wiſhed to be, did not overcome the reſentment of a man, in taking vengeance on the archbiſhop of York, who had been the king's tool in that affair, and was uniformly the primate's moſt malicious adverſary.

[5] Diceto, Stephanides.

Inquiſition was made throughout England, in the year 1163, whom every one, who was the vaſſal of any lord, was to render de jure ſecular ſervice to, for the ſame. The king's juſticiars, who had the charge of this buſineſs in Kent, procured a verdict to be returned, that William de Ros, in ſuſtaining every public burden to which he was liable for his fief, containing the fees of ſeven knights, ought to acknowledge the king, and not the archbiſhop, as his chief lord. Thus, ſays the hiſtorian, perſonal hatred redounded to the damage of the church[3].

It was then the right of the ſee of Canterbury to diſpoſe of the vacant churches of its vaſſals, as well as of thoſe of the monks of Canterbury, in their demeſne towns. Accordingly the archbiſhop, who claimed the patronage of the church of Ainsford in Kent, preſented thereto his clerk, whoſe name was Lawrence: William lord of the town drove him out; claiming, we may ſuppoſe, the right of advowſon, as appendant to his ſeignory. For this violence offered to his clerk, the archbiſhop excommunicated William. The latter was either a tenant in capite of the king, by reaſon of ſome fief, or one of the king's demeſne, that is, immediate and proper officers. This act of the archbiſhop, therefore, brought upon him the king's moſt violent indignation; it having been done without his privity. For it was an aſſertion of the king, that it was a part of the royal prerogative, that none of his chief thanes, no perſon in any office under him, none, in ſhort, holding of him in capite, caſtle, town, or free tenement, ſhould be excommunicated without his knowledge; leſt, as it was alledged, the king, by not having been certified of it, might hold communion, from ignorance, with the excommunicated, by admitting him to his preſence, or taking him into his council, or kiſſing him. The archbiſhop, however, relented ſo far as to take off the ſentence; but the king would not allow this to be any favour done to him, as the archbiſhop ſeemed to yield, not ſo much to gratify the king, as to comply with the remonſtrances that were made by others on the ſubject[4].

In the ſummer of the year 1163, pope Alexander III. held a general council at Tours in Gaul, at which our archbiſhop Thomas and ſome other Engliſh biſhops aſſiſted. Soon after their return, began the conteſt about the antient cuſtoms of the realm, which produced the final breach between the king and primate[5].

The king, in a council held at Weſtminſter, began to propoſe many things, which bore hard upon the privileges of the ſacred order[6], and were repugnant to the whole tenor of the canon law; which, it was at that time univerſally allowed, bound the clergy in preference to the municipal law of any particular country whatſoever.

The king, not knowing how to diminiſh the rights of his clergy, ſtanding on the ground of the canon law, to which other Chriſtian kings ſubmitted, without obtaining ſomething like their own conſent for the alteration he was meditating, convened the biſhops at Weſtminſter. In the firſt place, he complained of the violence of archdeacons, for making a gain, as he called it, of public crimes, and alledged the enormous ſums they made by this ſpecies of traffic, and inſiſted upon a correction of this evil; then, ſuddenly digreſſing from this topic, "My thoughts, ſaid he, are ſtrongly bent upon the eſtabliſhing of public peace and order, which are much obſtructed in my realm by the iniquity of certain clerks, who commit robberies, and thefts, and murders, without receiving condign puniſhment for the ſame. I therefore do will and require, that, with your conſent, my lord of Canterbury, and that of your co-biſhops, ſuch clerks as are caught in felonies, and perſons convict, or confeſſing, be immediately deprived of their orders, and afterwards delivered over to my officers of juſtice, that, being rendered deſtitute of the protection of the church, they may be capitally executed. I will, alſo, and require, that, in the act of deprivation, ye do conſent to allow the preſence of my officers, that after deprivation they may ſeize the deprived perſon, and thereby put it out of his power to make his eſcape." The archbiſhop requeſted that he might be permitted to think of this affair till the morrow, when he promiſed to give an anſwer to it. The king gave an abſolute denial to his requeſt. The archbiſhop, therefore, took the biſhops apart, to know their ſentiments, and think of the anſwer they were to give. Much was ſaid in this private conference, and the matter was agitated with diverſity of opinion. Some of the biſhops ſaid, that, according to the ſecular law, clerks deprived ought to be ſurrendered to the ſecular court, and after ſpiritual correction be puniſhed in their bodies; becauſe, that the higher they ſtood on account of privilege, by ſo much were they rendered worſe in the eye of the law by guilt. It is no marvel, therefore, ſay they, if the puniſhment of body follow the commiſſion of crime. And this they prove, not only by the laws themſelves, but alſo by the very letter of Scripture; inſtancing the caſe of the Levites, who, upon being found guilty and receiving prohibition, were put to death or diſmemberment. But the lord of Canterbury, adhering cloſely to the ſacred canons, maintained on the contrary, "that it was altogether unjuſt, and contrary both to the canons and to God, that any man ſhould, for the puniſhment of one crime, undergo two diſtinct judgements. For God, ſays he, puniſhes one crime by one judgement only. The judgement pronounced by the church, you will allow to be either juſt or unjuſt. You will not ſay it is unjuſt, therefore it muſt be juſt. As ſuch judgement contains no abſolution, it contains condemnation. If therefore the criminal is condemned, when he is deprived, there ought not to commence another judgement for condemnation of one and the ſame crime. Moreover, he added, it behoves us at this time to be particularly watchful of the liberty of the church, and not ſuffer it to be oppreſſed and deſtroyed with our conſent. For which liberty, after the example of our HIGH PRIEST, we are bound by our office to contend even unto death. But this has not yet been the caſe of any of you." To this the biſhops made anſwer, "that although the liberty of the church might periſh, yet the church itſelf might not; and in the preſent criſis it is better that the liberty of the church ſhould periſh, if that would ſave all of us from periſhing. Let us therefore comply with the king's commands; otherwiſe, there will be no place whereunto we can fly; there will not be found any who care for our lives. But if we do as the king commands us, we poſſeſs hereditably the ſanctuary of God, and ſhall ſleep ſecure in the poſſeſſions of our churches; and much is to be allowed to the malice of the preſent time." This was thrown out, becauſe of the ſchiſm which then was in the Roman church[7].

---

[1] So the hiſtorians: let the writer of the preſent memoir add, that this honor was unqueſtionably a fief of the archiepiſcopal ſee. See Lambarde's Perambulation of Kent, Matth. Paris, &c. I know no difference, in point of ſolid advantage, between holding in capite of the king, and of the archbiſhop; but I conjecture that the earl diſdained to do homage to any one except the king. In the feudal age, the homage was a mortifying ceremony.

[2] Matth. Paris.

[3] See note 2, p. 37. The king was then aſſeſſing the aid due to him from his tenants in capite by barony or knight ſervice, for the marriage of his daughter. The barony of Ros, if held of the king in capite, paid eſcuage immediately to the king; if of the ſee of Canterbury, to the archbiſhop, who accounted to the king for the eſcuage.

[4] Stephanides.

[5] Gul. Neubr. & alii.

[6] Gervas. Matth. Paris, & alii.

[7] This ſuggeſtion reſulted from an apprehenſion, that if Henry was thwarted in his ſcheme, and ſhould find pope Alexander III. adverſe to his views, he would renounce that pontiff, and make the antipope pope for the Engliſh nation. It was inſinuated that ſuch a thing was not unlikely, and that, ſhould it take place, it muſt be attended with the ruin of the Catholic church. Our author (Stephanides) alludes to ſuch a contingency by what he calls the malice of the time, but he does not approve of their excuſes; obſerving, that ſufficient unto the day was the evil thereof; and that the biſhops ought not, by their own wickedneſs, to ſwell the account.

The archbiſhop, inflamed with zeal for the houſe of God, rejoined, " I ſee you want to excuſe your ſloth, under the ſhew of forbearance; and under pretence of not being called upon to a vigorous exertion in her defence, ye can tamely ſee the liberty of the ſpouſe of Chriſt utterly extinguiſhed. And who has bewitched you, ye fooliſh prelates? Why do ye cloath your manifeſt unrighteouſneſs in the convenient garb of diſpenſation? Why do ye call that by the name of diſpenſation [1], which is nothing leſs than the diſpence of the whole church? Let words ſubmit to things, and not with things names be perverted. Your obſervations on the iniquity of the preſent time is certainly juſt; I allow it; but this is no excuſe for the accumulation of ſin. God is powerful to meliorate the condition of his church, without your making yourſelves wicked. Is God ſo impotent, as that he cannot ſuccour his holy church, but with the help of the ſins of the doctors of the church? In truth, God is trying you. I aſk, when is it that biſhops ought to offer themſelves to danger? Is it in tranquil times, or in ſeaſons of tempeſt? Ye will be aſhamed to ſay, in times of tranquillity. It ſtands allowed then, that, when the church is in trouble, the paſtors of the church ſhould ſtand forth to protect it. For the biſhops of antient times founded the church of Chriſt in their blood; and with their blood the biſhops of this age are under no leſs obligation to ſupport it, if there be occaſion. And, therefore, I do affirm and bear witneſs, as before God, that it is not ſafe for us to recede from that holy inſtitute, which we have received by tranſmiſſion from our pious fathers. Nor does it become us to be in any wiſe aſſiſting in condemnations to death, ſince it is not allowed to us even to be preſent in judgements of blood."

" Theſe words were ſoon after carried to the king, who, if he ſaw too many churchmen ſtand againſt his aſſault, not like pillars, but reeds ſhaken with the wind, found alſo that all the biſhops were not likely to yield to his demands. And there is no queſtion but that too many would have given way, even before the king had threatened them ſeverely, if they had not been animated by the firmneſs of the archbiſhop. The king then, perceiving that in the point he wiſhed to carry he had been defeated, ſhifted about to other queſtions; and demanded whether they would keep his royal cuſtoms in all things. The archbiſhop, having conferred with his brethren, anſwered, " Yes, in all things, ſaving in all things, and through all things, our order." And when the king aſked afterwards, each biſhop by himſelf, the ſame queſtion, the ſame anſwer was given individually. But the king perſiſted in his queſtion, and demanded of the archbiſhop, whether he would ſimply, and without any ſaving whatever, promiſe to keep his royal cuſtoms. What theſe royal cuſtoms were, or were to be, nobody yet knew, for they had never been reduced to writing, nor were they now; but it was ſuſpected from the king's preſent temper, and the violent manner in which a compliance was urged, that they would be found to be very injurious to the church and the clergy. But with all that he could do, the king was not able to move the primate from his reſolution; which ſo exaſperated him, that he leapt up ſuddenly, and in dreadful fury went away [2], and immediately left London, without ſtaying to attend the buſineſs of his exchequer, or any other of his affairs. All the metropolis was in confuſion; a general panic ſeized both clergy and laity; the biſhops were confounded, and trembling followed the king in his retreat; apprehending, that before they could overtake him, they ſhould loſe all they had, whether in lands or chattels. They afterwards held a ſecret convention with him, whereby they engaged to comply implicitly with his requiſitions, all mention of God and their order being wholly omitted. And their aſſent was ſo quick, that they ſeemed to grant all that he ſhould aſk, without allowing him even time to aſk any thing. But not ſo the primate; he remained unmoved, although, whether he turned to the right or to the left, he found no friend. He ſought for comfort in his brethren; they were ſlid back, and no more walked with him. Seeing now, that peace was on the ſide of the wicked, and that danger beſet him on every ſide; " One thing, he ſaid, I have ſpoken, that I would not keep the royal cuſtoms of an earthly king, but with a ſaving of my order in all things; for this I have incurred the king's diſpleaſure; for this my biſhops have deſerted me; for this I have the eyes of all turned from me. But, let the world like it or not, God willing, I will never forget my God and my order. Far be it from me that, for fear or favour of any mortal, I ſhould be found to have deſpiſed God. If an angel from heaven ſhould come and give me ſuch advice, he ſhould be to me Anathema [3]."

" The king had aforetime conceived many things againſt the clergy in general, and now he was againſt Thomas perſonally; and his anger increaſing daily by the malevolent ſuggeſtions of perſons who had the king's ear, and were very inimical to the archbiſhop, he reſolved upon a ſolemn diſcuſſion of his royal prerogatives. A general council, therefore, was ſummoned, and appointed to meet at Clarendon on the 28th of January, in the year 1164. In this aſſembly the king propoſed the dignities and cuſtoms, which he called thoſe of his anceſtors, and ſaid ought to be in the realm of England. Robert, archdeacon of Oxford, who was afterwards made biſhop of Hereford, and Jordan, archdeacon of Chicheſter, domeſtic chaplains of the archbiſhop, and ſome others, having intelligence of the king's wrath againſt that prelate, and finding that it grew fiercer every day, had obtained his permiſſion to leave him, and were gone away. Moreover, the king had, in the early ſtage of his diſpleaſure, contrived to remove from the archbiſhop two eminent and worthy clerks, who had been nouriſhed and brought up by him; of whom one was the treaſurer of the church of York, and the other a canon of Sarum; both were called John. This was done by the king, to deprive the primate of their aſſiſtance and advice. One of them he got elected biſhop of Poitou, and the other he baniſhed out of England. Some time before, he had obtained the pope's aſſiſtance for tranſlating Gilbert Foliot, the biſhop of Hereford, to the ſee of London; intending to keep him near his own perſon, and make him archbiſhop of Canterbury, and his high juſtice [4]."

Theſe pretended cuſtoms of the realm, which Henry wanted (with the help of the biſhops, whoſe rights were peculiarly affected by this attempt, and without whoſe concurrence he could not ſucceed in it) to be ingrafted into the ſtatute-law, contained many heads. For inſtance, " That a clerk or clergyman, accuſed of theft or robbery, or any thing of the kind, ſhould be brought, in the firſt place, into the court of the king: That no earl or baron, or any official of the king, ſhould be excommunicated, for any crime whatſoever, without the king's privity: That no appeals ſhould be made to the lord pope, till after the ſuit was heard in the eccleſiaſtical tribunal, before the dean, the archdeacon, the biſhop, the archbiſhop, and at length the king's juſticiars: That biſhops ſhould not go over to the pope, nor other clerks, being called by him, or appealed, or appellant, but by licence of the king: That no controverſy, for the breach of faith, ſhould be in the eccleſiaſtical court, but only for oaths for marriages, or dower, or matters of this kind, which ought not to be done but in the face of the church: Alſo, that biſhops ſhould be preſent at all ſecular tryals of the lord king, excepting judgement for blood; and other articles of this ſort, which were plainly repugnant to the ſacred conſtitutions of the canons [1]."

---

[1] My author is cloſely tranſlated. By diſpenſation, the biſhops ſeem to mean that there was no neceſſity on the preſent occaſion to expoſe themſelves to ruin, which would be the conſequence of ſtanding out againſt the king; they deſire to have a diſpenſation from a thing ſo dangerous to their perſons. The archbiſhop puns upon the word, by ſaying, " that ſuch diſpenſatio, with reſpect to themſelves, would be diſpendium, or loſs to the church."

[2] " Oculi ejus orbiculati ſunt, dum pacati eſt animi, columbini & ſimplices; ſed in irâ & turbatione cordis, quaſi ſcintillantes ignem, & in impetu fulminantes. Leonina facies, homo amari animi," was his general character. Petr. Bleſenſis de Henrico II.

[3] Almoſt literally from Gervas and Stephanides.

[4] W. Neubr. Stephanides, Matth. Paris, & alii.

Theſe ſtatutes may be ſeen more at large in writers of the life of Thomas a Becket; they had never been put into writing, nor had they ever been the received cuſtoms of this realm. By being put into writing and enacted, they would be recognized and become eſtabliſhed; whereas, if they were left as they were, they might be conſidered as no conſuetudines at all, or at leaſt as malæ conſuetudines; which the king, by his coronation oath, was bound to do away. The king would make the primate acknowledge theſe conſuetudines as a part of the common law, or conſuetudines regni, and ſwear to the obſervance of them againſt his conviction, his conſcience, his oath of obedience to the Holy ſee, and to the ruin of his character and order. And he would make him ſwear to conſent to them before he had ſeen them reduced to writing. The king's mother, as well as others, exerted all their endeavours to perſuade Henry to deſiſt from an experiment of ſo dangerous and exceptionable a nature, but in vain. The canons of the church were then held in the ſame veneration as the ſcriptures themſelves; and the clergy conceiving, concerning the pope, that he was infallible, and ſupreme, could not but dread any innovations that might impair the liberty of the Catholic church, and ſubject them to the diſpleaſure of God, and cenſures of his holineſs. And this project came with a particular ill grace from a king of England, who, at his inauguration, had ſolemnly ſwore to ſupport the church's freedom, and to aboliſh all evil cuſtoms whatever; of which ſort certainly muſt be thoſe which militated againſt the church's dignity, and every part of her polity. Beſides, king Henry II. profeſſed himſelf a vaſſal, and his realm a fief of the Holy ſee. By an exquiſite fetch of art and treachery, the ſnare was ſo contrived, that, act as he would, Becket muſt be undone; for if he conſented to theſe traditions, called cuſtoms of the realm, he muſt be involved in the diſgrace and ſin of betraying the right of the church; and, if he did not, he was liable to the imputation of treaſon, and muſt expect to ſuffer accordingly. The deviſing of this dilemma was attributed to the ingenious malice of the biſhops of York, London, and Sarum. The queſtion was put, whether the prelate would allow and ratify the cuſtoms? which queſtion was followed by the aſſertion, which came from the king's party, that, if he refuſed to comply, he meant nothing leſs than a deſire to have the crown torn from the king's head. The archbiſhop, although other biſhops complied with the king's demand, reſiſted, and refuſed [2]. The king, in the mean time, gave the full reins to his wrath, and appeared like a downright madman, which ſtruck the biſhops with affright, even thoſe who, in their ſecret inclinations, were with the primate. They could think of nothing, if they did not comply, but the archbiſhop's ruin and their own. And, bad as they deemed the propoſitions, they flattered themſelves that, by humouring the king now before his lords, he might afterwards be perſuaded, by gentle remonſtrances, to qualify or reſcind them. And ſome, who had on former occaſions rendered themſelves obnoxious to the king, thinking that they ſhould now feel the effects of accumulated wrath, if the king was not ſoftened, addreſſed the archbiſhop to have compaſſion on them, and entreated him with tears and lamentations to relent, and prevent his own impriſonment, the extermination of the clergy, and their immediate condemnation to death. To their ſupplications were added thoſe of Robert earl of Leiceſter, and Reginald earl of Cornwall, both men celebrated for wiſdom, and the moſt powerful nobles of the realm; they repreſented to the archbiſhop, that, if he did not ſubmit himſelf to the king's requiſition, they ſhould be under the hard neceſſity, in obedience to the king's command, to commit ſuch a violence upon his perſon as would be an eternal ſtain both to the king's fame and their own. But neither threats nor blandiſhments did yet make any alteration in the primate; he continued unſhaken. Two Templars, gentlemen in great eſtimation with the king, and of his domeſtic military ſuite, and both eminent for wiſdom, approached the primate, and upon their knees, with tears and remonſtrances, beſought him to have ſome concern for himſelf and the clergy. They ſeemed to bewail him, as a perſon in whoſe bowels thoſe ſwords would be inſtantly plunged, which were brandiſhed about him, if he did not yield. For at this very time ſome of the king's ſatellites were running to and fro, brandiſhing their ſhining blades, and with their garments tucked up, as if ready to fall upon him. So much intreaty, and the fear of inſtant death, at length brought the primate to ſubmiſſion. He yielded to the royal command, and concurred with the archbiſhop of York, the biſhops, and clergy, and earls, and barons, and nobles of the realm, in ſwearing to receive the royal cuſtoms; whereupon they were ordered to be drawn out in form, and be teſted. This accordingly was done. But when the archbiſhop ſaw their contents, he declared his abhorrence of them, and refuſed, according to Gervas, his ſanction to them. The archbiſhop's name, however, appears in the liſt of teſtes; but whether of his inſerting, or with his conſent, does not appear. It is generally, however, affirmed, that the archbiſhop did ſign them, and ſwore to ſupport them "bonâ fide, abſque malo ingenio, & in verbo veritatis [3]." And this beſt agrees with his ſubſequent conduct. The name of Robert, earl of Leiceſter, appears firſt in the liſt of witneſſes to this famous conſtitution. One copy of it was committed to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, another to the archbiſhop of York, and a third was depoſited in the king's treaſury. As ſoon as the aſſembly was diſſolved, the primate departed from the court, and directed his way from Clarendon, one of the king's manors near Sarum, towards Winton; and withdrew from danger his own perſon, and thoſe biſhops for whoſe ſafety he was particularly anxious.

The king having thus carried his point, the civil power [4] lorded it with an high hand over the property and perſons of the clergy, trampled upon all the rights of the church, and uſurped upon them without mercy; the biſhops, ſo far from reſiſting, not daring to grumble at, or even ſpeak of, what was going on. The archbiſhop, therefore, returning into himſelf, was ſtruck with horror at his having been an inſtrument in theſe impious innovations; he took ſhame to himſelf, for conſenting to what his conſcience abhorred; he determined, by future firmneſs, to make atonement for his late puſillanimity; he afflicted his body by rigid faſtings, and vile cloathing, and every other mark of ſevere contrition; he ſuſpended himſelf from the ſervice of the altar, ſent a full confeſſion of his ſin to the Roman pontiff, and humbly craved of his holineſs to abſolve him from the ſinful oath he had taken, in aſſenting to the conſtitutions of Clarendon. His holineſs rebuked him for the exceſs of his ſcrupuloſity, but granted him, in full form, a complete abſolution for all that he had done; and, as ſoon as he received the tranſcripts of the conſtitutions which were ſent to him by king Henry for his confirmation, he ſtigmatized the greater part of them as preſumptuous and impious innovations, which attacked the very vitals of the Catholic faith [5].

---

[1] Stephanides. Nor were they for the greater part leſs repugnant to the ſtatute law; for William I. had by expreſs ſtatute ſeparated the civil and eccleſiaſtical juriſdictions, and ordered the firſt to act according to the cuſtom of the realm, and the latter according to the canon law, and that the ſwords of the church and ſtate ſhould yield reciprocal ſupport.

[2] Gervas. [3] See Brady's Hiſt. vol. I. in Appendix, N° 41. [4] Matth. Paris. [5] Stephanides, & alii Cronici.

The archbiſhop, thinking England no longer a fit place for him to reſide in, repaired to the ſea-ſide, and twice endeavoured to reach the continent; but was both times obliged to return to land, either for want of wind, or becauſe it was contrary. The king, hearing of his intended, but diſappointed, flight, became more inflamed than ever, from an idea that, if he got beyond ſea, he would blacken him to foreign princes, eſpecially to Lewis le Jeune, who had no reaſon to eſteem Henry, but admired Becket almoſt to adoration [1].

In addition to theſe cauſes of the king's diſpleaſure againſt Becket, we find yet another, which ought not to be ſuppreſſed, although modern hiſtorians have overlooked it. The reader will probably think my author too indulgent to prerogative; but let him have the fact as the hiſtorian himſelf recites it[2]: "Thomas vero regis offenſam & ægram mentem non amplius jam obſequio lenivit, ſed majori pertinaciâ irritavit. Nam cum rex vectigal quoddam a ſingulis terræ hydis ad regni defenſionem tunc pendi conſuetum in fiſcum quotannis ſuum deferri juſſerit, Thomas obſtitit, eamque penſionem arbitrariam, atque liberam cuique debere eſſe dixit, non a rege præſcriptam aut coactam."

This hidage was a tax of ſo much per hide, according to a ſuppoſed value of landed property, divided by hides. The allodial, or thane, lands had been ſubject to it before the Conqueſt, and the impoſition of it began with the Daniſh invaſions[3]. Many authors affirm, that it was altogether aboliſhed by Edward the Confeſſor; but we find it aſſeſſed, as it ſhould ſeem ex more, at the acceſſion of the Conqueror, who levied it once, in a great neceſſity, in the early part of his reign, and once again, two or three years before his deceaſe; that is, twice in twenty years. This prince concurred in a ſtatute, that hidage, or as they uſually ſtyled it Danegeld, ſhould not be impoſed annually, as it had been, but only now and then, when the nation was actually invaded, or in imminent danger of invaſion[4]. All our authors have told how grievouſly the Engliſh were oppreſſed by this unlawful tax, in the reign of William Rufus, and Henry Beauclerc. When the latter died, the hidage was become an ordinary annual aſſeſſment of two ſhillings per hide. Stephen undertook to remit it wholly, as a condition of his election; and after he was confirmed in the throne, by oath and ſolemn charter he pledged himſelf never to aſſeſs it. The hardſhip of it fell chiefly upon the provincials, i. e. country gentlemen who held their lands in thenage. Tenure by knight ſervice, the general tenure of the Anglo-normans, was wholly relieved of it by the ſtatutes of the Conqueror and Henry I.[5]

It muſt be allowed to be a noble inſtance of juſtice and patriotiſm, for an Engliſh archbiſhop to reſiſt an unlawful exaction, which time ſeemed to have ſanctified, and terror rendered perpetual. Becket maintained, that hydage could not be levied by prerogative; but that it muſt be, to be lawful, a free gift of the Thanes of England.

The whole Anglo-norman hiſtory does not furniſh us with another ſentiment ſo favourable to Engliſh liberty and a free conſtitution. The idea is an unique. Bleſſed be the memory of a patriot ſaint! No wonder he ſhould be hated by an unprincipled deſpot.

The king, now inflamed with ire againſt the primate, and determined upon his ruin, reſolved to impeach him in his Great Council, or parliament, upon divers accuſations. The parliament at Clarendon, which conſiſted of archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, priors, earls, barons, and nobles of the realm[6], had been appointed to aſſert certain prerogatives of the crown, and enforce them by ſtatute. The Great Council at Northampton was convened to enforce the conſtitutions of Clarendon, and take vengeance on the primate of England, who refuſed to obey them. The purpoſe of the king, in this impeachment, was to make the archbiſhop, by dint of terror, reſign his archbiſhoprick; or, if he could not do that, caſt him in ſuch heavy damages as a public defaulter, as muſt involve him in irretrievable ruin. The firſt and formal article of accuſation, was a contempt which aroſe, as near as I can make out, in the following manner. Belonging to the ſee of Canterbury was a certain manor which, as was ſaid, had been for ages paſt in the quiet and firm poſſeſſion of the ſee of Canterbury, and was parcel of the barony of Pagenham, of which the archbiſhop was chief lord under the king. John, the king's mareſchal, claimed this manor as belonging to him, and obtained a writ of right for trying his claim in the archbiſhop's court baron, which determined in favour of the archbiſhop. Whereupon, John moved the cauſe into the king's court, by a writ of falſe judgement, and obtained a citation for the archbiſhop's appearance. Being not then in a condition to attend, he ſent four of his principal gentlemen, with his own letters, and thoſe of the ſhire-reeve of Kent, both atteſting the archbiſhop's incapacity to obey the citation, on account of indiſpoſition. Complaint likewiſe was made of the irregularity of John, who, before he could obtain a valid citation for the archbiſhop's appearance, was bound in law to certify the act of falſe judgement, by his corporal oath, taken upon the Holy Evangeliſts, in the archbiſhop's court: whereas John had made his oath only upon a little book, conſiſting of a certain portion of the Pſalms [1]. The archbiſhop's plea, however, was over-ruled. And the archbiſhop was impeached by the king in the Great Council, for contempt, in not obeying the citation of the king's court. This was the expreſs article of impeachment, which was followed by other charges totally irrelevant to the principal matter.

---

[1] Stephanides, & alii Cronici. [2] Antiq. Eccl. Britannicæ. [3] Dial. de Scaccario. [4] Ib. [5] Leges Will. I. & Hen. I.

[6] So the claſſes, which compoſed the Great Council of Clarendon, are enumerated by Matthew Paris. And, I preſume, the ſame orders had place, according to the cuſtom of the realm, in all the general or common councils. There were then 2 Engliſh archbiſhops, and 15 ſuffragan Engliſh biſhops. But we find Welſh, Iriſh, and Norman biſhops admitted to theſe councils; it ſeeming a ſufficient qualification, that the members ſhould be the king's liege men, and of rank and fortune, or, which was ſometimes more needful, of wiſdom ſuitable to that dignity. The abbots who were ſummoned to the council were the heads of abbeys of royal foundation, conſequently, whoſe abbey lands were fiefs of the crown. Priors, who ſat in the council, were heads of ſmaller religious houſes, but, like the others, tenants in chief of the king. Deans, archdeacons, and ſome few other eccleſiaſtical dignitaries, are ſometimes found among the members of the council; all, I preſume, holding lands of the king in capite. But ſuch only of theſe latter orders ſeem to have been admitted as were in ſome high office under the crown. The archbiſhop of Canterbury had a right to be ſummoned ſpecially, and before all other perſons, to the council, being the ſecond perſon of the realm. The biſhops likewiſe were all liable to be ſummoned on account of their fiefs or baronies; but whether the king did not uſe a diſcretion in calling a part of them, and omitting ſuch as he diſliked, or thought he had no occaſion for, I will not determine. Their order, however, was eſſential in the acts of the great council. Earls were nobles of the higheſt degree next to the crown. Of theſe there were two ſorts; one, earls palatine, that is, whoſe earldoms were feudal principalities, within which the earls had their jura regalia, or rights within their earldoms, ſimilar to thoſe which the king had in his realm at large: and earls de tertio denario; the meaning of which was, that an earl, inſtead of being the alderman, or high juſtice, and governor of a county, as the Anglo-Saxon earls or ealdermen in general were, ſhould, in lieu of all ſuch authority, and the perquiſites and iſſues of the county, from fines, forfeitures, &c. be content with the third ſterling or penny only of the ſame. In mark, however, of his ancient dignity, he was ſolemnly begirted, at his creation, by the king with the ſword of the county of which he was earl. In the time we are writing of, there were about nine or ten earls who were made ſo, out of the moſt opulent, diſtinguiſhed, and favoured barons. The barons were of divers ſorts, viz. 1ſt, tenants of the king in capite, holding immediately, as of his crown and perſon, their fiefs or tenements. To attend the king in perſon, in his war, and in his council, were inſeparable parts of their ſervice for their fiefs. They were therefore ſummoned to perform either ſervice, by the king's ſpecial writ; but as the attendance upon the king in his parliament, or ſupreme court, was a ſervice of the vaſſal to his lord; it was, in the nature of the thing, at the lord's option to diſpenſe with, or demand, it. The king found it moſt convenient to ſummon but few of them. The earls, however, ſeem to have been all ſummoned. There were, according to the beſt opinion I can form of their number, about one hundred and thirty of theſe major barons, at the time which concerns our preſent enquiry. In a ſtrict feudal view, they were the king's vaſſals, or homines; in a national one, the princes or chief nobility of the realm. The ſeat of a barony was uſually a caſtle, with a privileged territory appending, and a certain juriſdiction within and without it. The next order of parliamentary barons, uſually occurring after barones, under the term proceres, nobiles, optimates, &c. were what we may call quaſi barones, or barones ſecundæ dignitatis, conſiſting of certain perſons whom the king ordered to be members of his Great Council pro hac vice, on account of their ſuppoſed ſuperior knowledge in the law of England, or for other cauſes, at the king's diſcretion. William I. admitted certain perſons of this deſcription to be a part of his Great Council; and we find Henry II. do the ſame in his parliament at Clarendon, and, I gueſs, at Northampton alſo. This part of the prerogative royal was grounded on this reaſon, That the king ought to have what aſſiſtance he judged neceſſary, in making of laws, conſulting upon public affairs, and adminiſtering juſtice. See the plea of the abbot of St. Andrew's, in Selden's Titles of Honour. But theſe temporary and inferior barons had no hereditary right to a ſeat in the king's parliaments. That has ariſen entirely from creation-patents. There were other ſorts of barons; the king's juſtices of Exchequer, his chief juſtices in Eyre, members of his ordinary, or, what we call, his privy council, and nobles of his ſuite; although neither feudal, parliamentary, nor judicial barons, they obtained, by a ſort of courteſy, the name of barons; which, among the vulgar, went generally for a great man. With the reader's permiſſion, I will add a word upon the parliamentary nobles, called barones ſecundæ dignitatis. Stephanides, who attended his lord the archbiſhop in this hot perſecution, having ſaid, that the king exacted of his earls and barons judgement upon the archbiſhop, he adds, "Evocantur quidam vicecomites, & ſecundæ dignitatis barones, antiqui dierum, ut addantur eis, & aſſint judicio." Evocare is the uſual term for a ſummons by writ. Another coeval and very reſpectable author, in his tranſcript of the Statutes of Clarendon, recites the very preamble of the ſame; "Tracta eſt iſta recognitio coram archiepiſcopis, & epiſcopis, & clero, & comitibus, & baronibus, & proceribus regni; et eaſdem conſuetudines recognitas per archiepiſcopos, & epiſcopos, & comites, & barones, & per nobiliores, & antiquiores regni." Hence it appears that, on the Purſuant to the king's writ of ſummons, the Great Council met at the city of Northampton, on the 13th of October, 1164. "We came (ſays my author [2], who accompanied the archbiſhop) to Northampton. The archbiſhop did not ſee the king that day; for the king had amuſed himſelf with hawking as he travelled along the ſides of the ſtreams, and arrived late at Northampton. The next morning, after maſs, and the horæ, the archbiſhop went to court, at the king's caſtle. Having entered the firſt apartment, he ſat down, waiting the king's coming, who was then at maſs. On the king's coming, he aroſe from his ſeat, and, with a ſteady and placid countenance, preſented himſelf to him, as if ready to receive, according to the Engliſh cuſtom, the king's ſalute, if he ſhould offer it; but that mark of reſpect was not offered him. The archbiſhop began the converſation by complaining of William de Curcy, one of the barons of the realm, who had taken poſſeſſion of one of the hotels which belonged to the archbiſhop [3]. The latter deſired of the king, that he would order it to be evacuated; the order was given. The ſecond topic of diſcourſe was the archbiſhop's telling the king, that he was come thither at the king's ſummons, on account of a plaint brought againſt him by John, the king's mareſchal. To which the king replied, that John the mareſchal was in his ſervice at London, but that he would be with them the next day, when he would take cognizance of the ſuit between them. Nothing more was done that day; and the king told the archbiſhop, that he ſhould go to his hotel, and on the next day come and attend his cauſe. The archbiſhop accordingly came the next day, being the ſecond of the council; all the biſhops (except the biſhop of Rocheſter, and one more), earls, and barons of England, and many of Normandy, were preſent. The archbiſhop is impeached of leſe-majeſty of the crown of England; becauſe, as is above warranted, having been cited by the king for the cauſe of John, he had neither come, nor ſufficiently excuſed himſelf. The archbiſhop's defence was quite diſregarded, who alledged the injury done him by John, and the right of his court to take cognizance of the preſent queſtion, and the integrity of its conduct. The king exacted judgement, and the archbiſhop's excuſe was rejected. It was the general opinion, that from reverence of majeſty, and by the tie of liege homage which the archbiſhop had done to the king, and from the obligation of allegiance, and regard to the king's worldly honour, to which he had been ſworn, that he ſtood unexcuſed and unjuſtified; inaſmuch as, having been cited by the king, he had neither come, nor alledged, by his meſſengers, for his default, infirmity of body, or any eccleſiaſtical avocation, by which his appearance had been obſtructed. And they declared, that he ought to be condemned to the penalty of all his moveable goods, and be in the king's mercy. There was a difference of opinion between the biſhops and barons about the pronouncing of judgement, each party wanting to ſhift it to the other, and excuſe itſelf. The barons ſay, "Ye biſhops ought to pronounce ſentence; this does not belong to us: we are laymen; ye are eccleſiaſticks, as he is, his co-prieſts, and co-biſhops." One of the biſhops made anſwer, "Nay, but this affair is your province, not ours; for this is not an eccleſiaſtical judgement, but a ſecular one. We ſit here, not as biſhops, but as barons; we barons, and ye barons, are here in our judicial characters, upon one and the ſame footing [4]. But in vain do ye urge the argument of our order; for, if ye alledge our ordination, ye ought to allow the ſame with reſpect to him. And if our ordination be of any weight in the preſent affair, it makes againſt your ſuppoſition; for, if we be conſidered in the character of biſhops, we cannot judge our archbiſhop, and our lord." The king, upon being informed of this debate, was moved thereat, ſpur of the preſent occaſion, barons of an inferior order were called in, and acted as members of this council; that, however, they were nobiliores regni, and conſiſted of ſhire-reeves, and antiqui dierum. At that time ſome ſhire-reeves held their office in fee, and were beſides the king's tenants in capite on account of their fiefs. Such ſhire-reeves, I ſuppoſe, were meant, by the vicecomites frequently occurring as a claſs of baronial and parliamentary perſonages, and commonly ſtyled viſcounts. But the ſpirit of the paſſage before us, and the junction of vicecomites and antiqui dierum, lead us to underſtand, by theſe terms, perſons converſant in, and well informed of, the conſtitutional prerogatives of the crown of England; that is, Engliſh ſhire-reeves, who were the juſticiars of their ſeveral ſhires, where at that time the municipal law was cloſely followed. Such men as thoſe muſt be well verſed by their conſtant judicial practice in the cuſtoms of the realm. I fear theſe inferior auxiliaries to the common council were neither ſummoned for a good purpoſe, nor did any great honour to themſelves or their appointer; for it ſeems as if to them another author (Gervas) glances in the following paſſage, which reports their conduct in the buſineſs of the Statutes of Clarendon. The king having bullied his lords into a compliance with all his demands, and, "ſciens quod qui major ætate, major eſt & in iniquitate; ite ait, ætate & ſapientia provectiores, & avi mei conſuetudines diſquirite; ut in ſcriptum redactæ deducantur in medium, & publicè recenſeantur. Qui cum ſeorſum veteres actus & pravitates revoluiſſent, hæc tandem ſcripta modo chirographi protulerunt." Then follow the Statutes. From the whole, it ſeems that the king, by partial ſummonſes, made the common council of the realm, which conſtitutionally was his ſuperior, and without which he could do nothing, as it were, but matters of courſe in the routine of executive adminiſtration, the creature of his tyranny and deſpotiſm; and that, having called together, in any place that he pleaſed, a packed aſſembly ſuitable to his purpoſe, by threats or blandiſhment, he eaſily made them execute his orders, and then diſmiſſed them. Let the reader know, that the great officers of the crown, and alſo the barons of the realm (I believe all of that denomination who held fiefs immediately of the king in capite), as well as moſt of the biſhops, and upper gentry, were Normans, or Frenchmen, who neither talked Engliſh, nor tranſacted buſineſs in that language. Mutatis mutandis, the ſame may be ſaid of the king. Let the reader alſo know, that the king's court, conſiſting of the three branches, his council, coram rege, and common pleas, were equally under his own eye, and obnoxious to his own abſolute authority. As to the houſe of commons, no ſuch thing exiſted.

---

[1] See Carte and Lyttelton.

[2] Stephanides.

[3] Liber Niger, Steph.

[4] Pares ſumus. Moſt people would conſtrue this, we are alike peers.

and it ſoon ceaſed. Henry de Blois, the old biſhop of Winton, brother of the late king Stephen, very unwillingly, but in obedience to command, at length delivered the ſentence. And the archbiſhop, becauſe it was not lawful to contradict the ſentence and recordation of the court of the king of England, ſubmitted, by the advice of the biſhops; and, according to cuſtom upon ſuch occaſions, acceded to the judgement, and, to mitigate and honour the king, yielded himſelf entirely to his mercy. And all the biſhops, except Gilbert, biſhop of London, became the archbiſhop's ſureties with the king. Gilbert was requeſted to follow their example, but could not be prevailed with; his ſingularity was much noticed. Afterwards, but on the ſame day, the archbiſhop was called upon for three hundred pounds, which he had received, and for which he was reſponſible to the king, as conſtable of the caſtle of Eye and Berkham. The archbiſhop repreſented, that he was not at this time legally accountable with reſpect to that affair, having not been cited upon it; but, litigation apart, he alledged that he had employed that ſum, and a much larger, in repairing the king's palace at London, and the caſtles of thoſe places. The king would not allow that theſe expences had been made by his order; and again demanded judgement. The archbiſhop, in deference to the king, ſubmitted to his demand, being unwilling that the ſubject of money ſhould create any diſpute between them; and having ſettled the matter privately with his vaſſals, the earl of Glouceſter, and William de Einuf, and another perſon, he made them his ſureties for the money. The next day the archbiſhop was required by the king's agents to anſwer to the king for a loan of five hundred marcs, advanced during the expedition of Tolouſe, and alſo for five hundred other marcs, for which the king was pledged to a certain Jew. He was likewiſe called upon to account for the ſums he had received in truſt, from the archiepiſcopal and other ſees, and abbeys, during their avoidance, while he was chancellor, and aſked how much he had paid of theſe debts of the king into his Exchequer. He replied, that he had received no citation to anſwer to thoſe matters, and that he was not prepared for it; but that, if he ought to be arraigned about them, he would do his lord the king right concerning them in due time and place. The king demanded of him to give him good ſecurity for his ſo doing. The archbiſhop ſaid, that it behoved him to take the advice of his ſuffragans and clergy in this behalf. The king oppoſed it. The archbiſhop retired; and from that day forward neither the barons nor knights went to his hotel to ſee him, underſtanding the king's diſpoſition towards him [1].”

“On the fourth day of the General Council, all the dignified eccleſiaſtics came to the hotel of the archbiſhop. With the biſhops ſeparately, and the abbots ſeparately, he held a conſultation upon the ſtate of affairs, and craved their advice. By the counſel of the noble Henry biſhop of Winton, who ordained him, and was his warm friend upon all occaſions, it was propoſed to make tryal, whether they could ſoothe the king by a gift of money; and two thouſand marcs were offered the archbiſhop, by the biſhop of Winton, for that purpoſe. The king refuſed it. There was ſome of the clergy who told the archbiſhop, that it was a debt he owed to the office he had undertaken, to look to his perſon and his dignity; that he ſhould honour the king, ſaving his reverence for God and the holy church; that he need fear no ill, when nothing criminal, nothing baſe, was laid to his charge. He had been returned to the church of Canterbury, diſcharged from the chancellorſhip, and every ſecular concern of the king; and this was no more than was done when any vacant abbey was filled up by a monk of another abbey; the abbey to which he was appointed would not receive the elect, unleſs his abbot declared him free from all obedience to him. Others, who were for yielding to the king in all things, held a different opinion. The king, ſay they, is exceedingly hoſtile to the archbiſhop, through his anger towards him. We do really collect from certain ſigns, that the mind of the king is, that the lord archbiſhop ſhould ſubmit himſelf in all things to the king, even ſo far as to reſign the archbiſhoprick. Hilary, biſhop of Chicheſter, whoſe inclinations were ſtrongly towards the king, ſaid plainly, “I wiſh you could be plain Thomas, and not archbiſhop.” And he made objections to the mode of his getting the archbiſhoprick, obſerving its defect, from the king's having ſignified his will and pleaſure in favour of Thomas before his election. This inſidious reaſoning did not impoſe upon the archbiſhop, who mentioned it ſome time afterwards to a friend, and ſaid, “That Hilary among his brethren was another Judas.” Hilary ſaid further, “From your long intimacy with the king, you know him better than we do. When you was his chancellor, you ſerved him nobly, both in peace and war, and was admired and commended by all men, except the envious; theſe now inflame the king againſt you. Who could undertake to be ſurety for you in an account with the king ſo great, and beyond calculation? It is reported, that the king has ſaid, that he and you ſhall never again be both in England at the ſame time [2]. It is better for you to throw yourſelf entirely upon his mercy; leſt, mayhap, as you have been his chancellor and accomptant, he may order you to reckon with him for his money, and condemn you for peculation, and hold you for his debtor for want of ſureties, and lay his hands upon your perſon, which would be a grief to the church, and a ſtain to the realm of England.” Some one replied, “Far be it from the archbiſhop to provide for his ſafety by ſuch an expedient as the reſignation of his ſee, whereby he would bring diſhonour on his church of Canterbury, which made choice of him for their paſtor. None of his predeceſſors in that ſee ever did a thing of this ſort; and yet ſome ſuffered perſecution in their days. Beſides, were the king to exact heavy fines, the ſee of Canterbury might forego ſome of its manors for a time, without any material injury; but the loſs or ſuſpenſion of its ſpiritual functionary, and the diminution of its dignity, would be truly injurious.” Thus, in conſultation, they were divided in their ſentiments. The fifth day of the counſel was the Lord's day, and devoted to conſultation; there was ſcarcely an hour allowed for refreſhment; the archbiſhop never once left his hotel. The next day, being Monday, the archbiſhop, who had been ſeized ſuddenly with illneſs, was unable to go to court. This indiſpoſition was the effect of fatigue and vexation; he had pains in his back and limbs, attended with ſhiverings; and it was thought proper to put warm cloths ſucceſſively to the parts affected. As ſoon as the king received the news of this, he ſent the earls of Leiceſter and Cornwall, and a great many of his barons, to receive the anſwer which the archbiſhop was to give, after conſultation with the dignitaries of the church, concerning his rendering an account of his receipts from the vacant churches during his chancellorſhip, his giving ſecurity in that behalf, and conſenting to abide by the judgement of the court. He made anſwer by the biſhops, “That he could return no anſwer then; but that he would attend the court next day, though he were carried in a litter, and then do what his duty directed.” On the morning of the next day, he celebrated maſs at a certain altar of the Proto-martyr St. Stephen, called Etenim ſederunt principes [3]. His detractors, who had the ear and favour of the king, made this a matter of freſh charge; and inſinuated, that the archbiſhop celebrated that maſs for himſelf, as another Stephen and Proto-martyr, and that ſome words of the office were contrived by inuendo to mark and traduce the king. After the maſs, the archbiſhop went to court; the bearer of his croſs marched before him. The archbiſhop ſaid, "I had done better if I had come in my own garb[1]!" for he had propoſed to go to the court bare-foot, and in ſordid rayment, and with the croſs in his own hand, and enter the king's own apartment, and prefer his ſupplications at the foot of the throne, for the ſafety and protection of the church. But his clergy were againſt this meaſure, of his carrying the croſs[2]. At his entering into the hall of the caſtle, after getting off his horſe, he took the croſs from the hand of the officer into his own. The archdeacon of Liſieux, who had come with the archbiſhop, and was of his own houſhold, ſuggeſted the imprudence of the archbiſhop's conduct to the biſhop of London; and expreſſed his ſurprize, that the biſhop did not hinder the archbiſhop from coming into the room with the croſs in his hand. The biſhop ſaid, "He was always a fooliſh man, and would be ſo to the laſt." As the archbiſhop entered, all immediately gave way; he went forward into the chamber of parliament, and ſeated himſelf in his accuſtomed place; the biſhops ſat near him; all had riſen from their ſeats at his entry, and, out of reſpect, offered to bear the croſs, thinking how angry the king would be to ſee him enter the room armed in this manner. The biſhop of Hereford would have taken the croſs, ſo would the biſhop of London, who ſharply rebuked him. "If the king, ſaid he, ſhould ſee you thus arrayed, he will let his ſword fall upon your head, and you will then find of how little avail your arms will be." The archbiſhop replied, "that, if it were poſſible, it was his duty to have the croſs in his hands always; but now I know what I ſhall do; which is, to preſerve the honour of God, of myſelf, and of the church of Engliſhmen. You ſay what you think fit; but if you were in my place, your opinion would be different. If the lord king were, as you ſay, to take his ſword, I aſſure you this croſs would not be the emblem of peace." The archbiſhop might then poſſibly reflect upon the danger his perſon had been in at Clarendon, when the earl of Leiceſter, and other lords, came to him from the king, and ſupplicated him with tears to ſubmit to the king's demands, for fear of inſtant death."

---

[1] Stephanides, almoſt literally.

[2] This reſolution the king ſeems to have ſteadily adhered to; and it is a key to the ſubſequent murder of Becket, by the king's contrivance and order; twice had the Patriot and Confeſſor narrowly eſcaped the hands of his ſatellites; they made ſurer work the third time, when they maſſacred him at the altar. Theſe plots were nicely contrived; they were all quaſi rege ignorante.

[3] Princes ſat and ſpake againſt me, part of a pſalm, were in the ſervice of the day.

The king, as ſoon as he ſaw the archbiſhop come into the room, carrying the croſs in his own hand, retired into a diſtant room. All the biſhops were ordered into the preſence-chamber, where they ſtaid a long while in private diſcourſe with the king. Among the biſhops there, was Roger, archbiſhop of York. He had had his croſs carried erect, as if he were upon equality with the primate of Canterbury, although the pope had ſolemnly prohibited ſuch elevation of the croſs of York in the province of Canterbury. Thus the croſſes ſeemed to defy each other, and carried the appearance of war. The archbiſhop of York juſtified his preſumption by the plea of appeal which, he ſaid, he had made to the papal bull of prohibition. In the mean while, the heart of the archbiſhop of Canterbury was ready to break, from the anguiſh of his mind; for he had been informed, that this day he ſhould be either taken into cuſtody, or, if he eſcaped, that a party of bad men were leagued together to attack, and kill him, quaſi rege neſciente. Herbert, the archbiſhop's maſter in Holy Scripture, whiſpered him, "That if they ſhould dare to lay impious hands upon him, he was equipped to launch the ſentence of excommunication againſt them, ſo that the ſpirit be ſafe in the day of the Lord." To which William Fitz-Stephen, who ſat at the feet of the archbiſhop, replied, in a tone loud enough for the archbiſhop to hear him, "Far be it from him to act in that manner; the Holy Apoſtles and Martyrs of God did not do ſo, when they were ſeized and hurried to execution on the croſs. Let the archbiſhop rather pray for them, and forgive them, and poſſeſs his ſoul in patience; for if, for the cauſe of righteouſneſs, and the liberty of the church, he ſhould happen to ſuffer, his ſoul will be at reſt, and his memory in benediction. If he ſhould declare ſentence upon them, it would ſeem to all men, that he gave way to wrath and impatience, and acted from a ſpirit of revenge. And beyond doubt this would be directly contrary to what is commanded in the Decreta: for there thus St. Gregory writes to Januarius: "You ſhew that your thoughts are not heavenly, but that your converſation is earthly, by your iſſuing the curſe of anathema for avenging a perſonal injury done to yourſelf, which is forbidden in holy writ." John Plenata, hearing this, could not ſtop the guſhing tears. Likewiſe Ralph de Dici, archdeacon of London, and afterwards dean, cried exceedingly.

The archbiſhop ſaw and heard all this, and became wrapped in meditation. Shortly after, the ſame William Fitz-Stephen, deſirous of ſpeaking to the archbiſhop, was forbidden by one of the king's marſhals, who ſtood by with his rod of office, and told him, that no one whoſoever ſhould ſpeak to the archbiſhop. But Fitz-Stephen, waiting his opportunity, by looks and motions of his lips, made a ſign to the archbiſhop, "That he would have him turn his eye to Chriſt on the croſs which he held, and ſee an example of ſuffering, to comfort him under his own, and that he would keep cloſe to prayer." The archbiſhop underſtood the ſign, and did ſo, and was ſtrengthened in the Lord, as he told William Fitz-Stephen afterwards. Good God! how many clerks and knights, on that day, ejaculated true and bright ſentiments about the contempt of this world, while the archbiſhop ſat alone, holding his croſs, and all his ſuffragan biſhops, and the earls, and barons, were detained by the king in his apartment! One man ſaid, "O treacherous world! it reminds one of the ſea, which, at times, exhibits a ſmooth and fair appearance, but conceals within it the moſt dreadful tempeſts!" Another obſerved, "Every thing is ſubject to viciſſitude. There is no love of God in the world. O worldly honours! how many things, which men deſire, ſhould be objects of terror!"

The biſhops diſcourſing with the king in an apartment within the hall, among other things, informed him, "That on that very day, when they came to the archbiſhop, they were charged with bad behaviour towards him, for that they had acted with the barons, and treated him moſt unkindly, and had judged him with a ſeverity that was never known before; for that one abſence, which the courts of law called a ſuperſiſa, ought not to have been adjudged contumacy; nor ought they to have condemned him to be in the king's miſericordia in the pecuniary penalty of all his moveable goods; for, by ſuch way of proceeding, the church of Canterbury might be brought to devaſtation, if the king ſhould be without mercy; and ſuch a judgement as this might be ruinous in its conſequences both to biſhops and barons. But, to prevent ſuch evils, it was an eſtabliſhed law to impoſe a certain fine in caſes of this ſort; that this fine was unalterable, and the preciſe ſum was different in different counties, and that each county had its own cuſtom in this reſpect. In London, the fine fixed was an hundred ſhillings. In Kent, which lies expoſed to the ſea, and is bound to keep pirates off the coaſt, and claims the privilege of commencing the attack in battle againſt foreign enemies, the fine is only forty ſhillings: in conſideration of the heavy public burden which lies upon that county, indulgence is granted to it in the point alluded to; and the archbiſhop himſelf, who has his houſhold and reſidence in Kent, ought to have been adjudged, and taxed, according to the law and uſage of Kent."

---

[1] The Latin—in propriis meis inſtrumentis. It is difficult to tell the meaning of this. Perhaps it ſhould be indumentis.

[2] In old illuminated pictures primates carry a golden croſs; biſhops a paſtoral ſtaff, or crozier; the croſs was born by the primates in their own hands, and waved and ſtruck againſt the ground in the act of anathematiſing.

The biſhops, moreover, told the king, "That on that very day, being within ten days after the paſſing of ſentence, the archbiſhop had appealed them to the lord pope; and he had forbidden them, by the authority of the lord pope, to judge him thenceforward upon any ſecular plaint which might be moved againſt him for any time previous to his archiepiſcopacy [1]."

The king was much moved at this information; and again ſent the earl of Leiceſter, and many other lords, to the archbiſhop, to aſk the archbiſhop, "whether he would take upon him to be the author of this appeal and prohibition [2]; ſince he was the king's liege man, and was holden to him both by his general oath of fealty, and by ſpecial engagement made at Clarendon, whereby he ſtood ſolemnly pledged to preſerve to the king all his royal prerogatives in good faith, without fraud or deceit, and truly, and fairly; among which prerogatives this was one, That the biſhops ſhould form part of the king's tribunal in all tryals, except ſuch as touched the life of man?" And alſo to know from him, "whether he would conſent to find ſureties for rendering an account of the money for which he might be chargeable in quality of chancellor, and to ſtand by the judgement of the king's court?" To which the archbiſhop, fixing his eyes ſteadily on the crucifix, and compoſing his countenance, and without riſing from his ſeat, that he might not ſink his dignity, addreſſed them in the following ſpeech, which he delivered in a clear and equal tone of voice, without faultering in a ſingle word:

"Sirs, brethren, the earls and barons of the lord king, I am bound by homage, fealty, and oath, to my liege lord the king; but oaths, eſpecially ſuch as are taken by the prieſthood, have in them righteouſneſs and equity. I am held to the honour and fidelity of the lord king, as well by devout, as due, ſubjection, for God's ſake, to perform obedience in all things, ſaving the obedience of God, the eccleſiaſtical immunity, and the epiſcopal honour of my own perſon. Not ſpeaking at this time in the character of a litigant, for litigation I wholly decline; I was ſummoned hither, neither on the ſubject of accompt, or for any other cauſe, but ſimply that of John the mareſchal; nor am I at this time, and under my preſent circumſtances, either obnoxious to the giving of anſwer as in a proſecution, or to hearing of judgement as an accuſed convict. I acknowledge, and recollect, that I undertook very many adminiſtrations and important functions for the lord king, in which I ſerved him moſt faithfully on either ſide the ſea. And further, I do rejoice at the remembrance of having ſpent all my own revenue, and borrowed very large ſums in his ſervice. But when, by divine permiſſion, and the favour of my lord king, I was archbiſhop elect, before my conſecration, I was regularly and formally acquitted, in the court of the king's Exchequer, by prince Henry the king's ſon, and the high juſtice, of all demands whatſoever, reſulting from the truſts I held under the king; all which is perfectly known to the king, although his anger hinders him at this time from allowing it. The ſame thing is equally well known to many of you; and all the eccleſiaſtical dignitaries of this realm know it alſo. And I do beg and adjure you, as conſcious of the truth I now utter, that ye would ſuggeſt theſe things to the lord king; againſt whom, although it is allowable by law, it is not ſafe to name witneſſes; nor is it neceſſary to do ſo at preſent, as I do not ſpeak as a party in a lawſuit. After my conſecration, I fixed my attention on the honour that had been conferred upon me, and likewiſe on the burden I had undertaken; and made it my object to qualify myſelf for both, as well by deed, as by endeavour; and to be as ſerviceable as my poor abilities would allow me to the church of God, which the publick now ſaw me preſide over. And, if I cannot ſucceed in my wiſh, I do not impute my diſappointment to the lord king, or to any other perſon, but ſolely to my own ſins. God is ſufficient to give an increaſe of grace to whomſoever he pleaſe. As to the rendering an account, as is required of me, I am utterly unable to find the ſureties that are demanded. All the biſhops, and all my wealthy friends, are bound for me already. But I ought not to be compelled to find ſuch ſureties, becauſe no judgement has been yet paſſed upon me, to authorize ſuch a meaſure; nor am I now engaged in any affair of accompt, for I neither came here for any ſuch purpoſe, nor was my ſummons hither ſtated to be for any other buſineſs than that between me and the mareſchal. Ye lay a great ſtreſs upon the prohibition laid to-day upon the biſhops, and my appeal to the lord pope; now I do acknowledge that I ſaid to my co-biſhops, 'That for non-appearance, where there was no ground for imputing contumacy, they condemned me with more ſeverity than was compatible with juſtice, and contrary to all precedent and example of old times; whereupon I did appeal them, prohibiting them, during this appeal, to judge me upon a ſecular plaint on an affair of former time, before I was archbiſhop; and I do yet appeal them, and commit my perſon, and alſo the church of Canterbury, to the protection of God, and the lord pope." And then addreſſing the earl of Leiceſter diſtinctly, he forbade him to paſs any ſentence whatever upon him. He finiſhed. The nobles, with ſilence, returned to the king, pondering and examining what they had heard. Others ſaid, "Lo, we have heard from his own mouth the blaſphemy of his prohibition." Some of the barons and bye-ſtanders of the king, writhing their necks as they paſſed, ſpoke among themſelves, but loudly enough to be overheard by the archbiſhop: "King William, who ſubdued England, knew how to tame his clergy. He committed to priſon his rebel Odo, biſhop of Baieux, his own brother. He condemned Stigand, archbiſhop of Canterbury, to perpetual impriſonment, and threw him into a dark dungeon. Alſo the father of the lord king, Geoffry, count of Anjou, who valiantly ſubdued Normandy, got the biſhop elect of Sais, and many of his clergy, emaſculated; and the members of theſe eunuchs to be ſet before the count in a baſon, becauſe he aſſented to their election of him for their biſhop, and held himſelf as elected without the count's aſſent."

The king, when he had heard the archbiſhop's anſwer, inſiſted, that the biſhops [3], together with the barons, ſhould pronounce ſentence upon him, commanding and adjuring them ſo to do by the homage done, and fealty ſworn by them to him. They began to excuſe themſelves, alledging the prohibition which lay in the way. The king did not acquieſce, aſſerting, "That the ſingle prohibition of the archbiſhop did not make void what had been done, and ſworn to, at Clarendon." On the other hand, the biſhops reminded the king how heavily the archbiſhop's hand would fall upon them, if they ſhould diſobey the prohibition, and appeal; and repreſented to him, that they were willing, and ought in duty to acquieſce to the prohibition that had been made, both for the good of the king and of the realm. At length the king being perſuaded, the biſhops, having conſulted among themſelves, go in to the archbiſhop. Robert biſhop of Lincoln wept, and ſome others could ſcarcely forbear crying. Then the biſhop of Chicheſter thus began: "My lord archbiſhop, ſaving your grace, we have great cauſe of complaint againſt you; you have very much offended us, your biſhops; you have driven us into a ſtrait; you have placed us, as it were, between the hammer and the anvil by this your prohibition; which if we do not obey, then we incur the crime of diſobedience to you; and, if we do obey, we are involved in the ſnare of the king's diſpleaſure; for we were lately aſſembled with you at Clarendon, being ſummoned thither by the king, to engage ourſelves to acknowledge and maintain the antient prerogatives of his crown; and, to prevent all demur concerning the cuſtoms intended by that title, he cauſed all the things, that he expreſſed by word, to be arranged in writing. At length we pledged our aſſent to them, we promiſed to obſerve them. You did this firſt of all, and we, by your own direction, followed your example. Moreover, when the lord king required from us to confirm what we aſſented to by the ſolemnity of our oaths, and by the impreſſion of our ſeals, we replied, 'that he ought to be ſatisfied with our promiſe, and hold us as firmly pledged, as if we had put our ſacerdotal oath to it; ſeeing that we did ſay we would obſerve thoſe his royal cuſtoms in bonâ fide, ſine dolo malo, & legitimè.' The lord king was content. From this grievance of the prohibition, that you may not do us more injury, we do appeal to the lord pope; and for this turn we ſubmit to obey your orders." The archbiſhop ſaid, "I attend to what ye ſay, and with God's help I ſhall ſtick cloſe to the proſecution of the appeal. But at Clarendon nothing was yielded by me, or by you through me, but with a ſaving of the eccleſiaſtical honour. For, as ye yourſelves ſay, we there retained theſe three determinations, in bonâ fide, ſine dolo malo, & legitimè; through which continue ſafe to our churches the dignities which we have in right of our biſhopricks; for what is contrary to the faith, due to the church, and againſt the laws of God, cannot be obſerved in bonâ fide, & legitimè. Moreover, that cannot be the prerogative or dignity of a Chriſtian king, where the eccleſiaſtical rights and liberty are deſtroyed. Let me add, that theſe dignities, royal and written as ye ſay, the king ſent over to the chief pontiff, to have his holineſs's confirmation thereof; but they were ſent back to the king with a ſolemn condemnation of the greater part of them. Thus has the church of Rome, whom it is our duty to follow, being always ready to receive what ſhe receives, and reject what ſhe rejects, ſet us an example, and given us our leſſon; beſides, if we made a ſlip at Clarendon (for the fleſh is weak), we ought to reſume the ſpirit in the ſtrength of the Holy Ghoſt, to hold it out againſt the old enemy, whoſe purpoſe it is, that he who ſtandeth may fall, and he who falls may riſe no more. If, under the ſtipulation in verbo veritatis, we there granted or confirmed things unrighteous, ye know, that whoever bind themſelves to do things unlawful are not bound at all."

---

[1] This was expreſſly againſt one of the ſtatutes of Clarendon, whereby the biſhops were bound to ſit in judgement in the king's court of parliament. This ſhews that Becket did not mean to comply with the ſtatutes of Clarendon.

[2] This was another breach of thoſe ſtatutes.

[3] On the firſt day's trial the archbiſhop was caſt in the king's miſericordia, by the joint ſentence of prelates and barons; and the biſhop of Winton, although the friend and partizan of the primate, was forced to pronounce ſentence. The king intended to have the ſame ſupport from the biſhops on the remaining articles of impeachment, inſiſting, according to the ſtatutes of Clarendon, that his prelates, who were his vaſſals, as tenants of crown-lands, owed him their aſſiſtance in parliamentary counſels and tryals, as a ſervice due for their fiefs. Becket, to put a ſtop to the biſhops taking a part againſt him in the king's court of parliament, appealed them to the pope, which deprived the king of their further countenance and aſſiſtance. The biſhop of Chicheſter, and the others of his party, go to the archbiſhop, and complain of his ſeverity and inconſiſtency, and inform him, that although they will not diſobey his prohibition at preſent, yet they alſo will, in their turn, appeal to the pope.

The biſhops return to the king; and, being allowed by him to forbear ſitting in judgement upon the archbiſhop, take their ſeats apart from the barons. But the king perſeveres in calling upon the earls and barons to pronounce ſentence[1]. Certain barons of ſecondary dignity, antients of days, are ſummoned, that they might be added to the others, and be their coadjutors in this trial[2]; after a little delay, the nobles return to the archbiſhop. The earl of Leiceſter wanted to transfer to other perſons the office of pronouncing ſentence; but, not being able to prevail with any of them to do it, he began to ſtate the whole affair of Clarendon, article by article, juſt as he had done before at the cloſe of that convention. But Hilary, biſhop of Chicheſter, whoſe behaviour did not accord with his name[3], ſtill maintaining, that the crime of Leſe-majeſty clearly attached to the archbiſhop, and that the violation of the words in verbo veritatis barred his acquittal, ſaid to the archbiſhop, "That he ſhould hear judgement." The latter could refrain no longer; but turning to the nobles, "What is it, ſaid he, that ye are minded to do? Did ye come here to judge me? Ye ought not to do it; judgement is ſentence brought after trial. I have not ſaid one word to-day, as upon my trial. I was ſummoned hither in no other cauſe than that between me and John the mareſchal, who has done nothing at all in the matter. But to ſit in judgement upon me, is a thing wherein ye have no power. Be I what I may, I am your ſpiritual father; and ye are nobles of the palace, lay-potentates, temporal perſonages. I will not hear your adjudication." The nobles retire. After a little ſpace, the archbiſhop ariſing, and taking his croſs with him, went towards the door, which had been cloſely guarded the whole day, but was opened to him, as if it had opened of its own accord. Some ſlanderous perſon purſued him, and called him "a perjured man towards the king." Another ſaid, "There goes a traytor, who carries the king's judgement along with him." Oh, what a martyrdom did he then ſuffer in his ſpirit! But he left the council with more happineſs, inaſmuch as he was accounted worthy to ſuffer for the name of Jeſus. As he went through the hall, the crowd therein hindered him from ſeeing ſome fire-wood which lay in his way; he ſtruck againſt it, but did not fall down. He came to the door where his horſes were; mounting his own, he was conducted by maſter Herbert, who could not find his own horſe for the preſs of people, to the monaſtery of St. Andrew's, his hotel. Having made his oriſons before the high altar, he depoſited his croſs beſide the altar of the bleſſed Mary. He ſat down, and his domeſticks around him. Then ſaid William Fitz-Stephen to him, "This was, indeed it was, a bitter day." To which the archbiſhop, "The laſt day will be more ſo." And ſhortly after, he exhorted his friends, ſaying, "Let every one of you hold himſelf in ſilence and peace. Let not a bitter word come out of your mouths. Make no reply to any evil-ſpeaker whatever. Let them rail as much as they pleaſe. It is the part of a ſuperior to be patient under ſuch treatment; it is the part of an inferior to act ſo. If they are maſters of their tongues, we are not leſs ſo of our ears. The evil-ſpeaking is not againſt me, but God."

So Stephanides, who was preſent. Other authors ſtate it a little differently. The biſhop of Winton had reminded his brethren, that the archbiſhop had, on his election, been given to the ſee of Canterbury, by the king's court of Exchequer, acquitted and diſcharged of all debts, accounts, and demands, whatſoever; which the high juſticiar, the chief officer of that court, had poſitively declared. It ſeems hardly to be doubted but that the certainty of this fact induced the biſhops, except biſhop Hilary, a tool of the court, to have no further hand in this notorious buſineſs. The lay-lords, however, were not aſhamed to proceed. Lord Lyttelton, the panegyriſt of Henry II. deſcribes their proceedings in the following manner: "The earls and barons, with a great crowd of other perſons, attending the parliament, went to the archbiſhop; and the earl of Leiceſter, as grand juſticiar[4], ſaid to him theſe words: 'The king commands you to come before him, and give an account of the money you are charged with, according to the promiſe you made him yeſterday; otherwiſe hear your ſentence.' 'My ſentence,' interrupted Becket, riſing up from his ſeat, 'Nay, ſon earl, hear you firſt. You are not ignorant, how ſerviceable, and how faithful, according to the ſtate of this world, I have been to the king. In reſpect whereof, it has pleaſed him to promote me to the archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, God knows, againſt my own will; for I was not unconſcious of my weakneſs, and rather for the love of him, than of God, I acquieſced therein; which is this day ſufficiently apparent, ſince God withdraws both himſelf and the king from me. But in the time of my promotion, when the election was made, prince Henry, the king's ſon [1], to whom that charge was committed, being preſent, it was demanded in what manner they would give me the church of Canterbury: And the anſwer was, 'Free and diſcharged from all bonds of the court.' Being therefore free and diſcharged, I am not bound to anſwer, nor will I, concerning thoſe things from which I am ſo diſengaged.'

---

[1] Gervas and Stephanides.

[2] The account of this trial being ſhort and indiſtinct, it becomes difficult to underſtand certain parts of it. As the biſhops were ſilenced by the archbiſhop's appeal, and were allowed by the king to be inactive; Hilary, one ſhould think, would not have been among the barons upon their coming to paſs ſentence, much leſs have been ſo forward in ſpeaking. His interruption of the earl of Leiceſter beginning with But, looks as if he was eager to contradict the earl, as if the latter betrayed a manifeſt partiality to the accuſed.

[3] Hilary—in Latin Hilarius, i. e. the merry.

[4] As grand juſticar.—So lord Lyttelton; but without authority, and, I ſuſpect, improperly. I have obſerved that in great councils the high juſtice is never diſtinguiſhed by his forenſic title.

Hereupon the earl ſaid, 'This is very different from what the biſhop of London reported to the king.' To which the archbiſhop replied, 'Attend, my ſon, to what I ſay; by how much the ſoul is of more worth than the body, ſo much are you bound to obey God rather than an earthly king. Nor does law or reaſon allow, that children ſhould judge or condemn their father. Wherefore I diſclaim the judgement of the king, of you, and of all the other peers of the realm; being only to be judged, under God, by our lord the pope; to whom, before you all, I here appeal, committing the church of Canterbury, my order, my dignity, with all thereunto appertaining, to God's protection and to his. In like manner do I cite you, my brethren and fellow-biſhops, becauſe you obey man rather than God, to the audience and judgement of the ſovereign pontiff; and ſo relying on the authority of the Catholic church, and the apoſtolic ſee, I depart hence [2]."

The archbiſhop remained in the convent that night, and being anxious for the ſafety of his perſon, after he ſhould leave it, he made his ſupplication to the king by three of his ſuffragans, viz. the biſhops of Hereford, Worceſter, and Rocheſter, for letters of ſafe-conduct. The anſwer of the king was, "That he would conſult his council upon it the next day." We are told by one who was then attending upon the archbiſhop, that before his ſending this meſſage, that part of the goſpel had been read to him at dinner, where our Saviour directs his Apoſtles, when they were perſecuted in one city to flee unto another; which was thought to influence his mind in getting out of danger. John of Saliſbury, his companion and learned friend, writes, that he conceived this deſign from an alarm, which he received from two of the nobility who came to him in the evening, and with many tears and ſolemn aſſurances revealed to him a conſpiracy againſt his life, which ſome perſons of great quality but infamous characters had formed, and bound themſelves by mutual oaths to carry into execution. One cannot help ſuſpecting that one of theſe nobles, who diſcloſed this plot to him, was our earl of Leiceſter. The truth of ſuch a plot can hardly be doubted, when we conſider the king's fury at this time, and the promptitude wherewith ſome of his barons would be diſpoſed to gratify him by any deed whatever, that paved the way for their own promotion: and the king's with-holding the letter of ſafe-conduct, which the archbiſhop never obtained, ſufficiently ſhews how little the king was diſpoſed to give him any ſort of protection. Henry's hiſtoriographer tells us, "That the king, apprehenſive for the ſafety of Becket, prudently ordered a proclamation to be made, that he forbad all perſons, on pain of death, to do the archbiſhop or his people any harm." The hiſtorian's authority for this aſſertion is a certain letter, which, becauſe it was full of invective againſt the primate, upon the ruin of whoſe character Henry Curtmantel was to riſe to eſteem, muſt be his favourite document on the ſubject under diſcuſſion. But unfortunately for the panegyriſt of Henry, this calumnious letter is found to be ſpurious [3]. And this pretended proclamation is of itſelf a ſtrong proof of it. For Becket had recourſe to every ingenious and innocent contrivance to conceal his perſon and his motions, till he could effect his eſcape; for which there would have been no occaſion, if the king had iſſued ſuch a proclamation. And with regard to the primate's friends, the king's ſubſequent conduct ſhews his diſpoſition towards them. The ſecond night of the archbiſhop's ſtay at the convent, his bed was prepared by his order in the church between two altars, where he thought, probably, he might be ſafe by the privilege of ſanctuary: but riſing at midnight, he went out by the back door of the convent with only two monks (one of whom, namely, Herbert de Boſeham, wrote his life), and got ſafe from Northampton.

The archbiſhop's diſgrace was probably the cauſe of much grief to our earl, who, by the late account given of his friendſhip with Becket by his ſon, ſeems, neither from fear of, or attachment to, the king to have dropped his correſpondence with him. And not long afterwards, when he had a fair opportunity of humouring the king's prejudice, he forbore to do it; preferring the cauſe of Holy Church, of which Becket was the champion, and which Henry was inclined to undermine by dark intrigues with the antipope and imperial court. The emperor's chief miniſter, in his attack upon pope Alexander, was Reginald archbiſhop of Cologne; him pope Alexander had involved in the papal anathema. This did not hinder the king of England from employing the famous John of Oxford (who was intruſted in his moſt ſecret affairs) and ſome other agents from holding communion with him about the affairs which king Henry had then much at heart. John of Oxford, and the others who were employed in the ſame buſineſs, were ſolemnly excommunicated by Becket for negotiating with heretics.

In the beginning of the year 1165, this Reginald came into England, to confer perſonally with the king upon the affairs that were then in agitation between them; and alſo to take Maud, king Henry's eldeſt daughter, to be wife to Henry duke of Saxony. The archbiſhop of Cologne came to Weſtminſter, where the king was prepared to receive him; the great men of the realm went out in great ſolemnity to meet him. But Robert, earl of Leiceſter, and juſticiar of the king, refuſed to make one in this proceſſion; nor would he receive his kiſs of ſalutation, becauſe the archbiſhop was a ſchiſmatic, and ſtood excommunicate by Alexander, whom England had recognized as lawful pope. After Reginald's departure, the high altars, at which he had celebrated maſs, were overturned, as having ſuſtained a pollution, by the ſchiſmatical and excommunicate archbiſhop's having performed maſs at them.

The death of this illuſtrious earl is placed by ſome in the year 1167, by others in 1168, and by others in 1169; but probably it happened in the beginning of 1169. For the authors who place it in that year mention it at the beginning; and thoſe who ſuppoſe it to be in 1168, towards the end: this difference ſeems to ariſe from the different mode of commencing the year. If he died in January or February, or before Lady-day 1169, the authors who began their year March 25, might ſay he died 1168, and yet not contradict thoſe who, beginning their year on the nativity, or January 1, inſert his death among the events of 1169. He was buried on the South ſide of the choir in the abbey of St. Mary de Pratis, at Leiceſter; where Knighton tells us he had reſided fifteen years as a canon regular. But on this point Sir William Dugdale very properly ſuggeſts a doubt. We have ſhewn that he was buſily engaged in ſecular employments; and the fact is, that, after having been the founder of that abbey, his name was of courſe enrolled in their fraternity, as was the cuſtom of the times, that he might have the more immediate benefit of all the devout ſuffrages, faſtings, and alms, of the members of that religious ſociety. His pious and religious acts, alſo, were great and many, and far beyond thoſe of his father. Beſides this magnificent abbey, he founded, in the reign of king Stephen, a goodly monaſtery at Nuneaton in Warwickſhire, for Benedictine nuns; beſtowing on them the lordſhip of Eaton (except what the abbey of Leiceſter then held in Stockinford, and ſome land held by the monks de Caſâ Dei in Eatlebury and Eaton); and all his lands, rents, and tithing in Welles, except the tithe of the eels, which his father had given to the canons of Leiceſter; and confirming the grants of two carucates of lands in Waltham, co. Leiceſter, with paſturage there for 300 ſheep, by Iſabel his ſiſter, and Simon earl of Northampton, her ſon; two yard lands and a half, lying in Swinford, co. Leiceſter, by Richard Mallorie; and in Leiceſter two ſhillings rent out of a houſe which one Wido Breadleas then held of the ſaid Richard; all the lands lying within Eaton, of which the ſaid Richard was poſſeſſed [1]; two virgates of land and ſix ſhillings of annual rent on the other ſide of the river at Eaton; and an acquittal to the monaſtery and the church of the ſeignorial claim of the ſervice of a ninth part of a knight's fee [2]. He founded alſo, in 1133, the abbey of Gerendon [3], in the county of Leiceſter, for Ciſtercian or White monks; as alſo the priory of Luffield, in the county of Northampton, for monks of the Benedictine order [4]; both which he endowed liberally with lands and revenues. To the priory of Lenton, in Nottinghamſhire, he renewed his father's gift of the church of Great Wigſton [5]; and to the abbey of Alceſter, in Warwickſhire, he confirmed a variety of donations [6]. He was an eſpecial benefactor to the monks of St. Ebrulf, in Normandy; freeing them from payment of tithes for all their lands in Leiceſterſhire, as well in the foreſt of Leiceſter, as elſewhere; acquitting them from herbage and pannage for their hogs, either in that foreſt, or other incloſed lands. He moreover gave them nine burgeſſes within the walls of Leiceſter, and five without; with the tithes of all his own demeſne lands in that town [7]; alſo the churches of Belgrave and Glenfield, with two yard lands at Glenfield; the chapels of Kirby and Braunſton, with tithes and other appurtenances in Yrkinfeld; two parts of the tithes of all his demeſne lands in Rotheby that were tithable; and the like through all the fee of Leiceſter, in Groby, and elſewhere; in Rotheby alſo the tithes of the two halls; and in like manner the tithes of the two halls in Humberſton, and one virgate of land; and the tithes of the whole demeſnes in Evington, Ingarſby, Sileby, Thorp-Ernald, Brentingby, Waltham, Wigſton, and Houtheby [8]. To the abbey of Lira in Normandy he confirmed the church of Hinckley, with the chapels of Stoke and Dadlington, whereupon the monks of Lira made Hinckley a cell to their monaſtery; the church of Sibbeſdune alſo, with the chapels of Widerdeſley, Atretune, Huptone, and Draitone, and the church of Higham, with the chapel of Lindley, co. Leiceſter; the church of Eaton, with the chapel of Attleburgh, co. Warwick; the church of Warham, and one hide of land there. To the monks of Bec in Normandy he gave the lordſhip of Chinchebirick; to the nuns of Godſtow, co. Oxon. he gave three pounds a year in Hallo; to the canons of Sulby, co. Northampton, he granted fuel for their fire out of his woods called Ighey, as much as they could carry with one cart, twice every day, from Eaſter till Michaelmas, with freedom from toll for whatever they ſhould buy or ſell in the market of Leiceſter; and to the Knights Templars he gave a mark yearly out of the mill of Scheravene.

---

[1] Then acting as cuſtos regni in the king's abſence abroad, and aſſiſted by the king's high juſtice, and the barons of the Exchequer. See Hoveden.

[2] If the archbiſhop had not kept the croſs in his hand, and reſiſted the ſentence by appeal to the pope, the judgement paſſed by the barons in the king's apartment would have been delivered, and probably theſe contrivances of the primate would have been no avail, if the delivery of the ſentence had been conſigned to a perſon leſs partial to the accuſed, and leſs attached to the church, than the earl of Leiceſter. Becket was cited to anſwer to a ſmall treſpaſs. The judgement paſſed upon him by the court of the king's parliamentary barons, was, condemnation for treaſon and perjury.

[3] See Berrington's Hiſtory of Henry II.

We do not read of this earl's having more than one wife, viz. Amicia, mentioned above, by whom he had iſſue Robert, his ſucceſſor in the earldom, and two daughters, Iſabel, wife to Simon earl of Northampton [9]; and Hawiſe, married to William earl of Glouceſter: which Amicia gave to the monks of Lira one ounce of gold at Pont St. Piere in Normandy [10]. On the canons of Leiceſter ſhe beſtowed lands of four pounds a year value in the Everlas [11]; and, by the conſent of her huſband, became a nun in the monaſtery which he had founded at Nuneaton [12]; where ſhe died on the firſt of September, being St. Giles's day, the exact year not known, and was there buried.

We now reſume and finiſh the ſtory of Becket. Hindered by variety of difficulties, he did not get acroſs the Channel till Nov. 2, 1164 [13]. As ſoon as his flight from Northampton was known, the king, becoming ſenſible of the ill conſequence it might be to his affairs if Becket ſhould find an aſylum in foreign parts, gave ſtrict orders that the ſea-ports, eſpecially that of Dover, ſhould be watched, and the archbiſhop arreſted if he was ſeen in thoſe parts. And thinking that the primate had got out of the kingdom before he really had, he loſt no time in taking meaſures for his own ſafety. He determined accordingly to ſend a moſt ſplendid embaſſy, conſiſting of many of his chief nobility, both of the eccleſiaſtical and lay-orders, to the king of France, and alſo to the court of the Roman Pontiff Alexander III, who had his reſidence at that time in the city of Sens, a town in Champagne. But the embaſſadors were commanded, on account of the uncertainty where the primate was, to go firſt to the earl of Flanders, as, perhaps, he might be, or have been there, and repreſent to the earl how traiterous had been the conduct of that fugitive, and how he had fled from juſtice; and to entreat the earl to give him no protection within his dominion. It happened that the embaſſy paſſed from Dover at the very time when the primate ſailed from Sandwich, which was an archiepiſcopal manor, to Flanders. His truſty and diſcreet friend John of Saliſbury, whom he had ſent abroad as his agent when he firſt took the reſolution of ſeeking refuge in foreign parts, ſucceeded ſo well in his negotiation with the Flemiſh earl, as to obtain from him not only aſſurance of protection, but even an offer to procure a veſſel and ſeamen for his paſſage. The Engliſh miniſters, having made a ſhort ſtay with the earl of Flanders, haſtened to France, where they thought the primate lay concealed. But he was not yet got thither. The eſteem which Lewis le Jeune had conceived for his character, as well from perſonal acquaintance, as from the celebrity of his wiſdom and ſanctity, and extraordinary zeal for the ſervice of his lord king Henry, of which Lewis had had ample proofs, had induced him to ſend him word, that, if he ſought ſhelter in France, he would receive him not merely as a biſhop or an archbiſhop, but as a partner in his government. The ſame ſentiments of pity and reſpect were profeſſed by the French biſhops, who, from the account they had of the tranſactions at Northampton, ſpoke of him as a martyr. He had likewiſe a warm friend in the earl of Champagne, and his brothers, and many other of the French nobility. The Engliſh embaſſadors preſented a Latin letter to the French king, of which the following is a cloſe tranſlation: "To his lord and friend, Lewis illuſtrious king of Franks, Henry king of Angles, duke of Normans and Aquitanians, and count of Anjevins, health and love. Know ye, that Thomas, who was archbiſhop of Canterbury, was publicly condemned in my court, by a full council of the barons of my realm, as an iniquitous and perjured man, and a traytor; and under the manifeſt name of a traytor he iniquitouſly fled out of my realm, as my nuncios will more fully lay before you. It is on this account that I earneſtly pray you, that ye do not permit a man ſtigmatized by ſuch great crimes and treaſons, nor any of his retainers, to be in your realm; nor, if it pleaſe you, let ſo great an enemy of me find aid or advice from you, or any of your people: becauſe, to your enemies, and the enemies of your realm, neither I, nor my people, in a ſimilar caſe, would ſhew, or ſuffer to be ſhewed, any thing of that ſort. Nay, if it pleaſe you, effectually aſſiſt me to revenge my diſgrace upon ſo great an enemy, and to ſupport my honour, as you would wiſh me to do yours, if occaſion offered. Witneſs R. earl of Leiceſter, at Northampton [1]." When Lewis came to that part of the letter, in reading it over, where were the words, Thomas who was archbiſhop of Canterbury, and has fled out of my realm like a traytor, he aſked the nuncios, "Whether the perſon therein mentioned was no longer archbiſhop of Canterbury, and who had depoſed him [2]?" They appearing embarraſſed at the queſtion; he ſaid, "I am a king as well as the king of England; but I would not have deprived the loweſt clerk in my kingdom, nor do I think I have power to do it. I know this Thomas ſerved your lord king long and faithfully in the office of chancellor; and his recompenſe is now, that his maſter, after having forced him to flee from England, would alſo drive him out of France."

---

[1] Dugd. Bar. II. 1066.

[2] See the foundation charter, with his ſon's confirmation, from Dugd. Mon. Angl. I. 518, in the Appendix, N° IX.

[3] Of this abbey a full account will be given in its place, under the hundred of Weſt Goſcote.

[4] See the foundation charter, from Dugd. Mon. Angl. vol. I. p. 520. in Appendix, N° X.

[5] Dugd. Mon. Angl. I. 648.

[6] See Appendix, N° XI. from Dugd. Mon. Angl. I. 471.

[7] Dugd. Mon. Angl. vol. II. p. 967.

[8] See the deed, with ſome account of the monaſtery of St. Ebrulf, in Appendix, N° VII.

[9] Chron. Norm. p. 987.

[10] Dugd. Mon. Angl. vol. II. p. 986.

[11] Ibid. p. 309.

[12] H. Knighton, col. 3246. Dugd. Mon. Angl. vol. II. p. 313.

[13] Lyttelton, Stephanides, Gervas, &c.

The embaſſadors hereupon ſeeing no hopes of ſucceeding in this part of their buſineſs, entreated him at leaſt to admoniſh the pope not to give any credit to the ſuggeſtions of Thomas, againſt the king of England. This likewiſe Lewis refuſed to do. The Engliſh embaſſadors therefore left him, and went to the ſovereign pontiff at Sens.

The day after their departure, two eccleſiaſtics, whom the primate had diſpatched from St. Omer's, arrived at Compeigne, where Lewis then kept his court, and implored him to grant the holy father an aſylum in his kingdom. Lewis embraced them, and repeated to them the anſwer he had given to Henry's miniſters; bidding them aſſure the primate, in his name, that he ſhould be received with great kindneſs. Nor was he ſatisfied with this promiſe; but diſpatched his own almoner on a meſſage to the pope, beſeeching his holineſs, that as he loved the honour of the church, and the weal of the French kingdom, he would maintain Thomas, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and his cauſe, in all points againſt the tyrant of England. Thomas was confirmed by theſe encouragements in his deſire and intention of going into France. But while he took up his abode in the abbey of St. Bertin, not far from St. Omers, Richard de Lucy, coming to St. Omer's, on his return to England, and finding the place of the primate's retreat, paid him a viſit. The king's juſticiar, in his conference with the exile, tried to perſuade him to go back to England; offering himſelf to conduct him, and be a mediator and interceſſor with the king for his pardon, which he thought might be obtained by ſuch an act of ſubmiſſion. The archbiſhop anſwered, "That it was the temper of king Henry, when once made angry, to be implacable." The juſticiar, after expreſſing his indignation at the other's conduct, left him [3].

Preſently after the departure of Richard de Lucy, the primate ſet out on his journey to the French dominions. As ſoon as he was got into France, he was joined by ſome of his clergy, who, from attachment to his perſon, or zeal for his cauſe, deſired to follow his fortunes. He went for Soiſſons, where the king was ready to admit him to an interview.

While he was on this journey, the embaſſadors whom king Henry had diſpatched to pope Alexander at Sens arrived at that city. The perſons ſent from the court of England, on this great occaſion, were the archbiſhop of York, the biſhops of London, Worceſter, Exeter, and Chicheſter, with three of the king's chaplains; and the earl of Arundel, with three more of the king's barons; who were all men of great quality in king Henry's court. The ſubſtance of the ſpeeches of ſo many of them as ſpoke was as follows. The biſhop of London, their chief ſpeaker, obſerved, "That a diſſenſion between the king and the ſacerdotal order had lately ariſen, upon matters of no great conſequence in themſelves, and which might eaſily have been adjuſted at firſt, but for the perverſeneſs and intemperance of his lordſhip of Canterbury; who, not conſidering the malice of the times, and not preferring moderate and conciliatory expedients to thoſe of ſtiffneſs and difficulty, had, by his obſtinacy, woven a ſnare both for himſelf and his brethren; which would have produced worſe conſequences than it had, but for the temper and moderation of ſome other biſhops. And he urged the neceſſity there was for his holineſs to uſe his authority to reclaim the archbiſhop to true wiſdom; who, being wiſe in his own conceit, had diſturbed the quiet of his brethren, the peace of the church, and the piety of the king." He was proceeding to cenſure him very bitterly; and ſpeaking of his flight, he quoted a paſſage of the Pſalms: "The wicked fleeth, when no man purſueth." At theſe words his holineſs, interrupting him, ſaid, "Brother, forbear." The biſhop anſwered, "My lord, I will forbear." "I bid you forbear," replied the pope, "not out of regard to his character, but your own." The biſhop, abaſhed at this rebuke, ſaid no more.

The biſhop of Chicheſter, vain of a frothey eloquence, for which he was famous, ventured to inveigh, in a rhetorical ſtyle, againſt the preſumption of the primate, and pointed out the ſchiſm and other grievous diſorders which it threatened to bring upon the church. But while he was indulging his oratory, he happened to ſpeak a word of falſe Latin [4], and repeat it once or twice; which drew upon him the laughter of the whole aſſembly, whereby he was ſo confounded, that he ſtopped ſhort, and remained ſilent.

The archbiſhop of York [5] ſpoke of the primate without ceremony; ſaid, "he was a man of great obſtinacy; that, if he once took up an opinion, nothing could make him change it; and he believed in the preſent caſe it was impoſſible to ſet him right, unleſs his holineſs would apply his own hand to the work, and let it fall pretty heavily upon him."

---

[1] Apud Du Cheſne, tom. IV. p. 754.

[2] Lyttelton.

[3] It was an unfortunate thing for Henry that he could not prevent Becket's getting out of the kingdom. Some about him ſuggeſted, that Thomas could do him leſs hurt incluſus, quam excluſus; an hint which we may be ſure the king knew how to make uſe of. Had Richard de Lucy coaxed him to go back, Becket's life had been probably five or ſix years ſhorter, and far leſs glorious.

[4] Ipſi opportuerunt. Gervas.

[5] An immoral, covetous, quarrelſome, time-ſerving prieſt. Of his learning I find no mention. He was reckoned the chief inſtigator in the murder of Becket. Coming out of a legatine ſynod held at Weſtminſter in 1176, he was accoſted by the mob with theſe words: "Go, betrayer of St. Thomas; thy hands are beſmeared with blood." Gervas.

The biſhop of Exeter ſaid, "There was no need of long diſcourſe; the cauſe could not be determined in the abſence of the archbiſhop."

This being agreed to, the biſhops deſired that legates might be appointed to hear and decide the affair.

The earl of Arundel ſpoke laſt. He began with obſerving, "That what the learned biſhops had ſaid, being in Latin, was entirely unknown to him and the laity about him; but he could aſſure his holineſs, if he might be allowed to do it in plain Engliſh, that king Henry had an ardent zeal for the intereſt of his holineſs, and that he had given great proofs of it; alſo, that he was a prince of great piety to Holy Church: that the lord archbiſhop was a man of ſingular good learning, and in his office of archbiſhop a man of great diſcretion and wiſdom; only, indeed, that to ſome perſons he might ſeem too ſharp and ſevere: and that the breach between the king and him was much to be lamented; as, but for that, the church and ſtate might be very happy under ſo good a king and excellent a paſtor."

The aſſembly broke up after it had ſeemed to them, that the beſt expedient would be, to refer the queſtion to legates for determination.

The archbiſhop in the mean time came to Soiſſons, whither came Lewis to give him the meeting. During his abode in that city, where he continued ſome days, he ſo gained upon the affections of his royal hoſt, as to fix him firmly in his intereſt, and render him as zealous and active as he could wiſh, to do him ſervice. And the mind of Lewis, in proportion to his increaſing attachment to the primate, became hoſtile and adverſe to king Henry.

Before the Engliſh embaſſadors had had their audience of the pope, the latter had received the meſſage from the French king in favour of Becket, and had likewiſe admitted his agents to an hearing. Theſe began, as was much the cuſtom in that age among eccleſiaſtics, to ſpeak of their maſter's ſufferings and condition in words borrowed from Scripture, which, by eaſy application, deſcribed the caſe in point. "They were ſent," they ſaid, "to acquaint his holineſs, that Joſeph his ſon was yet alive, but no longer bore rule in the land of Egypt, having been, on the contrary, oppreſſed and almoſt deſtroyed by the Egyptians." After which they related to him, in the ſame ſtyle of Scripture, the perils his ſon had gone through, when he fought with beaſts at Northampton, his perils among falſe brethren, perils in his flight, perils upon the road, perils at ſea, perils even in the port. Upon the whole, they repreſented him as another St. Paul. At which the ſovereign pontiff was ſo much moved, that he burſt into tears. This was the day preceding that of his hearing the king of England's embaſſadors.

After the archbiſhop had wrought ſo well upon the French king, and had obtained from him a promiſe of liberal maintenance, in which the primate's friends were comprehended, he ſet out for Sens to pay his devoir to the holy father, who, on his arrival, received him very graciouſly; not quite ſo, however, did the cardinals, who, it was ſuſpected, had touched no ſmall quantity of Engliſh ſterlings, which Henry's miniſters had brought in abundance to corrupt the holy college. The next day after his arrival, a public audience was appointed for him by the pope, wherein he was required to give his reaſons for abandoning his ſee, and ſeeking refuge in a foreign country. The conſiſtory being formed, the archbiſhop[1] was called before it, and ſeated at the right hand of the pope, who commanded him to plead his cauſe before them; whereupon he roſe up, but was ordered by his holineſs to ſit down again, and ſpeak ſitting; which greatly encouraging him, he repreſented how meritorious to the holy ſee, and diſintereſted with reſpect to himſelf, had been the whole line of his conduct. He obſerved, "That if he would have complied in all points with the will of the king, not a ſingle man in England would have refuſed obedience to him: And while he was in the king's ſervice, every thing proſpered with him to the utmoſt of his wiſhes: But when he changed the mode of his behaviour, out of regard to his ſacred order, and his duty to God, the king's affection immediately cooled: Yet even now, if he would entirely ſubmit to that prince in all his purpoſes, he ſhould want no interceſſor to recover his favour: But ſeeing that the church of Canterbury, that Weſtern Sun, was now obſcured in his brightneſs, he choſe rather to endure a thouſand deaths, than diſſemble the evils it ſuffered: And leſt he ſhould ſeem unneceſſarily, or out of vain-glory, to have engaged in this diſpute, he thought it proper to ſatisfy the whole aſſembly there preſent, by ocular demonſtration." Then producing to them the Conſtitutions of Clarendon, he ſaid with tears, "See here what laws the king of England has ordained againſt the liberty of the Church! Be judges yourſelves, whether, without the perdition of my ſoul, I could poſſibly connive at ſuch things as theſe."

The Conſtitutions were read; and it was the opinion of the whole aſſembly, "That, in the perſon of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Catholic church ſhould be ſuccoured." And in the ſame conſiſtory, the pope proceeded to examine ſeverally the capitula of theſe conſtitutions or ſtatutes; of which he tolerated ſix, not as good, but as leſs evil than the reſt. And upon the other ten he pronounced abſolute condemnation.

This act of the pope was perfectly conſiſtent with the powers uſually exerciſed by the holy ſee in thoſe ages. All Chriſtendom compoſed, according to the general faith of its members, a ſpiritual monarchy, adminiſtered pleno jure by a ſacred and infallible head, the ſucceſſor of the prince of Apoſtles Peter, and the vicar or rather vice-roy of Jeſus Chriſt. Aſſiſted in ordinary by his cardinals, and in extraordinary caſes by them and biſhops of the ſeveral nations within the pale of the church, he took cognizance, not only of all matters purely eccleſiaſtical, but of ſuch as had reſpect to morals, and the peace and order of the world. The biſhops, prelates, and churchmen of every Chriſtian community, not only paid an implicit obedience to him, from conſcience, as the repreſentative of Jeſus Chriſt, but they were the pope's ſworn and devoted vaſſals and ſubjects. The ſubordinate branches of the univerſal or Catholic church, I mean the ſeparate local eccleſiaſtical ſyſtems of each Chriſtian kingdom and community, were all ſubjected in the dernier reſort to the holy Roman ſee; which, although at times it encroached too much upon the civil rights of princes, and abuſed its power to purpoſes of ambition, intereſt, and revenge; yet, upon the whole, by ſupporting them againſt the treaſon and rebellion of their ſubjects, by inculcating the ſubmiſſion of ſubjects to their rulers, by healing the diſcord of kings, and by mild perſuaſives, or bold correctives, checking their ferocious conduct, the papal monarchy became the beſt ſecurity of kings, and the chief means whereby they roſe to deſpotiſm. As the ſeveral kingdoms and ſtates of Chriſtendom were parcels of this univerſal church, their kings and princes were content to receive their crowns, and to derive their election, either from the pope himſelf, or, according to the cuſtoms of nations reſpectively, their own biſhops. Such was the reverence and devotion to Holy Church, that unleſs the biſhops concurred in the election of kings, dignified the choice by placing the crown on their heads, and above all made them God's anointed by the act of unction (which ſupplied all defects of title, and made all reſiſtance not only legally criminal, but canonically ſinful), the people whom they were to govern would hold them as tyrants, who ought not to be obeyed, but reſiſted and depoſed.

---

[1] Becket. This word is never uſed by the authors of that time, excepting when they ſpeak of his extraction. By anticipation he is frequently ſtyled St. Thomas; on other occaſions, Thomas, Thomas of Canterbury, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Primate. The panegyriſt of Henry II. is careful to ſink him in the reader's eſtimation, by calling him for ever plain Becket; ſuppreſſing, as much as poſſible, his reſpectability.

Without this clue, the reader, acquainted only with modern modes of religion, and political opinions, will have no clear view of the diſpute between the king and his primate; and judging of the latter by Proteſtant notions, and the preſent ſtate of the Engliſh church, he will condemn him without mercy as a bigot, a traytor, and a dangerous hierarchiſt; when in truth he was guided by the ſoundeſt reaſon, according to the approved wiſdom of that age, by the pureſt motives of conſcience, and the higheſt degree of attachment and fidelity to his prince.

It was the opinion of the pope, wherein concurred that of all true Catholics, "That if the primate of England, who, in defence of the liberty of the church, had riſked, not only wealth and honours, but life itſelf, ſhould be ſuffered to fall a ſacrifice to the civil power of an earthly prince, all other biſhops would fall with him; nor, after ſuch an example, would any one ever have courage to reſiſt the will of the prince: and thus the ſtate of the Catholic church would be ſhaken, and the power of the pope periſh." The concluſion was, "That the primate of England ſhould be reinſtated in his ſee in ſpite of all oppoſition; and that he who fought for them ſhould by all means be aſſiſted." The archbiſhop was made acquainted with this determination in the moſt honourable manner, and in terms of the ſtrongeſt affection which the pope could uſe; who concluded his ſpeech by recommending to the primate to go and take up his reſidence at the abbey of Pontigny[1], in Burgundy, that he might be there maintained during the time of his exile; obſerving, "that he, who had hitherto lived in affluence and elegance, ſhould now be taught, by the wholeſome leſſons of poverty, the mother of religion, to be the comforter of the poor, when he returned to his ſee." Wherefore he conſigned him over to one of the poor of Chriſt, the abbot of Pontigny, from whom he was to receive, not a ſumptuous, but ſimple, entertainment, ſuch as became a baniſhed man, and a champion of Chriſt.

Being thus diſmiſſed, he retired to the convent appointed for his reſidence, where he wore the habit of a monk, which had been ſent him by the pope himſelf, with a bleſſing; and he conformed to the monkiſh inſtitutions of that abbey.

Upon the report made to Henry of the proceedings at Sens, that prince exerted all his authority, and arrayed himſelf in all his terrors againſt the contumacy of the primate, and was determined to make the Roman pontiff alſo feel the weight of his diſpleaſure. He therefore confiſcated all the archbiſhop's baronial lands and tenements, together with all his other property; and ſent his royal mandate, ſeverally, to the biſhops of his dominions, to ſeize to his uſe the revenues of any of the clergy within their reſpective dioceſes, who had followed the archbiſhop into France, or otherwiſe had acted in derogation to the prerogative, and honour of his crown, conjointly with him, or for him. All correſpondence with him was declared criminal. And although the church, in its offices, prayed for Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Hereticks, and was wont to pray ſpecially for the primate of England; yet now, by the king's ſpecial command, it was made treaſon to pray for him, or uſe his name in divine ſervice. Nor did the king ſtop here; for, in the beginning of the year 1165, he baniſhed out of England, by a general act of proſcription, all the relations, friends, and dependants of the archbiſhop, to the number of about 400 perſons, without diſtinction of ſex or age; not excepting women labouring with child, and infants at the breaſt. Their lands, if they had any, were all confiſcated, and their goods and chattels exterminated; and the adult perſons among them were compelled to take an oath, before they departed, that they would go to the archbiſhop, wherever he was, in order to load him with the charge of maintaining them, and alſo to grieve him with the ſpectacle of their diſtreſs. This cruelty was heightened by the king's appointment of Ranulph de Broc (to whom was given likewiſe the cuſtody of the archiepiſcopal manors), a man of all work to pleaſe the king, a wretch of the moſt unfeeling and rapacious diſpoſition, and an old and bitter enemy of the primate, to carry this cruel and moſt diabolical decree into execution[2]. There is a letter ſtill exiſting, without a name, addreſſed to king Henry by one of his friends, whereby it appears, that the writer had repreſented to him, with an honeſt freedom, the injuſtice and cruelty of proſcribing innocent perſons for the archbiſhop's offence; many of whom were no way related to him in blood[3]. It ſeems as if this remonſtrance was well received by the king; for he acknowledged the truth of its contents, and promiſed to act more favourably to the perſons alluded to; but the breach of the royal word was experienced in this, as on moſt other occaſions; nothing was done in their behalf. Thoſe innocent ſufferers, however, met with ſome pity and kindneſs from people abroad. Some of them were abſolved by the pope from the oath they had taken, and remained in Flanders, where they were ſupported by the friends of the archbiſhop. The king of France, the queen of Sicily, and many other perſons of rank, took care of others.

In the year 1165, and in Eaſter-week, by the procurement of the pope, the kings, Lewis and Henry, had an interview at Giſors. Among other matters which wanted to be adjuſted between them, one of the chief was the affair of the archbiſhop of Canterbury. But they came to no agreement; Henry refuſing to recede from his demand of an entire ſubmiſſion on the part of the archbiſhop; and Lewis perſevering in his reſolution to protect him. Not long after, a conference was propoſed between Henry and the pope; to which the former at length aſſented; but on the condition that Becket ſhould not be preſent. The latter, hearing of this, intreated Alexander, by letters, not to agree to the interview on thoſe terms; telling him, "that without an interpreter, as ſkilfull as he was in the king's language, his holineſs would be in danger of being deceived by the king's ſubtelty." Whereupon the ſovereign pontiff ſent back this meſſage to Henry, "That it had never been heard of in any age, that the church of Rome, at the command of any prince whatſoever, had driven any perſon out of her ſuite, eſpecially one who was baniſhed for the cauſe of righteouſneſs: but that it was a privilege and authority granted from above, to the apoſtolic ſee, to ſuccour the exiled and oppreſſed of all nations, againſt the fury of their princes."

The coming of the archbiſhop of Cologne into England has been mentioned above. Soon after that prelate's return, the following letter was ſent him by king Henry: "I have long wiſhed that ſome occaſion was given me to leave the party of pope Alexander, and his perfidious cardinals, who preſume to maintain that traytor Thomas, ſome time archbiſhop of Canterbury, againſt me. Wherefore, by the advice of all my barons, and with the conſent of my clergy, I now intend to ſend to Rome ſome principal men of my kingdom; viz. the archbiſhop of York, the biſhop of London, the archdeacon of Poitiers, Richard de Lucy, and John of Oxford, who publicly and openly, in behalf of myſelf and the whole kingdom, and of all the other territories under my government, ſhall propound and denounce to pope Alexander, and his cardinals, that I do expect they ſhall no longer ſupport that traytor, but ſo rid me of him, as that I may, with the advice of my clergy, eſtabliſh another in the church of Canterbury; and ſhall further require, that they revoke and annul whatſoever he has done. This alſo ſhall they demand, that in their preſence the pope ſhall cauſe an oath to be publicly taken, that he himſelf, and his ſucceſſors, ſhall for ever maintain (as far as in them lies) to me, and all my ſucceſſors, the royal cuſtoms of my grandfather Henry, unſhaken, and inviolate. But if it ſhall ſo happen that they refuſe any one of my demands, then neither I, nor my clergy, will any longer pay any obedience to Alexander; nay, we will openly oppoſe him, and all his adherents; and whoſoever in my dominions is found to perſiſt in a wilful adherence to his party, ſhall be driven into baniſhment. We therefore intreat you, as our deareſt friend, that you will not fail to ſend us ſpeedily brother Arnold, or brother Radulph, of the order of the knight's hoſpitalers, who, on the part of the emperor and yourſelf, may give my embaſſadors a ſafe conduct to go and return through the emperor's territories."

---

[1] Pontigni, in Burgundy, a poor abbey, preferred by Thomas to any abbey in the French dominions; wherein, if he continued to reſide, a ſuſpicion might ariſe, that he took a ſhare in the counſels of the enemies of his king, to hurt the latter; an imputation he laboured to avoid.

[2] Gervas, Matth. Paris, &c.

[3] Lyttelton.

Let me inform the reader, that upon the death of pope Adrian, anno 1159, two popes were choſen, viz. Alexander and Octavian. To the latter adhered Frederic, emperor of Germany; to the former, the kings of France and England. In the conteſt that enſued on this occaſion, Alexander had at firſt the worſt of it, and was driven out of Italy, and choſe France for the place of his refuge, and took up his reſidence at Sens[1]. While fortune was adverſe to Alexander, it was a matter of great moment to him to preſerve the attachment of the king of England, whom the antipope and emperor ſtrongly ſolicited to join their party. An indiſcreet ſupport of Becket might have brought Alexander into the moſt alarming criſis. He ſaw the juſtice of Becket's cauſe, and was ſteady in his ſupport, but preſerved great ſhew of friendſhip to the king of England, and took his meaſures with great caution. In the ſpring of the year 1165, he ventured back to Italy, which was terribly harraſſed by the emperor, Frederic Barbaroſſa, during part of that ſummer, before the end of which, however, that prince ſuſtained a ſudden ſhock, which ruined all his power in that country. While Alexander's affairs were in a moſt alarming ſtate, by the tranſient ſucceſs of the emperor's arms, the Engliſh miniſters were diſpatched to the holy ſee by way of Germany. We do not find, however, that they ever got to Italy; but we gather from the pontifical hiſtory, that two of Henry's embaſſadors, viz. Richard of Ivelcheſter, archdeacon of Poitiers, and John of Oxford, attended a diet at Wurſtburg, convened for the more ſolemn acknowledgement of Guido de Crema, a ſecond antipope of the imperial faction, called by his adherents pope Paſcal III. The emperor himſelf, and all the princes and biſhops there preſent, ſwore to obey the ſaid Paſcal, and never to acknowledge Orlando, called Alexander, or any ſucceſſor elected by thoſe of his party. Before the concluſion of theſe proceedings, arrived Richard of Ivelcheſter, and John of Oxford, at Wurſtburg (now Wittingburg), who took an oath upon the relics of the ſaints, the moſt ſolemn mode of ſwearing in thoſe ages; "That the king of England, and his whole kingdom, would faithfully adhere to the emperor's party, and conſtantly acknowledge the pope whom he had acknowledged, and do nothing more in ſupporting the ſchiſmatic Orlando, i.e. Alexander III." This ſtands upon record in the emperor's very letters patent. And yet we find the archbiſhop of Rouen, who ſtuck at nothing, not even at perjuring himſelf, to pleaſe his lord Henry, king of England, and duke of Normandy, roundly aſſerting in a ſolemn letter, "that neither by himſelf, nor by his embaſſadors, had the king of England given any oath or promiſe that he would acknowlege the antipope." And the biſhop of London, Henry's tool, and reluctant defender, and his moſt confidential miniſter in this nefarious buſineſs of Becket, in a letter to pope Alexander, written for the purpoſe of vindicating the king's conduct, and ſoftening the diſpleaſure of that pontiff, aſſures the latter, "that the king had ſolemnly declared, that he had not withdrawn his reverence for that pontiff, nor ever purpoſed to do it; but, ſo long as his holineſs would act towards him with a paternal affection, he would love him as a father, and obey his injunctions, ſaving his own royal dignity, and that of his kingdom." The ſame conditions are expreſſed in a letter, written by the king, to the college of cardinals, as an anſwer to ſome complaints the pope had made on that ſubject. He there aſſures them, "That it was his moſt hearty deſire to perſevere in the integrity of love to that pontiff, if his holineſs would, in return, maintain to him and his kingdom the ſame honour and dignity as holy and venerable popes of Rome had maintained to his predeceſſors[2]."

In this important affair the holy ſee had a very nice part to act. Henry had certainly laid Alexander under conſiderable obligations, by declaring for him, in the great ſtruggle between him and the antipopes; and the pontiff was diſpoſed to keep him in his intereſt, and oblige him, as far as he could do it, without giving a deadly wound to the papal authority, which Alexander was not of a diſpoſition to do, nor probably would have done in any extremity of his affairs. At preſent his ſtrength was increaſing by the advantages he had gained over the antipopes, and imperial party; and Lewis le jeune was diſpoſed to give him all his aid, to oblige Henry to do juſtice to Becket and the church. Whenever it ſuited his intereſt, king Henry would ſtoop to the moſt mortifying humiliations, and ſwear and promiſe any thing to extricate himſelf from a preſent embarras; but his malice was implacable, and his rapacity inſatiable: as ſoon as his opponents, truſting to his ſolemn vows and declarations, were ſoothed into terms of conciliation, and put off their guard, he fell immediately on his defenceleſs prey, and gratified at once his revenge and his rapacity. The conſtitutions of Clarendon were affirmed by him to have been prerogatives of the Engliſh crown in the time of Henry I. But this was abſolutely denied by Becket, who underſtood the queſtion as well as any man. The perſon of the king he highly revered, as his prince, his liege lord, his benefactor, and his friend; but he ſaid, "That as he was bound to render unto Cæſar the things that were Cæſar's, ſo he muſt render unto God the things that were God's." He urged, that to yield to the king on the preſent occaſion was detrimental to him, and highly diſloyal; for that if the church, which had recognized his ſovereignty, and made him, by the act of conſecration, the Lord's anointed, were deſtroyed, his beſt title would be undermined, and his chief ſecurity be withdrawn; and conſequently, that to betray the church, would be to deſtroy the king. In his letters and manifeſtos, Henry had aſſerted, that theſe conſtitutions had been declared, by the whole aſſembly of his clergy and baronage, to be the prerogatives of the crown in the time of Henry I. Why was the time of Henry I. reſorted to, and not that of Stephen? Why, truly, Stephen had been elected upon conditions favourable to liberty and defined government. Henry had no more reliſh for the mode of Stephen's election, and his laws, than for his perſon and royalty. Therefore Stephen's name was ſuppreſſed, and his acts conſidered as nullities; which was oppreſſive on the part of Henry, and unjuſtifiable in point of law; for certainly Stephen's laws were as valid as his own. Theſe conſtitutions are ſaid to have been allowed and ratified by the whole clergy and baronage of England. By the clergy, we muſt underſtand a few of the biſhops, for we read of no abbots or priors taking any ſhare in the debate at the council of Clarendon; and probably there were but few of the biſhops. There were at that time ſeventeen Engliſh biſhops. It was uſual with Henry to keep the biſhopricks open for a good while, ſometimes for 10 or 15 years, in order to appropriate the temporalties of them to his own uſe, during the avoidance. At this time ſeveral ſees were vacant, and ſeveral biſhops nearly worn out with age and infirmity [1].

---

[1] He wrote alſo from hence many epiſtles to his co-biſhops, ſometimes to them collectively, ſometimes ſeverally; exhorting them to reſume the ſpirit of God, and, without fearing the loſs of worldly things, oppoſe themſelves, as a wall, for the houſe of God; and particularly cautioned them againſt joining in the ſchiſm of the emperor, and his pſeudo-biſhops. Stephanides.

[2] Vide Ep Joh. Saleſbury, apud du Cheſne, Brady, Du Cheſne, Lyttelton, & Auctores ab ipſis citatos.

The council at Clarendon was held in January, a ſeaſon when it was almoſt impoſſible for the diſtant and aged biſhops to go to that royal manor. This place was probably only a temporary reſidence, no more than a ſort of inn or hotel for the king in paſſing from one part of his realm to another. Probably then there were only 6 or 7 biſhops; and abbots, if any there, were of no account. We can hardly ſuppoſe the aſſembly convened there, and at ſuch a time of the year, to be numerous. But the conſtitutions, according to Henry, were made by the counſel of the whole baronage of England. King Henry's noble biographer lays great ſtreſs upon this, as if it was a ſolemn, regular, and complete act of all the barons of England. The inſinuation is not founded. It is a common expreſſion, to denote the barons who compoſed any particular great council. Till after the making of magna carta, I do not find that many of the barons of the realm were uſed to be ſummoned (and no baron did ever attend without a ſummons) to the king's parliament. If the king was in the North, he ſummoned ſome of the Northern barons, ſuch, probably, as were near, or ſuch as he liked, to compoſe his great council or parliament; in like manner, when he held his parliament in other places, he ſeems to have convened only a ſmall part of the barons of the realm; probably not above twenty or thirty, and thoſe ſelected and mixed up with others who were not magnates of the realm, or tenants of the king by barony, but forenſic or other perſons whom the king judged proper for his purpoſe. This fluctuating and imperfect aſſembly was deemed by the king ſufficient to form his ſupreme court of civil and criminal judicature, to give validity to his acts of ſtate, to adviſe him in his moſt arduous affairs, and to define and declare the law: Were I to go ſo far as to ſay, to make laws, I might perhaps aſſign to it a power of which it was in poſſeſſion, and which it claimed. Let it be remembered, that the acts of this aſſembly were deemed the acts of the king, being what he did, by the advice and decree of his common, or great council. Deſpotiſm being the natural conſequence of an authority ſo diſcretional and large, and increaſing to a degree intolerable; at length a ſteady and manly reſiſtance was made to it in the reign of John; terminating in the magna carta, which was a mere definition and declaration of law, and contained no ſort of new conceſſion on the part of the crown [2]. Henry the Second's government, therefore, ſhould be examined, if we wanted to judge of its merit, by that conſtitutional code, to which it may be ſuppoſed in part to have given riſe. It has been generally ſuppoſed, that Becket was a turbulent and ſeditious churchman, denying the juſt and legal prerogative of the king, and determined to enlarge the claims of the holy ſee at the riſk of his own life, and at the expence of the law and conſtitution of England. No charge of this ſort can ſtand upon a worſe foundation. He conteſted the matter with argument only, drawn from the canons of the church, and the cuſtoms of England. He bore no ill-will to king Henry, but was his faithful liegeman. He refuſed, at the expence of his oath, and upon ſtrong grounds, to be acceſſary to the deſtruction of the church. And as to the conſtitutions of Clarendon, all the Engliſh biſhops thought them pravities and innovations; and blamed him, not for oppoſing what was wrong, but for not conniving and temporiſing, which his brethren thought would in the iſſue be leſs hurtful to the church, than an open oppoſition to ſo violent and arbitrary, ſo powerful and vindictive, a prince as Henry II. who made ſolemn proteſtations of good-meaning to the church, while he was rendering it his moſt abject ſlave by expreſs ſtatute.

As ſoon as the archbiſhop got a little ſettled at Pontigny, he determined not to be idle or diſſipated, but to put every moment of his time to good uſe [3]. Spiritual diſcipline and avocations engaged a large part of his attention; and indeed ſo much was he devoted to employments of this ſort, that he ſeemed to have nothing but God, and his improvement in piety, in his thoughts. His humility, mildneſs, and condeſcenſion, won the hearts of the whole convent. He did not diſdain the toils of the field, but he would go with the other fryars, and help them in reaping and mowing, and harveſting their crops [4]. But theſe were not his only employments. He reſerved a portion of his time for ſtudying the Scriptures, and adding to his general fund of knowledge. He procured a large ſtock of books, and obtained from the pope a copious collection of papal privilegia [4]. If he heard of there being in France any book of antiquity, or public eſteem, he got a copy of it made for himſelf, intending all theſe as literary treaſure for his church of Canterbury, which was more beholden to him for books and records, than it had ever been to any archbiſhop before him. More than a year was ſpent in this retirement, and amidſt theſe occupations; when the diſtreſs of his friends who had ſhared in his exile, excited his moſt tender feelings, and rouſed him afreſh into action. Among thoſe who had followed his fortune, were many eminent and pious dignitaries, and clerks of the church, who were now reduced to the extremity of want, by the proſcription of their perſons, and the confiſcation of their benefices. Many of theſe he now found himſelf in no capacity to relieve. And he had the concern to ſee many of thoſe, who were driven out of England on his account, abſolutely die of want. To relieve his mind of the agony it felt on theſe accounts, and eſpecially for the injury ſuſtained by the church, he opened a freſh correſpondence with the king of England. It is the letter which begins with "Deſiderio deſideravi," and may be ſeen in the printed chronicles of that time. He ſent his letter, which he took care ſhould have nothing in it that ſavoured of rebuke or harſhneſs, but be full of mild and gentle admonition, by the hand of a Ciſtertian abbot, whoſe order was then in the higheſt degree of public reſpect. But his nuncio came back in a ſhort time, and brought back hard and ſevere reproofs, for his gentle admonitions. The archbiſhop, upon hearing what anſwer the king returned, ſent him a ſecond admonition by other men of religion, written with more freedom: to which nothing again was ſent back but abuſe and reproach. At this his holy zeal took fire; and he determined now to deſiſt from the language of admonition, and proceed to that of commination. He was now armed by the pope's commiſſion, with the office of his legate à latere; and had the power of anathematizing king Henry, and his partizans, and involving his dominions in the ſentence of interdict. And he cauſed it to be ſignified to that prince, that if he did not relent, and do juſtice to the church, the cenſure of it ſhould be pronounced upon him in its utmoſt ſeverity, without further delay. This threat had no other effect upon the king than inflaming his wrath, and putting him upon expedients for defending himſelf, and annoying his adverſary. With reſpect to the obnoxious ſtatutes, he does not appear from firſt to laſt to have given up an iota thereof that materially affected his deſpotiſm; and the ſtretch of his policy was employed in enforcing them throughout England, avoiding as much as poſſible the diſcuſſion of their merits in his foreign negociations. Being now exaſperated againſt the primate more than ever, he ſummoned his grandees [5] and familiars (ſays John of Saliſbury)

---

[1] Stephanides.
[2] Matth. Paris.
[3] Gervas.
[4] Stephanides.

[5] By grandees, I conceive he means the higher order of his vaſſals, who were bound by their oath of fealty, and upon pain of forfeiting their fiefs, to give their lord or prince council when ſummoned by him for that purpoſe. In the preſent inſtance, the liſbury) to a colloquy or parliament at Chinon. "This aſſembly (continues the ſame writer) was compoſed of men who would ſpare no pains to help forward deeds of iniquity, wherein they were hackneyed, as people very well knew; and were ſages of the law, ſo far only as chicane and villainy were to be their object. The king, with much earneſtneſs, in a diſcourſe copiouſly larded with intreaties, threats, and promiſes, craved their advice how he could act in the moſt effectual manner againſt the church. Complaining moſt bitterly againſt the archbiſhop, he uttered his harangue with a profuſion of ſighs and groans. And, as people who were preſent told me afterwards, he cryed miſerably, and ſaid, "That the archbiſhop of Canterbury would deſtroy both his life and his ſoul." At length he told the whole aſſembly, "That they were all no better than a ſet of traytors [1], who declined to apply their endeavour and aſſiſtance to rid him of the infeſtation of that one man." The biſhop of Liſieux gave him ſome comfort, by pointing out to him, that the only thing he could do to avert the impending ſentence, was by throwing in the archbiſhop's way the obſtacle of appeal. And ſo by what means I know not, unleſs it be, that truth, the more it be ventilated, the more ſtrength it gets; and juſtice, the more it is ſhaken, the more it flouriſhes; while the king, by his anceſtorial cuſtoms, endeavours to evacuate the right of appeal to the ſee of Rome, the more confirms it, while he himſelf, to ſave his own head, is obliged to fly to the refuge of appeals. From this council then departed, from the face of God and their king, the biſhops of Liſieux and Sais, haſtening to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, that, the appeal being thus interpoſed, they might ſuſpend his ſentence to the octaves of Eaſter. But the Engliſh archbiſhop, who was getting ready for launching the ſentence, had made a journey to the city of Soiſſons to pray there, it being a place peculiarly commemorative of the Bleſſed Virgin, the archbiſhop's particular patroneſs, to whom, as well as to St. Drauſius (to whom warriors who expect ſharp conflicts make their oriſons), and to St. Gregory (the founder of the Engliſh church), he might commend his agony by ſupplications. St. Drauſius was a moſt glorious confeſſor, who, as the Franks and Lotharingians believe, renders champions invincible, who commemmorate him by nocturnal vigils; and to him fly the Italians and Burgundians in neceſſities of the ſame ſort. And there Robert de Montford paſſed the night before his ſingle combat with Henry of Eſſex. And thus, by God's ordaining, the ſolicitude of the king's biſhops proved fruitleſs, for when they got to Pontigny, they did not find the archbiſhop, whom they appealed, but returned as they came, excepting that they were very angry at the loſs of ſo much labour. But the archbiſhop, after ſpending three nights in ſupplications to the three aforeſaid ſaints, on the day following the feaſt of the Aſcenſion, haſtened to Vizelay, that he might there, on the feaſt of Pentecoſt, give ſentence of anathema againſt king Henry and his abettors. But by the divine aſſent it happened, that while he was in the church of St. Reginian, on the day preceding the feſtival of Pentecoſt, unqueſtionable information was brought to him, that the king of England was fallen into ſo grievous an illneſs, that he could not poſſibly attend the king of France at the parliament, which Henry had himſelf procured by ſtrong intreaty and large gifts; of which indiſpoſition the Engliſh king had ſent notice to the king of France, by Richard archdeacon of Poitiers, and R. de Humez, who had atteſted the truth of it by oath. The king of France notified this fact to the Engliſh primate, by his ſpecial nuncio; whereupon the latter poſtponed to iſſue the ſentence, as he had intended to do. But he there publicly denounced John of Oxford excommunicated; and by authority of the Roman pontiff excommunicated him, to uſe his own words, "becauſe he had fallen into a condemned hereſy, by taking a ſacrilegious oath to the Emperor; and communicated with the ſchiſmatic of Cologne; and, againſt the mandate of the lord pope, uſurped the deanery of the church of Sarum." Theſe cauſes he alledged in the pulpit in the hearing of all perſons, who from divers nations had come to celebrate the feaſt at Vizelay. In the ſame place, on various accounts, and for good cauſes, he excommunicated Richard archdeacon of Poitiers, and Richard de Luci, Joſcel. de Baillol, Ranulph de Broc, Hugo de Sancto Claro, and Thomas Fitz-Bernard, and all thoſe who ſhould in future lay their hands upon the poſſeſſions and goods of the church of Canterbury, or abuſe them, or hinder them from the uſe of thoſe for whoſe neceſſities they were deputed. But the king, whom he had before by letters, and nuncios, according to the rule and cuſtom of the church, called to make ſatisfaction, he invited by a public admonition to the fruit of repentance; threatening, that, unleſs he ſpeedily repented, and made ſatisfaction for his numerous attempts againſt the church, he ſhould fulminate againſt him the ſentence of anathema; which, nevertheleſs, he will not do but with the greateſt reluctance; nor will any of his confidential friends be forward in recommending to him. Moreover, he publicly condemned the writing, in which were contained thoſe malignant depravities, called the avitæ conſuetudines; involving in the bond of anathema all thoſe who ſhould hereafter pay any kind of regard to them, or hold them to be of any weight or authority [2]. He particularly condemned the following capitula." Then follows a recital of the moſt obnoxious parts of the conſtitutions of Clarendon. This from John of Saliſbury.

As a further precaution king Henry loſt no time in ſending his mandate to Richard de Lucy [3], who then held the prefecture of England [4], that Richard ſhould compel the biſhops and perſons (i. e. the eccleſiaſtical the grandees who attended his parliament were, I conceive, ſome of his Norman and foreign vaſſals, or barons, whom he ſelected for the occaſion. The other ſort of men, called by my author familiars, could, I think, be no other than his counſellors in ordinary, ſometimes ſtyled his juſticiars, on account of their judicial office in his curia, which followed his perſon, or barones à latere ejus, as I find barons of this claſs ſometimes ſtyled, to diſtinguiſh them from the magnates, or grandees, who only attended the prince when ſummoned; whereas the familiares performed that duty ex officio, and conſtantly.

---

[1] Traytor carried in it every thing denoting villainy, cowardice, and ingratitude. What can we think of a king who could make this ſpeech to the nobles of his great council? It was in conſequence of a repetition of ſuch a reproach, that four of his barons leagued to aſſaſſinate Becket. We ſee from the paſſage before us, that this king had more than once demanded the blood of this man, as a tribute due from his barons to their ſovereign.

[2] Statutes of Clarendon. John of Saliſbury, an exile with Becket on account of theſe ſtatutes, being apprehenſive that Henry would require all the clergy to ſwear to them who were with Becket, or never allow them to return to England, writes thus: "Nam ſi de juramentis agitur, quæ dominus rex a nobis exigere conſuevit; rogo Deum meum, ut ante mihi mortem miſericorditur largiater, quam conſcientiam & famam meam juramentis talibus maculare." Du Cheſne, tom. IV. p. 480.

[3] Gervas.

[4] i. e. High juſtice, Richard de Lucy. John of Saliſbury, ſpeaking of the archbiſhop of Rouen, Richard de Humet, high juſtice of Normandy, and Richard de Lucy being ſworn to a treaty, as ſubſtitutes of king Henry, adds, "quorum juramenta contra voluntatem Domini ſui (ſc. regis Henrici) Franci noſtri non appretiantur vel obolum."

Richard de Lucy, high juſtice. In May 1167, our Robert earl of Leiceſter acted as high juſtice, repreſenting the king in the election of the abbot of St. Alban's. See Rad. de Diceto. As Robert deteſted the ſchiſmatics, and was the friend of Becket, Henry's conduct could not be agreeable to him. Richard de Lucy was perhaps a ſort of auxiliary high juſtice. It ſeems to have been within the power of the king to appoint ſuch an officer, although he might not be able formally to ſuperſede the high juſtice, regularly appointed by himſelf, probably under patent by the advice of his great council. See the caſe of the biſhop of Chicheſter, in the time of Henry III. And the kings of France, from antient times, down to the late French revolution, could not amove the chancellor; but theſe kings took upon themſelves (whether lawfully without the chancellor's concurrence Q.) to appoint a keeper of the ſeal, which was ſufficient for their purpoſe.

dignitaries) of England, and the monks of Canterbury, to appeal againſt the archbiſhop. This was done by king Henry, while he was in Normandy. Upon receiving this mandate, the biſhops of England held a convention in London, and appealed. Nor did theſe meaſures ſatisfy the king; ſtill fearing that the interdict might go forth againſt his realm, he iſſued his writs to hinder its getting into England. He ſent orders that all the ports ſhould be diligently watched, and that, if any eccleſiaſtic was found to bring over ſuch letters, he ſhould be puniſhed with mutilation of members; if any layman, with death. He alſo commanded, that if any of the biſhops, for fear of ſuch interdict, ſhould depart out of the kingdom in obedience to the ſummons of the primate, he ſhould not be permitted to carry any thing with him, except his ſtaff; and that all clergy ſtudying abroad, ſhould ſpeedily return into England, or be deprived of their benefices, and be baniſhed for ever. All prieſts who ſhould refuſe, in purſuance of the interdict, to perform divine ſervice, were to be caſtrated; and for any rebellious act, that is, I ſuppoſe, not conforming to the ſtatutes of Clarendon, they were to be puniſhed with the loſs of their benefices.

The exiled archbiſhop had found a comfortable aſylum at Pontigni, where he had been placed by the procurement of pope Alexander. Although the maintenance of him, and ſome of his particular friends, had put the abbey to a great expence; yet they found their finances ſo little impaired by the charge, that they thought the preſence of ſo holy a man brought down upon their convent a kind of miraculous plenty, and they thought themſelves highly favoured of heaven, which had ſent the good and perſecuted archbiſhop among them. Henry was now determined to vex both him and the convent, by compelling them to ſeparate. The monks of the order of Citeaux were ſcattered through Henry's vaſt dominions, and were almoſt infinite[1]. He ſent threatening letters to the general chapter of the Ciſtertians, ſignifying, "that they had received and entertained an enemy of his, viz. Thomas archpræſul of Canterbury;" and commanded, "that, as they held dear their poſſeſſions on both ſides the ſea, they would harbour him no longer[2]." At the diſſolution of the chapter, therefore, the biſhop of Pavia, who had been a monk of the order, and certain abbots belonging thereto, went to the archbiſhop at Pontigny, and in the name of the chapter reported to him the king's letter, and the order therein. They repreſented to the archbiſhop, "that although the chapter had received ſuch mandate and threat, they did not mean to drive him from Pontigny; but wiſhed he would conſider of the matter, and do as he ſhould think proper." After a ſhort conſultation with his friends, he made anſwer, "That he would by no means bring hurt to the order by ſtaying at Pontigny;" adding, "That go where he would, or in what place ſoever he laid his head, he would immediately leave his preſent abode." The meſſengers of the chapter went back with this anſwer[3]. This ſpiteful proceeding muſt have been highly offenſive to pope Alexander, who had placed Becket at Pontigni, and owed a peculiar regard to that order, becauſe they had loſt all their convents in the empire, by refuſing to join the ſchiſm againſt pope Alexander[4].

When the news of this affair was brought to Lewis le Jeune, he thanked God for what had happened, and ſaid to the meſſenger, "I am both glad and ſorry for this event; I am ſorry that the monks of the Ciſtertian order, who I thought feared and loved God alone, ſhould now, either out of love or fear of mortal man, withdraw their alms from a man of God. At this I grieve. Alas! where is religion?" He added, "I rejoice that opportunity is offered to us of ſhewing our regard for ſo great a man. Let him, let him come to us, and he ſhall feel the goodneſs and charity of the French nation." The king then ſent one of his chief nobles, with three hundred men, to meet him; theſe eſcorted the archbiſhop from Pontigny with great honour into France. He left this abbey about the feaſt of St. Martin, Nov. 1166, after a reſidence there of about two years; and in his journey to France he was attended by the abbot of that houſe. In France he took up his reſidence in the abbey of St. Columba, near Sens, whoſe archbiſhop, together with the people of that city, paid him the higheſt honors, and in this abbey he reſided about four years. Nor did theſe precautions ſatisfy the exulcerated mind of Henry: ſo much was he enraged and terrified at what Thomas had done at Vizelay, and what he further threatened to do, that he ſent John of Oxford to the court of Rome with certain advices and propoſals, which he thought ſhould be imparted to his holineſs. John of Oxford took with him letters from king Henry, full of reſpect to the pope, and intreaty with regard to Becket, and highly commendatory of his preſent ambaſſador, whom he deſired to be credited, as to his depoſitions, as much as the pontiff would credit Henry himſelf, if he were with his holineſs[5]. The Engliſh miniſter, with the advantage of ſuch credentials, could not fail of a courteous reception. He aſſured the pope, "that the king wiſhed to ſtand or fall by his holineſs's own determination of the queſtion concerning the ſtatutes of Clarendon, and would make peace with the archbiſhop upon the terms of the pope's own preſcribing. And it was even ſignified by the letters which he brought, that the king had publicly ſaid, he would preſerve to his clergy that liberty which they had enjoyed in the reign of his grandfather king Henry[6]. And to remove the prejudice which lay againſt him for his conferences and engagements with the ſchiſmatics, the archdeacon took a poſitive and public oath, that at the meeting he had had with them, he had done nothing againſt the faith of the church, and the honour and intereſt of his holineſs." The conſcience of Alexander was ſurprized on this occaſion, and he had very nearly ſacrificed the primate by an act of inadvertence. John obtained all that he aſked for his maſter; and having previouſly reſigned the deanry of Saliſbury into the hands of the pope, he was collated thereto afreſh by the hand of that pontiff, and his negociation was crowned by a complete abſolution from the ſentence of excommunication lately inflicted upon him by Thomas of Canterbury, in quality of legate. He returned to the king with theſe joyful tidings, and further acquainted him that his holineſs would forthwith ſend his legates a latere, who would ſettle the matters that had cauſed ſo much diſquiet, to the honour of king Henry, and to the confuſion of his enemy.

Shortly after the appointment of his legates, and their and John of Oxford's departure, he received letters from the archbiſhop, which gave him a better knowledge of affairs, and ſhewed him the great miſtake he had committed. He therefore loſt no time in diſpatching meſſengers after the legates with new inſtructions, whereby they were prohibited from taking any definitive ſtep againſt Becket, or acting in any other capacity than merely that of mediators and adviſers. And when he reflected on John of Oxford's perjury, and the king of England's duplicity, he had a worſe opinion of them than ever. And indeed had the pope entertained a wiſh of giving up the archbiſhop, he could hardly have done it with prudence, for the king of France was inflexible in procuring juſtice for Thomas. This unexpected reſtriction upon the legates made Henry outrageous. He had entertained the moſt ſanguine expectations of a ſpeedy and complete triumph over Becket. Upon ſeeing the limited powers of the legates, he became convinced that he had not advanced one ſtep toward accompliſhing his favourite point.

The king of France had this ſpring and ſummer waged war againſt him, through the inſtigation, as he aſſerted, although falſely, of Becket. After ſpending many months in endeavouring to bring matters to an iſſue, and after divers conferences with the king and archbiſhop, the legates returned to Italy. The king was ſo angry with both of them before they departed, that even in their hearing he declared, "that he wiſhed never more to ſee the face of a cardinal." Nevertheleſs, when they afterwards had their audience of leave, he begged their aſſiſtance and interceſſion with the pope, to rid him of Thomas, archbiſhop; and ſpoke with ſo much emotion, that he even ſhed tears; at which cardinal Williamſon ſeemed alſo to weep, while cardinal Otho could not forbear laughing. The latter gave notice to the pope, by a ſecret channel, "that he never would be concerned in depoſing Thomas, nor conſenting thereunto, though the king ſeemed to deſire nothing but his head in a charger."

---

[1] Gervas, & alii Cronici.

[2] Gervas.

[3] Lyttelton.

[4] Gervas.

[5] Joh. Sarum.

[6] Lyttelton. If this were true, Becket would have lived in quiet. The noble hiſtorian would have us be'ieve, that Henry had in his heart all that he uttered, whereas no man's words and actions could be more at variance. There was nothing to bind Henry but his word, on which there could be no rational reliance. Hinc lacrymæ.

In the beginning of the year 1168, preliminaries of peace were agreed on between the kings of England and France, and a final ratification of a treaty of amity was to be made in a grand parliament held at Montmirail. Henry's deceit and perfidy had rendered him odious all over France: but when Lewis, who was of an open, honeſt, and liberal diſpoſition, ſhewed a diſpoſition to accommodate matters to Henry's ſolid advantage; the latter expreſſed his devotion to Lewis in language of ſuch groveling ſervility as would have diſgraced the pooreſt man upon earth; and readily conſented to do homage to the French king, notwithſtanding he had repeatedly ſworn, that he never would ſtoop again to that humiliating ceremonial. Lewis was determined to take this opportunity of bringing about a thorough reconciliation between Henry and Thomas. During the quarrel between theſe two, the former had frequently ſaid, "That his honour was concerned in exacting ſubmiſſion from the primate; and that it was not ſo much his predilection for the points themſelves which had cauſed the diſpute, as his ſolicitude for the dignity of his royal name, that had rendered him ſo inflexible." And he intimated, that he would be ſatisfied with the archbiſhop's making ſuch general conceſſions as would juſtify him in the eye of the world, as a ground of cordial reconciliation: and he made a propoſal of this ſort by his internuncios to the archbiſhop himſelf, during this very parliament at Montmirail. If Henry was acquainted, as we may well ſuppoſe he was, with what the pope had lately promiſed to Thomas, we may account for Henry's condeſcenſion, without aſcribing it to any alteration of his mind and temper towards the former. For the pope had paſſed his word, "that if the king was not reconciled to him by the beginning of Lent following, he would then reſtore to him the full power of legate, and allow him to execute the plenitude of his office, not only upon particular perſons of high degree, but the kingdom itſelf, and the perſon of the king, without any obſtacle of an appeal, if he ſhould find it expedient." Thomas was ſo wrought upon by the king's overture, that he had almoſt conſented to ſubmit himſelf wholly to the king's will, that the latter might ſeem to have conquered. The archbiſhops of Rhemes, Sens, and Rouen, the king of France, the biſhops, the abbot of Montdieu, were of opinion that this was the beſt thing he could do, and thought it would be moſt adviſable to be wholly ſilent about the conſtitutions of Clarendon. "For what neceſſity," ſaid they, "of mentioning them? By your written inſtrument, you have condemned them by the pope's authority; and from the obſervance of them, you have releaſed all who gave their aſſent to them[1]."

A rumour was juſt got among the people, that king Henry would take the croſs of pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, if he could be ſuffered to reſtore peace to the church, in ſome manner conſiſtent with his honour. Although this was all a pretence (ſays my author), yet the declaration ſo won the hearts of the auditory, that the archbiſhop became doubly preſſed, impelled, and importuned, to conciliate matters, and ſeemed at laſt as if yielding his compliance. Under this expectation, the mediators and ſtanders-by took him to the two kings, who were together, expecting to eſtabliſh the reconciliation. The archbiſhop, almoſt at the beginning of his addreſs to Henry, threw himſelf at his feet; he was hardly proſtrate, before Henry caught hold of him, and lifted him up. The archbiſhop then ſtanding before the two kings, began devoutly and humbly to implore the king's clemency for the Church of England, committed to his charge, although very unworthy of it; and aſcribed its perturbation and ſore affliction to his own perſonal demerit: and added, "My whole cauſe, my lord, which has created ſo much diſagreement between us, I here, in the preſence of the lord king of Franks, and of theſe prelates and princes, ſubmit wholly to your will and pleaſure, ſaving the honour of God." At which Henry broke out into a violent rage, and uſed very groſs and vulgar language, to the great aſtoniſhment of the ſpectators, who thought more good manners were due to ſo illuſtrious an aſſembly[2]. He loaded the archbiſhop with every ſort of reproach. He laid a thouſand falſe things to his charge. He called him proud and arrogant, and the moſt ungrateful fellow living. All the good which the archbiſhop had done for him, while he was chancellor, was thrown in his diſh, as if it had been evil, vile, and abominable[3]; and directly accuſed him of an intention of taking away his crown. This ſudden alteration of his behaviour ſeemed, to thoſe who were ignorant of the cauſe, to be very extraordinary; but the reaſon was, that having, by falſe oaths and hypocritical humility, duped the king of France into juſt ſuch a treaty as he wiſhed, he was no longer induſtrious to ſuppreſs his violent hatred of Becket and his principles. The archbiſhop bore all this with great patience, and was careful, in making his anſwer, not to be ſlack or rigid. "My lord," ſaid he, "the ſervices I rendered you when I was chancellor deſerved your warmeſt thanks; but your anger turns them into ſo many crimes." Henry, ſeeing that his unmannerly behaviour, and foul treatment of the archbiſhop, was much diſapproved of, and that the good ſenſe and moderation of the primate won the hearts of all who were preſent, ſtopped him ſhort, and addreſſed the king of France in the following manner: "My lord king, be pleaſed to hear what I am about to ſay. Whatever this fellow is diſpleaſed with, he ſays, is contrary to the honour of God; and on this pretence he will lay claim not only to every thing that belongs to him, but to every thing that belongs to me. But, that I may not ſeem to have any inclination to intrench upon the honour of God, I make him this offer. There have been many kings of England, ſome of leſs, ſome of greater, authority than myſelf. There have been before him many archbiſhops of Canterbury, great and holy men. Let him therefore allow to me what the greateſt and moſt holy archbiſhops have allowed to my anceſtors; and I acquieſce, and am ſatisfied[4]. Indeed, I never expelled him my realm, but he fled of his own accord in a clandeſtine manner; and now he wants to perſuade you and this great aſſembly, that he is engaged in the cauſe of God and his church. I do declare, that I always willed and granted, and do at this moment will and grant, that he might, and may yet hold his church, and rule it in all that liberty in which any one of his predeceſſors did ever do who did rule it moſt fully and freely." The aſſembly were ſo ſatisfied with theſe ſolemn and generous proteſtations, that they thought the king had now done as much as ought to be expected from him. Of this opinion was the king of France, who, turning to the archbiſhop with a look of diſapprobation, ſaid, "Lord archbiſhop, do you want to be greater than the Saints? to be better than Peter himſelf? why do you heſitate? Peace is now in your option." The archbiſhop replied, "That he moſt willingly would receive his church in that liberty which his anceſtors had had it, but that he muſt be excuſed from conſenting to cuſtoms altogether repugnant to the inſtitutes of the Holy Fathers;" thereby declaring indirectly, that he would not conſent to the Conſtitutions of Clarendon, which he thought was a point that ought to be ſpecially adjuſted, but what his friends thought muſt be left as it was, or no peace could poſſibly take place. He was proceeding to ſtate the affair of his flight from England, which the king had called clandeſtine; when the mediators, who thought the agitation of that queſtion would prove an obſtacle to his reconciliation with Henry, hurried him out of the circle, perſuading and urging, demanding and deſiring, "that he would give glory to the king, and be ſilent about the honour of God." But he ſaid, "Our fathers ſuffered, becauſe they would not forbear the name of Chriſt: and ſhall I ſuppreſs the name of God, to recover the favour of man? God forbid!" Very many grandees, therefore, both of France and England, aroſe upon him, and imputed to his own obſtinacy, that peace between the king and him was not ſettled; and even went ſo far as to declare, "that, as he now withſtood the wiſhes of both kings, he was unworthy of the aſſiſtance of either, and that France ought not to receive ſuch an outcaſt into her boſom." The evening was now come on. The grandees diſperſed, and the two kings went away together on horſeback. Thomas, thus deſerted, was comforted with the thought that he had been deemed worthy by God to ſuffer in his cauſe. The king of France became ſo eſtranged from him as not to viſit him, as he had been wont, for ſeveral days, or even to ſend him neceſſary proviſions. Thomas returned to his lodging at Sens, and conferred with his friends on the ſad ſtate of his affairs. He was minded to ſet out on foot, and, depending upon God's providence, procure a ſubſiſtence by begging, taking with him a ſingle friend to bear him company. After ſome days of anxiety and ſuſpence, a ſervant of the French king ſignified to him his maſter's deſire to ſee him. The archbiſhop haſtened to the king, revolving with himſelf the apprehenſions of his famiſhed dependents, who all thought that they were now to be ordered orally by the king to leave his kingdom. When the archbiſhop and ſome of his friends approached the French king, and preſented to him their ſalutations, they found him ſitting with a melancholy countenance, and not riſing to the archbiſhop according to his uſual manner. After a ſhort pauſe, the king on a ſudden fell proſtrate at the archbiſhop's feet, and, amidſt a flood of tears and much ſobbing, addreſſed him thus: "Lord, my holy father, it was you only who ſaw the thing as it was; the reſt of us were all blind, who gave it as our advice, that to the nod of man you ſhould ſubmit the honour of God: I repent; father, forgive me, I pray thee; and abſolve me, miſerable man, from this ſin: from this hour I offer to thee my kingdom and myſelf." The king having been raiſed from the ground, and abſolved, and bleſſed by the archbiſhop, they held a long and a moſt friendly diſcourſe together; after which the archbiſhop went back to Sens. Whether this ſudden alteration of the French king's behaviour proceeded ſolely from repentance, can hardly be determined: but perhaps not altogether from that cauſe; for he had juſt diſcovered, that king Henry had broken all the conventions which he had made upon his oath, and under the mediation of the king of France, with the Poitevins and Britons, and was glutting his revenge againſt thoſe who had offended him, notwithſtanding the ſafety they depended on in conſequence of the treaty lately ratified between the two kings. He was now more convinced than ever of the duplicity and perfidy of Henry; and admired the archbiſhop's wiſdom, who would not truſt him, nor make the peace with him, which had been recommended, but upon clear and ſpecific terms. "To him," ſaid Lewis, "we ought to have gone for counſel; not he to us; who had a perfect knowledge of the king's temper and character." Other great perſons, who had acted in the mediation, now changed their note, and extolled the archbiſhop's noble firmneſs to the ſkies. The common people, even children, as the archbiſhop paſſed by, ſaid one to another, "This is the holy archbiſhop, who for kings would not deny God, nor with-hold his honour." Henry, hearing of theſe things, ſent diſpatches to the French king, expreſſive of his ſurprize, that he ſhould retain in his land the archbiſhop, who had contumaciouſly rejected the peace which had been offered him. Lewis ſent back word by Henry's nuncios, "That if the king of England would not annul and abandon what he called his ancient cuſtoms, he ſhould never think of renouncing the ancient cuſtom of the kings of France, with whom it had been a cuſtom and liberty to protect baniſhed men, eſpecially if they belonged to the church." The archbiſhop now, perceiving that he could not poſſibly ſucceed by mild means in reſtoring the peace of the church, proceeded to ſeverer expedients. By the licence of the lord pope and his own authority, he ſuſpended and excommunicated all who had done evil to the church. In theſe acts the names of the parties involved were ſpecified, with their reſpective offences; and the liſt contained ſeveral great perſons, both lay and eccleſiaſtical, who were neceſſary to the king's ſervice, and in his immediate ſuite: he denounced alſo vengeance upon thoſe who had ſeized the poſſeſſions of the ſee of Canterbury, or detained them being ſo ſeized. Theſe ſentences being diſperſed and executed, there was ſcarcely a perſon in the king's chapel who was able to give the kiſs of peace to the king according to the uſage of the church[1]; for they were all made objects of public obſervation, either by being perſonally involved in theſe ſentences, or by connection with thoſe who were. Biſhops, therefore, as well as grandees of the realm, fearing for themſelves, leſt ſimilar vengeance ſhould fall upon them, appealed to the pope again and again. But the king, not able to bear this damnation of his friends and counſellors, diſpatched two archdeacons to Rome, complaining of the injury done to his people, and craving that legates might be ſent over, who might abſolve the excommunicated, and make peace; threatening, that, if his requeſt was diſregarded, he ſhould be compelled to provide for his own ſecurity and honour. The archbiſhop alſo ſent his nuncios to the holy father, who took with them no gold or ſilver to corrupt, but parchments and ſtrong arguments to convince and obtain juſtice. And at length things came to this iſſue, that two legates, men of underſtanding and eloquence, ſhould be ſent; viz. Gratian, nephew of the late pope Eugenius, and Vivianus, an advocate in cauſes of the Roman court. Theſe cardinal legates, having ſpoken to the king, obtained from him, that the archbiſhop might return to England, and hold his archbiſhoprick and the temporalities of his ſee in peace, ſaving the prerogatives of his kingly power[1]. The legates, gladdened by this empty and deluſive conceſſion, and not aware of the ſecret deceit of it, decreed, that Vivian ſhould paſs over into England, and abſolve the excommunicate, and put the finiſhing hand to the reconciliation. But the next day, when the king was gone away, and the legates had diſcovered the deceit that lurked in the king's promiſes[2], they refuſed to confirm what they had promiſed. But, with a view to make further trial of the king's diſpoſition, they ſent after him Peter of Pavia the archdeacon, who, being roughly received, and moſt baſely laid hold of, was ſtripped of all his effects, and very narrowly eſcaped without caſtration. Gratian therefore, who had more ſpirit than Vivian, remonſtrated ſtrongly to the king, refuſed all his preſents, and ſet off for Rome, leaving Vivian behind. But the king, fearing his ſudden retreat, and ſeeing the king of France in great wrath with him for his perfidious conduct and breach of the treaty of Montmirail, bethought himſelf, by what ſubtilty he might be able to ſoothe that king, and reſtore peace to the archbiſhop, at leaſt to outward appearance; that he might not be compelled to do it at the inſtance of Gratian. It was given out, therefore, that he was much concerned at this reconciliation not having taken place, and that he much wiſhed to ſee it effected; but, almoſt deſpairing of having it in his power to hold another conference with the king of France (whom he had ſo highly offended), he went into that realm on pretence of praying at the ſhrine of ſome particular ſaint near Paris; hoping that, by this ſtratagem, he ſhould be able to obtain an interview with Lewis. Whether of his own accord, or otherwiſe, is not known; but Lewis met him at Mount-Martyr near Paris. After ſome diſcourſe about ſettling their perſonal affairs, all perſons preſent ſupplicated king Henry to make peace and amity with the archbiſhop. The king therefore aſſented that the archbiſhop ſhould go home in peace and ſecurity, and ſhould receive and hold his archbiſhoprick in that liberty which his predeceſſors had always enjoyed. And he promiſed, moreover, to give him 1000 marks to facilitate his return. But the archbiſhop was not ſatisfied with this compoſition. His loſs had been taxed, by perſons of the king's own choice, at 30,000 marcs[3]; and he inſiſted that the mediators ſhould not abſolve the king, unleſs he paid that ſum. But the king of France, and grandees of either realm, perſuaded the archbiſhop not to refuſe the king's grace on this account, but to wave it altogether. The primate conſented. When, therefore, every thing was ſo arranged, by command of the lord pope, the archbiſhop deſired ſome ſecurity for the performance of the king's engagements. The nobles of both kingdoms objected to this, as improper to be required by the archbiſhop of his lord the king[4]. The archbiſhop, therefore, gave it up, and ſaid he would be contented with a kiſs of the king's own mouth in confirmation of peace. This was mentioned by the king of France and the mediators to Henry, who made anſwer, "that he would willingly do this but for an oath that he had publicly made in a fit of anger, that he would never kiſs the archbiſhop, ſhould he even be reconciled unto him;" and added, "that, although he omitted the ceremony of the kiſs, he ſhould be as free from all rancour towards him as if he had not." But the king of France and the other mediators, ſuſpecting ſome poiſon to lurk in theſe ſweet profeſſions, reported theſe words to the archbiſhop, but declined to adviſe him either way. But the archbiſhop, who was too knowing to want advice on this occaſion, refuſed to accept of the peace, unleſs the king would give him the kiſs. Evening was now come on; lodgings were prepared for the king at Mantua, and the negotiation proved abortive. The king of England, as he went to his hotel, curſed the archbiſhop all the way, who had given him ſo many and ſuch great vexations. Of all theſe things the archbiſhop wrote a minute account to the pope; as did alſo the king of France. The latter, as well by letter, as by the voice of his nuncios, prayed his holineſs, out of perſonal regard and reverence to him, to protract no longer temporizing and uſeleſs meaſures, but proceed to deciſive expedients. And the archbiſhop of Sens[5] did himſelf take the journey to Rome, to ſolicit the pope in his own perſon to lay the dominions of the king of England under an interdict, if peace was not reſtored without further delay. All which could not but be ſoon known to the king of England; who, to prevent the miſchief that threatened him, loſt no time in providing for his ſecurity. Mandates were accordingly ſent over to England, containing directions for preventing ſentences of interdict and excommunication from getting into that realm. Old and young were promiſcuouſly required to ſwear to obey thoſe mandates, and carry their contents into full execution. All ſorts of perſons were required to abjure pope Alexander and Thomas of Canterbury, upon the penalties of confiſcation of property, and exile for life. The biſhops of England were convened, to ſwear that they would comply with, and aſſiſt in carrying into execution, theſe unreaſonable and wicked and odious injunctions. They durſt not, however, ſo ſet God at defiance, or ſo little value their characters, as to conſent to the king's demands. Geoffry Ridel, archdeacon of Canterbury, Richard, archdeacon of Poitiers, and ſome laymen, were the perſons commiſſioned by the king to aſſemble the biſhops and abbots at London, to make them ſwear, as all the laity were compelled to do, to conform to, and to carry into execution, the above-mentioned commands[6]. But neither biſhops nor abbots would obey the order for meeting, or give any countenance to the king's meaſure. Henry of Blois, brother of king Stephen, and biſhop of Winton, a man of great experience in public affairs, and now very aged, firſt proteſted againſt it; declaring, "that he would, to the laſt moment of his life, moſt devoutly obey the papal mandates, and thoſe of the church of Canterbury, to which he had ſworn fidelity and obedience;" and he enjoined all the clergy of his dioceſe to do the ſame. The biſhop of Exeter followed the example of that prelate; and then retired for ſafety into a monaſtery. The biſhop of Norwich, though expreſsly forbidden by the king, publiſhed a ſentence of excommunication againſt the earl of Cheſter and ſeveral others, conformably to injunctions laid upon him by his ghoſtly father the primate, even in the preſence of the king's officers, who ſerved him with the prohibition. Then deſcending from the pulpit, from whence ſuch ſentences were uſed to be promulgated, he laid his paſtoral ſtaff or crozier on the high altar, and ſaid "he would ſee who would dare ſacrilegiouſly to ſtretch out their hands againſt the lands or goods of his church." After which, going into the cloiſter of the abbey, he lived there with the monks. The biſhop of Cheſter was equally obedient to the archbiſhop's injunctions; and then, to ſecure himſelf from the officers of the crown, he withdrew into a part of his dioceſe belonging to the Welſh. Even the biſhop of London was refractory to the royal mandate on this occaſion[1]. He concurred with the biſhop of Norwich in paſſing the anathema and interdict againſt the earl of Cheſter; for which they were both put in miſericordiâ regis, and ſummoned by the ſheriffs and beadles of the ſeveral counties to appear before the king's juſtices for this act of theirs againſt the ſtatutes of Clarendon. They were charged with promulging the aforeſaid ſentences through their dioceſes without the king's licence[2].

---

[1] Gervas.

[2] Epiſt. Joh. Sarum, apud Du Cheſne.

[3] It was the intention of king Stephen to get his ſon Euſtace crowned before his death, to ſecure to him the ſucceſſion. But archbiſhop Theobald could not be brought to it. Thomas à Becket, then archdeacon of Canterbury, and in that quality the archbiſhop's chief and moſt confidential officer, was ſaid to be the cauſe of that primate's diſſent to Stephen's requeſt. If ſo, Henry probably owed his crown to Becket.

[4] This was very plauſible; but if he had been contented to let things remain as they were, all would have been quiet. He talks of moderation: but what dependance could there be upon his word?

---

[1] Stephanides obſerves, that this cuſtom of kiſſing was a prevailing cuſtom among the Engliſh; ſeeming thereby to intimate that it was peculiar to the Engliſh. It ſeems to have been a faſhion at the receiving of maſs, and in all acts of homage done by the vaſſal to his lord. It was not lawful to kiſs an excommunicated perſon: Henry therefore inſiſted, that none of his tenants in capite nor his demeſne miniſters (i. e. the great officers of his houſehold and court) ſhould be excommunicated without his privity, as it might draw him into the ſin of kiſſing them unawares. And we ſhall ſee, by-and-by, that, light as Henry made of oaths, he did not chuſe to incur the guilt of a perfidious kiſs in his counterfeit reconciliation with Thomas of Canterbury; which ought to have put the latter more upon his guard. But indeed he knew pretty well what was to be his fate before he embarked for England.

---

[1] See Lyttelton.

[2] See Lyttelton, and the authors referred to by him concerning this affair.

[3] i. e. Twenty thouſand pounds. To bring it to the value of preſent money, I think we may multiply by 20. It will then be £.400,000. The reader can hardly ſuppoſe, that Henry ever meant to make good ſuch damages.

[4] For a ſubject to doubt the king's word, and not leave every thing to his honour, was inſolence hardly ſhort of treaſon. Here Henry had the advantage-ground, and he knew how to make uſe of it. His honour was truſted to: Becket became enſnared, and periſhed. The king had his revenge; and all his promiſes were given to the winds.

[5] William, archbiſhop of Sens, ſon of count Theobald, nephew of our Henry I. brother of the queen and three counts of France; a man of great piety and worth; with his archbiſhoprick of Sens, he had permiſſion to hold the biſhoprick of Chartres in commendam; but he declined it from a ſcruple of conſcience. He was a moſt zealous friend of the Engliſh primate; who ſeems to have lived cloſe to him after Thomas's ſettling at the abbey of Columba, juſt without the walls of the city of Sens, where the archbiſhop reſided. The learned and clever John of Saliſbury, another of Becket's ſtaunch friends, was made biſhop of Chartres after the primate's aſſaſſination, by the means of the archbiſhop of Sens, who got him advanced to the ſee of Chartres, on account of his friendſhip for their common friend St. Thomas.

[6] Lyttelton.

After reiterated conferences between the king and legates of Rome, the treaty broke off without effect; and the king had the mortification to ſee them depart for Italy without ſuperſeding the excommunications[3] which Becket had denounced againſt his friends and officers, excepting a very few of them, who happened to be about his perſon when the legates firſt arrived, and when a complete reconciliation was looked upon as a thing certain. The curious reader may ſee Henry's opinion of the legates and holy ſee, at this time, by recurring to Rymer's Fœdera[4].

The legate Vivian, accompanied by the archbiſhop of Sens, and Thomas of Canterbury's nuncios, left Normandy in Nov. 1169, on their journey to Rome. As ſoon as Henry was informed of Vivian's departure, he ſent after him again, importunately requeſted his return, and propoſed freſh terms of accommodation. Henry's meſſenger addreſſed the legate with many fair words, and offered him a bribe; but all in vain; the legate would not return; and made this anſwer to the king's pecuniary offer: "That he did not take it well, that, after he had laboured ſo much in his ſervice, and loſt, through him, the favour of ſo many and ſuch great perſons, the king ſhould endeavour to render him infamous as being corrupted by money." In the ſame epiſtle he exhorted him to grant the archbiſhop's petition; to give that prelate the kiſs of peace; and, by a liberal reparation, atone for the crime of having ſeized his goods[5] and thoſe of his friends; which admonition was concluded by a poſitive declaration, that, "if the king ſhould now reject this counſel, the laſt he would give him, repentance would come too late." What induced the king to deſire another conference with Vivian, was the information he had received, that the archbiſhop of Sens, a zealous friend of the Engliſh primate, and a man of high birth[6] and great eſtimation, was ſet out with Gratian; which made him apprehenſive that, on their report to his holineſs, the excommunication and interdict, with which he had been ſo long threatened, and had eluded by ſo many ſtratagems, would now be delayed no longer. The event proved his fears to be well founded.

Before we proceed to the tranſactions of the year 1170, I wiſh to preſent to the reader's attention part of a letter, which Becket ſent (probably by theſe laſt nuncios of his) to Rome. In the concluſion of this letter he gives directions to the legates, who were to be ſent by the pope to negotiate with king Henry, how they were to think of him, and how conduct themſelves towards him. "As it is not eaſy," ſays he, "to diſcover the manifeſt artifices of that ſtrange man[7], whatever he ſays, whatever ſhape he puts on, ſuſpect it all as full of deceit, unleſs it be manifeſtly proved by his deeds; for if he ſhould perceive that he can either overreach you by promiſes[8], or frighten you with threats, or obtain any thing againſt your honour and the ſafety of the cauſe, all your authority with him will inſtantly vaniſh, and you will become the jeſt and contempt of him and his courtiers. But if he ſees that he cannot bend you from your purpoſe, he will firſt counterfeit fury, he will ſwear, forſwear; take as many ſhapes as Proteus did, and at laſt come to himſelf again; and, if it be not your own fault, you will be from that time a God unto Pharaoh." With ſuch penetration and keenneſs of ſarcaſm did Becket ſpeak of Henry II.

In the ſpring of the year 1170, he puſhed on the project of his eldeſt ſon's coronation. This grand affair opened a new ſcene of contention between the king and primate. To put the crown on the king's head, and take the lead in his conſecration, were acts of dignity too important to be diſregarded by an archbiſhop of Canterbury, to whom they conſtitutionally alſo belonged. Beſides the honour of performing theſe ceremonies upon common occaſions, Becket could not but be peculiarly ſolicitous to preſerve this right under his preſent circumſtances. Young Henry had been his pupil, and had conceived ſo ſtrong an attachment to his tutor, that he would never ſuffer any perſon to ſpeak ill of him in his preſence, hated the primate's enemies, and would have puniſhed them if he could. It could not therefore but be a very favourite wiſh of Becket's to confer this honour upon his friend and pupil, which had in it ſomewhat of the virtue of electing him. On the other ſide, to be defrauded of this grand privilege of his ſee of Canterbury, of whoſe rights he was ſo tenacious, to be excluded from ſuch a ceremonial, to loſe this opportunity of ſhewing and recommending himſelf to the prince, muſt not only greatly hurt his feelings, but lower him in the eſtimation of the world; who, if ſuch a ſlight was put upon him, muſt ſee how odious and contemptible he was in the ſight of king Henry. What proſpect could there be of a reſtoration of amity between them, if the king overlooked this opportunity of forgiving old grudges, and making the coronation-day a jubilee of amneſty and friendſhip? Beſides, the putting-by of an archbiſhop of Canterbury might bring into queſtion the very validity of the coronation; and therefore was an informality not wantonly to be incurred. On the whole, the reader muſt be ſenſible, that the king would not put ſuch a ſlur upon the archbiſhop, or deviate from the uſual form, if he meant to be ſeriouſly reconciled to him.

Theſe remarks, which are ſuggeſted by the very nature of Henry's proceedings, are corroborated by the ſtrongeſt teſtimony. A few days only before his coronation, and while every thing was getting ready for it, and Becket was on the rack of ſuſpence, ſome private friend, whoſe name we know not, aſſured him by letter[9], "that every thing with reſpect to the coronation would be done to injure, inſult, and vex him; that the king hated him, and was in as great rage againſt him as he had ever been; that the writer had been told this by Richard de Welcheſter [1], who was then getting every thing ready for the young prince's journey and voyage, and was appointed by the king to take him to England; and further, that this ſame Richard informed him, that the king had not the moſt diſtant thought of being ſincerely reconciled to him; and that, ſooner than he would be friends with him, even to the laſt moment of his life, he would be diſobedient, not only to the lord pope, but even to the Lord God. In the ſame letter, the writer cautions him againſt believing any thing that was reported to him of the king's amicable intentions; that ſuch a thing could be believed only by fools, and ſuch as were willing to think well of the king, or to have others think well of him, but that it was all unfounded, and nothing but mere lies; and let the king, ſays he, pretend what he will, it is all deceit and villainy. His ſnares are laid with the greater ſubtilty, as he is exceedingly anxious to make ſure work, and cruſh you completely. He pities the primate's weakneſs for entertaining an opinion that Henry meant to give him his peace; and exhorts him to make uſe of ſpiritual thunder without delay, as the only thing which remained for him to do to prevent the ruin of himſelf and his cauſe." The primate does not ſeem to have profited by this advice.

---

[1] Brady in Appendix, vol. I. p. 47.

[2] See Statues of Clarendon, c. 7.

[3] In the diſpute between king Henry and the archbiſhop, there was at bottom no other cauſe of diſagreement but Becket's oppoſition to the ſtatutes of Clarendon. The king himſelf often declared it; and ſo did Becket. The various charges, therefore, brought againſt the primate, were mere acts of revenge, and totally unfounded. By theſe perſecutions of the biſhops of Norwich and London, for obeying the commands of the primate, which were in open defiance of thoſe ſtatutes, it appears plainly that the primate would not pay at this time, although he had been now in baniſhment about ſix years, any reſpect to them: nor would the king conſent to annul or qualify them. At the end, therefore, or near the end, of the year 1169, the king and primate were not advanced one ſtep towards reconciliation.

[4] Tom. I. anno 1169.

[5] Bona—all the archbiſhop's eſtate, real and perſonal.

[6] He was ſon of Theobald earl of Champagne, and brother of Adela queen of France, all deſcended from Charlemagne; tranſlated anno 1169 from biſhop elect of Chartres to the archbiſhop of Sens. Chron. Vet. apud Du Cheſne, tom. IV. p. 442. In the year 1175, he became archbiſhop of Rhemes, and afterwards cardinal and regent of France. Ib.

[7] Monſtri.

[8] Well as Becket knew the king's duplicity, yet he was ſoon after completely overreached by his inſidious devices, and in conſequence of it deſtroyed.

[9] See it in Lyttelton's Appendix.

The hiſtorians of that time aſſign no particular reaſons for this precipitate coronation. The meaſure was dangerous as to the king himſelf, who was thereby to exalt his ſon to a fearful equality with himſelf, and the more likely to give him trouble; as, notwithſtanding this advancement, he did not intend to give his ſon more power than he had before, or part with an atom of his own authority. And at the very time of conferring this honour upon his ſon, he took care to tye his hands, by impoſing a council upon him compoſed of perſons hateful to the prince, viz. the fierceſt enemies of the primate. P. Daniel ſeems to have hit upon the true reaſon of this coronation, viz. to prevent the interdict, or leſſen the effects of it: for if anathema ſhould iſſue againſt the perſon of the king, the revolt of his ſubjects would be obviated by the adminiſtration of young Henry. A precedent of this ſort had occurred in France, where Philip I, being threatened with ſimilar cenſure, crowned his ſon, and thereby averted the diſorders which would otherwiſe have happened.

It being thus determined by the king, that Thomas of Canterbury ſhould have no ſhare in his ſon's coronation, he pitched upon the archbiſhop of York [2], as next in dignity, to perform this office. But Becket, whoſe vigilance ſeems to have been as great as king Henry's ſubtilty, loſt no time to counteract the king's ſcheme. He had informed the pope of what was doing, intreated him to aſſert the right of the ſee of Canterbury, and to lay a reſtraint on the archbiſhop of York, and all other Engliſh biſhops, and prevent their intermeddling in the prince's coronation; which was granted to him in terms as ſtrong and ample as he himſelf could deviſe. The privilege of the ſee was declared, and the prohibition enforced, by the apoſtolic authority. Nay, the biſhops were told, that if any one of them ſhould preſume to attempt it, he ſhould undoubtedly know it would be to the great peril of his office and order. His holineſs alſo denied them any appeal to himſelf on this matter. The brief is dated Feb. 26.

In the beginning of March, king Henry came over to England; and having ſummoned the clergy and laity to attend his colloquy or parliament on the feaſt of St. Barnabas, when they were met according to his ſummons, he propoſed to them his ſon's coronation; to which no objection being made, he appointed the 15th day of June for that ceremonial; which was accordingly performed, the archbiſhop of York doing that which ſhould have been done by the archbiſhop of Canterbury; preſent, and aſſiſting, the biſhops of Durham, London, Sarum, and Rocheſter [3]. At the coronation-dinner, king Henry, whom henceforth we ſtyle king Henry the elder, ſerved up a diſh to his ſon's table with his own hands; which being noticed by the archbiſhop of York to the young king, the latter obſerved, "That it was no great condeſcenſion for the ſon of an earl to ſerve the ſon of a king." A contemporary writer [4] ſo far confirms this account, as to ſay that the father miniſtered to the ſon at the feaſt, and declared that he himſelf was no longer king [5].

Gervas of Dover gives ſo curious a detail of Henry's proceedings at this time, as to render it worthy of the reader's attention. "This ſurprizing inquiſition [6] being made, all were ordered to be before the king on the 18th kal. of July. In the mean time the biſhops of Rouen and Nevers were making their journey towards England; of which they apprized king Henry by letter, together with the commiſſion they were charged with from the lord pope. Henry returned for anſwer, admoniſhing and deſiring them not to expoſe their perſons to the perils of the ſea [7]; and undertaking to croſs the water very ſpeedily, and yield his full aſſent to the form of peace between him and the archbiſhop, according to their counſel and opinion. In the mean while, on the day ſpecified in his mandate or writ, aſſembled at London the biſhops, abbots, earls, barons, viſcounts, reeves, aldermen with their ſureties, all of them in great fright; every one trembled according to his conſciouſneſs of what he had done; for no one knew what the king meant to decree. On that day he knighted his ſon Henry, who had come over from Normandy that week; and immediately, to the aſtoniſhment of all men, he ordered him to be anointed king, and to be crowned. Roger, archbiſhop of York, not having the fear of God before his eyes, and in contempt of juſtice, and of the expreſs prohibition of the apoſtolic father, moſt inauſpiciouſly [8], as the event ſhewed, put his hands upon the king; which preſumptuous invaſion of the right of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and his relentleſs ſpight to it, reflected the more diſgrace upon him, as he owed to it his riſe from a ſtate of poverty to his preſent heighth. The degenerate ſuffragans of the church of Canterbury, inſtead of reſiſting, as they ought to have done, this wicked and outrageous proceeding, aſſiſted the archbiſhop of York in this act of conſecration, or rather execration. For it was notorious, that the coronation of the kings of England belonged to the archbiſhop of Canterbury only, from ancient time. The new king, being thus crowned by command of his father, received the fealties of the earls and barons; and ſo relieved from the fear of being puniſhed for their faults, all the reſt returned to their own homes. The king having deputed guardians and maſters over the young king out of thoſe who had inveterate malice againſt Thomas of Canterbury[1], deſcended to the ſea, and croſſed it, to have colloquy with the king of France on the feaſt-day of Mary Magdalene."

---

[1] This could hardly be any other than Richard de Ilcheſter, archdeacon of Poitou, one of Henry's moſt diligent and confidential miniſters. The writer of the letter ſeems to be a man of conſiderable dignity, probably ſome biſhop.

[2] A very rich and undeſerving archbiſhop, of whom the king had frequently expreſſed his abhorrence to Becket in the time of their intimacy; and had even ſworn, that that vile man ſhould never lay his heretical hands upon his ſon. It will entertain the reader to read, in Hoveden, king Henry's manner of ſeizing all this archbiſhop's wealth, after the latter's deceaſe. Serve a tyrant—at your coſt.

[3] Theſe were probably all the biſhops who could attend that ceremony. The biſhop of Worceſter, ſon of Robert the great earl of Glouceſter, was kept in Normandy, and not ſuffered to be preſent on account of his attachment to Thomas of Canterbury, and poſitive declaration, that, if he ſhould be preſent, none but Thomas ſhould crown the young king. Six biſhopricks at this time were deſtitute of paſtors, the king not ſuffering them to be ſupplied on account of the temporalities, with which he augmented his revenue. Many other biſhops were worn out with age, and not in a condition to be at this ceremony. The number of Engliſh biſhops was ſeventeen; two archbiſhops; 15 ſuffragans.

[4] Lyttelton, Willelmus in Quadriloquo.

[5] We ſee from hence, and from certain circumſtances occurring afterwards, that king Henry made a ſurrender of his crown. This was a ticklish buſineſs. His reaſon for this act of deceit is now known to the reader. That the reſignation was fictitious, appears from his ſubſequent conduct, and may be inferred from the nature of the monſtrum.

[6] Inquiſition into the conduct of ſheriffs, to ſqueeze a large ſum by fines. See Gervas.

[7] There is ſome humour in this. Theſe legates were come to force him to make conceſſions and reſtitution to Becket; and likewiſe grant him his peace, the worſt thing of all.

[8] Alluding to the death of this young king.

The archbiſhop of Sens, and the papal legates, and the epiſtles of Thomas of Canterbury, did at laſt prevail upon pope Alexander to take deciſive meaſures with the king of England; and the advice of Henry's journey to that realm induced him to come to an immediate reſolution. On the 10th of May his holineſs iſſued his bull, directed to the archbiſhop of Rouen and the biſhop of Nevers, whom he commanded to find out, and inform the king of England, "That if he did not perform, within forty days after the apoſtolic commonition was made known to him, thoſe things which the king had promiſed the pope, and particularly what concerned the entire reſtitution of the archbiſhop's property, and that of his friends, and making full peace with the archbiſhop and his friends, and alſo granting the kiſs of peace, they were to pronounce ſentence of interdict againſt all his dominions in Gaul[2], without appeal." The papal bull commanded the biſhops above mentioned to carry into full execution the things contained in their commiſſion, and to excommunicate all ſuch as were remiſs on their part in the ſame buſineſs; and it further declared, that, if the king did not repent and amend, the pope would launch againſt his perſon the judgement of anathema, as he had already launched it againſt Frederick[3]. Henry was now under a neceſſity of patching up his quarrel with the archbiſhop, within the little ſpace of time which Alexander allowed him, as well as he could. The day therefore preceding the feaſt of Mary Magdalene, were collected, at Fretvill[4], the archbiſhops of Rheims, Sens, Rouen, and Tyre; the king of France, the biſhop of Nevers, the abbot of Groſ-mont, in the place of the lord pope, the biſhop of Poitou, and almoſt all the biſhops of Normandy, alſo almoſt all the counts and grandees of Gaul, to reſtore peace between the king of England and the archbiſhop of Canterbury. No one of the Engliſh biſhops was there, except Roger biſhop of Worceſter. On that day the king of Angles went to the hotel of the king of Franks, to have ſome converſation with him; after exchanging a few words, the king of Angles ſaid to Lewis jocularly, "To-morrow then that thief of yours will have his peace; and he ſhall have a good one." "By the ſaints," ſaid Lewis, "whom do you mean by thief?" "Our archbiſhop of Canterbury," returned Henry. "I wiſh," replied Lewis, "he were as much mine, as he is yours. It will do you honour before God and man, if you grant him a good peace; and I ſhall eſteem it as a great favour done to myſelf." This was heard by ſtanders-by; their other diſcourſe was between themſelves. The next day all go out to the colloquy; but the king of France did not appear[5]. Perhaps this was done at the inſtance of king Henry, who had aſſured the other, "that he would perform every thing which Lewis had required;" for indeed Lewis had wearied Henry with his importunate prayers for Thomas the archbiſhop; but ſeeing that the king of Angles was now come to the preſent colloquy in the French territory, he conſented to the colloquy and treaty of concord; but choſe to be preſent rather in ſpirit and authority than in perſon; and to looſen the reigns of liberty and liberality to the king of England, that he might ſeem to be more at his own command, when the king of Franks neither preſſed him with his preſence or prayers; and it was judged that king Henry's pity for the archbiſhop would be more conſpicuous, if his peace and grace were reſtored to him by the king, when the latter was left to his own inclination, and ſubjected to no neceſſity. For, to a diſcerning perſon, intreaties of ſuperiors paſs often for commands. When many perſons on both ſides had ſpoken in favour of peace and reconciliation, and the king had acquieſced to all that was deſired with regard to peace and the church's liberty, and the perſon of the archbiſhop; and conſented to the reſtitution of lands and churches to clerks and all others who had been deſpoiled of either on the archbiſhop's account; and to the donation of churches of the archbiſhoprick, which had become vacant in the mean while; all which were now to be left to him, although the king had given the ſame to his own clerks[6]: the good archbiſhop, being unwilling that any thing ſhould be kept concealed which might afterwards generate freſh diſturbance and quarrel, made the following addreſs to the king: "My lord king, all the kind things you have done me, in my two promotions, I keep in mind with the moſt reſpectful and religious gratitude; and in all things I give my thanks to you, and am your debtor, and bounden more to you as to my king and terrene lord, ſaving the honour of God and holy church; and now particularly am I beholden to you, for recalling and receiving me to your peace and favour. But, among all my late misfortunes, which your anger and indignation have brought upon me, by proſcribing, deſpoiling, and ejecting me and mine, and oppreſſing the church of Canterbury, one thing there is that exceedingly diſturbs me, and which I neither can nor ought to leave unnoticed; which is, that you have cauſed your ſon to be crowned in the dioceſe of Canterbury by the archbiſhop of the dioceſe of York, and have thereby deſpoiled the church of Canterbury of its moſt honourable privilege of conſecrating the king; which church of Canterbury, by the mercy of God, anointed you to be king; and which, among all its honourable privileges, has had this to itſelf, as its peculiar, ſpecial, and proper right, from time very remote, even ever ſince that St. Auguſtin firſt conſtituted the metropolitan ſee of Canterbury." The king made anſwer, "I have been informed and taught, that, among the regal prerogatives of my realm, this is one, that if the king of England, in his life-time, ſhould be pleaſed to have his ſon crowned, he was at liberty to have it done by the archbiſhop or biſhop of any city at his pleaſure. And my great grandfather king William, who ſubdued England, received his conſecration and coronation at London from the archbiſhop of York; and my grandfather Henry by the hand of the biſhop of Hereford." Archbiſhop: "It is very true that thoſe kings were crowned as you ſay; but in thoſe coronations the dignity of the church of Canterbury ſuſtained no infringement; for when he of York anointed king William, the ſee of Canterbury was in a manner void; for Stigard, who then ſeemed to preſide over that church, was in truth not archbiſhop; having never received the pall of it from the church of Rome; and the church of Canterbury being empty, the next dignitary of the church being the archbiſhop of York, he performed the office. When king Henry was crowned, St. Anſelm was archbiſhop of Canterbury; but he was then far from England, being in exile at Clugny; but becauſe delaying the coronation might have thrown the realm into danger, to give neceſſary diſpatch, one of the archbiſhop of Canterbury's ſuffragans, viz. the biſhop of Hereford, was allowed to officiate, with a ſaving of the right of his ghoſtly father the archbiſhop." The king: "What you ſay may be true. What I have ſaid has been with no intention of injuring the church of Canterbury; nor do I ſpeak from any deſire of agitating a queſtion of this ſort: that church conſecrated me; and I am deſirous that its rights ſhould be kept inviolate. If I have done any thing to its damage, I am diſpoſed to correct it, as the lord pope and Roman church ſhall ordain; and you have my full permiſſion to do juſtice to yourſelf and to your church againſt the archbiſhop of York and the biſhops of England[1]." The archbiſhop was ſatisfied; and to render due thanks to the king for this anſwer and grace, he diſmounted his horſe, to throw himſelf at the king's feet; which the king obſerving, ſprang from his horſe, and lifted up the archbiſhop with an embrace, and held the ſtirrup for his right foot as the archbiſhop was getting again upon his horſe. Every good man who beheld what happened burſt into tears of joy. The king was then intreated to give the kiſs of reconciliation and peace; which was the only thing not yet done according to the pope's injunction to finiſh the articles of agreement. In excuſe for Henry's refuſing to comply with that part of the buſineſs, he had alledged the obligation of his oath which he had made never to kiſs the archbiſhop, although he ſhould be reconciled to him. But that excuſe was now done away, the pope having abſolved him of that oath; the excuſe therefore now would not hold. The king returned: "Within my own territory I will kiſs the archbiſhop's mouth, his hands, and feet; I will hear his maſs an hundred times: but let it be put off for the preſent—I do not ſpeak deceitfully: ſome deference ſhould be ſhewn to me here; and if I give the kiſs in my own dominions, it will look more kind and gracious than if I did here, as it were, by neceſſity." The archbiſhop, with the aſſent of all preſent, ſubmitted; the clergy, nobleſſe, and the multitude, every age, every order of men, who were witneſſes of theſe tranſactions, were in tranſports of joy. Afterwards the king and archbiſhop had a long private conference. The aſſembly broke up. It had been agreed between the king and archbiſhop, that the archbiſhop ſhould return into France, to pay his thanks to his benefactors there, and to ſend a nuncio to the pope with a letter of his own. Having obtained the king's permiſſion for theſe things, and forwarded his matters for going over to England, he was to meet king Henry at a place appointed; who promiſed either to take the archbiſhop over in his own royal ſuite, or, if his affairs rendered his return at this time impracticable, to ſend the archbiſhop of Rouen to England with him, that the latter might be received in England in a moſt honourable manner. And in the mean time the king's writ was iſſued, commanding, that all the lands and tenements which had been taken from the archbiſhop's friends ſhould be reſtored to thoſe from whom they had been taken; reſtitution likewiſe of what had been taken from the archbiſhop's clerks was ordered by proclamation; but, notwithſtanding, full reſtitution was not made, either to the archbiſhop's clerks, or to himſelf. The king, as was obſerved before, had in the time of this diſſenſion diſpoſed of ſome of the archbiſhop's vacant churches; and, according to the form of peace, he was to revoke thoſe donations, and leave them to the archbiſhop. The officials of the clerks entered into the poſſeſſion of theſe for the benefit of ſuch clerks; but ſoon afterwards theſe officials were expelled by the king's officials, and the perſons to whom the king had given them kept them. Beſides, the rents and payments of the archiepiſcopal manors, at the next term of St. Michael, were received and taken by the king's officials, and withheld entirely from the archbiſhop. Many wiſe perſons noticed theſe things, but held their tongues for ſafety. The archbiſhop had, in the mean while, ſent his nuncio to the pope, with a letter of thanks to his holineſs for the ſervice he had done him; and to acquaint him how the king had complied with what was required; and to tell him, "That the king gave him full liberty to obtain from his holineſs full power to puniſh the biſhops who had preſumed to crown the young king, to the injury of the ſee of Canterbury." He then paid his viſits to his Gallic friends, and thanked them for all their kindneſſes to him, and took his leave. The French nobleſſe made him preſents of horſes, cloaths, and other neceſſary things; that, as they had ſhewed their regard for him and his friends during his exile, they might crown their beneficence now he was leaving them. The king of France ſhewed him the moſt warm regard; and the archbiſhop thanked him for his numerous and great favours with a profuſion of gratitude; and ſaid to the king, "We are going to England to play for heads." "Very true," returned Lewis, "you are ſo: but," ſaid he, "if you would follow my advice, you would never truſt to the king, unleſs he conferred upon you the kiſs of peace. Stay with Lewis; as long as he lives, the wines, meats, and opulence of France ſhall be all at your ſervice." Thomas replied, "Let God's will be done." And they parted with a flood of tears reciprocally. Upon his kiſſing his friend the archbiſhop of Paris, at taking leave, "I am going," ſaid he, "into England to die." There was at this time in England one Richard de Halliwell, a conſcientious and good prieſt: one of the king's ſervants confeſſed to this man, and, among other things, told the confeſſor, that "he himſelf had with his own hand impreſſed with the king's ſeal a certain letter of the king, ordering the murder of the archbiſhop." He ſaid alſo, "That Nigel de Salcavill was the perſon who wrote the letter, and ſhed tears as he was doing it." He added, "That he had confeſſed this likewiſe to a biſhop, and deſired him to appoint a penance for this ſin; and that the biſhop made very light of it, and refuſed to appoint any penance; telling him, he had only done what his maſter had ordered, and that the thing required no penance at all." Alſo, one day Reginald de Warren entered the chapter-houſe of the canons of Southwark, with whom he had great intimacy; and talking to them upon the wickedneſs of the age, deſired them "to pray for him, for that they would very ſoon hear of ſuch a deed as would ſhock them; and the part that he was to take in it was againſt his inclination, and forced upon him." The canons were ſhocked at what they heard, but did not underſtand it till after the death of Thomas; when Reginald, who had luckily not ſtained his hand in the blood of this juſt man, explained the whole matter to them. The king of Angles, in the mean while, wrote a letter to the archbiſhop, requiring him "to leave France, where his ſtay, he told him, ſeemed to him to be for no good purpoſe." According to his promiſe, the archbiſhop made haſte to the king. He found him at Tours, and there expected to receive the kiſs which had been promiſed; but he forbore to aſk it, and went without it. The archbiſhop went again to the king at Amboiſe; and was on that day about to hear maſs. Nigel de Salcavill, the king's clerk and ſignet-bearer, and to whom the king had given one of the good churches of the archbiſhop, which Nigel was now afraid of loſing, tells the king, "That the archbiſhop was in the chapel; and that he had come perhaps in a ſeaſonable time, and before maſs, that the king before maſs might give him the kiſs of peace: but that, if the lord king pleaſed, the archbiſhop might be defrauded of the kiſs." The king aſked, "how that could be done?" "Let the prieſt," ſaid Nigel, "ſay the maſs of the faithful deceaſed." The king approved of it, and ſo it was done. After that, maſs was ſaid as uſual in veneration of our Lady the perpetual Virgin Mary, Salve ſancta parens; which being ſaid, the prieſt bleſſed the text of the Goſpel, and delivered it to the archbiſhop coming to him, and kiſſing it, that he might take it to the king; to whom, after the king had kiſſed it, the archbiſhop ſaid, "Lord, now I have come to you into your own dominion; give me, according to the time and place and your engagement, the kiſs of peace." King: "Another time you ſhall be ſatisfied." Which repulſe was noticed by the archbiſhop and all preſent in ſilence. The king and archbiſhop had on that day a great deal of private diſcourſe; but, in the laſt tenor of their agreement, the king engaged that the archbiſhop of Rouen ſhould come to archbiſhop Thomas, and pay Thomas's creditors all that was owing to them, and do with the reſt of the money as the archbiſhop ſhould direct; and that he would then receive Thomas to the kiſs, and accompany him to England; or, that he would ſend the archbiſhop of Rouen to England with him to the young king, to make full reſtitution and ſatisfaction to the archbiſhop, if any thing more of that ſort remained to be done. He there took leave of the king; and he never ſaw him more. The king ſaid to him, "Go in peace; I will follow you; and I will ſee you again, either at Rouen or in England, as ſoon as I can." The archbiſhop: "Lord, my mind tells me, I now leave you in ſuch a manner, that I ſhall never ſee you more in this life." The king: "Do you take me for a villain?" The archbiſhop: "That be far from thee, lord!" The archbiſhop, thus ordered, went to Rouen; but when he got there, he found no other nuncio of the king to accompany him to England, but John of Oxford, dean of Sarum[1]. The king's excuſe was, that he could not go with him into England, becauſe the king of France was preparing to attack his vaſſals in Auvergne[2]. The dean of Sarum having told him what he came for, the archbiſhop exclaimed, "O, what a change of things! the archbiſhop of Canterbury ought to have been your protector into England, and not you his." And he ſaid to the archbiſhop of Rouen, through whom the various agreements had been negotiated, "Where are all the compacts made between the king and me? Why is the king not here according to his promiſe? What is to be done concerning the kiſs of peace, and the money which he promiſed to ſend to pay my creditors? I have brought them all hither. The king does not keep his word." And the archbiſhop of Rouen having been aſked by him, if he had received the king's command to accompany him to England; he ſaid, "he had not; but that, if he deſired him to go with him, he would do it out of kindneſs, but not as by any order of the king. All things," he added, "are ſafe. The archbiſhop's peace and ſecurity have been formed and confirmed in ſuch great authority, and in the preſence of ſuch great perſons, there is nothing to apprehend." The archbiſhop of Rouen made him a preſent of £.300. out of his own pocket[3]. The archbiſhop of Canterbury goes to the ſea of Flanders, with no other conductor but John of Oxford; bearing all theſe things in his mind, and particularly the king's breach of promiſe in regard of the kiſs; but, ſtedfaſt in the Holy Ghoſt, and not afraid to die for God and church, he purſued his way. He had now received the pope's nuncio, who brought a letter of exhortation from his holineſs, wherein he was deſired to return boldly to his church, and fulfil his miniſtry[4]. And the nuncio brought letters of ſevere juſtice concerning the unwarrantable coronation of the young king. They ordered the archbiſhop of York, and all the biſhops concerned in that buſineſs, except the biſhop of Exeter, to be ſuſpended; and the biſhops of London and Sarum, who had been conditionally abſolved from the ſentence of excommunication, which Thomas, as papal legate, had denounced againſt them, were now involved in that ſentence afreſh by expreſs command of the pope. The nuncio is ſent on with theſe letters; and very ſeaſonably found the archbiſhop of York and the biſhop of London at Canterbury; from whence they were preparing to go to the king. Theſe letters of the lord pope being thus fulminated againſt them, they were ſtruck aghaſt. The archbiſhop was now arrived at the port of Whitſand[5]; the weather was fine, and the ſea ſmooth; and the archbiſhop waited for the ſhip being ready that was to take him over. Some of the clerks, his co-exiles, who were in haſte to reach their native ſoil, ſaid to him, "Lord, we now ſee England: the ſails of very many who are going over ſwell. Why do you not aſcend the ſhip? Are we to make exit, as Moſes did, who ſaw the land of promiſe, but never entered it?" "Why," ſays he, "are ye in ſuch an hurry? Within forty days after ye land in England, ye will wiſh ye were in any part of the world rather than there."

---

[1] This ſtep was a good preparation for what was intended. The reader is deſired to keep this in memory, when he reads the part taken by the young king, or rather by his maſters, or governors, after Becket's return.

[2] At that time, the French empire was ſo called; compounded of the king of France's own proper terra, or dominion, and the ſeveral fiefs. The firſt was called France; the other Normandy, Poitou, &c. The interdict was confined to Henry's Gallic dominions, he being conſidered, ſince his reſignation, no longer king of England.

[3] Frederick Barbaroſſa, emperor, whom pope Alexander had completely humbled.

[4] Stephanides.

[5] This is very extraordinary. Henry knew how to make a good uſe of it. Poor Becket!

[6] It is impoſſible to think that king Henry meant to fulfil ſuch terms.

---

[1] Becket's own letter adds, "And to thoſe who have hitherto betrayed me and you, I will, by the bleſſing of God, make ſuch an anſwer as the deſerts of traytors require." This was Henry's gratitude to his tools.

As Becket's only offence after his return home was his animadverſion upon the biſhops, the queſtion is, how far he acted in that affair with the king's permiſſion. His own letters on the ſubject to the pope perfectly correſponds with the narration of his friend and biographer Stephanides. The account of the ſame affair, in a letter of the count de Blois, may be added to the others. "The archbiſhop," ſays the count, "complained bitterly of the biſhops, who, contrary to the right and dignity of the church of Canterbury, preſumed to put the new king into the royal ſeat, not thereby to pleaſe God, but to pleaſe the tyrant. But the king granted to him free, uninterrupted power over thoſe biſhops, that he might, at the diſcretion of your and his pleaſure, promulge ſentence againſt them." And the count adds, "Hæc ſiquidem vobis vel juramento, vel quolibet alio modo atteſtari paratus ſum, & ſancire; ſic itaque pace facta, vir Dei nihil metuens receſſit, ut gladio jugulum ſubderet." Hoveden, anno 1171.

Every thing was now ready for his embarking; when a perſon happened to give him intelligence, that if he put into Dover, he would find aſſaſſins there ready to kill him as ſoon as he reached that place; and that the biſhops of York and London had made haſte to the ſea, to give all the countenance they could to ſuch murderers. This prieſt of God then went on board, and directed the maſter of the ſhip to make for the port of Sandwich, becauſe that port was his own eſtate, and the people thereof would be very glad to ſee him. On the 1ſt of December, then, 1170, on Tueſday morning, he arrived at Sandwich; which as ſoon as the king's officials heard, viz. Gervas de Cornhelle and Reginald de Warrenne, and a great many of their lay-retainers, having coats of mail under their capes and tunicks, they went forward as he got out of the ſhip, and made towards him; but ſeeing and hearing his conductor John of Oxford, having the king's commiſſion, thoſe perſons, who were ſaid to be armed, retired: but, leſt nothing ſhould be done, the ſhire-reeve and Reginald, among other things, aſked if any foreigner came with him; that, according to the law promulgated by the king, they might demand of him the letters of the king concerning his entry into England, or at leaſt the oath of fidelity to the king; or perhaps this was ſaid to irritate the archbiſhop, or raiſe a ſedition; but in vain. The archbiſhop mildly anſwered, "that his entrance was altogether peaceable; and that none but men of peaceable diſpoſitions were in his ſuite, viz. his clerks and domeſtic retinue. Indeed, the archdeacon of Sens had come with him, who had been very kind to him and his friends in their exile. This clerk," he ſaid, "was with him. Such demands, and letters, and oaths were wont to be demanded of ſuſpicious perſons, who might wiſh to expoſe the weak parts of the realm; but it had never been heard before, that ſuch things were required of the clerks of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and they ought not to begin with him." And ſo the matter ended; except that the ſhire-reeve told him afterwards, "that he had entered the land in fire and ſword, and wanted to dethrone the king; that the archbiſhop had excommunicated the archbiſhop of York and biſhop of London for what they had done in the king's ſervice; and that, if he did not undo theſe things ſpeedily, ſomething would happen which would better be undone." The archbiſhop replied, "That he did not object to the coronation on the young king's account, whom he wiſhed to have many kingdoms as big as England; but he had done this thing on account of thoſe who had unjuſtly uſurped this conſecration, againſt God and the dignity of the church of Canterbury; and that to inflict due puniſhment upon the ſins of biſhops, was not to ſend fire and ſword into the land. No one ſhould threaten him with death; for he had come prepared to extend his neck for righteouſneſs and truth." He wrote immediately to the pope advice of his entry into England. News is proclaimed at the church and city of Canterbury, that the archbiſhop was landed. All ſorts of people, from the higheſt to the loweſt, rejoiced at an event ſo agreeable. The front of the church is adorned. The people array themſelves in ſilks and precious garments. They make a great feaſt, and prepare the largeſt coverlids. The archbiſhop is received with a grand proceſſion. The church reſounds with pſalms and organs; the courts with clarions; the city is filled with joy. He preached a moſt captivating ſermon, of which the text was, We have here no abiding city, but wait for one to come. Two archdeacons, i. e. Geoffry Ridel, archdeacon of Canterbury, and Richard, archdeacon of Poitou, being of the king's houſehold, and of his council, but whom the archbiſhop had promoted to the high rank they held, who were likewiſe his vaſſals, had now come to Canterbury, being going over the water to the king. But hearing that the archbiſhop was got to Canterbury, they turned their horſes reins another way, and made for the ports of the Weſtern ſea; which journey ſeemed to many to be a bad ſign [1]. The archbiſhop of York, and the biſhops of London and Sarum, through their clerks addreſs the archbiſhop, obſerving that he had not come in peace, but in fire and ſword; treading upon his co-biſhops, and making them his footſtool, without hearing citation or judgement. They repreſented, "that, being his ſuffragans, they had met him at the ſea, that they might receive him in proceſſion with the church of Canterbury: That, beſides their expectations and deſerts, they were now cloathed in black coats, which by his leave they would lay aſide, before they went into his preſence." He, among other things, ſaid, "That the peace of the wicked did not ſeem to him to be a good peace: that ſome of his biſhops had made a ſort of falſe peace; but that the people had made a real war, to break a bad peace. Let puniſhment therefore be inflicted on ſins. Moreover there can be no true peace to the wicked. Jeruſalem, abounding in delights, and over-indulgent to itſelf, thought it had peace; but the compaſſionate Jeſus bewailed it, becauſe the ſeverity of God's vengeance hung over it, being hidden from their eyes. Alſo, the biſhops ſay, they were not called, not heard in law: truly, all things do not require a ſolemn hearing. When crimes are manifeſt, they want no diſcuſſion, but only due correction. This ſentence of ſuſpenſion, or excommunication (he ſaid) is not mine, but the lord pope's; nor is it for me to queſtion his ſentence. I well know that it is mere deceit and trick, which the biſhops propoſe by you their meſſengers; that, if I ſhould confeſs that I did not come with authority to abſolve them, they would not hold me for a real legate; and they would pay me but little regard if I had this authority, and they could extort abſolution from me by the civil power. I am laying no ſnare for them. They thirſt for my blood, and I wiſh they may drink it; and drink it they will." And when at length he had adviſed them to repent and make ſatisfaction, they acquieſced not, but appealed. The biſhop of London did afterwards, as was ſaid, repent, and wiſh to humble himſelf to the archbiſhop-legate, and to ſtand to the eccleſiaſtical law upon the matter in queſtion: with which Thomas would have been ſatisfied; but the archbiſhop of York, who thought his wealth would inſure his conqueſt over the primate, did not like to be left alone in this diſpute, and diſſuaded the biſhop of London from his purpoſe. He adviſed that they ſhould go over to the king, and tell him all that had happened.

---

[1] A particular enemy of Becket's, whom he had excommunicated for holding communion with the anti-pope's party.

[2] A mere evaſion.

[3] This archbiſhop was a mere tool of Henry's. John of Saliſbury, ſpeaking of an oath he was to take as Henry's commiſſioner in a treaty with France, ſays, "his oath was not worth a farthing if Henry's intereſt was concerned." I have a ſhrewd ſuſpicion that Henry ſent this £.300. to facilitate Becket's embarkation, which might otherwiſe be impeded for want of money. See Epiſt. Joh. Sariſbur. apud Du Cheſne.

[4] This command left the archbiſhop no liberty of leaving his church, be his fate there what it might.

[5] Præcepit etiam hominibus ſuis, ne libri, unde plurimam habuit copiam, alibi, quam in eccleſia Cantuarienſi recondentur. Gervas.—Stephanides obſerved, that the primate was a great collector of books and records while he was at Pontigni. The care of his books was probably a great concern with him at this time.

After ſtaying eight days at Canterbury, the archbiſhop ſent his nuncio to lord king, junior, ſignifying that he wiſhed to come to him to make his devoir, as his king and lord. And he had taken with him four remarkable fine deſtrers, which he intended to preſent to him as a new exenium. For he loved the young king exceedingly, whom he had had in his houſe when a child, and educated in his court when he was chancellor.

The biſhop and church of Rocheſter made a proceſſion for him one day, and received him with profound reſpect. He was honoured with the third proceſſion of the church of the canons regular of St. Mary in Southwark: and there had gone out from the city to meet him, on his return from exile, an infinite multitude of clerks, and of men and women in exultation, praiſing and bleſſing God, for his deſired return to his own country; the poor prieſts and the clerks [2] of the London churches went in a body out of the city to meet him, to the number of three thouſand. Upon ſeeing, and drawing near to the archbiſhop, they began to ſing aloud, and in full chorus, Te Deum laudamus; inſomuch that this their weeping for joy was caught by others, and became univerſal. He, partaking of their joy and exultation in the Lord, inclined his head, in token of thanks, and ſcattered his alms among the people very plentifully. Amidſt the rejoicings for his return in the city of London, a certain woman named Matilda, who thruſted herſelf into the courts and crowds, cryed aloud again and again, "Archbiſhop, beware of the knife, beware of the knife!" at which all who heard were aſtoniſhed. While the archbiſhop was ſojourning for one day only at the biſhop of Winton's palace in Southwark, he received, by the young king's nuncio, information, that the young king would not conſent to his coming to him, and that he did not approve of his going through the cities and boroughs of the realm; butth at he ſhould return immediately to Canterbury, abide in his ſee, and not leave it [3]. The archbiſhop was ſurprized, but he knew the young king too well to think that theſe were his own orders. And he deſired Joceline of Arundel, the brother of the queen, who had been diſpatched on this occaſion, to tell him whether the young king meant really to remove him from his friendſhip and peace. Joceline ſaid, "I have delivered his command;" and going out in an haughty manner, he ſaw a citizen of London, a very rich man, coming towards him, to whom he ſaid, "What are you coming to the king's enemy? Go back, I adviſe you." The other anſwered, "Whether he be the king's enemy, I know not; but I have ſeen and heard the letters of the king written abroad, of his peace and reſtitution. If there be any ſecret here, it is not known to me." Theſe were ſigns of what was coming.

---

[1] That is, I ſuppoſe, ſuſpecting what was carrying on. Richard of Poitou. See note 1, p. 60.

[2] Clerks—it does not import merely clergymen, but the ſeparate quality of that order, perhaps ſomething like what is contained in the phraſe, "the reverend clergy." It denominated particularly the ſuperior ſort of clergy, ſuch as archbiſhops, biſhops, and other eccleſiaſtical dignitaries.

[3] It having probably been determined that he ſhould be put to death at Canterbury, or that neighbourhood, care was to be taken to have him there.

The next day, as he was returning to Canterbury, advice was brought him, that Ranulph de Broc had carried away one of his veſſels freighted with wine, had cut down the rudder, taken away the anchors, and of the ſailors had killed ſome, and impriſoned others at the caſtle of Pevenſey. Some of his knights[1], as he returned from Canterbury to London, attended him, leſt ſome villains, ſtarting from ambuſh on the road, ſhould ſlay him. Of theſe there were only about five. Report was carried to the king[2], that the primate was parading the realm with a great army. Ranulph de Broc, and Gervas de Cornhelle, officers of the king, in conſequence of a pretended order from the king, cauſed to be evoked and cited priors of churches, and the moſt eminent citizens of London, whoſe names they had got down, as perſons who had gone out to meet the archbiſhop, with orders that they ſhould come to the king's court, and find ſureties for their appearance; they having, as it was ſaid, gone out to meet the king's enemy. But the priors and eccleſiaſtical perſons did not attend. Many citizens, who came on the day of appearance, alledged, that they had not ſeen the king's letters, whereby they were required to give ſureties, or be cited, or any writs of the juſtices of that nature. Nor had they committed any crime, but rather done a religious act, by ſhewing reſpect to the archbiſhop-legate. The good archbiſhop got back to Canterbury, and the knights who guarded him went home. The hirelings of that monſter Broc, who were his neighbours at Saltwode caſtle, were perpetually laying in ambuſh for him on the road to Canterbury; and that they might provoke him to impatience, and make his attendants quarrel with them, hunted in his purlieus without leave, and took a ſtag, and ſeized and detained the archbiſhop's own dogs as they were hunting in the woods. Nay, a day or two before Chriſtmas, one Robert de Broc, who had been a clerk, but was again returned to the world, ſtopped a ſumpter horſe of the archbiſhop, as he was coming with proviſions from one of the manors of the church of Canterbury, and cut off his tail, as he was paſſing the road, merely out of contempt. Thomas conſidered all theſe things as ſure preſages of his fate, and prepared himſelf from day to day for what was coming, by a more intenſe devotion, by larger alms, and a cloſer attention to the care of his ſoul. He frequently told his clergy that this affair could only terminate by the ſpilling of his blood, and that he would never flinch in the righteous cauſe of the church. And he ſent an epiſtle to the pope, ſaying, "That death and the ſword impended over him," and deſiring the pope to pray for him. The three enraged biſhops had now reached the king, and made him acquainted with the treatment they had received from the pope and the archbiſhop; and added, that the archbiſhop was perambulating London with a body of armed knights. This was grounded on his having a ſuite of his knights to guard him on his return to Canterbury. The king took inſtant fire at theſe reports, and deſired their advice. Their opinion was, "That he would never be in quiet while Thomas ſurvived." The king lamented moſt grievouſly, that a man whom he had raiſed from the duſt ſhould preſume to treat him ſo diſdainfully, and trample upon his prerogatives and royal dignity. He exclaimed, "That he was very unfortunate indeed to have maintained ſo many cowardly and ungrateful men about his perſon; not one of whom would avenge him of ſo many injuries brought upon him by one man." Four knights, ſtimulated by theſe expreſſions and lamentations of the king, bound themſelves by oath, on the very night of the Lord's nativity, which was on the Friday, to ſlay the archbiſhop; and ſecretly retired from court[3]. They were domeſtic barons of the king, famous for the nobility of their birth, men eminent in chivalry, and cloſe intimates and companions of the king[4]. The names of theſe lords were Reginald Fitz-Urſo, William de Traci, Hugo de Morevill, and Richard Brito. In the mean while the king addreſſed his barons, and complained to them of the archbiſhop; "that he had, like a tyrant, entered his land, and that he had ſuſpended, or excommunicated, all the biſhops, and the archbiſhop of York, for what they had done in his ſervice; that he had thrown the whole realm into confuſion; that he was going to drive him and his ſon from the crown and diadem of the realm; that he had obtained over him the legateſhip; that he had procured a certain privilegium from the chief pontiff to himſelf and biſhops, for donations of churches and advowſons belonging to the king, and to earls and barons[5]." The earl of Leiceſter ſpoke firſt, and made the following anſwer: "Indeed, ſir, the archbiſhop, and the late earl my father, were united by the cloſeſt bands of friendſhip; but be pleaſed to believe me, when I ſolemnly aſſure you, that ever ſince the archbiſhop has left the kingdom, and loſt your favour, there has not been the ſmalleſt degree of correſpondence between the archbiſhop and me[6]."

Engelger de Bohun, an old ſinner, and uncle of the then biſhop of Sarum, who, having been executed, bore the mark of the beaſt in his forehead, ſays, "I do not know how ye can otherwiſe inflict condign puniſhment upon ſuch a man, but by firſt tying him to a ſtake, and after ſcourging him there with a rope of rods, putting him upon a gibbet."

William, ſurnamed Bad-neighbour, nephew of Eudo, count of Bretagne, was the third who ſpoke: "I once came through Rome, in my way from Jeruſalem; and while I was tarrying there, among other things that paſſed between me and the maſter of my hotel, I aſked him many queſtions about the biſhops of Rome, and he told me of a pope who had been murdered for his intolerable inſolence and pride."

---

[1] Knights—I conceive they were gentlemen mounted on deſtrers, or clad in complete armour. The vaſſals of earls, barons, and biſhops, were for the greater part ſtyled knights, and eſquires. His vaſſals were of two ſorts; thoſe who held fiefs of him by ſpecific ſervices, and were more immediately bound to him by tenure, and thoſe who, without holding ſuch fiefs of him, became his vaſſals either from gratitude or affection, binding themſelves to him by fealty and homage, as if they were his tenants. The milice, which compoſed his ſuite, and was called his familia, ſeems to be his ordinary guard. Other biſhops, and, I believe, all the chief nobles, had a familia likewiſe, conſiſting not of ſolidarii (i. e. mercenaries), but of their feudal tenants, and perhaps other retainers.

[2] Probably the young king.

[3] Some ſay, and among them our author, ſecretly; not meaning, I preſume, that the conſpiracy was unknown to the king, but that the barons kept their deſign a ſecret. That the king knew of their going is plain, for they went with his commiſſion, and took orders from him. So far then we bring the treachery home to Henry, which contradicts all modern ſtatements of this fact. Let the reader conſider who theſe aſſaſſins were—the king's particular companions and friends, who muſt have been perfectly acquainted with his wiſhes reſpecting Becket. Nothing ſhort of the latter's death could relieve the king. The terms of pacification were all on the ſide of the primate, and wrung from Henry. He had nothing for it, but to circumvent, and then make ſure work: as he did.

[4] Gervas and Stephanides.

[5] This looks very much like a proſecution of the meaſures adopted after the departure of the aſſaſſins, as further precautions againſt the eſcape of Becket. And his probable knowledge of the impoſſibility of his eſcape might induce him not to attempt flight, and to die in his church.

[6] We cannot extol Stephanides for being a very methodical and well-connected hiſtorian. The earl of Leiceſter's ſpeech has no affinity with the purpoſe of this conſultation; the others ſpeak immediately to the point, and prepare us for what the king had in contemplation. Our earl gives no ſanguinary advice. Indeed, his ſpeech looks only like an anſwer to a charge of being a partizan of Becket's.

Theſe diſcourſes being ended, the king ſent William earl of Magnevill, Seier de Quinci, Richard de Humet, after the four barons into England. The report was, that they were to ſeize the archbiſhop. Earl William and Seier went to the ſea-port, but did not croſs over. Richard went to another port, and croſſed. The ſon-king was at Winton. Richard ſent Hugh de Gundevill, and William Fitz-John to the maſters [1] of the young king, that they ſhould go privately with the knights of the royal houſehold to Canterbury. He himſelf ſtayed in ambuſh about the ſea-coaſt; that, if the archbiſhop ſhould attempt to eſcape by flight, he might be ſure to be taken at ſome port. A ſharp look-out therefore was kept on the Engliſh ſide; while earl William and Seier ſo ſtationed themſelves on the other ſide the channel, as to make ſure of him if he ſhould get thither. The four barons croſſed the ſea in different ſhips, but they all got over about the ſame time, and made their rendevouz at the caſtle of Saltwode, where they held their conſultation with the partizans of Broc. But, before their arrival, the archbiſhop had a perfect knowledge of their coming over, and more ſtrongly fortified himſelf in the Lord; manfully exerting himſelf, and putting on the whole armour of God, that he might ſtand boldly in the day of the Lord. But he took all the care he poſſibly could, that at ſo ſolemn a feſtival no tumult ſhould be made.

On the night of the Lord's day he read the Goſpel leſſon, liber generationis, and celebrated the maſs of the night. In the day before the great maſs, which he likewiſe celebrated, he delivered to the people from the pulpit a moſt bright diſcourſe, taking for his text, "There is peace on earth for the righteous." And to the dignitaries, the holy fathers of Canterbury, who were confeſſors there, he ſaid, "That they had one martyr of their church, who had been archbiſhop of it, viz. St. Elphege; that perhaps they might ſoon have another." He this day excommunicated Robert de Broc for cutting the tail of his poor peaſant's horſe, out of hatred to the archbiſhop; and exhorted Broc to repentance. On the feaſt of St. Stephen he celebrated great maſs, as he did alſo on the feaſt of John the Apoſtle and Evangeliſt. On the ſame day he diſpatched ſecretly into Gaul his two clerks, maſter Herbert, and Alexander Wale, his croſs-bearer, and ſent off a third perſon, Gilbert de Glanvill, who was to go to the lord pope. He ſent alſo two perſons to the biſhop of Norwich, to abſolve for a time the excommunicated prieſts of the territory of earl Hugh, who had celebrated divine offices to perſons excommunicate. Reckoning at this time upon his approaching death, he made proviſion in the church for William his chaplain [2]. William was then not in the way to be preſented; but the archbiſhop ſecured it to him under pain of anathema, ſhould any one dare to prevent the preſentation taking place.

On the 30th of December the four barons of the king came from Saltwode to Canterbury, accompanied with their people, and the military ſuite of de Broc. Many other knights were added to them, whom they had ſummoned from the caſtles, and the neighbourhood of Canterbury, in the king's name, to reinforce them, as if for the king's ſervice. About twelve of theſe proceeded directly with the four barons, while notice was given through the city to the reeves and aldermen, as on the part of the king, "that all citizens ſhould go in their armour to the archbiſhop's houſe, to the king's ſervice." And when the city, aſtoniſhed at ſuch madneſs, refuſed to march, they then ordered the citizens to remain quiet and inactive, and not ſtir an inch, ſee or hear what they might. Their firſt object was, to prevail upon the citizens to aſſiſt in the work they were upon; but if they could not be brought to that, at leaſt they ſhould not interrupt them, and fight for the archbiſhop. The four barons went at the head of their party, and with their knights penetrated into an inner room where the archbiſhop was. On their entering, the archbiſhop very kindly ſaluted them; but his ſalutation was either not anſwered, or the anſwer was delivered in ſo dark a manner as not to be underſtood. It was then 10 o'clock in the morning, and the archbiſhop had juſt dined, but his houſehold was ſtill eating. Reginald Fitz-Urſo thus began the converſation: "The lord king who is abroad ſends us to you, that you would abſolve the perſons excommunicated by you, upon your coming into England; likewiſe that you would reſtore to their office thoſe whom you have ſuſpended: alſo he commands that you repair to the king, his ſon, whom you want to uncrown, at Winton, to make ſatisfaction for your exceſs, and to obey the judgement of his court." The archbiſhop replied, "It is not I who have excommunicated and ſuſpended ſeverally the perſons you mean, but the lord pope, by his letters chaſtiſing in this manner his ſons, and puniſhing their demerits, viz. the archbiſhop of York, becauſe in my abſence, and without my notice, without my knowledge or conſent, to the prejudice of my church, and in open defiance of the mandate of the lord pope, he uſurped the coronation of the new king in my own dioceſe. As to the biſhops, they were ſuſpended, becauſe, although they were the ſuffragans and profeſſed obedientiaries of the church of Canterbury, they connived at this abuſe, and entered no proteſt in behalf of the right of their mother, the church. With regard to the ſentence of my lord pope, it is not within my province to cancel it, for the leſſer power cannot bind the greater. But nevertheleſs, although as to the archbiſhop I can neither bind nor looſe, I did upon requeſt concede to my ſuffragans of London and Sarum, that I would abſolve them from anathema, and reſtore the others who had been ſuſpended, if they would only with meekneſs implore mercy, or give ſurety for ſtanding judgement. But this they have refuſed to do. Moreover, I am now ready to do this. The coronation of the young king is firm and ſtable; God forbid any thing ſhould ſhake it! The dignity, therefore, of the perſon crowned being preſerved inviolate, the lord pope puniſhes the injury of the crowner; becauſe the latter, who ought not, and where he ought not, pre-occupied the dignity of our office. And our biſhops are chaſtiſed for their ſilence and ſufferance. All this is with the expreſs and full permiſſion of the lord king, and conformable to the licence he gave me on the day of our reconciliation [3]. I do not therefore ſeek to diſherit the young king, who I wiſh had many kingdoms, if that were compatible with the rights of the poſſeſſors. I lately was ſet out on my journey to him, not to make excuſe or ſatisfaction for aught I had done, for I have in no one thing offended him, but to pay to him, as my lord, my moſt profound congratulations. But at London I received his meſſenger, and his command, which pierces me to the heart." Then they broke out into threats, to which they put no bounds. He ſaid, "I marvel greatly that ye make this uproar, and that ye threaten me, and denounce ſo many evil things againſt me. Know ye, that on St. Magdalen's day the lord king received me to his peace and grace; and I ſee among you ſome who were preſent at the very time. And as far as I could then judge of your thoughts, what the king did was highly agreeable to you; and I came into England with the king's own letters of protection, and with his conductor." Maſter John of Saliſbury ſaid to him, "Sir, ſpeak upon that head a little more privately." "There is no need," ſays the archbiſhop; "they propoſe and demand ſuch things as I will moſt certainly not do, and ought not to do." Reginald Urſo: "From whom have you the archbiſhoprick?" Archbiſhop: "The ſpirituals from God, and the lord pope; the temporals and the lands from the lord king." Reginald:

---

[1] The reader is deſired to mark this.

[2] viz. Stephanides, his companion and biographer.

[3] See p. 62.

"Do not you acknowledge to have the whole from the king?"[1] Archbiſhop: "By no means. But we have to render to the king the things which are the king's; and to God the things that are God's." Reginald and the others, as if he had uttered a moſt ſtrange thing, fumed and ſtormed more than before, and gnaſhed upon him with their teeth."

"But the righteous Thomas, firm and undaunted, and prepared to ſuffer agony even unto death for righteouſneſs, and the liberty of his church, and to ſave his ſoul alive, ſays to them, "Ye do in vain threaten me: if all the ſwords of England were now alighting upon my head, your terrors would never be able to remove me from the obſervation of juſtice, and the obedience of the lord pope. Foot to foot ſhall ye find me in the Lord's battle. I once retreated a timid prieſt: I returned in the counſel and obedience of the lord pope[2]. I will never deſert my church again. If I may diſcharge my ſacerdotal office in peace, it is well; if not, the will of God be done. Beſides, ye know what there is between me and you; which makes me more ſurprized that ye dare threaten the archbiſhop in his own houſe." He ſaid this, alluding to what Reginald, and William de Traci, and Hugh de Moreville had done, while Thomas was yet chancellor; for theſe three had actually then done him homage, and upon their knees ſubmitted to obey him, and hold him for their lord, ſaving their allegiance to the king. But this reminding, inſtead of ſoftening their ferocity, only made it worſe. And, now tranſported with rage, they exclaimed, "There is no tie between us againſt the king; we dare (cried Reginald) not only threaten the archbiſhop, but do a great deal more; let us retreat." Near the ſpot ſtood a large company of the archbiſhop's knights[3], with clerks and other people, and ſome knights[4], who had flocked together in conſequence of the loud talk within the houſe. Reginald, caſting his eye upon theſe people, ſaid, "We charge you on the part of the king, whoſe lieges ye are, that ye withdraw from this fellow." Probably as their comrades had been afraid of the citizens, ſo they were afraid, leſt the milice about the archbiſhop ſhould ariſe, and fight for him. And when all ſtood motionleſs, Reginald immediately gives another order, "We command you that ye guard this man, that he do not get away." Archbiſhop: "I am eaſily guarded: I will not go away." The aſſaſſins among others ſpy a certain knight, cup-bearer of the archbiſhop, William Fitz-Nigel, who had juſt run from his chamber about ſome article of accompt. They ſeize and carry him away with them, ſaying, "You ſhall come along with us." The gentleman ſays to the archbiſhop, "Do you ſee, ſir, what they do with me?" The archbiſhop replied, "I do; this is their ſeaſon, and the hour of darkneſs." Then riſing, he made a few ſteps after them, before they got out of the apartment, that he might extricate his knight, whom he moſt humbly beſought them to let go. They perſevered in refuſing, and moreover ſeize and take away another of the archbiſhop's knights, Ralph Morin; and paſſing through the middle of the hall, and the court, to their party, with terrible looks and threats, which ſpread terror all around, they ſhout "Arms, arms, men," to ſome of their companions who ſtood at the gate to guard it, leſt it ſhould be ſhut on account of the noiſe within the houſe. They had amoved the archbiſhop's porter, and put their own guard, leſt any one out of the city ſhould go to the archbiſhop to carry him aſſiſtance, and that no one ſhould go out from the archbiſhop, and take any thing away[5]. There were within the gate on, horſeback, William Fitz-Nigel, a tenant and vaſſal of the archbiſhop, but now againſt him[6], and Simon de Crioil, a knight of the abbot of St. Auguſtin, hard by. Reginald arms himſelf apart in the area before the hall, and forces a ſervant of the archbiſhop to aſſiſt him. And he ſeized a carpenter's ax out of the carpenter's hand, who was mending the ſtairs. We in the mean while tarrying with the archbiſhop in the ſaloon, recollected and conſidered the threats and vehement words that had been uttered, and liſtened to what came from the archbiſhop. We were of different opinions. Some thought there was nothing to fear. "Theſe men," they ſaid, "who came were drunk; before dinner they would have talked differently. It is now the Lord's Nativity; the king's peace is pledged to us." Others thought that cruel deeds were very likely to follow ſuch fierce words. There were many ſtrong indications of approaching cruelty. In the mean while we hear from the ſide of the church a terrible cry of both ſexes and of all ages, expreſſing their compaſſion for us, as ſheep doomed for ſlaughter. Theſe people had ſeen the king's barons put on their armour in the city, and, upon the ſignal given, haſten to the archbiſhop. We who were within likewiſe heard Robert de Broc battering the wall, he thinking that the only way of getting in would be by making a breach. Fear and trembling fell upon us monks, the clerks, and companions of the archbiſhop. Lo! the prediction was now fulfilled which the holy one of God had ſpoken a little while before: "They would ſoon wiſh to be any where rather than in England." But the good Thomas was under no fear of death; looking upon it as the haven of reſt to the good and righteous, and as the paſſage to eternity. Moreover, he ſeemed to be perfectly ſerene and ſecure, as if glad that he had now a fair opportunity of dying for righteouſneſs and liberty, and the cauſe of his church; and as if deſiring to be diſſolved, and to be with Chriſt. So great was his love of eccleſiaſtical liberty, that he meaſured it not by his fall, but by his reſurrection and ſalvation. Then the monks, who were numerous, ſay to him, "Sir, go into the church." Archbiſhop: "By no means, do not be afraid." Monks are apt to be timid and puſillanimous. They are not content. Some of them lay hands upon him, and lift him up in order to take him away, and would force him off. Others perſuade him to depart, for the monks were ſaying veſpers, and he himſelf was about to hear the ninth hora, and veſpers. He orders therefore the croſs of the Lord to be brought forth. One of his clerks bears it. When we were come into the cloyſter of the monks, the monks wiſhed to have the door ſhut after him. He could not be brought to conſent to it. And putting himſelf in the rear, and moving very ſlowly, he drove them all gently before him, as a good ſhepherd would do his ſheep.' No fear could be diſcovered either in his look or in his carriage. The love of God ſeemed wholly to have extinguiſhed it. Once indeed he looked towards the right, for what reaſon is unknown. Perhaps he had a mind to ſee whether the king's people were coming upon him; or, he might look towards the door, to ſee that nobody bolted it. We enter the church itſelf, being about to go to the upper altar, where he was wont to hear the common maſſes and horæ. He had now got up four ſteps, when, lo! at the cloiſter door appears Reginald Urſo, who had come the firſt, in his coat of mail, and with his ſword drawn, and hollowing, "Now, hither to me, ye men of the king." Shortly after are joined to him his three beforementioned companions, in like manner covered heads and bodies with mails, except their eyes. They likewiſe had their ſwords drawn. They were accompanied by ſome perſons of Canterbury, whom they had compelled to attend them. On that day, and four days afterwards, at the neighbouring caſtles of Dover, Haſtings, and other caſtles, knights kept guard, as was obſerved before. At the trans-marine ports were the king's own people; earl William at Witſand, Seier de Quinci in another place. The murderers being perceived, the door of the church was ſhut-to. But the good man, putting his truſt in God, and unterrified, deſcended from the ſteps, and went back, and forbad the door of the church to be ſhut, ſaying, "Let all come into the church that like it, it ought not to be ſhut like a caſtle. The will of God be done!" As the archbiſhop came down the ſteps to go towards the door, to prevent its being ſhut, then John of Saliſbury, and all the archbiſhop's other clerks (except canon Robert, and William Fitz-Stephen[1], and Edward Grim), ſolicitous to ſave their lives, left the archbiſhop, and hid themſelves under the altars, and wherever elſe they could. And indeed if the archbiſhop had had a mind to ſave himſelf, he might have done it with little or no trouble. It was evening; the nights very long. The crypts of the church were near, in which were many crooked paſſages. Another door was likewiſe very near, by which he might have got up to the top of the church under the roof. He would not have recourſe to any of theſe means of ſafety. He did not decline the conflict. He made no ſupplications to the murderers. He did not utter a murmur. He dropt no complaint; but, expecting the laſt hour, which now impended, for Chriſt, and the cauſe of the church, he diſplayed a fortitude, a conſtancy of mind, of body, and of ſpeech, that equalled any of the martyrs of antient times. He maintained his firmneſs till the whole was finiſhed. Lo! theſe ruffians, tranſported by fury, finding the church open, contrary to their expectations, ruſh haſtily through the door. Whither, whither do ye ruſh, ye wicked men? What madneſs ſeizes you, O! wretched men, what do ye with your ſwords[2]? One of the aſſaſſins ſaid to the monks who ſtood by the archbiſhop, "Do not ye ſtir." And one of them cryed, "Where is that traytor?" The archbiſhop, poſſeſſing his ſoul in patience, made no reply. "Where (cried one) is the archbiſhop?" "Behold me (ſaid the latter), not a traytor, but a prieſt of God. And I wonder that in ſuch a dreſs ye ſhould enter his church. What is your pleaſure?" One of the aſſaſſins: "That you die. It is impoſſible you ſhould live longer." Archbiſhop: "In the name of God, I ſubmit myſelf unto death; and commend my ſoul, and the cauſe of my church, to God and the bleſſed Mary, and to the patron-ſaints of this church. Far be it from me that I ſhould flee on account of your ſwords; but, by the authority of God, I forbid you to touch any one of theſe my friends." One of them had brought an ax with him to break down the church door, if it had been found barred, when they came to it. But, as the door was open, he laid down the hatchet, and kept the ſword. One of them ſtruck the primate between the ſhoulders with a broad ſword, ſaying, "Flee, you are dead." He kept his poſition, and then holding his neck forward, as to pray, he commended himſelf to God, and had in his mouth holy archbiſhops, martyrs, St. Dionyſius, and St. Elphege of Canterbury. Some ſaying, "You are taken, you ſhall go with us; and laying their hands upon him, they wanted to pull him out of the church; but it then occurred to them, that if they did ſo, the people would take him out of their hands. The archbiſhop ſaid, "I will go no whither: here ſhall ye do what ye mean to do; and what he who ſent you ordered you to do[3]." He ſtruggled againſt them, as they pulled him, as much as he could. And the monks held him back: among them was maſter Grim, who took the ſtroke of the ſword, which William de Tracy levelled at the archbiſhop's head, upon his arm. The archbiſhop's head, which was bent downwards, received a moſt violent contuſion, although the ſtroke had in its deſcent nearly ſevered the arm of Grim. The archbiſhop, wiping with his arm the blood as it run down from his head, and ſeeing the blood, gave thanks to God, and added, "Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my ſpirit." Then a ſecond ſtroke alights upon his head, at which he fell forward upon his face, his knees being previouſly put together, and gently bent, and his hands raiſed and joined, and extended, by the ſide of the altar of St. Benedict there. He had the care to fall in a becoming and pious manner, ſinking in a poſture of adoration, and covered with his pall quite from his head to his ancles. Neither his attitude nor his robe were deranged; but he lay proſtrate, as if about to worſhip and pray. As he lay ſtretched upon the ground, Richard Brito ſtruck him with ſuch force, that his ſword was broke againſt his head and the pavement. "Take this," ſaid he, "for the love of my lord William, the king's brother." This William had wanted to marry the counteſs Warrenne; but their conſanguinity being within the limited degrees, the archbiſhop would not permit the marriage; which very much grieved William, and made all his friends deteſt the archbiſhop.

---

[1] After lands had, in a regular and lawful manner, been given in pure and frank almoine to the church, with exemption from all civil and feudal obligations, could the quondam lord, or his heirs, ſay, eſpecially while the ſpiritual ſervices ſpecified in the charter of infeofment were performed, they were holden of him? Were they not then held of the church?

[2] The pope had ordered him to go to Canterbury to take care of his flock. To deſert his ſtation, therefore, ſeemed to be diſobedience to the vicar of Chriſt, which nothing could juſtify.

[3] We ſhould at this day ſay, gentlemen of eſtates.

[4] i. e. Gentlemen of his houſehold, clerus & militia, clergy and laity.

[5] The houſe was to be plundered, as well as the inhabitant and owner murdered.

[6] Forced, I preſume, to act againſt his immediate lord, in behalf of his ſuperior lord, the king.

This is the account given by Stephanides of this atrocious murder. In lord Lyttelton's narration of it, taken from other authors of the time, it is recited thus:

"Reginald Fitz-Urſe lifted up his ſword againſt the head of Becket, who then bowing his head, and joining his hands together in a poſture of prayer, recommended his own ſoul, and the cauſe of the church, to God, and to the ſaints of that cathedral. But one of the monks of Canterbury interpoſing his arm to ward off the blow, it was almoſt cut off; and the archbiſhop alſo was wounded in the crown of his head. He ſtood a ſecond ſtroke, which likewiſe fell on his head, in the ſame devout poſture, without a motion, word, or groan; but, after receiving a third, he fell proſtrate on his face; and all the accomplices preſſing now to a ſhare in the murder, his ſkull was ſtruck off by Richard Brito. Laſtly, Hugh the ſubdeacon, who had joined himſelf to them at Canterbury, ſcooped out the brains of the dead archbiſhop with the point of a ſword, and ſcattered them over the pavement."

Thus fell this great and good man, a rare example of manly firmneſs, and Chriſtian piety:

"Juſtum & tenacem propoſiti virum
"Non civium ardor prava jubentium,
"Non vultus inſtantis tyranni
"Mente quatit ſolidâ." Hor.

---

[1] Becket's biographer, from whom this account is taken. We ſee he was an eye-witneſs of the murder. Others were tortured, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better reſurrection—of whom the world was not worthy. Ep. to Heb.

[2] The hiſtorian's exclamation; who ſaw them enter.

[3] How ſtrange that hiſtorians ſhould affirm, that king Henry had no guilt in this murder. Whereas it was moſt clearly done by a plot of his own forming, by his own immediate inſtruments, and by his own poſitive order. Not a perſon of Europe doubted of his guilt. In favour of his innocence nothing was brought but his oath, the oath of the moſt perjured man alive, to reſcue his reputation from infamy, and his perſon from deſtruction. The aſſaſſins were never puniſhed; but enjoyed his friendſhip, and were of his parties of pleaſure after the fact. See Gervas, and contemplate the following hiſtorical French fragment. The author is drawing the amiable character of Lewis le Jeune: "Cum beato etiam Thoma multa unitus eſt familiaritate. Cui cum a ſede Cantuarienſi exul per ſeptem annos moraretur in Francia quam plurima obtulit donaria, & illius inopiam per multa ſtuduit ſublevare ſubſidia. Ad ultimum autem Henrico regi Angliæ illum concordavit, & in ſede propria reſtitui fecit. Sed rex Angliæ belluinum habens animum, paciſq per manum regis Franciæ factæ immemor, illum intra ſinum eccleſiæ Cantuariæ capite plecti conſenſit." Du Cheſne. tom. IV. p. 444. Our chronicles frequently complain of the danger to which they were expoſed by writing truth. Their fear of Henry might hinder them from ſpeaking all they knew about this murder. The fact, however, ſpeaks for itſelf; and if our writers do not charge him ſo ſtrongly and directly with the murder; the French writers, who had nothing to fear, are leſs reſerved.

[4] Baſe ſon of Henry II. by Roſamond.

Memoir

BRITISH
12 JN 923
MUSEUM

Fig. 1. App. p. 38.

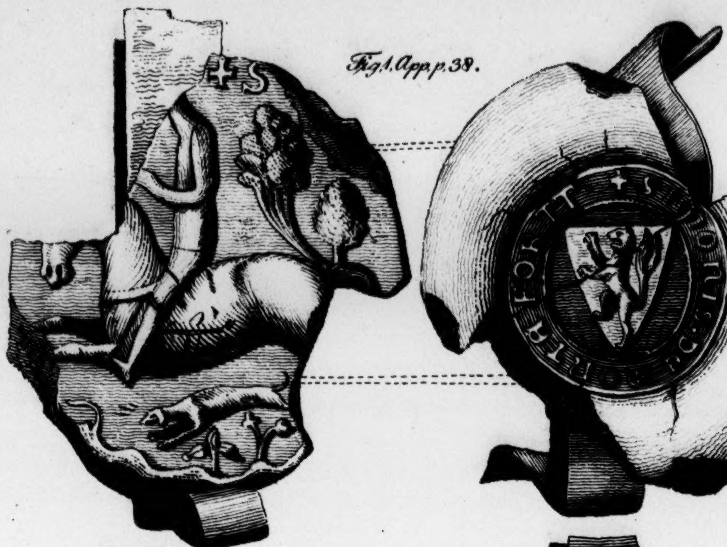

Fig. 3. App. p. 38.

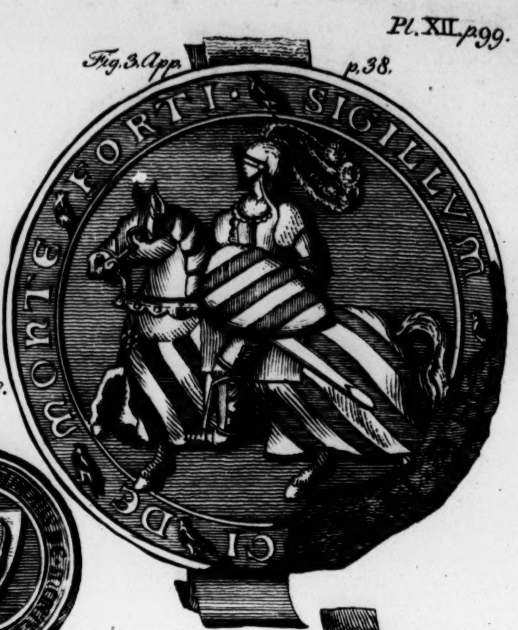

SIGILLUM · GI · DE · MONTE · FORTI ·

Fig. 2. App. p. 38.

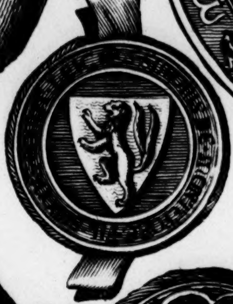

Fig. 4. App. p. 39.

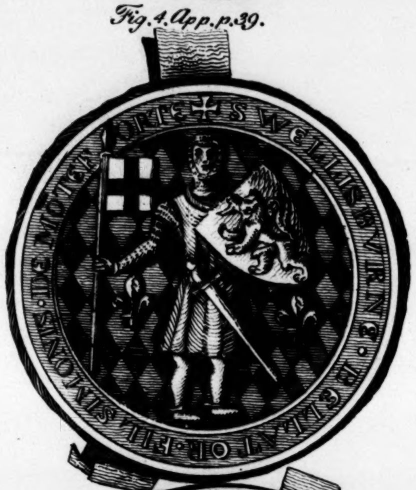
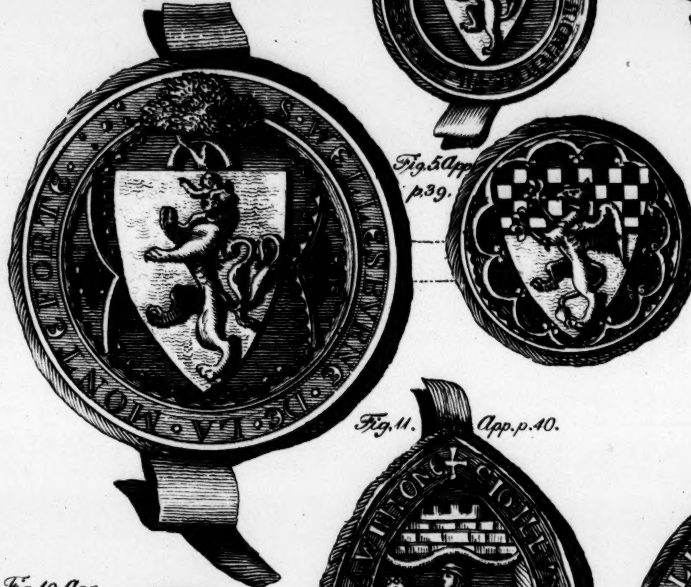


+ S' WELLESBURNE · REGINALDI · FILII · SIMONIS · DE · MONTE FORTI ·

Fig. 5. App. p. 39.



S' ... WELLESBURNE · DE · LA · MONTE · FORTE

Fig. 6. App. p. 39.

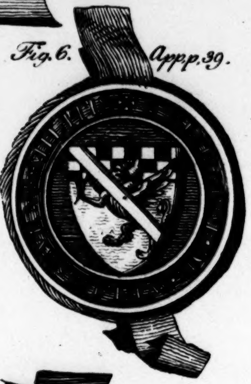


Fig. 11. App. p. 40.

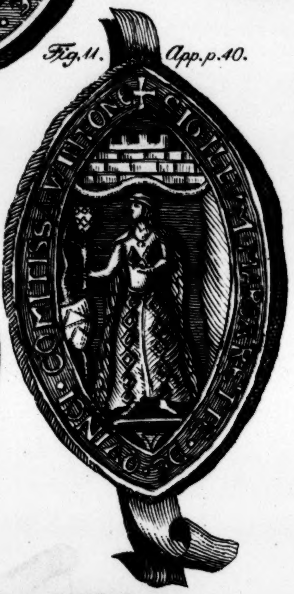

Fig. 9. App. p. 39.

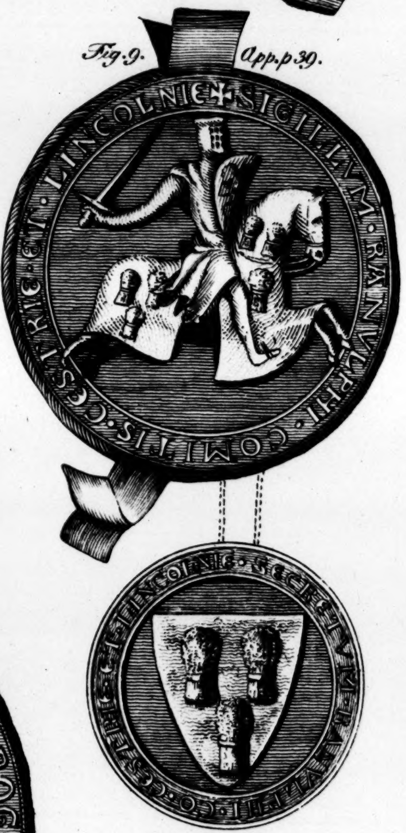
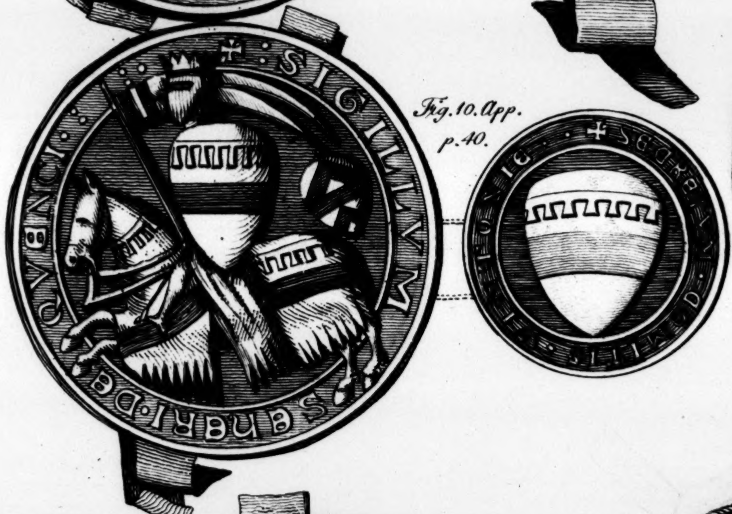


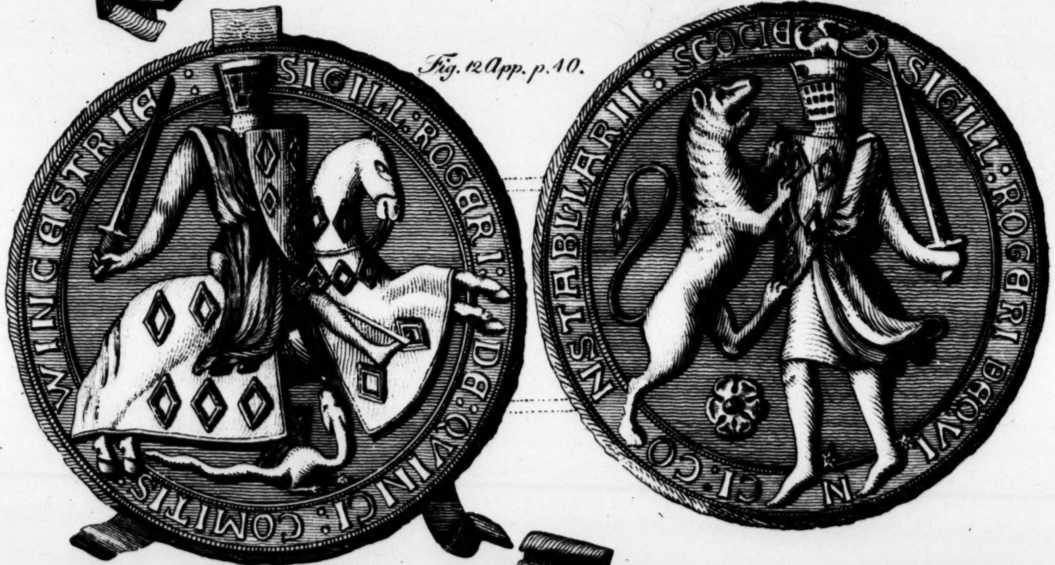
+ SIGILLUM · RANULFI · COMITIS · CESTRIE · ET · LINCOLNIE
LINCOLNIE

Fig. 10. App. p. 40.



+ SIGILLUM · S · HENRICI · DE · QUINCI ·
+ S ... DE QUINCI

Fig. 12. App. p. 40.



SIGILL · ROGERI · DE · QUINCI · COMITIS · WINCESTRIE
SIGILL · ROGERI · DE QUI · NCI · CO · NSTABULARII · SCOCIE

Fig. 13. App. p. 40.

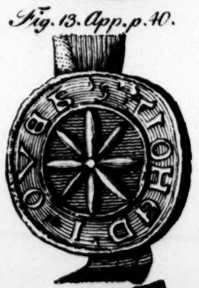


Fig. 14. App. p. 40.

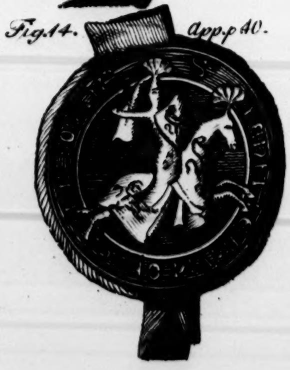

Fig. 7. App. p. 39.

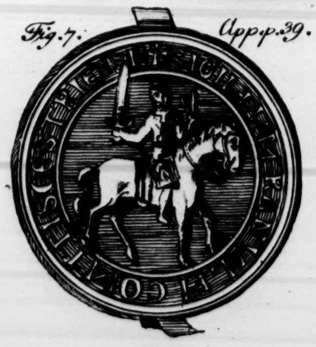

Fig. 8. p. 39.

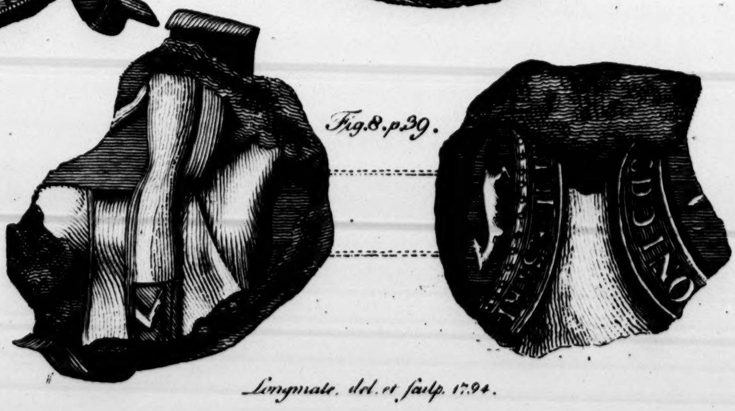

Longmate. del. et sculp. 1794.

Memoir of ROBERT ove BLANCHMAINES, Earl of LEICESTER.

This earl of Leiceſter was deſcribed in his own time by various appellations; ſometimes Robert the younger, to diſtinguiſh him from his father; ſometimes Robert the ſecond earl of Leiceſter, for the ſame reaſon. Again, he is called Robert de Britolio, from the town of Breteuil, which was part of the family fief in Normandy, being, I ſuppoſe, the place of his birth; and laſtly, Robert ove Blanchmaines, that is, Robert with White-hands[1]. Some conjectures have been ſtarted on the cauſe of this nick-name, which, as they have no great probability, and reſt on no antient authority, ſeem unworthy of further notice. The name of Blanchmaines, however, was not peculiar to our earl, for hiſtory makes mention of Humbert, ſurnamed White-hands, as earl of Maurienne and Savoy, in the early part of the eleventh century[2].

It is remarked of Henry II. that he was a ſcourge of the church, and an oppreſſor of the nobility. William, earl of Glouceſter, ſon of that Robert, earl of Glouceſter, to whom Henry owed the crown of England, had been deſpoiled by him of a large part of his knights fees. Probably other nobles had found no better treatment. Our earl of Leiceſter's ſiſter was the wife of this William, earl of Glouceſter; and perhaps Blanchmaines ſaw, with too much ſympathy, the wrongs done to his brother-in-law. Upon the ſlighteſt pretence, Henry attacked and battered the caſtles of the nobility, both in England, and in his foreign dominions. The earl of Leiceſter had certainly a good title to the earldom of Hereford, which ſeems to have been a palatine earldom; but we do not find that his father, or his ſon, had ever enjoyed it after the acceſſion of Henry II. Again: the murder of Becket had made Henry odious throughout Europe; and thoſe, who were moſt affected to the primate during his life, became his zealous worſhipers when they heard of the many miracles performed by him after his death. But the hatred that was conceived againſt Henry was not confined to the nobility and people at large, but reached to his queen and children. And it was with theſe that our earl was connected in the extraordinary war that I am going to relate. In the autumn of the year 1171, the king invaded Ireland, and conquered a large part. This expedition detained him in that country till the following ſpring.

Before I enter into the detail of this war, it may be uſeful to make an obſervation on the authors and cauſes of it; for on the ſide of the king it was wholly defenſive. The chief enemies he had to contend with on this occaſion were no others than his own wife and three eldeſt ſons; for John ſans terre was not yet ripe enough to take arms againſt his father. A war between perſons ſo related to each other was ſomewhat more than a civil war, and ſeems to be ſo monſtrous and unnatural, that we can only account for it by ſuppoſing, that the queen was either a moſt weak, or moſt wicked, woman (and hiſtory does not ſo deſcribe her), or actuated by ſome ſtrong impulſe of paſſion. Her age at this time ſeems to have been between forty and fifty years. Some ſay that ſhe was drawn into it by ſome uncles ſhe had[3], who took advantage of the king's abſence in Ireland during the latter part of the year 1171, and beginning of the year following, to perſuade her to make certain demands in favour of her eldeſt ſon Henry, who was now co-rex by his late coronation; and to compel the king's compliance with ſuch demands. The earl of Leiceſter took ſo deep a ſhare in the conſpiracy as to make it the opinion of ſome, that it was wholly of his and the queen's formation. It has been ſuggeſted, alſo, that the king's neglect of the queen, and his attachment to his miſtreſſes, ſpurred her to this deſperate act of hoſtility againſt her huſband. But, after being accuſtomed to Henry's infidelities from the time of her marriage, it can hardly be ſuppoſed that her jealouſy could riſe to ſuch a pitch ſo late in life as to ſtimulate her to ſo violent and dangerous a ſtep as what ſhe was now taking. Nor did ſhe, or the French king, aſſign any other reaſon for exciting this rebellion, but that of procuring juſtice for the young king and queen. Alianor had ſecretly made a warm auxiliar in her old huſband the French king, whoſe daughter Margaret being the wife of her ſon the young king, he had the ſame reaſon to extort from Henry a proper conſideration of his ſon-in-law, as the latter's mother had for her ſon. Hence an union of intereſts, combined perhaps with ſome latent regard in Lewis for the wife of his youth, and mother of his two eldeſt daughters, produced an union of exertion to attain a common object.

Henry, by his ſubtle management, had leſſened the odium incurred by the murder of Becket. While the clamour raged like a tempeſt, and threatened him with the loſs of dominions, if not of life; he proteſted, that he had no intentional ſhare in that atrocious deed; he faſted, he prayed, he wept, he ſuſpended buſineſs and pleaſure, he kept at home, he declared his horror at what had happened, threw himſelf entirely on the mercy of the holy ſee, as to the means of atonement, and paid as much reverence to the ſhrine of Becket as any monk in the kingdom. With all theſe profeſſions and acts of humiliation, he took his meaſures with a degree of craft, which ſhewed all the reſt to be mere grimace and policy. The pope was flattered with his contrition, which afforded him a pretence for indulgence. Legates at length were ſent into Normandy, to try and paſs ſentence upon Henry; but, before they came, he had in a manner reconciled himſelf to the holy ſee, was well acquainted with the conditions upon which his abſolution was to be granted, and had taken care to qualify theſe conditions with ſo many reſervations as made them, while they ſeemed to be imperious and authoritative acts of the pope, to be, in reality, no reſtraint or puniſhment upon Henry whatſoever. Nor did he ever perform any one of the conditions to which he was ſworn, and that were contained in the inſtrument made on the occaſion; excepting that of raiſing a great deal of money out of the pockets of his people, under the pretence of employing it in the croiſade; but to which purpoſe it was not applied. Upon the whole, this pretended ſubmiſſion to the pope ſeems to have been a mere ſtate-trick between the Roman court and the Engliſh king; the latter was certainly at the mercy of the former, which was willing to ſave appearances, but not diſpoſed to be long, or ſeriouſly at variance, with a powerful living king, for the ſake of a dead archbiſhop.

We now return to the ſtory of the war which commenced with the open breach between the two kings of England, Henry the father, and Henry the ſon. This breach was brought on in the following manner:

Towards the latter part of the year 1172, Lewis le Jeune, who had not for a long time ſeen his daughter Margaret, preferred his requeſt to Henry ſenior, that he would permit the young king and queen to pay him a viſit in France. The requeſt being granted, Henry and Margaret left England, and, after paſſing through Normandy, arrived at the French court, which was then at Chartres. The French king received them with great affection; and took the preſent opportunity, while the young king ſtayed with him, to point out to him the injuſtice done him by his father, who, notwithſtanding he had gotten him crowned king of England, and had voluntarily proclaimed, at the coronation feaſt, his own abdication of the crown, had ever ſince not only kept the crown, but engroſſed the power of it, and had not been ſo juſt and generous as to inveſt Henry with one province from among his numerous dominions, or beſtowed on him a ſingle territory out of which he might honourably ſupport himſelf and his queen, and have ſomething to beſtow on the knights who were in his immediate ſuite [1]. According to the reports ſpread afterwards by the partizans and courtiers of king Henry ſenior, Lewis not only ſuggeſted theſe things to the young king, but perſuaded him to make ſtrong remonſtrances upon theſe matters to his father, and, in failure of redreſs, to force him by open arms to do him juſtice. Before Lewis and Henry parted, it was finally agreed between them, that, when the latter got back into Normandy, he ſhould make it his propoſal to his father, to reſign to him either England, or Normandy, or Anjou, that, as he was a young king, he might not be without a dominion, and that he might have ſome proper place for his own and his queen's reſidence, and that he might have a permanent and competent income, and be no longer kept at ſuch a ſhort and precarious allowance as he had been hitherto. Henry ſenior having ſhrewd ſuſpicions that Lewis would take the opportunity which now offered, for infuſing into his ſon dangerous counſels, congenial with his own prejudices, was not eaſy at his ſon's ſtay with the French king, and therefore ordered him and the young queen to take their leave of the French court, and return to him. The feaſt of the Nativity drawing nigh, the king the father went into Anjou to ſpend his Chriſtmas at Chinon, leaving the king, his ſon, and his wife, in Normandy. Alianor went with the king to Chinon. Henry ſenior had his thoughts at this time wholly turned upon a very advantageous match, which he had projected for his youngeſt ſon, viz. John, who was about ſeven years old. In February he made a journey into Auvergne, to have a meeting there with many illuſtrious perſons upon various affairs, but particularly to meet Hubert, count of Maurienne, or Savoy, between whoſe daughter, the preſumptive heir of her father, and his ſon John, it was king Henry's ardent wiſh to bring about a marriage. The treaty was nearly ſettled, but could not be brought to a concluſion, unleſs king Henry ſenior would agree to ſettle three of his caſtles in Normandy upon the young couple; which Hubert thought was no unreaſonable requiſition, in conſideration of the princely earldom which his daughter was to bring to the ſon of king Henry. Henry cloſed with the requiſition; and now nothing was wanting but the concurrence of the young king to finiſh this laboured and advantageous contract. But young Henry, highly incenſed with his father for putting a flat negative upon his late requeſt, and probably directed by his mother (for the whole blame was afterwards laid upon her), now in his turn retaliated upon the king, and refuſed to concur in the alienation of the caſtles. He ſeems from this time to have been kept in cuſtody, and formed his ſcheme of eſcape. This he effected about the beginning of March, 1173, by quitting his place of abode by night, and journeying in a rapid manner to Chartres. King Henry heard of his eſcape almoſt immediately, and purſued him with all poſſible ſpeed; but not able to overtake him, he repaired to his ſtrong caſtle at Giſors, his uſual quarters while negotiations were pending between him and the French court.

---

[1] Knyghton Ann. Waverl. Lelandi Coll. Diceto, &c.

[2] Mezeray.

[3] Leland, Coll.

Queen Alianor, who had the care of her two ſons, Richard and Geoffry, diſpoſed them to join in their brother's revolt, and accordingly fetched them from the places of their reſidence, which ſeem to be in Bretagne and Poitou; and young Henry took them with him to the court of the French king, where they were all treated with the higheſt degree of hoſpitality and reſpect. About the ſame time, Alianor diſguiſed herſelf in man's apparel, and eloped from her royal huſband, and choſe for her preſent aſylum a certain caſtle in her own paternal dominion of Poitou, where ſhe found full employment in alienating the publick mind from her huſband, and widening the breach, as much as poſſible, between the father and his ſons.

Henry took up his abode at the ſtrong caſtle of Giſors, which lay on the Eaſtern frontier of Normandy; from thence he diſpatched, without loſs of time, his two truſty friends, Rotred, archbiſhop of Rouen, and Arnulp, the biſhop of Liſieux, to the court of France: they were directed to convey the king of England's ſalutation to his lord the king of France, and repreſent to him the injuſtice of harbouring and withholding ſons from their father, and aſſure him, that if he had done any thing offenſive to his lord, he was ready to correct his error, and make adequate ſatiſfaction without delay; nobody being more convinced than king Henry was of the bleſſedneſs of peace, and the miſchief of diſſenſion. On the admiſſion of the Engliſh ambaſſadors to the audience of the French king, he ſcorned their ſalutation on the part of the king of England, but condeſcended to hear, with patience, what they had to offer. After they had delivered what is juſt recited, he began to treat the name of king Henry very ſcornfully. He repreſented to them the deceit and tricks of Henry, by which, he ſaid, "he had been abuſed and circumvented times without number." He ſaid, "that Henry, after having pledged his moſt ſolemn faith on ſundry occaſions, broke his compacts upon the moſt frivolous pretences; and that he had proved him in all things ſo fickle and faithleſs, that he was determined never more to rely upon his oath or promiſe." And he added, "that it had been his firm reſolution to attack him, before his ſon Henry came to him at Chartres." He told them alſo, "that, beſides theſe, Henry had given him other cauſes of diſpleaſure; for inſtance, in not ſuffering his daughter to return to her huſband; in not rendering her dower to him; in exciting the people, who were ſubject to his government, from the mountains of Auvergne, even to the Rhone, to hate him; in receiving the count of St. Egid to be his liegeman, to the injury of the crown of France." And at laſt he confirmed, by oath, "that he never would make league or concord with Henry, without the aſſent of his wife and ſons." The ambaſſadors thought it their duty to relate all this in their letter to king Henry, and to inform him "that the people, both of his Engliſh and Gallic dominions, were ſo ſtrongly ſet againſt him, and had laid ſo deep a plot for his deſtruction, that nothing could ſave him but the correction of his errors, and flying to the prayers of the church for protection." They ſay, "Quid eſt amabilius filiis? Quid uxore familiarius? Receſſit tamen uxor a latere veſtro, et filii inſurgunt in patrem [2]." Walter Hemingford, in his Chronicle, deſcribes Lewis's behaviour in the following manner: "After the ambaſſadors had demanded of the French the delivery of the Engliſh princes, as a right due to a father, and had declared king Henry's readineſs to amend any thing which had given the French king any cauſe of umbrage." "Who is it," ſays Lewis, "that ſends me this meſſage, and makes theſe propoſals?" They anſwer, "the king of Angles." "That is falſe," rejoined Lewis; "behold, here is the king of Angles. But if ye ſay that the father of this man is now the king of Angles, know ye, that he whom ye call king of Angles is, as it were, defunct. And as to his retaining the title of king when he has reſigned his realm to his ſon, that matter ſhall be ſoon ſet to rights."

Theſe declarations of Lewis, and the general aſpect of his affairs, convinced Henry of the danger that beſet him on all ſides, and rouſed him to exertions adequate to the occaſion [3]. He diſcovered no ſymptoms of fear; nor even ſuffered the ſubjects of his crown, and liberty, and life, to interrupt his conſtant purſuits of hunting, and hawking. It was doubted whether the ſeverity of his mind, amidſt ſo important a criſis, was the effect of policy, or rational ſecurity. He might think it prudent to inſpire his people with an opinion of his contempt for his enemies, to prevent a further defection. And perhaps no one could judge ſo well as he of his own reſources, and the nature of that hoſtile confederacy which was formed againſt him; but it ſeems to have been extremely formidable, and enough to render a mind, not uncommonly firm, even incapable of diſſimulation. His firſt ſtep was, to provide for the eaſtern frontier of Normandy, where was a ſuite of forts to prevent the inroads of the French on that ſide. With all the diſpatch poſſible he appointed wardens for the caſtles in that part, and got the ditches deepened and cleanſed, and ſtored with plenty of victuals; beſtowing the principal care upon Giſors, the moſt important fortreſs in that quarter; which was at once the protection of his dutchy, and the terror and annoyance of his enemy. As he was paſſing ſucceſſively through the caſtles, and munitions, on this ſide Normandy, for the above purpoſes, he likewiſe, by his meſſengers and letters, took the beſt meaſures he could for the preſervation of England, Bretagne, Anjou, Poitou, and his other dominions, in the ſame manner as he had done for Normandy. And, in addition to theſe means of defence and offence, he took ſome ſteps to obtain popularity. To conciliate the free tenants of the foreſts of England, conſiſting of knights and eſquires, infeoffed of lands within the juriſdiction thereof, he ſent an order to Richard de Lucy, his high juſtice of England, to throw open all the foreſts, and let the gentry hunt therein at their pleaſure[1]. He had been a great hoarder of money, and was now content to diſburſe it profuſely, in hiring 20,000 mercenaries of Brabant, called Roturiers, or Plebeyans, to diſtinguiſh them, I ſuppoſe, from the feudal milice, of whom uſually the armies of European princes then conſiſted. By the ſhort remarks found in our Chronicles upon theſe Brabantine mercenaries, they ſeem to have been men trained to arms for the ſake of ſubſiſtence, and ready to fight for any one who would hire them, and to be troops better diſciplined, and more to be depended on, than the forces furniſhed by the vaſſals of the crown, and the hundreds, and towns, and communities of England. This kind of muſter was made upon the ſpur of the occaſion, and conſiſting of raw forces, collected chiefly by compulſion, and ſerving only for a ſhort term, was certainly much inferior to ſuch a corps as was furniſhed by the Brabanters, men well diſciplined, devoted to war, and under no authority but that of the king himſelf. Henry pretended that he was too anxious for the lives of his people, to expoſe them to the evils of war, and therefore that he preferred foreign mercenaries, and would be content with ſcutage inſtead of perſonal ſervice from barons, knights, and freeholders of England[2]. This ſeems to have been readily aſſented to by his vaſſals, who preferred paying to ſerving, but, perhaps, not aware how ſubverſive ſuch an innovation might prove of their liberties.

---

[1] From this, and ſimilar paſſages in other chronicles, it ſeems, that the uſual way of rewarding the ſervice of military retainers was, for the prince or chief to give them fiefs, to be holden of the giver and his heirs, by the tenant and his heirs by homage and fealty; the general conditions of military fief. This ſort of honourable and free tenement was called prædium.

[2] Du Cheſne, IV. p. 451.

[3] See Rad. Diceto, p. 571.

While theſe preparations were making, a treaty was opened with the queen, who was in Poitou. Upon this occaſion, as upon moſt others, Henry tried the united powers of blandiſhment and threat. He got the archbiſhop of Rouen, and that primate's ſuffragans, to write to Alianor, and repreſent to her the heinouſneſs of a wife's ſeparating from her huſband, ſeducing their common children from their duty to their parent, perſuading them to abandon their father, and join his enemy to overturn and deſtroy him. The biſhops remonſtrated to her, that her three ſons were entirely under her influence, and had been guided by her in their late and preſent conduct; and having very ſharply admoniſhed her, they exhorted and commanded her, upon pain of moſt ſevere eccleſiaſtical cenſures, to amend her conduct, and return to her huſband, who, they aſſure her, upon that condition, would forgive all that was paſt, and reinſtate her fully in his favour. Alianor, circumvented by theſe ſoothings, fell again into the king's hands, who immediately put her into a ſtrong tower, belonging, we may ſuppoſe, to one of his ſtrong caſtles, where he kept her a priſoner for about 15 years, that is, till his death. Such was the fortune of Alianor, the greateſt heireſs of Europe, who had heroically, if not, perhaps, piouſly made the cruſade, taſted the pleaſures of gallantry, been the wife, firſt of the king of France, and afterwards of the king of England, whom ſhe preferred to Lewis, according to the French hiſtorian Mezeray, becauſe Henry was not ſo religious as Lewis, was ſtronger, younger, and yellow-haired.

After Eaſter, in 1173, the king of France celebrated a great council at Paris, in which he and all the princes (or grandees) of France ſwore to the ſon of the king of England, that they would aid him by all means to eject his father from his kingdom, unleſs the latter would make ſuch a compromiſe as ſhould be required of him. And young king Henry ſwore to them that he would never make peace with his father, but with their conſent and pleaſure. Then he ſwore, that he would give to Philip, count of Flanders, for his homage, annual rents in lands, £. 1000, and the whole county or earldom of Kent, with the caſtles of Dover and Rocheſter; and to Matthew, brother of Philip, count of Bologne, for his homage, he would give the ſoke of Kirketon, in Lindeſie, and the earldom of Mortagne, with the honor of Eye; and to count Theobald of Blois, for his homage, 200 pounds of yearly rents in land, in Anjou, and the caſtle of Amboiſe, with the whole right that he claimed in Turonique; and quit-claimed to him all the right which the king, his father, and himſelf, claimed in Caſtle Reginald[3].

William king of Scots was perſuaded to take a part in this war on the ſide of the confederates, in hopes of recovering, through the help of young Henry, Northumberland, and his other fiefs held of the crown of England[4].

This parliament of the French king was, immediately after its diſſolution, followed by hoſtilities. The king of England's dominions were attacked on either ſide the ſea with the moſt tremendous fury.

The earl of Leiceſter does not ſeem to have declared himſelf till he got out of England, and was arrived at his caſtle of Breteuil, on the Eaſtern ſide of Normandy. The caſtle and town of this name were the capital of a fair honor, which had been formerly the poſſeſſion of the illuſtrious family of the Oſberns, and had come to Robert through his mother Amicia, the heireſs of Oſbern, both in the barony of Breteuil, and the whole earldom of Hereford.

Robert earl of Leiceſter (ſays Ralph de Diceto), collecting all the money he could from all quarters, and having in his mouth profeſſions of peace, obtained, from the high juſticiars, licence to go beyond ſea; and the chamberlain, William de Tancarvill, got licence to do the ſame. Each of them, by their corporal oath, ſwore fealty to the perſon of king Henry the father; but, as ſoon as they were got abroad, they changed their minds with the climate; for as ſoon as they heard what was doing in the land, they began likewiſe to think of revolting[5].

Philip, count of Flanders, with a great army, invaded Bretagne, and beſieged Albemarle, and took it, together with the earl of it. From thence the Flemiſh army advanced to Drivencurt, a caſtle of itſelf extremely ſtrong, and intruſted to a picked body of knights. But this was alſo ſurrendered after a little reſiſtance, and there was a great ſuſpicion that the earl of Albemarle ſecretly favoured the aſſailants. The Flemiſh army then ſat down againſt the caſtle of Arches, where Philip's brother, the count of Blois, being ſeverely wounded, the former was ſtruck with conſternation, and deſiſted from further attacks for the preſent[1]. Advice of the earl of Flanders' ſucceſs in Bretagne no ſooner reached England, than the malcontents there, conceiving ſanguine hopes of ſucceſs to the cauſe of the young king, began to combine, and declare more openly againſt Henry, the father[2]. In the mean time Lewis and young king Henry invaded Normandy, and laid ſiege to Verneuil, one of the ſtrongeſt burghs of that dutchy. They proſecuted the ſiege for about a month with very little effect upon the works[3]: but the burgeſſes and people within fearing a famine if the ſiege went on, and they were not relieved by the feaſt of St. Laurence, their tutelar ſaint, viz. Auguſt 10, they pledged themſelves, by hoſtages, to ſurrender to the beſiegers, if not relieved by that time. They ſent advice, therefore, of their ſituation to king Henry, who collected his whole and vaſt army, and, with his uſual and aſtoniſhing expedition, marched to its relief. In his way he ſtopped at the caſtle of Breteuil[4]. The earl of Leiceſter was in it when king Henry approached it, but did not ſtay to await the event of a ſiege, but fled from it immediately, and joined the king of France. King Henry had no difficulty in taking it; after which he ſet it on fire, and levelled it to the ground[5], and then marched on for Verneuil[6], which he preſerved. The two kings, not thinking themſelves ſtrong enough to engage him in the open field, and bring matters to an iſſue by one deciſive battle, withdrew into France.

---

[1] As ſoon as his danger was over, and the kingdom reſtored to tranquillity, he levied vaſt fines upon all who had committed treſpaſs upon the foreſts, and ſqueezed an enormous ſum out of the Engliſh gentry who had availed themſelves of the indulgence to hunt. Lyttelton, Benedict, Hoveden, but particularly Diceto, p. 587. Conſequences of this proceeding, Lyttelton, vol. III. p. 176-7.

[2] Dial. de Scaccario, in Madox Exch.

[3] Du Cheſne, tom. IV. p. 430.

[4] Rex Scottorum Willelmus quæ in provincia Northantymbrorum avo ſuo regi David fuerant donata tradita, cartis confirmata, quæ etiam fuerant ab ipſo tempore longo poſſeſſa, repetens a rege patre, ſed repulſam inveniens, congregavit exercitum, &c. Diceto.

[5] So Diceto, but the earl's revolt had been determined long before.

About the ſame time with theſe tranſactions abroad, Leiceſter became the victim of the king's rage, and experienced a calamity from which, probably, it never recovered. The earl of Leiceſter had been the firſt of the Engliſh barons who had revolted, and his example had led many others to do the ſame. Early in the ſummer king Henry, to revenge the defection of the earl of Leiceſter, ſent ſpecial order to his high juſticiar, who was regent of the realm, to go againſt that town. It had been rendered, by the earl's care, and the zeal of his burgeſſes, ſo ſtrong, in reſpect of its walls and gates, and ſo well provided with other means of defence, as to be thought in no danger from an attack. And Ralph de Diceto obſerves, "that the coſt of the ſiege was more than the place was worth." Richard de Lucy brought his forces againſt it on the third of July, and ſoon gained it in conſequence of an unfortunate accident. By mere chance a fire broke out and conſumed the greater part of the city. The citizens, therefore, made an overture to the beſiegers, to pay down 300 marcs for the uſe of the king's treaſury, upon condition of their having the liberty of retiring, and going where they would with their baggage. This propoſal was agreed to, provided they all choſe, as the place of their reſidence, ſome city, or caſtle, or town, belonging to the king. As ſoon as they were gone, the gates of the city were ſubverted, and part of the walls deſtroyed[7]. So Diceto.

According to Bromton, "About the feaſt of St. Mary Magdalen, Reginald, earl of Cornwall, and Richard de Lucy, who then was over England under the king, having the king's command for that purpoſe, collected an army from the neighbouring parts, beſieged Leiceſter, and burnt it to the ground[8]; having firſt given licence to the burgeſſes to go out with their chattels, and tarry where they would till peace was reſtored in the realm, when they might return to their own lands. But the caſtle of Leiceſter was not taken[9]." Matthew Paris relates it thus: "The ſame year, on the 5th of July, Leiceſter was beſieged by the king's command, becauſe, as was ſaid, the earl, lord of the city, left the king the father, and joined the king the ſon. But at laſt, the city being for the greater part conſumed by fire, the citizens opened a treaty of peace, and engaged to give to the king 300 marcs, if they might have licence to go whither they would. Such licence was granted to them, but it was required that they ſhould make their abode in the cities and caſtles of the king. The nobles[10] of the city were diſperſed; and becauſe they had offended the king very much in defending of their city, they ſought a place of ſafe refuge to avoid the threats and weight of the king. They, therefore, fled to the land of St. Alban, the proto-martyr of England, and to the land of St. Edmund, the martyr and king, as to the boſom of protection. Becauſe, at that time, ſuch was the reverence of thoſe ſaints, that their burghs afforded a ſafe aſylum to all fugitives who fled from their enemies. As ſoon, therefore, as the burgeſſes were gone, the gates of the city were overturned, a part of the walls was deſtroyed, and to the knights within the caſtle a truce was granted to Michaelmas, and ſo on the 5th of the kalends of Auguſt the ſiege was raiſed."

"As ſoon as Robert earl of Leiceſter (writes Matthew Paris) received the news of what had happened at Leiceſter, he was cut to the heart. Being then about to return into England, he took the route by Flanders, where the military gentry who were diſpoſed to embark in his cauſe were very numerous, and ready to furniſh both horſe and foot. Having muſtered his army, compoſed of Normans and Flemings, he embarked them on the 3d of the kalends of October [i. e. Sept. 28]." According to Thomas Wykes, he took to England with him 10,000 Flemings.

But, before we ſpeak more of his going to England, let us note certain incidents which happened abroad a little before his embarkation.

King Henry having obliged the king of France to abandon Verneuil, and retire into France, laid ſiege to the caſtle of Adamvil, and took it, making priſoners the knights and eſquires who were found in it[11]. From thence he marched to his capital, the city of Rouen, and immediately diſpatched his Brabantine mercenaries, in whom was his chief confidence, towards Bretagne; where Hugh, earl of Cheſter, and Ralph de Fulgers, with the Britons, were laying waſte the country, having made themſelves maſters of the city of Dol. The Brabantines engaged them on the 20th of Auguſt in regular battle, and defeated them. The Britons were put to the rout, in which ſeventeen knights were made priſoners. The earl of Cheſter, and Ralph de Fulgers, a great baron of thoſe parts, and many nobles of their party, and the remainder of the army, took refuge in the caſtle of Dol, which was preſently inveſted by the victorious Brabanters, who ſent notice to Henry of this victory, and of the remains of the army, which had been vanquiſhed, being ſhut up in the caſtle of Dol[12]. That monarch ſet off immediately for Dol, which he reached the next day, and began to apply his battering engines to the walls of that town. The beſieged, finding themſelves much crowded, and ſeeing no hopes of ſucceſs and relief, thought their only expedient was, to ſurrender at diſcretion. Near an hundred nobles, the flower and ſtrength of Bretagne, fell on this occaſion into the king's hands: but the taking of the earl of Cheſter, an Engliſh baron of amazing power and property, muſt have been felt by Henry as a prize of ineſtimable value.

---

[1] Du Cheſne, tom. IV. p. 430.

[2] Brompton.

[3] See more particulars, R. Diceto, p 572.

[4] Brompton, p. 1086.

[5] Probably the ſurrender of the earl of Leiceſter's fine caſtle of Paſcy happened about the ſame time.

[6] Henry's march to Vernevil; ſee Diceto, p. 572.

[7] Diceto.

[8] So Brompton; but it could not be.

[9] So Brompton.

[10] Nobles of the city, nobiles civitatis, viz. the burgeſſes, holding lands and tenements of the earl in capite by burgage tenure, to whom were committed, by burgage ſervice, the defence and government of the city.

[11] Brompton.

[12] Lyttelton.

Amidſt theſe horrors of war, the pope's legates were labouriouſly employed in endeavouring to bring about an accommodation. Under their mediation the two monarchs agreed at laſt to a perſonal conference. The place appointed for it was ſomewhere between Giſors and Trie; the day Sept. 25[1]. The king of France accordingly came, attended by the archbiſhops, biſhops, counts, and barons of his realm[2]; bringing in his train the three ſons of the king of England, Henry, Richard, and Geoffry. The king of England likewiſe came with the archbiſhops, biſhops, earls, and barons of his dominions. The buſineſs of this parliament was, to treat about a reconciliation between king Henry the elder, and his three ſons. Henry the father offered to the king, his ſon, a moiety of the rents of England, and four ſufficient caſtles there; or, if his ſon choſe to reſide in Normandy, the king offered him a moiety of the rents of that country, and four chief caſtles within it. Alſo, he offered to Richard another moiety of rents in the ſame country, and four chief caſtles in the ſame. To his little ſon Geoffry he offered that land which, by hereditary right, appertained to the daughter of Conan, in Bretagne, and elſewhere, if he could be matrimonially coupled to her with aſſent of the lord pope. Moreover, he put himſelf to the will and pleaſure of the archbiſhop of Tarento, and the legates, and would ſuperadd as much to the rents, and give to his ſons as much as they would, only retaining to him the juſtice and royal power. But it was by the counſel of the king of France that the ſons ſhould make this peace with their father; upon which, on the morrow, they met between Giſors and Trie to form the peace; but they could by no means come to an agreement. In this colloquy Robert, earl of Leiceſter, ſaid many bitter and reproachful things to king Henry, and abuſed him exceedingly, and put his hand upon his ſword, intending to ſtrike the king; but this was prevented by the ſtanders-by: and with theſe things the parliament was cloſed[3].

Upon the diſſolution of this parliament, the earl of Leiceſter loſt no time in collecting his Norman and Engliſh forces, and expediting his going with them into England. What is juſt related of him ſhews the violence of his reſentment againſt the king, who, it is reaſonable to ſuppoſe, could never have been ſo treated, but for ſome heinous injury done to the earl. The total deſtruction of his town of Breteuil, from whence he had his name, was an act of cruelty beyond common example, and the king's vengeance againſt the ſeat of the earl's other honor, viz. Leiceſter; theſe acts of fury, added to thoſe provocations which muſt previouſly have alienated the earl's mind from his liege lord, ſtimulated him, we may ſuppoſe, to the higheſt degree of rage, and made him eager to invade the king's dominions with the foreign forces, which muſt, before the late parliament near Giſors, have been hired for this ſervice. The two kings, Lewis, and young Henry, appointed him to this great command; whoſe object, we may conclude, made one chief part in the plan of the war. King Henry could not be in both parts of his dominions at the ſame time. What, therefore, was ſo likely to vanquiſh him as the making this diverſion in England, where the nobles and people were ſo diſaffected to him, and ſeemed only to defer their revolt till they could promiſe themſelves ſafety, either from their own numbers, or ſome great chieftain at the head of an army? On Sept. 28, the earl and his forces arrived at Waleton, in Suffolk, a caſtle of Hugh Bigot, earl of Norfolk; from whence they ſoon repaired to Framlingham caſtle, a very extenſive fortification of the ſame earl, one of the greateſt barons of England, and a confederate of the earl of Leiceſter in the preſent war. After reſting ſome ſmall time at Framlingham, the earl of Leiceſter's army, under the guidance, and with the co-operation of earl Hugh, made an attack againſt the city of Norwich, and took it; the citizens thereof being unprepared for a ſtout defence, and not expecting a viſit of this ſort. The city was ſtripped of its wealth, and the victors returned to the caſtle. After this, Hugh conducted the earl of Leiceſter's forces againſt the rich maritime town of Donwick; but finding the inhabitants determined to protect their property by a vigorous defence, retreated with diſappointment. Earl Hugh, who was a ſhrewd and ſubtle man, having made what uſe he thought fit of the earl of Leiceſter's army, and growing tired of the vaſt expence he incurred in maintaining it, at which his counteſs alſo expreſſed her diſſatisfaction, began at her inſtigation to propoſe to the earl the withdrawing his foreign troops to his own territories and caſtles. It is alſo added, that the counteſs of Norfolk did not reliſh the company of the counteſs of Leiceſter, and, therefore, deſired her lord to relieve her of theſe troubleſome viſitors as ſoon as he could[4].

When the earl of Leiceſter landed his troops in Suffolk, Richard de Lucy, the high juſtice, who, after his conqueſt of Leiceſter, had gone haſtily into the North to repel William king of Scots, was in the Louthians, beyond which he had driven the Scottiſh army; and where he was now retaliating upon the Scots for the depredations and cruelties they had committed within the Northern territories of England. The earl of Leiceſter's arrival in England with a foreign army ſtruck the royal party with conſternation and terror. As ſoon as the news had reached Richard de Lucy, he ſaw the neceſſity of giving immediate aſſiſtance to the royal party in the South, and had the addreſs and good fortune to keep the earl of Leiceſter's invaſion a profound ſecret from the king of Scots, till he had negotiated a ſhort truce with him, whereby he ſecured the Northern parts, while he took his meaſures againſt the earl of Leiceſter. With all poſſible expedition he detached from his own army Humphrey de Bohun, the king's conſtable, to St. Edmund-Bury, where he waited the arrival, as was ſaid, of the earl of Leiceſter, who was yet at Framlingham with Hugh Bigot[5].

The earl of Leiceſter heſitated for a conſiderable time about the reſolution he ſhould adopt in his preſent embarras. For if he ſhould attempt to puſh through ſo large a tract of country as lay between him and his town of Leiceſter, he muſt paſs through the middle of the enemies borders, who were ſaid to watch his march; and he could not expect to reach Leiceſter without infinite danger. At length, thinking his army ſufficient in point of numbers, and confiding in their value (for he had about eighty choſen knights, and four or five thouſand valiant infantry), and having ſome doubt whether he ſhould be attacked at all, as he had, among thoſe who ſeemed to favour the king, a vaſt number of people, friends to him and his cauſe[6]; he therefore boldly began his march, accompanied by his wife, and a certain noble perſonage of France, viz. Hugh de Chatel, and all his forces[7]. It was his intention to leave the burg of St. Edmund on his left, becauſe he judged it impoſſible otherwiſe to eſcape the notice of the royal army, which then tarried there to defend the adjacent country. As the army marched on it came to a place in the territory of St. Edmunſburg, called Fornham, and got into a marſhy place not far from the church of St. Genevias[8]. This marſh the earl was in hopes he ſhould be able to get through without obſtruction. Humphrey de Bohun, conſtable of the king, and earl Roger, and William earl of Arundel, who were ſtationed at the burg of St. Edmund, got advice of the earl of Leiceſter's ſituation; and, knowing him to be in a place where he could neither turn to the right or the left, were eager to take advantage of it. While the earl was making the march of this dangerous paſs, he was ſuddenly attacked by the three barons abovementioned, at the head of 3000 ſtipendiary knights. The onſet was very fierce, and the engagement very ſharp; till at length the earl's forces gave way, and were entirely defeated. The counteſs of Leiceſter, a lady of too much pride and ſpirit, having a ring upon her finger, adorned with a moſt precious gem, threw it into the neighbouring ſtream through indignation, being unwilling that her enemies ſhould be inriched with ſo valuable a ſpoil in taking her captive. At length, the greater part of the Flemings was killed; ſome part was drowned[1]. The earl and his counteſs, and Hugh de Caſtill, were taken priſoners; as were the reſidue of the army which eſcaped with their lives. This diſaſter of the earl of Leiceſter being ſpread over England, the enemies of king Henry the father were ſtruck with terror. And this event being reported to the two allied kings, Lewis and Henry junior, they were exceedingly dejected, and terrified more than words can expreſs. As ſoon as king Henry ſenior heard of the capture of the earl of Leiceſter and his wife, he ordered them immediately to be conveyed into Normandy, and to be ſhut up in the caſtle of Faleiſe. After the recovery of Bretagne, he took his Brabanters into Anjou, and reduced many caſtles there to his obedience. At length the three kings agreed to have truce till the end of Eaſter-week, A.D. 1174[2].

---

[1] Hoveden, Brompton.

[2] i. e. Tenants of the king in capite—vaſſals of the crown, lords of fiefs, the princes of the empire, holding fiefs or ſeignories in propriety. The earls and barons of England were of the ſame quality.

[3] Hoveden.

[4] Guil. Neubr. lib. ii. c. 30.

[5] Bromton.

[6] W. Neubr.

[7] Diceto.

[8] Bromton.

For a ſhort time in the winter, hoſtile tumults were ſuſpended in foreign parts, but in England the caſe was different[3]. For the knights and eſquires who were in the fortreſſes of the earl of Leiceſter, after being quiet for ſome time after the miſhap of their lord, became inflamed with the paſſion of revenge; and, having adjoined to them a multitude of vile people, began to infeſt the neighbouring ſhires with their excurſions. And as people are apt to think that a leader of great name inſpires confidence, they made choice of David earl of Huntingdon, brother of William king of Scots, for their general and prince. Earl David proſpered in his hoſtilities, and vented his rage at pleaſure, carrying every thing before him. Likewiſe the earl of Ferrers, and the great baron Roger de Moubrey, now laying aſide the maſk, followed the precedent of other mal-contents, and could ſcarcely refrain from violence and rapine during the holy ſeaſon of Lent. After Eaſter, they broke out into open acts of hoſtility. And all this time young king Henry was buſily employed in ſeducing his father's adherents, by intrigue, by threats, by promiſes, and all other means of gaining them to his own ſide. Theſe proceedings were ſo ſucceſsful, that moſt of the chief nobles of England were ſuppoſed to be in the intereſt of the young king, and they were ready to declare againſt the old one, if their deſigns were not diſappointed by a ſudden turn of affairs. In the ſecond ſummer, therefore, of this civil war, greater preparations were made than before to ſubdue king Henry the elder. The confederates conſiſted of the French king, the three Engliſh princes, the count of Flanders, the king of Scots, and the nobles and barons who were their aſſociates. The earl of Flanders, who ſeemed no longer to remember his brother Matthew, count of Bologne, who had periſhed the former year in this war, longed to be in poſſeſſion of the earldom of Kent, for which he had done homage to young Henry, and was employed in fitting out his fleet, to take his forces, and young Henry, and himſelf, to England, which was now to be invaded by them. While the king of France was to pour all his ſtrength into Normandy, the young Engliſh princes were to attack their father's dominions wherever they ſeemed moſt vulnerable; the king of Scots was to bring his troops into the Northern parts of England, and the diſaffected nobles of that realm were to ravage the king's demeſnes, and reduce his partizans to ſubmiſſion. As ſoon as the ſpring was ſufficiently advanced to take the field, the king of Scots conducted his army into the Northern counties of England, which committed, according to their cuſtom, the moſt dreadful cruelties, took Carliſle, and many caſtles of the king's barons, and ſeemed to treat the Northern counties of England as a devoted and conquered country. The middle and Southern parts of England were in a ſtate of the utmoſt diſtraction by the conflicting parties; and in the Weſt the ſame ſpirit of revolt was every day increaſing. Hugh Bigot, who had procured a corps of Flemings, marched againſt Norwich, a city held of the king in capite, broke down the works about it, took it, and burnt it[4]. And juſt after the expiration of Pentecoſt, Anketil Malore, conſtable of Leiceſter caſtle for the earl thereof, went to Northampton, one of the king's towns, with the knights of the caſtle of Leiceſter. The burgeſſes of the town of Northampton, and the knights of the caſtle there, marched out againſt Malore, and engaged him; but were totally defeated, and put to flight, with the loſs of 200 burgeſſes killed on the ſpot, or periſhing afterwards from their wounds. And the knights of Leiceſter returned to their caſtle of Leiceſter with an immenſe booty. In the mean while Geoffrey, elect biſhop of Lincoln, Henry's ſon by the beautiful Roſamond, having got together the army of Lincolnſhire, beſieged the caſtle of L'Iſle, which Robert de Moubray, a very powerful baron, had fortified. The latter had juſt before fallen into the hands of his enemies as he was going to Leiceſter to obtain ſuccour from the earl of Leiceſter's partizans at that place. Geoffrey, after this, did his father good ſervice in Yorkſhire; and, while he was ſo employed, Robert de Ferrers, earl of Derby, and lord of Tutbury caſtle, one of the greateſt barons of the realm, took with him the knights of Leiceſter, and appeared at early day at Nottingham, a town belonging to the king, of which Reginald de Lucy had been appointed warden or conſtable. The earl of Derby took the town without difficulty; and of the burgeſſes, ſome he ſlew, and others he made priſoners, at the ſame time deſpoiling them of their effects[5].

King Henry was fully employed all this ſpring in ſecuring Normandy from the threatened invaſion of the king of Franks, and in recovering or ſecuring towns and caſtles in other parts of his Gallic dominions, which were aſſailed, or likely to be ſo, by his ſon Richard, titular duke and ſeneſchal of Aquitaine, and his mother's appointed heir in that principality, together with the county of Poitou.

Philip earl of Flanders, in the preſence of Lewis king of Franks, and the elders of his realm, had ſolemnly ſworn upon the ſacred relics, that within 15 days of the feaſt of John Baptiſt he would enter England in ſtrong force, and ſubject it to the power of king Henry, ſon of the king. Depending upon this aſſiſtance, young Henry came to Witſand on July 13, being about to ſend Radulph de la Haye into England with a numerous milice. The earl of Flanders had already ſent to that port 300 choice knights, picked men throughout Flanders. And the earl of Flanders, and young king Henry, were making all the diſpatch that was poſſible, to get the reſt of their troops embarked, and be themſelves in England with them, according to the earl of Flanders' late engagement to the king of France, by July 13[6]. King Henry the elder, therefore, thought it now abſolutely neceſſary to loſe no time in getting to England, thinking, that, if ſome part of his dominions were to be expoſed to riſk, it had better be thoſe in France than his realm; and he was, beſides, thoroughly convinced, that in his abſence from England, thereby ſeeming to his people as if he were dead, nobody there would think of reſiſting his ſon already conſecrated and crowned king of that realm. Having well ſecured the two queens, viz. his own and his ſon's wife, and the earl and counteſs of Leiceſter, and the earl of Cheſter, and embarked them, he got himſelf on board, taking with him only a detachment of his Brabanters, and arrived at Southampton July 8, where he ſtayed only one night, and then ſet out on his pilgrimage to the ſhrine of Thomas of Canterbury, now inrolled, by papal decree, among the ſaints; and as ſuch adored by all Chriſtendom, and even by Henry his late perſecutor and murderer. This act of penance, and Henry's readineſs to recognize the merit and aſſumption of St. Thomas, whether ſincere or counterfeit, made a ſudden revulſion, with reſpect to popular opinion, in his favour[1]. By this abaſement the church and her ſaint triumphed, and the tyrant was humbled; humiliation diſarmed malice, and vengeance became abſorbed in pity. The old affection between Thomas and Henry ſeemed to be revived. The ſaint now interceded with God in behalf of the ſinner, and the ſinner craved the interceſſion of the ſaint. All was harmony between them: and the king and the votaries of Thomas made now but one party. From this time, therefore, we muſt not be ſurprized if the Monkiſh writers ſpeak very differently of Henry from what they did before St. Thomas's murder, or would have ſpoken of him if he had not recovered their favour by this act of atonement to the church and her champion. The penance itſelf was wiſely ſubmitted to by Henry: it was neither painful, durable, nor inglorious. After his penitentiary promenade to the door of Trinity church, and his arrival at the ſhrine of St. Thomas, he ordered the monks, and ſome of the clergy about him, to perform the flagellation; whereupon they gave him, on the bare back, four or five ſtrokes apiece with their rods; how hard the ſtrokes were let the reader judge. But I will venture to ſay, that, had one of the flagellants ſtruck hard enough to excite pain, or bruiſe the ſkin, the penitent would ſoon have made him regret his raſhneſs, by baniſhment, impriſonment, or death. Henry was not a man to be trifled with. The author of his life and reign would have us think his flagellation was very ſevere; and becauſe, after the king's return to London, he thought it proper to open a vein, which does not denote his loſs of blood at Canterbury, the hiſtorian aſſerts, of his own head, that a fever was the effect of Henry's ſevere flagellation. What an ill-judged tenderneſs had the hiſtorian for the tough hide of this brutal deſpot! A breach of continuity in his royal ſkin, made by his ſubjects—the live ſtock upon his eſtate: what inſolence! what abomination! Again, the penance was not inglorious; it was inflicted according to a kind mother's cuſtom, viz. the Church, upon her favourite children, to correct their ſins, and ſave their ſouls hereafter. Henry the Confeſſor, and favourite king of the Angles, had repeated whippings; and ſo likewiſe had much greater kings than Henry, and, inſtead of being diſgraced by them, acquired a great part of their glory. Flagellation was in that age a common penance, but probably not ſo mild in ſome caſes as this of the royal penitent. If this caſtigation was ſubmitted to from real contrition, Henry ſhould have conſented to have had it inflicted in a degree more proportionable to his ſin. If he only meant it as a bait to catch the vulgar, it was a ſtratagem which demonſtrated the reach of his policy.

---

[1] Matt. Paris.

[2] Bromton.

[3] Gull. Neubr.

[4] Bromton.

[5] Bromton.

[6] Diceto.

Such rapid and extraordinary ſucceſs coincided with this act of abaſement as induced the world to think higher than ever of the merit of St. Thomas of Canterbury, to whoſe interceſſion in behalf of Henry his ſucceſſes were aſcribed.

On the very day of his flagellation, his moſt formidable enemy, William, king of Scots, was, after being taken by ſurprize, committed to his priſon at Richmond. According to others, he became the king of England's captive on the very day of his penance. On the 14th of July, the fleet appointed to bring over the earl of Flanders, reckoned the beſt General of his age, and young king Henry, and their Flemiſh army, were diſperſed by a ſtorm, in which the ſhips narrowly eſcaped being wrecked. Theſe two events ſecured Henry from further danger, both in the North and the South. On the 20th of July, Huntington ſurrendered to the king, although it had before ſtood a ſiege of two or three months, after a ſiege of one day. David earl of Huntington, the brother of William king of Scots, and his preſumptive heir, and the commander under whoſe banner the earl of Leiceſter's tenants and partizans had put themſelves after the captivity of their lord, made the beſt of his way into Scotland, upon the advice of his brother's misfortune at Alnwick. And on the day that Huntington was beſieged and taken, the conſtables of the earl of Leiceſter's caſtles came with ſupplications to the king at Huntington, to negotiate on the part of the earl and themſelves. The knights of the earl of Leiceſter, touched with commiſeration for their lord earl, and willing to releaſe him from his bonds, with which he was moſt cruelly galled, were obliged to ſurrender to the king the caſtles of Leiceſter, Montſorrel, and Groby[2].

This event is related in the following manner:

"In the mean time, king Henry ſenior being in England, ſent for the governors of the caſtles of the earl of Leiceſter, whom he had brought with him bound from Normandy; and admoniſhed them, as they valued the ſafety of their lord the earl, to reſign the caſtles, by means of which they had ſo infeſted the neighbouring counties. The governors deſired leave to conſult the earl upon the matter, which was allowed. The earl told them, "that he would not make any ſtipulations with them on the ſubject; but that it would be well if they did that which he wiſhed them to do." The king called for the holy relics; which being brought to him, "So," cryed he, "may God be with me, and theſe holy relics, as the earl of Leiceſter ſhall taſte nothing till that be done with his caſtles which I command. And do ye be gone as quick as poſſible." The governors, therefore, ſeeing very plainly, that ſwift and ſure deſtruction impended over their lord if they ſtood out any longer, immediately gave up the caſtles[3]."

Theſe accumulated misfortunes befalling the confederates, they were in no ſituation to proſecute the war. The earl of Glouceſter deſiſted from further attempts. The earl of Derby ſurrendered his caſtles of Tutbury and Duffield to pacify king Henry. And the earl of Norfolk threw himſelf on the king's mercy.

Thus was England reſtored, as it were in a moment, to allegiance and order. And king Henry found himſelf able to return on the 11th of Auguſt, with a conſiderable body of forces, into Normandy, which had been invaded by Lewis, who was then laying ſiege to Rouen, the capital of that dutchy, with a prodigious army. The king of Scots, and the two greateſt earls of England, were doomed to adorn the journeys of Henry, in the quality of captives, till they arrived with him at Caen, from whence they were ſoon afterwards removed to Faleiſe, and were there confined. Theſe journeys muſt not only have been very humiliating, but alſo very painful, if they travelled with Henry in the manner that the king of Scots did from Richmond, in Yorkſhire, to Northampton, viz. with his feet tied under the horſe's belly.

On the 11th of Auguſt king Henry arrived at Rouen, which was then beſieged by Lewis le Jeune, young king Henry, the earl of Flanders, and one of the greateſt armies that had ever been ſeen in thoſe days. The king found a paſſage open to him by the bridge of the Seine into the city. He brought with him a corps of Brabanters, and likewiſe of Welſh. His arrival infuſed new ſpirits into the hearts of the people within the city, and, conjointly with ſo many inſtances of ſucceſs (which ſeemed to many to be the declaration of heaven in his behalf, for his humiliation and devotion to St. Thomas of Canterbury, now the faſhionable ſaint of England and France), inſpired his enemies with ſo ardent a deſire of peace, to which king Henry was equally inclined, that the ſiege of Rouen was ſoon raiſed, and overtures made by the archbiſhop of Sens for a treaty of general pacification, which was fully eſtabliſhed on September 23. The terms of it were very honourable for king Henry, and conſiſted of little more than he had offered the year before. A general amneſty made a part of it, with exception, however, to the priſoners, who had made a compoſition with the king before the peace, namely, the king of Scots, and the earls of Leiceſter and Cheſter, and Radulf de Fougeres. Theſe remained ſtill bound by the fine and compoſition they had entered into, as the condition of obtaining their lands and perſonal liberty. In this treaty neither Lewis le Jeune, nor any of his allies, made any demands upon king Henry upon their ſeparate account, which ſhews they conſidered themſelves as mere allies of the young Engliſh princes, who were obliged to give ſecurity to their father for their future obedience and loyalty, and, what ſhould have been more grating, to abandon their three principal adherents, the king of Scots, and the earls of Leiceſter and Cheſter, who ſeem to be left almoſt at the king's mercy, with a ſaving only of their lives. Nay, what ſeems more a proof of their total overthrow, neither the young princes, nor their friend the king of France, their mother's late huſband, who had declared to Henry's miniſters, that he would never make peace with that king but with the conſent of Alianora and her ſons, inſerted a ſingle article in the treaty in behalf of that unfortunate queen [1]. Thus did king Henry obtain a complete victory over his wife and their common offſpring. Young king Henry was reduced nearly to the level of other ſubjects, and acquired no ſort of ſhare in the adminiſtration of the government, which, if it had not been formerly yielded up to him excluſively by his father, was univerſally ſuppoſed to be veſted conjointly in him, as his father's equal colleague. Dreadful beyond deſcription was the king of Scots captivity, both to his own perſon and his whole people. According to the cuſtom of feudal governments, when a vaſſal thought himſelf injured by his lord, of whom his fief was held, he remonſtrated to his lord, demanded reparation to be made by the lord in the court of the peers of the lord; which court of peers the lord, at the vaſſal's requiſition, was obliged by the feudal law to convene, and in whom was veſted the right of trying the lord's vaſſal, and pronouncing judgement. If the complaining vaſſal made his complaint to the lord, accompanied by theſe conſtitutional requiſitions, and obtained no juſtice, he then made a formal ſurrender of his homage, and declared himſelf his enemy at lawful war till juſtice ſhould be obtained. After which, upon reconciliation, the homage and fealty muſt be renewed. This ought to have been Henry's mode of proceeding in the preſent caſe; and, had this been done, the king of Scots would have had the opportunity of ſtating the wrongs he had ſuffered from the king of England, who, in violation of the moſt ſolemn engagements, and in return for important ſervices, had ſeized and detained the earldom of Northumberland, and other fiefs within the realm of England. Scotland had been reduced to a province of the imperial crown of England ſoon after the diſſolution of the Heptarchy; and its kings had ſolemnly and repeatedly done homage for it, both before and after the Conqueſt. But in the acts of fealty and homage performed by the Scottiſh kings, the right of thoſe kings to the free and full enjoyment of royalty was conſtantly meant and acknowledged. The kings of England had no right to diſſolve or weaken the ancient conſtitution of Scotland: it could only demand the allegiance of its king, according to the ſervices which the king of England could legally, in the court of his parliament, prove to be his due. In the preſent caſe, Henry overturned the whole liberty of the king of Scots, and of his whole kingdom, by requiring the act of liege homage, not only of the king of Scots (who only ſhould have taken it), but of all the magnates of the whole Scottiſh nation, who by this act could appeal at all times from the tribunals of Scotland to thoſe of England, whereby the king of Scots would be rendered a mere cypher, and the laws of Scotland a dead letter, and the people there individually be ſubject to the king of England's authority in preference to their own king, who could have had no liege homage from his ſubjects, conſequently not their ſubjection, while that was paid, both by himſelf and all his people, to an higher lord.

---

[1] G. Neubr.

[2] Matt. Paris.

[3] G. Neubr.

The earls of Leiceſter and Cheſter compromiſed for their rebellion by a fine ſeverally to the king; what the ſum was I do not diſcover: probably it was very great. We find, by exchequer documents of that time, that our earl's lands and tenements were ſeized into the king's hands, and put under the ſurvey of the exchequer; in which ſtate I ſuppoſe they were to remain till the fine was liquidated by the receipt of the rents and profits. The practice of uſury was then contrary to law, and allowed only to the Jews, with which England then abounded. But this temporary confiſcation would probably in the ſequel prove a perpetual forfeiture. A ſimilar ſequeſtration of the great earldom of Derby, about an hundred years afterwards, upon a ſimilar account, terminated in a total loſs of that great honour to its right heirs; and this may be eaſily accounted for. When a great honour fell into the king's exchequer, and the ſeiſin and management of it was committed to officers of revenue, who had no motive but that of probity to adminiſter it properly, and whoſe intereſt it was to keep it as long as poſſible in the king's hands or demeſne, it had but a ſlender chance of reverting, as to the poſſeſſion, to the lawful proprietors. Indeed, ſuch a return might be conſidered as a forlorn hope, unleſs the king could be wrought upon, at a favourable moment, to reſtore it, as of his mere grace and mercy. The value and contents of our earl's honour I can no where diſcover; but it was certainly one of the largeſt in the kingdom, for, beſides a part of the Oſbern inheritance, it conſiſted of the conſolidated fiefs of Beaumont and Grantemaiſnel; each of which had compoſed a ſeveral barony of great extent and magnificence. And the military fiefs of the earls of Leiceſter, that is, lands and tenements which were in their homage and ſervice, amounted to one hundred and twenty knights' fees, which muſt have conſtituted a prodigious train of vaſſals. It may be preſumed, that their demeſne lands bore ſome proportion to thoſe which were in their ſervice.

All the confederates, even thoſe who had been moſt forward to commence the war, now deſired to end it. The coincidence of ſo many and ſuch unexpected events, with Henry's humiliation before the ſhrine of St. Thomas, whoſe miracles were now become the talk and aſtoniſhment of Europe, was generally, and as we may ſuppoſe with a more impreſſive awe, felt by the king of France, and Thomas's other devots, as a divine teſtimony of the ſaint's having forgiven the king, and become his celeſtial protector. The count of Flanders, ſtruck with horror at the loſs of ſo many innocent Flemings as had periſhed by his means under the earl of Leiceſter and other leaders of the ſame party, determined, without delay, to reconcile himſelf to God for his grievous ſin by making the voyage to Jeruſalem. Henry, having no other object in this war but the recovery of his dominions and ſovereign authority, readily yielded to the overtures made by the mediating miniſters of peace; and, after a ſhort negotiation, he concluded, on the 30th of September, 1174, a treaty with his ſons; whereby they were abridged of many advantages, to which their father had conſented in the conference of the preceding year. The terms of pacification were ſpecified in a charter made for the purpoſe: towards the cloſe of which, it was expreſsly noted, that the king of Scots, and the earls of Leiceſter and Cheſter, ſhould be exempted from the benefit of the general amneſty, and ſtand bound by the fine, to which they had pledged themſelves while they were priſoners in the caſtle of Faleiſe.

---

[1] In a document printed by Rymer, this great lady ſtyles herſelf " Alianora in irâ Dei regina Anglorum." Fœdera, tom. I.

In that age, the king's mode of reducing his rebellious barons or vaſſals [1] was by beſieging their caſtles, of one or more of which thoſe vaſſals were uſually poſſeſſed within their reſpective fiefs or ſeignories. If the king took ſuch caſtles, and was highly enraged with the owners, he would diſmantle them, or perhaps raſe them to the ground: after which, ſuch barons were brought to a ſtate of debility, little leſs than ruin, and no longer able to reſiſt. Nor could ſuch unfortunate barons, without the royal licence, either rebuild the demoliſhed caſtle, or erect another. After the Norman conqueſt, the king, as well as his countrymen, on whom he beſtowed very extenſive fiefs, found it neceſſary to erect a vaſt number of caſtles; the king, for the preſervation of his crown; and his nobles, for the preſervation of their fiefs; and, indeed, theſe latter caſtles were a collateral ſecurity of the crown alſo, their proprietors owing feudal ſervice to the king. The habitation of a baron, or one who had a noble fief, was chiefly a caſtle; there he had a garriſon, in which ſome of his vaſſals, holding ſmaller fiefs of him by caſtle-guard, called the fiefs of knights and freeholders, that is, eſquires, did, if the king permitted, duty in perſon, or by commutation for their fiefs. In ſome caſes, the fief was a ſingle manor; then the feudal juriſdiction was commenſurate with the manerial, although of a different kind; for manerial rights concerned the order and adminiſtration of a manor, and had reſpect to the works and various payments exacted of the villans or ruſtics of ſuch manor, and the lord's mode of exacting his dues from them, and other queſtions merely manerial; but the feudal authority applied to matters of police, and civil and criminal judicature, and in certain caſes it puniſhed with death. To this authority all were ſubject who lived within the fief; but, in caſes of injuſtice and oppreſſion, redreſs might be had in the king's court. To which at length almoſt all ſorts of matters were brought by appeal, or other modes of proceſs. Such authority was appendant to fiefs, and conſtituted the chief power and profit thereof, where the juriſdiction was complete and well preſerved. Such fief belonging to a ſubject was a barony, and conſtituted a liberty or franchiſe within the county where it lay. From hence may be eaſily ſeen the importance of a caſtle to the lord of a fief. It was the ſeat of his juſtice, in which he had his court of police and criminal judicature, and alſo his priſon. It was conſidered as the ſafe-guard of his ſeignory, as the ſeat of his honour, as his ſpring of wealth; for in the baron's court, although he had the franchiſe of a gallows in this his fief, yet his judicature ſeldom went further than to forfeiture; and, to multiply theſe, treſpaſſes were very numerous. Sometimes caſtles were ſo ſtrong, and the lords of them poſſeſſed of ſo much wealth and power, as to ſet the king at defiance. Again, it was frequent for lords of caſtles in the ſame vicinage to lead their people againſt a neighbouring caſtle, and for ſuch lords to proſecute a deſtructive war between themſelves, without the interference of the king. Various cauſes had produced ſuch an exceſs of caſtles between the conqueſt of England and the demiſe of Stephen, that at length they are ſaid to have amounted to eleven hundred. Henry made it a chief part of his policy to leſſen the baronial caſtles, and break down the appendant juriſdiction. Such policy, like a two-edged ſword, did double work. The juriſdiction of the fief fell with the caſtle, and merged in the county, a bailiwic in moſt caſes of the king. Thus were augmented both the king's revenues and his power. King Henry's ſucceſs againſt his ſons and rebellious barons, in the years 1173 and 1174, afforded him a new pretence, and plentiful opportunity, for the reduction of caſtles belonging to his vaſſals. He had been much employed perſonally in this ſort of work at the end of that war in his foreign dominions, particularly in Anjou and Aquitain. But in thoſe parts, much being left by him undone, this odious employment was turned over to his ſon Richard titular count of Poitou, who probably proſecuted it more according to his father's wiſhes, and the ſavageneſs of his own temper, than the principles of juſtice, humanity, and true policy. In the mean while, king Henry took care to raſe the caſtles of certain late ſeditious barons in England, who had been of his wife's and ſon's party in the late commotion. As our earl of Leiceſter was among the firſt of theſe, both in quality and in time, his caſtles had very little chance of being ſpared: accordingly, thoſe of Leiceſter and Groby were demoliſhed in the year 1175. But the caſtle of Pacy, belonging to our earl's fair honour of Breteuil in Normandy, he kept in his own hand; and the caſtle of Mountſorrel, in Leiceſterſhire, he retained as his own property: it having been ſworn to be his by the recognition of lawful men [2] of the vicinage!

It

---

[1] Vaſſals. The meaning of this word has been much miſtaken; the vaſſal was not a low and abject dependent of the crown, but uſually a great nobleman, the tenant of a fief, held generally by knight's ſervice or barony of the king in capite. This is a phraſe which our moſt learned lawyers and gloſſariſts ſeem to have all of them much miſunderſtood. Spelman and Selden were of oppoſite opinions upon it, and might be both eaſily proved to be in the wrong. Mr. Madox attempts to ſhew lord Coke's utter ignorance of the matter, and ſeems confident he has explained what all others had been foiled with. But if the reader becomes wiſer by Mr. Madox's expoſition, he has better luck than has befallen the compiler of the preſent memoir. Suffice it to ſay, what theſe have all omitted, that tenure in capite denoted the immediate and excluſive relation between him from whom a fief moved, and him to whom it was granted, and had ſpecial reference to the ſervice reſerved by the terms of the grant to the grantor, called the new feoffee's capital lord. No ſervice was due but what could be eſtabliſhed from actual infeoffment, and the expreſs tenor of the deed of infeoffment; nor was any due but to the lord in capite, from his tenant in capite, between whom alone ſubſiſted feudal relation. It denoted no particular kind of tenure. Principaliter tenere, and tenere in capite, were convertible. All franc tenement was liable to fealty at leaſt, moſt of it to that and homage.

[2] Lawful men. Sometimes they are called liberi & legales homines; that is, freeholders, or perſons who were ſeiſed of lands or tenements in their own demeſne, as of their own fief or fee. This ſpecies of liberi were very different from ſuch freemen as were called free becauſe no maſter claimed them for their ſerfs or villans, and whom the law required to be in franc pledge, as the condition upon which they were ſuffered by the lords of towns or manors to reſide within the ſame. Theſe freemen, who were appointed recognitors in pleas de droit, or real actions, were the knights and freeholders of a county or hundred or other court-baron. Liberi applies to their rank and franc tenement; legales to their local ſituation and unimpeached character; for, to be recognitors, they muſt be of the vicinage of the diſputed tenement, which made them beſt able to give their verdict on the queſtion referred to them. Which, after actual view, was, Utrum hic vel ille (the tenant or demandant) majus jus habuerit in illa terra, as Glanvill expreſſes it, Lib. ii. c. 3. Men of the vicinage were the liberi & legales homines of the hundred where the land or tenement lay: or, if proper recognitors could not be found within the ſame hundred, they might be choſen, in part, out of one or two of the hundreds adjoining. The proceſs was by king's writ, directed to the ſheriff, ordering the recognitors to be elected in the court of the community of the county, and give their verdict coram rege, or coram juſticiis ſuis apud Weſtmonaſterium. This mode of delivering a verdict muſt have been very expenſive and inconvenient. To remedy this evil, ſundry regulations took place in ſubſequent reigns. The Magna Charta of king John will ſhew how the prelates and barons of the realm, in their great council of Runimede, provided for proſecuting pleas of right. If the tenement in litigation was within the fief of a lord who had a court-baron, the right was tried, and judgement pronounced by the pares of ſuch court-baron: penes quos (as Bracton ſays) judicia fiebant. Theſe peers of the court-baron were freeholders of the manor, and owed this judicial attendance, as part of their ſervice, to the lord of the manor. A very learned counſel, who has nobly exerted himſelf in reſtoring to the people the right of trying the whole matter of a libel, has ſuppoſed, that theſe pares, compoſing the curia or tribunal, were

It may ſurprize the reader, that the king did not, inſtead of deſtroying the earl's caſtles of Leiceſter and Groby, and ſeizing Mountſorrel, annex them to his demeſne, as forfeited by an overt act of rebellion. Had the law authorized him ſo to do, one can ſcarcely believe but he would have done it. But I ſuppoſe the confiſcation of the earl's eſtate, or, as it was then called, his fief or barony, could not be incurred by the authority of the king only, but muſt have been ſanctioned by a previous trial of the earl in the great council of the realm, wherein his co-vaſſals muſt have acted, either in whole or in part, as his judges. As the earl had probably taken care only to wage lawful war againſt the king, the judges or peers of the great council might not be diſpoſed to think his crime deſerving of confiſcation of his lands and tenements. It is likely they would have only caſt him in a fine. Whether the fine, in which he was bound to the king during his impriſonment, was his own free act, or in conſequence of ſome judgement pronounced by the court of the king's council abroad, we are not told. But probably the fine was propoſed on the part of the king, and aſſented to by the earl in a private manner. But again, whether freely, or through fear, can hardly be known. Again, why was he not capitally tried and condemned for treaſon? I ſuppoſe, becauſe his rebellion was not treaſon: of the former he was certainly guilty; and, had his rebellion involved the crime of treaſon (which latter was felony), I think he muſt have been tried and condemned in forfeiture of life and eſtate. In the time of William Rufus, certain Norman noblemen were tried for treaſon, and capitally convicted, in the king's court of his council, I ſuppoſe, his great council. And yet, in the year 1074, when Waltheof earl of Northumberland was engaged in a plot with the earls of Hereford and Norfolk againſt William I. the two latter, being Normans, were ſentenced, for their treaſonable acts, to perpetual impriſonment, and confiſcation of property: while Waltheof incurred a capital ſentence. According to Ordericus, the reaſon of theſe different judgements of the king's court was, that the law of England (this muſt have been the Anglo-Saxon law) puniſhed that by decapitation, which the Norman law did not; and that theſe ſentences were agreeable to the reſpective countries of the criminals.

Thus the earl of Leiceſter ſuſtained the irreparable loſs of his caſtles of Leiceſter, Groby, and Mountſorrel. The king had before taken to himſelf the earl's caſtle of Pacy, the appendage and defence of the earl's honour of Breteuil, which gave him his ſurname. By theſe heavy misfortunes, we can hardly think him much leſs than totally undone. But in the beginning of the year 1177, fortune became again propitious.

After the Chriſtmas holidays, the king held a great council at Northampton. William de Cahannes[1] had intimated to the king, that he ought to hold of him, in capite, his fief or barony, which he held of the earl of Leiceſter. But he ſaid this through the influence of evil counſel, becauſe he wanted to render himſelf agreeable to the king, who hated his lord the earl of Leiceſter. And when the ſaid earl had come at the king's ſummons on the day that had been appointed him, and when he had heard all the things which were ſpoken againſt him, he anſwered, "That although his predeceſſors, viz. his great grandfather, his grandfather, and his father, and himſelf, were in poſſeſſion of charters, and other authentic muniments, of the kings of England, viz. William and Henry I. concerning their lands, and particularly concerning that barony; and although the predeceſſors of William de Cahannes had held that barony of his predeceſſors without impeachment or interruption; yet he would not litigate againſt the pleaſure of the king, neither concerning that tenement or any other tenement in his ſervice; but he conceded, that both that in queſtion and all his other tenements ſhould be in the king's mercy." And when the king heard him ſpeaking with ſuch humility, being moved with pity towards him, he reſtored to him all his lands and tenements entirely, as the earl had enjoyed them fifteen days before the late war. But the king kept in his own hand the caſtle of Mountſorrel and the caſtle of Pacy. And the king reſtored to him at the ſame time all Leiceſter[2], and the foreſt, which were proved to be of his demeſne by the verdict of the whole community of the county. For the king knew, that the injury which was now meditated againſt the earl was founded in malice to him, and becauſe the latter was hated by the king. Abbas Benedictus.

A few days afterwards the king had a colloquy with the great men of the realm, or, in other terms of more modern uſe, aſſembled the council of the realm for hearing the cauſe referred to his judgement, between the kings of Caſtile and Navarre[3]; and which he determined, by the advice of his council of great men, the conſtitutional mode of exerciſing his royal power in his higheſt acts of judicature. The judgement is called the king's act; and yet it ſeems to have been ſubmitted entirely to the diſcuſſion and deciſion of the great men compoſing the concilium regni, or a council wherein the magnates regni compoſed the curia, to diſtinguiſh it from the ordinary council of were the juratores. But he is miſtaken, for the pares had themſelves the aſſiſtance of the juratores. The magna charta directs, that tryal of freehold ſhould be either per judicium parium, i. e. per pares curiæ baronis, in the court-baron, or per legem terræ, i. e. coram rege vel juſticiis ſuis apud Weſtmonaſterium This placitum concerning the right to Mountſorrel was determined, I ſuppoſe, per legem terræ, and by the new law of grand aſſize.

---

[1] About the 14th of Henry II. that king iſſued his ſpecial writs, to require all who held of him in capite, the fiefs of knights, to certify to him the names of ſuch their knights, and the quantity of their knight-ſervice due to their ſeveral lords, of whom the ſaid knights held immediately, as their lords held the ſame in capite of the king. Mr. Hearne, the antiquary, printed this liſt of certificates. Among the fiefs of knights in Bucks is the following certificate: "De veteri feſamento tenet Hugo de Cahaines de rege duas partes militis quas rex dedit ei, cum herede ipſius terræ in Bukinge-hamſcire." Liber Niger, apud Hearne. The fiefs of knights are, in this liſt of certificates, frequently called the barony of the king's immediate tenant, who had the ſaid fiefs in ſuo ſervicio; and it appears from the above extract, that Hugh de Cahaines was in the ſeiſin of two parts of a knight's fief by antient feofment; that is, he had been infeoffed of the ſame by grant of ſome king before the death of Henry I This ſeignory, or ſovereignty, or barony, or ſuperiority, had been given him, we find, together with the heir of the fief, to hold both of the king in capite. Therefore Hugh de Cahaines's barony implied only a tenement he had in ſuo ſervitio, and for which he was to anſwer to the king in relief, aid, ſcutage, and other feudal aſſeſſments, as for two parts of a knight's fief; the right of ſeignory remaining to him over the ſaid heir and his fief. Whether this William de Cahannes was the deſcendant or heir of Hugh de Cahaines of the certificate, I do not find: but if he was, then Henry II. had kept this barony from the true proprietor, the earl of Leiceſter, for thirteen or fourteen years: for the certificate makes Hugh de Cahaines, the lord of the fief, hold it immediately of the king; whereas, if it was held immediately of the earl of Leiceſter, it ſhould be found among the fiefs held of that earl. In this collection of certificates, called in the exchequer liber feodorum, there wants the certificate of the fiefs of the knights of the earl of Leiceſter. For this omiſſion I cannot account; but it appears, from other exchequer documents, that, when ſcutage was levied upon the fiefs of knights to the king's uſe, the earls of Leiceſter anſwered for as many of theſe fiefs as amounted to one hundred and twenty. This was a prodigious barony, to uſe that word in the ſenſe of the liber feodorum. Whether land in the earl's demeſne had been alienated to an exceſſive degree, to create ſo much land in ſervice, or whether theſe fiefs of knights had come by purchaſe, or through the king's gift, is beyond my power to determine.

[2] That is, I ſuppoſe, the whole fief or honour of Leiceſter, namely, the burgh, and the earldom, with all the demeſne lands and knights fees or tenements thereto belonging. By the earldom I mean the third penny of the iſſues of the county and hundred courts, with the dignity and title of earl.

[3] For the manner of trying rights or queſtions of free tenement at that time in the county, ſee Regiſtrum Roffenſe, apud Thorpe, p. 27.

the king, conſiſting of his juſtices and other ſworn counſellors in ordinary. Theſe courts were the origin of the houſe of lords and privy council. Out of the latter ſprung the courts at Weſtminſter-hall.

It might have been expected, that after the king had ſtripped the earl of Leiceſter of his caſtles, by raſing ſome, and adding others to his demeſne, and had given him ſuch tokens of returning grace and favour, he would have forborne further oppreſſion, if the earl demeaned himſelf with that ſubmiſſion which he had lately ſo ſolemnly promiſed, and was careful to engage in no plots or machinations, whereby the king could be juſtly alarmed. Although, ſo far as we are informed, the earl's behaviour had been perfectly inoffenſive, yet he could not eſcape more perſecution from this jealous and reſtleſs prince. As the earl's ſufferings, to which we allude, proceeded from freſh diſſenſion among the royal family, and thus become intimately blended therewith, my narrative therefore ſhall include both.

At the celebrated colloquy or parliament at Montmirail, anno 1169, certain arrangements had been made reſpecting the French fiefs held immediately and in capite of the king of France by the king of England. At this parliament were preſent Lewis le jeune king of France, as chief lord of the fiefs in queſtion; king Henry and his ſons, and a large aſſembly of prelates and grandees of the French king, convened to form the general council of that realm. In this grand aſſembly, it was agreed and adjudged, that king Henry junior ſhould do homage and ſwear fealty to his ſovereign lord the French king, for Normandy and Anjou, with their appendages; that Richard, king Henry's ſecond ſon, ſhould do the ſame for Aquitaine and Poitou; and that Geoffry, as ſoon as he was of a proper age, ſhould conſummate his marriage with Conſtancia, the heireſs of Bretagne, and be inveſted in that dutchy. But it was not intended that young Henry ſhould be put into the immediate ſeiſin of Normandy, nor Richard into that of Aquitaine and Poitou; but ſucceed reſpectively to thoſe fiefs, either by ceſſion or demiſe of the preſent poſſeſſors.

After the reconciliation between king Henry and his ſons in the year 1174, Aquitaine, including the earldom of Poitou, being in a ſtate of partial revolt, king Henry committed the adminiſtration of thoſe two provinces to Richard [1], as his lieutenant or ſeneſchal, with the title of count of Poitou, and ſent him thither to reduce the diſaffected barons there to their allegiance. And in this work Richard ſeems to have been employed for ſeveral years. If bravery, adulterated by a ſpirit of rapine, inſolence, and ſavage ferocity, could have broken the ſpirits of the Gaſcons and Poitevins, they would have been terrified into obedience [2]: but this not proving to be the caſe, the barons [3] there became only more refractory by irritation, and at length made ſecret propoſals to young king Henry to take upon him the government of their country, to whom they ſaid it rightfully belonged, as the true heir thereof: and they aſſured the prince, that, if he would aſſiſt them in ſhaking off the intolerable yoke of Richard, they would deliver into his hands their fortified towns and caſtles, and do homage and fealty to him, as their lord; repreſenting at the ſame time the barbarous and brutal behaviour of Richard, who, they ſaid, committed rapes on the wives and daughters of the nobleſſe of the country, and, after he had ſatisfied his own brutal appetite, delivered them over to the luſt of his military aſſociates.

After the late revolt and reduction of young king Henry, his father retained ſo keen a remembrance of his conduct as to give him no independent dominion, or commit to him the government of any of his numerous fiefs in quality of ſeneſchal, but allowed him only a very moderate penſion, and bound him to his good behaviour by Henry's own oath, and other corroborative ſecurity. Whether he did this upon juſt grounds is not eaſy to determine. Henry was certainly a king who did not chuſe to part with his money or his power, if he could help it. Young Henry's late rebellion, and ſuſpicious conduct in ſome particulars afterwards, may give ſome colour to old Henry's rigid treatment: but, on the other hand, a father's want of virtue and natural affection, parſimony, cruelty, and above all projects formed for preventing the ſon's ever coming to his lawful inheritance, might by degrees ſo wean the latter, although naturally of no bad diſpoſition (and ſuch young king Henry is deſcribed to be), from his father, as at length to determine the ſon to vindicate his own rights, and treat the father as an alien. The young king availed himſelf of this opportunity of bettering his own condition; and, without his father's knowledge, received from the Poitevins and Gaſcons ſuch ſecurities as he deemed ſufficient, and promiſed to ſtand by them, and be their lord. Geoffry, now duke of Bretagne, in right of his wife, leagued with his brother Henry in the preſent undertaking for the expulſion of their brother Richard out of Aquitaine. And a mercenary army of Brabanters was hired by theſe princes, and joined to the milice [4] of Bretagne. With theſe forces they ravaged the territories of which Richard had now the charge. Some authors [5] affirm, that king Henry hated his ſons, and fomented diſcord among them, as beſt calculated for his own peace. Whether they allude to the king's behaviour at this time I do not know; but ſome of our Chronicles ſpeak of a parliament at Caen, in the beginning of the year 1183, wherein were preſent the king, and his three eldeſt ſons. And they ſtate, that at this meeting the king ordered Richard to do homage to his brother Henry for Aquitaine [6], and Geoffry for Bretagne [7]; and add, that Geoffry complied with his father's requſition, but that Richard would not [8]: That hereupon king Henry ſenior was in great wrath with Richard, and ordered both Henry and Geoffry to fall upon Richard's government, and drive him out of it. It is ſaid alſo, that Richard afterwards conſented to do the homage, but that young Henry in his turn refuſed to take it. At this meeting of Caen (according to Diceto), young Henry frankly confeſſed to his father the engagements he had made with the Poitevin and Aquitanian barons, and alledged, in excuſe for the connexions he had made with them, that Richard had got into his hands, and ſtrengthened, the caſtle of Clerevals, which, from old time, had been under the ſovereignty of the counts of Anjou [9], and was therefore part of his inheritance. But, to avoid his father's diſpleaſure, young Henry offered to admit the homage of Richard[1], and accept of his oath of fealty taken upon the holy relics, if Richard would conſent to it. But he required this to be done at Mirabeau, in Anjou, that his aſſociates might be preſent. At this Richard became very warm, ſaying, "that, Henry and himſelf being the iſſue of common parents, it was altogether incongruous, that he ſhould acknowledge his brother to be his ſuperior by any act of ſubjection; but that as his father's poſſeſſions belonged to Henry, ſo the poſſeſſions of his mother belonged to him." Henry ſenior upon this grew angry with Richard, and required very hard conditions of him, and ſtraightway ordered both Henry and Geoffry to take arms againſt Richard, and compel his compliance. In conſequence of theſe orders, both Henry and Geoffry began a war upon Richard, aſſerting, that they did not take arms againſt their father, but againſt Richard, in behalf of the Poitevins, who were moſt cruelly oppreſſed by Richard, and in maintenance of Henry's own right, as legitimate prince of Poitou and Aquitaine. After many ineffectual conferences between Henry ſenior and his diſcordant ſons, young Henry and Geoffry went into the country, which was the theatre of the war; where, with the corps of Brabanters which Henry had hired, and the milice of Bretagne, and the diſaffected barons of Poitou and Aquitaine, they ſoon convinced Richard of their ſuperiority. So far Richard ſeemed to be under the diſpleaſure of his father: but, to our ſurprize, we find immediately afterwards, that he applied to the latter for help in his preſent exigence, and obtained it. This ſeems to have been a great inconſiſtence in Henry ſenior, and, I fear, is that part of his conduct to which Bromton and others allude, when they aſſert, "that he ſet his ſons to quarrel with each other for his own private advantage." Certain, however, it is, that the king marched into the borders of Aquitaine in behalf of Richard; there he had many conferences with young Henry, who profeſſed the moſt filial regard for him: but his party were ſo incenſed againſt the king, that he was treated by them very roughly, and ſeveral times in danger of his life by their weapons more than once ſecretly leveled at his perſon. At length, however, both Henry junior and Geoffry adhered deciſively to the malcontents, and the preparations of both armies preſaged a ſpeedy encounter: but this was prevented by the ſudden illneſs and deceaſe of young Henry; who, according to ſome, brought this fatal illneſs upon himſelf, by grieving at the ill proſpect of his affairs, which, however, does not ſeem likely, for at this time he cannot but be ſuppoſed to be much an overmatch for his father and brother: therefore, I am more inclined to impute his malady, either to accident, or to his hurry and agitation of ſpirits in this diſtreſsful moment. His fever became attended with a diarrhœa, and he died on the 20th of May.

---

[1] Bromton.

[2] Richard Cœur de Lion was the very flower of Chivalry. Alas! the age of Chivalry is gone. Burke. See note 1, p. 83.

[3] Barons; i. e. lords of fiefs held of the duke de Guienne or Aquitaine.

[4] Milice—Barons, knights, and eſquires of Bretagne, holding lands and tenements by knight's ſervice: of ſuch the conſtitutional armies were compoſed. They were all noble on account of their fiefs, and ſerved the prince by ſtated ſervice, mounted on deſtrers, and clad in complete armour. To call the milites of the armies of that time by the low word horſe, was a degrading and erroneous appellation. Yet ſo generally do modern hiſtorians tranſlate milites.

[5] Brito Armoric, Giraldus, Bromton.

[6] If the chronicler has not made ſome miſtake here, old Henry muſt have intended an injury to the king of France; to whom alone homage was due for Poitou and Aquitaine, held of him immediately in capite. It looks as if Henry wanted to have thoſe provinces conſidered as fiefs of the king of England.

[7] Bretagne being a fief or tenement of Normandy, and ſo allowed to be by the king of France, the homage was due to young Henry as the heir apparent of Normandy.

[8] By theſe acts of fealty and homage, the lord recognized the right of his tenant or vaſſal to the fief or tenement in queſtion, and warranted to him his fief. And, on the other hand, the tenant was pledged to be faithful to his lord. The lord was ſuppoſed to give the fief as a return for the homage, after which the fealty followed of courſe.

[9] Of which Henry was the declared heir apparent.

Among the operations of Henry ſenior, in the courſe of this ſpring 1183, was the ſiege of Limoges, of which caſtle young Henry had got poſſeſſion. While he was ſo employed, he ordered divers great perſons, who had joined his ſons in their revolt in 1173, to be arreſted and impriſoned throughout his dominions on the continent; and ſent orders to his high juſticiars, or regents of England, to uſe the ſame caution there; which they accordingly did, by arreſting the earl and counteſs of Leiceſter, the earl of Glouceſter, and many others. And it appears from Exchequer records of that time, that the earl and his wife were not only arreſted, but his lands and tenements alſo confiſcated[2]. Bromton, after Gyraldus, obſerves, that king Henry was an oppreſſor of the nobility. Among other inſtances of perſons ſuffering in this way, it may be preſumed, the hiſtorian had our earl in his thoughts.

The death of young Henry, which ſeemed to be an happy event for his father, did not prove ſo conducive to the eaſe and quiet of the latter as might have been expected. There were yet left three ſons, viz. Richard, Geoffry, and John. The father had ſuffered too much from the two firſt to have any proſpect of comfort in them; and John gave ſuch early ſymptoms of turbulence and depravity as precluded any reaſonable expectation of his being better than the other two.

Upon the death of young Henry, Richard, ſtyled Cœur de Lion, became heir apparent to the crown of England, and to his father's foreign fiefs, except Bretagne, of which Geoffry was duke in right of his wife. But even Bretagne Richard would have in his ſervice when he ſhould obtain of his father the dutchy of Normandy, of which Bretagne was a fief, as Normandy, Poitou, Aquitaine, Anjou, with their appendant ſeignories, were fiefs or tenements in ſervice of the king of France. If this king had ſecured the affection of his wife and ſons, and forborn from injuſtice to the king of France, his lord, and to the people whom he governed, he might probably have ſpent his old age in quiet, prolonged his life, and died in glory. But, for want of thoſe great and good qualities, he became the wretched victim of his own folly and vice.

Philip Auguſtus, king of the French, ſucceeded Lewis le Jeune on the 18th of September, 1180. This king, then in the fifteenth year of his age, was a youth of very promiſing talents: to him, in conjunction with Richard, count of Poitou, was reſerved, by fortune, the overthrow and death of this experienced and crafty politician, old Henry king of England. I mean to give the outline of this hiſtorical piece.

"Lewis le Jeune, late king of France, had eſpouſed his two infant daughters Margaret and Adelais (whom ſome call Aelis or Aliſia), born to that king after his divorce from Alianor, to Henry and Richard, then infants likewiſe, and both ſons of king Henry. Theſe ladies, being thus betrothed, were conſigned to the guardianſhip of king Henry, the father of their reſpective huſbands, according to the very abſurd cuſtom of that age. After the deceaſe of Roſamond, Henry deflowered the contracted wife of Richard, and kept her confined in a tower. Whether he did this for privacy, or to prevent her eſcape, is not mentioned. In 1176, he procured his relation Huguccio, a cardinal, to be ſent hither, on pretence of adjuſting certain points of precedence between the archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, but more truly to hear and determine a plea of divorce between him and Alianor, with whom he no longer cohabited, whom he confined in a tower, and unto whom he now meditated a total annullation of conjugality. The colour was conſanguinity; he and Alianor being within the prohibited degrees. His ſcheme was, to obtain ſentence of divorce, and then take the hand of Adelais; by which ſtep he hoped to ſtrengthen his alliance with the French king, and have iſſue to the diſheriſon of his ſons by Alianor[3]."

The ſhort and imperfect account of this curious affair does not enable me to ſtate it in detail; but we find, that the divorce did not take place, and that the lady Adelais remained in the charge of king

---

[1] I ſuppoſe, he means without inſiſting on the ceſſion of Clerevals; for, if Henry had taken the homage generally, he would have guaranteed to Richard the caſtle of Clerevals, as parcel of the fief of Poitou or Aquitaine.

[2] Madox, Exch.

[3] In the year 1173, Geoffry, king Henry's ſon by Roſamond, then biſhop elect of Lincoln, was 20 years of age; conſequently the connexion with his mother muſt have exiſted ſoon after Henry's marriage with Alianor. After the latter had excited the rebellion in 1173, and was committed cloſe priſoner, Henry lived publicly with Roſamond; conſequently this connexion muſt have laſted above 20 years. King Henry ſhewed always great partiality for this ſon of his, acknowledged him, and educated him in the palace; and, towards the latter part of his life, made him his chancellor. Such partiality was not likely to be agreeable to the queen or her children. After the death of Roſamond, the king debauched the lady Adelais, his ſon Richard's eſpouſed wife, and wiſhed to marry her in hopes of offspring, that his ſons, by Alianor, might be ſet aſide. By Roſamond Henry had another ſon named William, probably older than Geoffrey. This William was earl of Saliſbury.

Henry. In the year 1177, Peter, cardinal prieſt of the holy ſee, came into France with the mandate of pope Alexander III. enjoining the cardinal to lay all the king of England's dominions, on either ſide of the ſea, under interdict, if he did not permit prince Richard to perfect his marriage with Adelais, whom the king of England, as the mandate declared, had now kept in his cuſtody to and beyond the term which had been fixed by the two kings[1]. To prevent theſe impending evils, Henry went over to Normandy, and negotiated with Lewis and the cardinal on the ſubject in queſtion, and patched up his matters with both of them ſo well, as to eſcape the interdict, and renew his amity with Lewis; with a promiſe, however, that the marriage demanded between Adelais and Richard ſhould conditionally be duly ſolemnized according to requiſition. This happened about the middle of September, 1177. But Henry ſeems to have no ſincerity in this engagement. For although Richard was at the court of England all the following ſummer, we hear of no preparation for this marriage[2].

After the death of Henry junior, the French king demanded the reſtitution of Giſors, and many other places on the ſame frontier adjoining to France. He alledged, that, on young Henry's marriage with his ſiſter the lady Margaret, theſe tenements[3] had been ceded by the king her father, as her marriage portion; but that it was expreſsly ſtipulated, that if ſhe had no iſſue by Henry, they ſhould return to the king of France. Henry tried the art of negotiation, in order to retain the poſſeſſion of them; which not ſucceeding, and being determined rather to riſk a breach with Philip, than give them up; both kings prepared for war, and ſoon commenced it. In this conteſt Philip gained great advantages; and his adverſary nothing but diſgrace and loſs, although, at this time, prince Richard took part with his father. After a ſhort contention, the two Engliſh princes ſued for peace, which was granted them upon certain conditions, of which the chief was, that king Henry ſhould now make the cruſade with Philip; which was no unreaſonable requiſition, as Henry had ſworn, ſo long ago as the year 1172, to make the holy voyage as part of his atonement for the murder of Becket.

By putting off this cruſade from the year 1172, to 1183, and making no apparent preparation for it, it may be inferred, he had no intention of going to Paleſtine. Philip, therefore, who probably did not chuſe to leave ſo dangerous an enemy behind him, embraced this opportunity of requiring of Henry to diſcharge his vow, and, to make ſure of him, demanded that he ſhould go with him.

The grievous calamities recently ſuſtained by the Chriſtians in Paleſtine had ſo alarmed them, that, unleſs they were ſoon ſuccoured by ſome prince of great name and power, their condition ſeemed to themſelves to be deſperate. Henry had again and again promiſed to go to their ſuccour; but as often did he invent ſome excuſe or other to elude the performance of what he promiſed; and his conduct is the more obnoxious to the imputation of duplicity, as nothing, that we know of, hindered him for many years from carrying his engagement into execution. And it may be readily ſuppoſed, that, after raiſing ſanguine expectations in the minds of the Chriſtians at Paleſtine and the croiſes in general, the diſappointment, on their parts, muſt have been ſenſibly regretted. The ſucceſs of Saladine's arms in the year 1184 reduced the Chriſtians of Paleſtine to extremity. As their laſt reſource, Heraclius, patriarch of Jeruſalem, was diſpatched to the Chriſtian princes of Europe, and eſpecially to the king of England, to implore perſonal help againſt their formidable enemy. In conſequence of theſe meaſures, the patriarch obtained letters exhortatory from pope Lucius, addreſſed to king Henry, and came with them to England. He arrived there the beginning of February, 1185; and, on his introduction to king Henry, he preſented the keys of Jeruſalem and of the holy ſepulchre, together with a royal banner conſecrated by the pope: he preſented alſo his holineſs's letter. In the end of the papal epiſtle were theſe words: "Let your wiſdom recall to mind, and weigh with due attention, the promiſe whereby you bound your highneſs to ſuccour the holy land; and take care to exerciſe ſuch caution and regard in this behalf, that, in the tremendous day of judgement, when you ſhall be examined ſtraitly by your Judge on the matter in queſtion, your conſcience may not accuſe you." The king received the patriarch with much appearance of reverence[4].

"After reading the pope's letter, the king ſaid, 'that, God willing, the affair was like to have a good iſſue;' and appointed the patriarch and his colleagues to attend him at the meeting of his great council at London, on the firſt Sunday in Lent, when they ſhould have his anſwer. Accordingly, on the aforeſaid day, the lord king, and the patriarch, and the biſhops and abbots, and earls and barons, of the king of England, and William king of Scotland, and David his brother, with the earls and barons of Scotland[5], met at London; and, ſolemn counſel being had thereupon, it was decreed by all, that the lord king ſhould take the advice of his lord Philip king of France on the matter in queſtion; and the council being thus diſſolved, the lord king gave to all his men, as well clerks as laymen, licence to take the croſs. Whereupon it came to paſs, that Baldwin archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Ranulf the juſtice of England, and Walter archbiſhop of Rouen, and Hugh biſhop of Durham, and other very many biſhops tranſmarine and ciſmarine, and almoſt all the earls and barons and knights of England, Normandy and Aquitaine, and Bretagne, and Anjou, and la Maine, and Touraine, were then ſigned with the croſs." The hiſtorian does not give the names of the Engliſh earls who took the vow of the croſs at this time; but we may be pretty ſure our Robert ove Blanchmaines was one; for other hiſtorians mention his inliſting among the croiſes this year; and therefore we may conclude he did it with others at this ſolemn aſſembly, which was harangued by the eloquence of Baldwin, to incite the auditory to engage in this holy expedition [1].

---

[1] Du Cheſne, tom. IV. p. 432.

[2] Lyttelton.

[3] Theſe tenements. As I believe the reader would look in vain for the meaning of this word in Engliſh law-dictionaries, it may be convenient to attempt a definition of it. In feudal governments the word tenement uſually ſignified a certain portion of a diſmembered ſeignory. Thus the aggregate of the realm of England conſiſted of terra and tenementa. The firſt was conſidered as caput, the ſecond as membra; making together totality, or corpus integrum regni. The king was conſidered as chief proprietor, and held the whole, either in ſuo dominico, or in ſuo ſervitio. What was in ſervitio was called tenement, the other terra, in French la terre. Out of the royal terra were created tenementa. Such were the fiefs of his tenants in capite. Theſe great fiefs again, by diſmemberment, conſiſted of terra and tenementa, i. e. caput and membra; each proprietor of the membra holding of the lord of his peculiar terra, by ſpecific and fixed ſervices. Thus tenementa were a kind of appendage to their own terra. If the tenement eſcheated to the lord of the terra, it merged in the terra, and became part of the demeſne of its lord. Thus a tenement might be a whole province, or a ſmall part of a knight's fief. The reaſon of preſerving the two terms in the deſcription of a fief was, that lords of fiefs might know how much of their tenants fiefs was in their tenants demeſne, and how much was in their ſervice; for both were reſponſible ultimately to the chief lord, for aids and other legal demands. The king made his demand upon his tenant in capite, and the latter on his through the whole chain of feodation.

[4] Bromton.

[5] I ſuppoſe that, in conſequence of the late compact with the Scots, Henry conceived that he had a right to ſummon not only the Scottiſh king, but likewiſe any of his vaſſals or ſubjects, to his Engliſh councils or parliaments. If Henry had been content with the uſual homage and fealty paid by the kings of Scotland to the monarchs of England for that kingdom, ſome ſaving of the rights of his crown might have been implied in ſuch engagements; and at leaſt the vaſſals of the Scottiſh king would have known no lord ſuperior to their own king. But when Henry made all the chief men of Scotland do him liege homage, he had a right not only to ſummon them to his courts and armies, but even at his command to take arms againſt their king. Among the firſt acts of Richard I. was, his putting the king of Scots upon the ſame footing as he had been upon, before Henry II's haughty treatment of him. But Richard took homage of the king of Scotland; which was undoubtedly a fief of England. Mailros, and other Chroniclers.

According to Hoveden, as quoted above, upon the arrival of Heraclius, who, we may ſuppoſe, could not be ignorant of Henry's repeated and moſt ſolemn promiſe to ſhare in the projected cruſade, he refers Heraclius to the opinion of his great council concerning that buſineſs; who adjudged, that the king ſhould act by the opinion of the French king. But what trifling was this, when the king of France's ſentiments upon the affair were ſo well known! And be the king of France's opinion what it might, how was Henry at liberty to be guided by that, after he had ſo ſolemnly pledged himſelf to make this voyage for the remiſſion of his ſins? Other hiſtorians ſay nothing of this reference to the French king; but ſay poſitively that the great council declared ſolemnly againſt the king's going: which ſeems more probable than the account given by Hoveden. But if ſuch were the advice of the great council, viz. that Henry ought not to make the cruſade, ſuch advice muſt be aſcribed to the awe which the aſſembly were under in a matter ſo nearly touching his perſon, or to ſome oblique management on his part, whereby the members of that aſſembly were induced to decide more according to the king's wiſhes, than for the maintenance of his honour. But how little the king was in his heart diſpoſed to meddle with this cruſade, appears fully from other accounts of his behaviour.

An hiſtorian of that age gives the following account of the ſucceſs of the united efforts of the patriarch of Jeruſalem and the primate of England, and adds a very curious dialogue between the king and that patriarch: "At length, when many, at the preaching of the patriarch and archbiſhop Baldwin, were ſigned with the croſs, king Henry enumerated the many dangers that muſt accrue to his dominions, if he made the voyage to Jeruſalem, and left them without protection, and to the rapacity of the French, and attempted to convince the patriarch that it was highly improper for him to make the voyage perſonally; but he expreſſed his readineſs to ſupply ſuch as choſe to go, with money [2] adequate to the relief of the Eaſtern church. Then enſued the following dialogue.—Patriarch: "That, O king! is of no uſe: we want a prince, not money; but no country will ſend a prince. We want therefore a man that wants money; not money that wants a man." The patriarch withdrew in the anguiſh of diſappointment; whom the king, ſeeing how much he was moved, and being deſirous of ſoothing, accompanied to the ſeaſide. On parting, the patriarch ſpoke thus: "Hitherto you have reigned glorioully; but henceforward he will forſake thee, whom thou haſt forſaken. Call to mind, what things God has conferred upon you, and how you have requited his favours; how falſe and perfidious you have been to the king of France; how you murdered St. Thomas; and now have renounced the protecting of the Chriſtians." The king glowed with anger at hearing theſe words; upon which, the patriarch inclined his head, and ſtretched his neck, and ſaid, "Do by me, as thou didſt by St. Thomas: it is as well for me to die here by thy hand, as to be killed in Syria by the Saracens, who however are not ſo bad as you." The king replied, "If all my ſubjects had only one body, and ſpoke all with one tongue, they would not dare to utter the words which have come from thee."—"No wonder," ſaid the patriarch, "for they love not thee, but thine. That multitude follow the prey, and not the man."—King: "I cannot go; were I abſent, my ſons would riſe up againſt me."—Patriarch: "No wonder, they iſſue from the devil; and to the devil they will go." And ſo at length the patriarch took ſhipping, and returned to Gaul [3]."

Before the end of the year 1183, a freſh diſpute aroſe between king Henry and prince Richard. I pretend not to decide on the merits of theſe domeſtic diſputes; neither the cauſes of them, nor the diſpoſitions of the parties, being ſufficiently known to me to judge adequately of them. Suffice it to make ſuch ſtatements of facts, and ſuch reflections, as our ſcanty materials afford. In the life-time of young Henry, a jealouſy had ſubſiſted between him and his next brother Richard count of Poitou. Henry's death put the king and his ſons reciprocally in a new ſituation; for Richard, the king intended the dominions of his mother, which had been eventually ſettled upon him by the act of king Henry, and with the ſanction of the king and great council of France. Richard was now become his father's eldeſt ſon; and his brother John had the ſame claim to the maternal fiefs as Richard had while his elder brother was living; for Geoffry, being made duke of Bretagne, had, we may ſuppoſe, no further claim upon his father: conſequently, to preſerve conſiſtency, Richard could hardly object to the relinquiſhing of Poitou and Aquitaine to John. Perhaps, however, in the preſent circumſtances of the caſe, he might alledge, that, the fiefs in queſtion having been ſettled upon him, he was not bound in honour to abdicate them, although he might own John's title to have been good, had his elder brother died before ſuch act of ſettlement. Before the expiration of the year 1183, king Henry ordered his ſon Richard to take the homage of John for the earldom of Poitou [4], which Richard refuſed. The reaſons of his refuſal are not given. A very ſerious breach, however, was now commencing between him and the king. Whether Richard reſented the abuſe of his wife, or was angry with his father on other accounts, we are not told. But this diſcordance of Henry and Richard, at this time, did not laſt; for we find, ſoon after, the king and Richard upon good terms: and, towards the concluſion of the year 1184, the king cauſed peace and final concord to be confirmed, by an inſtrument in writing [5], between the royal brothers, Richard, Geoffry, and John, before their mother Alianor, and Henry duke of Saxony (ſon-in-law of the king and queen of England), and many others. And about this time, Richard would have been actually married to a daughter of Frederic emperor of Germany, if the death of the young lady had not intercepted the ceremonial. About this time alſo Alianor, the queen conſort, was ſet at liberty; perhaps on account of her daughter and her huſband Henry duke of Saxony being then at the court of England. Short, however, was her enjoyment of freedom; for Henry ſoon committed her again to a tower, where ſhe continued in cloſe cuſtody till his death.

In the ſpring of the year 1185 [6], the king, with the biſhop of Durham, and many of the chief men of England, croſſed the Channel; and as ſoon as he arrived in Normandy, he collected a great army, and ſent a mandate to his ſon Richard, count of Poitou, who had fortified that province againſt him, and was then at war with his brother Geoffry duke of Bretagne, that unleſs he ſurrendered all Poitou, and quit-claimed the ſame to his mother queen Alianor, he would viſit him with a rod of iron, and war againſt him in mighty force. Upon the receipt of this mandate, Richard diſcontinued hoſtilities, and gave up Poitou to his mother, and, returning to his father, remained with him like a tractable and gentle ſon. In the beginning of the year 1186 [7], another conference or parliament was held by the kings of France and England at Giſors;

---

[1] Hoveden.

[2] According to Gervas, he engaged to furniſh 50,000 marcs. But note, this was to come out of his people's pockets by an illegal and unprecedented taxation.

[3] Bromton.

[4] Hoveden.

[5] Hoveden.

[6] Hoveden.

[7] At the Chriſtmas feſtival of 1186, which was ſolemnized at Bedford, the earl of Leiceſter is mentioned as one of the nobles who ſerved at the king's table. Lyttelton, VI. 37.

at which king Henry ſwore, that he would deliver to Richard, count of Poitou, Adelais ſiſter of the French king, to be Richard's wife; and the French king yielded to Richard Giſors, and all the other things which his late father Lewis le jeune had yielded to the late king Henry, junior, with his daughter Margaret. And he ſware, that he never would move a queſtion againſt them on that affair. After this conference, Henry returned to England [1]. Before Henry left Normandy, Richard count of Poitou had levied a great army, and invaded the land or ſeignory of the count of St. Gilles, and, either by force or fraud, reduced many caſtles within that earldom. On the 19th of Auguſt, 1186, died the king's third ſon Geoffry duke of Bretagne. His ſhort life had been ſpent in tilts and feats of war, and in broils with his father. He died at Paris, whither he had gone to ſtir up his boſom friend the French king to aſſiſt him in a new war againſt his parent. His untimely death overtook him by a fall from his horſe at a tournament, whereby, and the trampling of others upon him when fallen, he was ſo bruiſed that no medical art could prevent his death [2].

This event no ſooner reached the ears of king Henry, than he began to move to take the cuſtody of Bretagnè, which he conſidered as a fief or tenement of Normandy; but his purpoſe was croſſed by the French king, who alleged that the ſovereignty of Bretagne had been yielded to him by Henry himſelf, when he made Geoffrey a vaſſal of the French king. Bretagne was immediately in confuſion, ſome of the Breton lords ſided with one king, and ſome with the other. In this embarraſment Henry thought to have recourſe to his old devices, negotiation and bribery; with which view he requeſted a truce of the French king; to which king Philip aſſented: but he withſtood Henry's ſecret arts of corruption, and bound his counts and barons by oath not to ſtain their fingers with the gold or ſilver of Henry. Philip conceived himſelf to have been much injured by Henry, and particularly reſented the affair of his ſiſter Adelais. For theſe injuries he determined to have redreſs, either by war or peace. In the beginning of next year negotiations were continued to make up the breach between the two kings; but Henry not complying with the requiſitions of Philip [3], who demanded that the ſovereignty of Bretagne ſhould be in him, and not in Henry, and that Adelais ſhould be reſtored to Richard, the former laid ſiege to Giſors. King Henry ſent over earl William of Mandevill to make head againſt him. And about the middle of February, king Henry went over to Normandy, and ſoon after had another conference with Philip, in which a truce was agreed upon to the feaſt of John Baptiſt. On the eve of this feſtival, when every thing was got ready for action the next day [4], the earl of Flanders, one of the French barons, paid a viſit to prince Richard, and addreſſed him in the following manner: "Sir Count, it is the opinion of me and of many others, that you act very unwiſely, and are very ill-adviſed, to go thus in arms againſt your lord the king of France, of whom you hold ſuch fair fiefs, and expect ſo much. You are juſt now about to engage him in battle: but I adviſe you to forbear from an act of ſuch imprudence. How can he ever love you after this? or how can he confer the fiefs upon you, which, by inheritance, await you? Do not let his youth inſpire you with contempt; for although he is young in years, he is mature in wiſdom, and ſtrenuous in affairs. He is ſenſible of wrongs, but not unmindful of obligations. I was once his enemy; the conſequences of it I have reaſon to feel. How glorious would it be to you, and alſo how uſeful, if you could have the good-will, and alſo the grace, of this your liege lord!" The earl: "I would be content to go to Jeruſalem barefoot, if I could gain the favour of my lord to the extent of my wiſhes." The earl of Flanders: "There is no need of your taking ſo great a journey: lo! the king of France is at hand. You may ſpeak to him without putting your ſhoes either on, or off. Arrayed as you now are in ſhining armour, and ſeated on your deſtrer, you may go to him, and you will eaſily obtain his favour." Earl Richard, therefore, without conſulting his father, the earl of Flanders going before him, amidſt the phalanx of armed cavalry, and the lines of troops in battle array, proceeded to the preſence of king Philip, with whom he held a private conference; after which he returned to his fellow knights with a calm and ſatisfied mind. But king Henry, hearing of what had paſſed, was much agitated, and had nothing in his thoughts but the idea of treachery. As to peace, he conceived there was no likelihood of it; and, without loſing a moment, ſent a meſſenger to the chief nobles of France, intreating them to come to him forthwith. Accordingly came to him the archbiſhop of Rheems, count Theobald, the count of Flanders, count Robert, and other prime nobles of France; whom the king of England addreſſed in the following manner: "Sirs, friends, and couſins, I make it known to you, that I am a ſinful man, who hitherto, in many things, have done amiſs. But I am now deſirous of amending my life, and, while I have time, getting myſelf reconciled to God: and ſeeing that I have now men and money ſuitable for the thing, if it pleaſe my lord the king of France, I will go againſt the Pagans. Aſk it, therefore, in my name, of my ſaid lord, that he would be pleaſed to grant me a truce of two years; which thing if he refuſe me, he muſt anſwer before God concerning the ſalvation of my ſoul; as ye alſo muſt expect to do if ye refuſe to communicate what ye have now heard to the lord king." After ſaying this, and a great deal more, which ſtruck the nobles with amazement, he burſt into a fit of tears. The nobles, returning to the French king, reported what they had heard. At which Philip, with a ſmile, ſaid to them, "Do ye believe him?" They anſwered, "He humbly beſought us to ſay theſe things to you, and we do adviſe and admoniſh you to comply with his requeſt." Go to him then, ſays Philip, and ſay to him, "That at his petition, and your admonition, I grant him the truce of two years." Theſe illuſtrious meſſengers then returning to the king of England, found him now of another mind, and having quite other purpoſes than he had when he ſaw them before. He ſaid in his excuſe, "that he had more cloſely and nicely conſidered the matter, and had found there was great danger in his petition;" and declared, without diſguiſe, "that nothing ſhould make him comply with any thing that he had aſked, or the French king had granted." The counts aforeſaid, therefore, returned to king Philip, with advice of this unaccountable change of king Henry's mind. Whereupon Philip, highly incenſed at the trick that had been played him, ordered all his forces to be ready on the morrow for attacking Henry. The army was accordingly arranged in order of battle. As ſoon as Henry heard of Philip's reſolution and eagerneſs to engage, he ſent in a great hurry for his ſon Richard, and ſaid to him, "What are we to do? What is your counſel in our preſent critical ſituation?" To which Richard made anſwer, "What advice can I poſſibly offer you, when you to-day refuſe that truce which was granted you yeſterday at your own deſire? We cannot now ſolicit again for that truce without diſgrace and ſhame." But ſeeing his father in great trouble of mind, and being deſirous of giving him comfort, ſaid to him, "Although it puts one to the bluſh to take ſuch a ſtep, I will go, ſir father, if you pleaſe, to our lord king, and try if I can recover the truce which was granted yeſterday." "Do ſo," replied king Henry. Earl Richard, therefore, haſtened to king Philip, whom he found equipped for battle; and, uncovering his head, and falling on his knees, he offered the French king his ſword, and humbly craved of him to mitigate the anguiſh of his mind, and grant to him, who was faithful to him, the truce, inſtead of his father; "which truce," he ſaid, "if it ſhould be infringed by his father, he would be reſponſible for in his own perſon to the king at Paris, and ſubmit himſelf to the king of France's will." Philip, hearing this, adviſed apart with his counts and barons, and granted the truce upon the conditions propoſed by Richard. Each ſide hereupon took a farewell of arms, and returned with joy to their reſpective homes; and the French king took the count of Poitou with him in peace and grace into France[1].

---

[1] Gervas.

[2] It is related of this prince, or, as his contemporaries would have called him, this lord, that, after ſome fracas with his father, the latter ſent one of his clerks to him to make up matters between them; and that Geoffry, on the nuncio's making his appearance, immediately exclaimed, "What, are you come to diſheriſon me of my native right? Do not you know, that it is a principle born with us, and derived to us from our anceſtors, that no two of our family can love each other? Do not give yourſelf the trouble of attempting a reconciliation; for it is againſt nature, that ſuch a thing ſhould be brought about. X Script. p. 1043. This was the æra of chivalry. The king's three eldeſt ſons had an enthuſiaſm for that ſort of proweſs. Hoveden thus ſpeaks of them: "Et erat eis mens una, videlicet, plus cæteris poſſe in armis: ſcientes, quod ars bellandi, ſi non præluditur, cum fuerit neceſſaria, non habetur. Nec poteſt athleta magnos ſpiritus ad certamen afferre, qui nunquam ſugillatus eſt. Ille qui ſanguinem ſuum vidit: cujus dentes crepuerunt ſub pugno: ille, qui ſupplantatus adverſarium toto tulit corpore; nec projecit animum projectus: qui quotiens cecidit contumacior ſurrexit cum magna ſpe deſcendit ad pugnam." Hoveden, de filiis Henrici II. anno 1178.

[3] Gervas.

[4] Gervas, p. 1500.

One chief purpoſe of this truce was, to give the two kings leiſure to prepare for the cruſade, to which Henry ſtood now pledged again by the ſolemn ties of honour and conſcience. But this ſacred avocation was not ſufficient to reſtrain the Engliſh princes from hoſtilities. Before the expiration of the truce, a commotion broke out in the empire of France, which obliged almoſt all the people thereof to fly to arms. The count of St. Gilles happening to die, his ſon, a kinſman of the French king, ſucceeded to that earldom. The count of Poitou, ſetting the count at nought, took arms, aſſembled his milice, and ſeized the caſtles and fortified towns in the confine of the city of Toloufe; being very deſirous to beſiege that city itſelf, for which both the count of Poitou, and his father the king of England, had, for a long time, a ſtrong inclination. The king of France, much irritated, as was no wonder, at this proceeding, moved forward with the army of France, and, without loſs of time, got poſſeſſion of the caſtle of Radulf, in the province of Berry. He got alſo into his hands ſome other caſtles, and in a ſhort time that whole country. The king of Angles, hearing of this invaſion and theſe conqueſts, was exceedingly alarmed, and, as the beſt expedient which his mind ſuggeſted, ſent Baldwin archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the biſhops of Lincoln and Cheſter, that they might adjoin themſelves to the archbiſhop of Rouen, and then proceed with him to the French king, to whom they were ordered to uſe every intreaty which might move Philip to reſtore peace. For this purpoſe Baldwin croſſed the Channel about the middle of June, 1188. The French king ſhunned all diſcourſe with Henry's ſacerdotal ambaſſadors, and thought their very commiſſion a freſh offence; nor would he receive or confer with them. Henry, therefore, was under the neceſſity of croſſing the ſea in perſon, not having a doubt but that by ſo doing he ſhould eaſily pacify the French king. Accordingly he embarked for Normandy on the 10th of July, and after a moſt perilous paſſage was at length ſafely landed there, from whence he immediately diſpatched his nuncios to Philip. But the latter, raging like an incenſed lion, utterly rejected all his overtures, thinking that in every one of them lurked ſome deceit. He was determined to decide every thing by arms alone, growing every day more and more ſtrong, and fully perſuaded of his ability to reduce the fortified places of Henry to his obedience. He purſued his conqueſts, and made himſelf maſter of all Auvergne, the king of England being afraid to face him, and retreating into Normandy before him. At length Henry took refuge in Giſors, from whence he opened a treaty of peace with Philip. The former alleged, that the latter being his liege lord, of whom he held ſo many dominions within the empire of France, he was reſtrained by the ties of homage and honour from engaging him; but his forbearance was imputed ſolely to fear[2]. Philip removing to Mount-calve with his victorious troops, king Henry repaired to Verneuil, where he ſtayed only in the day-time, and at night lodged in the caſtle of Pacy, of which he thought the walls of ſufficient ſtrength to ſecure his perſon. This caſtle of Pacy belonged to our earl of Leiceſter, till he had the misfortune to loſe it by his late capture. Although king Henry had not choſen to riſk a deciſive battle with the French, yet ſuch was the ardour of the two chief heroes of the two armies, viz. Richard Cœur de Lion on the Engliſh ſide, and of William du Barres on the French, that they could not refrain from partial attacks of their reſpective foes, till at laſt they met each other, and had a deſperate encounter. Their manner of fighting ſo reſembled what we read in Homer and Virgil, that the difference is hardly perceptible. Richard did not acquire the honour of victory, which on the other hand was not complete on the ſide of his antagoniſt. The two heroes ſeemed to be nearly equal in courage, ſkill, and activity; but Richard was ſo far vanquiſhed as to need the help of his friends to raiſe him upon his legs, and take him off the field. Our earl too was perſonally aſſailed on this occaſion, and in no ſmall danger; what were his own feats is not recited:

"At Droco Mellotides totis conatibus inſtans,
"Marcellum devolvit equo, comitemque Liceſtræ
"Aſſociat lapſis[3]."

The action was now becoming general, which king Henry not intending, inforced his orders for retreating; and this was conducted by prince Richard, and the earl of Leiceſter. Henry, after this, declined attacking the French borders with his milice:

"Anglicus ex illo rex tempore non fuit auſus
"Armato noſtros adoriri milite fines[4]."

This prince now finding that he could neither by threatening ncr ſoothing ſoften the French king, held a ſolemn conference with the archbiſhops of Canterbury and Rouen, and his other counſellors, to conſider of ſome further ſteps to be taken on the preſent emergence; complaining of the unexpected and violent attack of this boy-king, and remarking the ſhame and diſgrace he ſhould ſuſtain, if his youthful preſumption were not taught to know its bounds. For he deſpiſed Philip, who was yet under the age of twenty-four. The advice given by his counſel was, that he ſhould throw open his coffers, that he ſhould aſſemble an army, both milice and foot, from all quarters, and by every means endeavour to break the power of Philip, that the French in future might never think of annoying him again in this manner. Having had this advice, although the parting with his money went very near his heart, yet he ſubmitted to it on this occaſion, and got together a large body of forces, conſiſting of milice and Welſh infantry, with which he aſſailed the utmoſt confines of France, and made a ſhift to ſet on fire a few wretched towns, and deſtroy ſome vineyards, to tread down the ripe grapes, and to get off with the booty of a few cattle, which he might eaſily do, as he met with no oppoſition. When the king of France heard of theſe hoſtilities, he ſhewed no indignation, but kept his temper, purpoſing to ſee what Henry had in his intention. For he had diſmiſſed a good part of his army on account of the vintage being then at hand. The count of Poitou perceiving the agitation of his father, and the deſolate ſtate of Philip, that he might not be altogether idle, formed a ſcheme for the taking of Caſtle-Radulf; and at length found means of ſtopping up the paſſage of the gates, which the knights, who had the guard thereof, gave him an opportunity of doing, by their having ſallied out for the ſake of plunder. The excluded knights, finding what had happened, returned; and making ſigns to the knights within to make an attack on their ſide, while they did the ſame from without, they, in conjunction with their party within, aſſailed Richard with united fury; nor could the latter eſcape without ſeeing many of his corps ſlain, and ſeveral wounded and made captive. And the count himſelf, whoſe only hope was in flight, did not effect that without extreme danger, for he was hurled from his horſe, and at length got off, having been reſcued by the help of a very ſtrong butcher. The king of France acquired ſuch extenſive and rapid renown, and was ſo ſucceſsful in all his exploits, that he began to threaten Henry, not only with taking the province of Berry, but all his other territories on that ſide the ſea. On the other hand, Henry declined in his power and fame every day, and ſaw many thouſand marcs iſſue daily from his treaſury, and no ſort of good accruing to himſelf from the expenditure; for he had not the affections of his earls, barons, and knights, whom he had ſtripped and reduced almoſt to nothing. At laſt, after ſending their reſpective nuncios backwards and forwards, both parties conſented, that on the octaves of St. Martin (i. e. about the middle of November) the kings and their ſuites ſhould have a conference at Bon-mulins, for the making of peace. But many great perſons of the eccleſiaſtical and knightly orders, ſeeing the old age of king Henry, and his declining fortune, and the wiſdom and growing greatneſs of Philip, being fearful of the event of the approaching parliament, perſuaded Henry to correct his evil deeds, and, in particular, to remove the calamities of his mother the church of Canterbury. In anſwer to this remonſtrance, he aſſured the petitioners, that, when peace and tranquillity were reſtored to him, he would attend to the welfare of the church. The kings and their grandees aſſembled for the parliament; at which, in a very ſhort time, Richard was reconciled to the king of France, and made his homage and fealty to him, with reſervation of his fealty to the king his father as long as the latter lived; after which he withdrew himſelf, and all his party and forces, from his father's ſide, to that of the French king. At this ſight Henry was ſurprized, exaſperated, and terrified. Richard, in defence of his conduct, alleged, that, according to report, it was his father's intention to trick him out of his juſt inheritance, and make John his ſucceſſor in the realm of England, and crown him. And it was on this account that Richard, highly agitated with this report, had, before this parliament, taken great pains to get the favour of the king of France, that, after he was caſt off and diſinherited by his father, he might have the comfort of a friend in Philip. At this parliament at Bon-mulins, the parties, on the firſt day, behaved to each other with tolerable temper, and ſeemed to talk very reaſonably, and treat of peace. On the ſecond day the tone of their voices took an higher pitch, and their minds began to ſwell. On the third day they began to quarrel, and at length to exchange ſuch ſharp menaces, that the knights who were around them put on their ſwords. A truce, however, to the feaſt of St. Hilary was then agreed to. An innumerable body of people ſurrounded the kings, who were both in the middle of a circle, as were alſo the archbiſhop of Rhemes and earl Richard. The latter then commencing his diſcourſe, aſked his father to make him his heir in the ſucceſſion of the realm, and to ſecure to him ſuch ſucceſſion. But king Henry giving him an evaſive and deceitful anſwer, according to his manner, was preſſed to be more explicit and ſatisfactory. Still Richard urged his ſuit in vain. Whereupon Richard ſaid, "that what he could ſcarcely be brought to believe hitherto now ſeemed to him very probable." And turning to the king of France, he took off his ſword, his father ſtanding by, and in ſight of all there preſent he ſtretched forth his hands and did homage to Philip, and implored his aid to prevent his loſing his right. The father and ſon then ſeparated from each other, to the aſtoniſhment of the whole auditory. Henry, contemplating what he had ſeen, was thunder-ſtruck thereat, and reflected with anxiety upon the uncertain iſſue of this unexpected coalition: for he ſtill retained in his mind a lively remembrance of the vexation which his ſon Henry's combination with the late king of France had given him; and now he ſaw his preſent eldeſt ſon leagued with Philip, a more formidable enemy than Lewis had been, or was capable of being. When the two kings then, as was obſerved before, parted from each other, and the people, who had formed a large ring, began to get cloſer to each other, the king of France and earl Richard went away together. Henry, thus left to himſelf, haſtened into Aquitaine, and ſent his illegitimate ſon Geoffry, now his chancellor, into Anjou, to ſecure all the ſtrong towns of that earldom againſt the deſigns of Philip and Richard.

---

[1] Gervas.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Will. Brit. Armor. lib. III.

[4] Ibid.

At the beginning of the year 1189, the truce, which was to have expired on the feaſt of St. Hilary, was prolonged to the feaſt of Purification, through the prayer and excuſes of king Henry; and again it was extended to Eaſter. For the king of England was then really, or fictitiouſly, indiſpoſed; and after a little while, agitated by repentance of his conduct towards his ſon Richard, he ſent the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and other great perſons, to that prince; and, according to his cuſtom, ſpared neither coaxing nor threatening in order to regain him. But Richard treated with diſdain both the overture of the archbiſhop, and of a nuncio of the king, and determined to believe nothing that came from his father; for, after fatal experience of his duplicity, he was ſatisfied that he knew the man thoroughly, and ſuſpected deceit and villainy to be in the meſſages brought by the archbiſhop, and in all the words of the king by his nuncio.

On the 9th day of June, the two kings, together with the apoſtolic legate, and four archbiſhops, viz. of Canterbury, Rouen, Rhemes, and Bourges[1], who were appointed to re-eſtabliſh peace between the kings and earl of Poitou, met in a parliament held for that purpoſe. After various allegations made by one ſide and the other, the king of France, with moderation enough, in a ſhort ſpeech, as indeed he was uſually a brief ſpeaker, made proteſtation, "that he would reſtore all that he had taken from the king of England the former year, upon this condition, namely, that king Henry ſhould reſtore to him his ſiſter Adelais, who had been given by his late father Lewis, twenty-two years before, to be wife to Richard, and whom king Henry had kept all that time in cloſe cuſtody[2]." Earl Richard alſo claimed the lady aforeſaid, as being his wife by the eccleſiaſtical law; alſo, he demanded ſecurity to be given as to the inheritance of the crown, and that his brother John, whom, as was reported, king Henry deſired to raiſe to the throne, to the excluſion of Richard, ſhould be his inſeparable companion in the voyage to Jeruſalem, and go thither in the ſtead of the king their father. King Henry rejected every propoſition, againſt the advice of all his counſellors and familiars, that was made to him, with diſdain and abuſe; and thus the aſſembly being diſſolved, the chiefs and their partizans flew immediately to arms. Henry took up his ſtation at Mans, with intention of ſtanding a ſiege, if the enemy ſhould come before it; which it was thought, however, they would not dare to do. But this was a miſtaken opinion; for, in the beginning of May, Philip and Richard approached that city with a very formidable army. It was Henry's birth-place, and a particular object of his delight. The people too were attached to him, and the works were deemed ſufficiently ſtrong to juſtify a contempt of a ſiege, and the king had a conſiderable corps of his milice to defend him. The citizens exhorted him to ſtay with them as their protector, and he promiſed to do ſo; but, finding the French king and his ſon Richard approach with their forces, his heart ſunk, and he determined to flee. But before his departure he had ordered the ſuburbs to be ſet on fire, thinking, that, if they ſtood, they would facilitate the taking of the place. This ſtratagem proved very hurtful to the city, for the wind being high, and blowing into the town, the flame was carried into it, and conſumed a great part of it. As Henry was leaving it, he made this impious ſpeech: "As thou, O God, haſt ſo ſhamefully taken from me this day the place that I loved more than any other in the whole world, I will retaliate upon thee; for, henceforth, I will take from thee what I had moſt deſirable to thee, which is my heart[1]." Henry in his flight was cloſely purſued by his ſon Richard, but made a ſhift to reach Alençon, where he took ſhelter. In the mean while ſuch parts of Mans as had eſcaped the flames were pillaged by the victorious French led by their king, who found the gates open. Henry's perfidious deſertion of that place ſeems to be one of the baſeſt actions of his life. On Richard's return to join the French king, he was much ſurprized to find what had happened; but although it might ſeem an important conqueſt to the French in the points of glory and plunder, yet the damage done to the city and the deſpoiling were enough to give great concern to Richard, to whoſe anceſtors the city had belonged, and which had been their birth-place, and very faithful and ſerviceable to them. But Philip, by way of conſolation, made him a preſent of the city and citizens. After the taking of Mans, Philip marched to beſiege Tours, a very populous and rich city, and ſo ſtrong as to be thought impregnable. But this alſo fell into his hands[2]. Henry's army, ſeeing his deplorable condition, began to deſert him; and he had the mortification to ſee ſome of his principal vaſſals go over to Richard, and become his ſworn men. Even his favourite ſon John forſook him, and joined his brother; ſeeming deſirous to ſhew his father and all the world, that he ſcorned to be more dutiful to his father than the reſt of his brethren. Theſe accumulated and dire misfortunes drove Henry to deſpair. His only reſource was, ſubmiſſion to his ſon and the French king. He got it ſignified, therefore, to the king of France, that he would willingly ſubmit himſelf to the mercy of that king, ſaving to him his fiefs held of him, and the crown of his realm. But this propoſal was rejected. It was required of him that he ſhould ſubmit abſolutely to the mercy of king Philip[3].

---

[1] "Richardus vero interea petit a patre ſponſam,
Reſtitui ſibi jure ſuam quam turre recluſam,
Viliter Henricus rex dira mente tenebat,
Contra jus ſponſique ſui fratriſque Philippi,
Fratrem germana fraudans, uxore maritum,
Se ſuper inceſtus ſuſpectum crimine reddens,
Corrupiſſe nurum fama vulgante notatus.
Quapropter patri merito ſe ſubtrahit ille,
Seque reconciliat ſub amica pace Philippo."
Will. Brit. Arm. lib. III.

[2] William of Bretagne in his Philippis ſpeaks thus of Philip's laying ſiege to Mans, and Henry's flight thereupon:

"————————— protinus urbem
Cenomanorum ſubita premit obſidione,
Quam rex Henricus equitum peditumque catervis,
Innumeris fretus clauſam tunc forte tenebat,
Ad quod Vindecimo modo feſtinaverat ipſe,
Ut contra Francos & natum clauderet illam.
Sed poſtquam ſcivit portis inſtare Philippum,
Dat ſua terga fugæ, nec lumina flectere retro,
Audet cui ſubitas dederat timor anxius alas,
Dum fugit oblitus famæ & regalis honoris,
Donec Alançonis tuta ſe clauſit in arce."
Lib. III.

According to Gyraldus, Philip and Richard beſieged Mans, and ſet the town on fire, which obliged Henry to decamp.

To obtain this miſerable boon of a diſgraceful peace, he was obliged, in the midſt of a fever, brought on by vexation, to take a journey from Chinon to Columbare, to know the pleaſure of his conquerors, or rather to hear his ſentence from them[4]. According to Gervas, the French king granted him the following terms: "He was to do fealty afreſh to Philip, as his liege lord, for the fiefs held of him, and ſtand pledged for £.30,000; he was to grant to that king, and earl Richard, all that they had aſked of him before, and that he had denied; and to promiſe to give to the French barons 20,000*l*." This agreement was ratified at Giſors, and that part of it ſat very heavy upon the mind of Henry which concerned the payment of ſo great a ſum of money. Diceto's account is ſomewhat different: by the advice of their grandees peace was renewed upon theſe terms, namely, "To the king of England ſhall be reſtored all things, as well the caſtle of Radulph as others taken after the engagement of the croſs, to wit, the places within the province of Berry: to the French king ſhall be paid 20,000 marcs, in the name of diſburſements, which king Philip had expended about and upon Caſtle-Radulph: the two kings and the count of Poitou, in the hand of the archbiſhop of Rhemes, ſhall make oath to meet in the middle of the following Lent at Vizelay, there to proſecute the vow of the pilgrimage which they had made, unleſs an alteration, by common conſent, or infirmity of body, proved by ſufficient teſtimony, ſhall be an impediment: Adelais, ſiſter of the French king, ſhall be delivered either to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, or to the archbiſhop of Rouen, or to earl William de Mandeville, to be in the keeping of one of them, and after the return from pilgrimage, by advice of the king of France, ſhall be delivered to be diſpoſed of in marriage: the king of France, for his great expences which he made at Caſtle-Radulph de doleurs in the time of hoſtility, ſhall receive 20,000 marcs from the treaſury of king Henry. Count Richard ſhall receive ſecurities from the barons, ſaving their fealty to his father, to be ſucceſſor in the realm of England. All the barons of king Henry, who deſerted him, and joined Richard, ſhall remain in the count's fealty, until his father ſhall ſet out upon his pilgrimage to Jeruſalem. The kings, earls, and barons, ſhall become pledged to the firm-keeping of this agreement." Theſe things were done on the eve of the feaſt of St. Peter and Paul, between Tours and Aza. Afterwards the king of England renewed the homage he had lately ſurrendered to the king of France. Alſo, whatever the king of England or his anceſtors held in Auvergne, he quit-claimed to the French king.

Thus (concludes my author) the king of Angles, who had ſubdued ſo many nations, and had been always victorious, might perceive the completion of Merlin's prophecy[5], which ſpoke of the bit put in the jaws. He might ſee how applicable this was to him, when he found himſelf obliged to give up his anceſtral lands in Auvergne; when he found himſelf forced to allow his rebels and fugitives, Geoffry de Meduana, Guido de Valle, and Ralph de Foulgeres, who held important ſeignories under him, paſs into the ligeance and power of Richard, without any ſort of regard to his intereſt or inclination on the ſubject. He did not ſurvive this diſgraceful convention many days. His illneſs increaſed, and obliged him to take his bed, where he lay five days, and was then relieved of his miſery by death; dying, according to the moſt authentic accounts, truly of a broken heart. According to the conſtant cuſtom of that age, in the latter ſtage of his illneſs, he received the viaticum; but neither that holy office, nor the extremity he was in, could reconcile him to his fate, or to his ſons. He curſed the day of his birth, and denounced the moſt direful maledictions upon them. He was exhorted to a better temper, but he refuſed to relent or retract, and in that diſpoſition expired on July 6,

---

[1] Gervas. [2] W. Brito. [3] Bromton. [4] W. Brito.

[5] In that age the moſt learned believed Merlin to be an inſpired prophet, who foretold the events of the Engliſh kings and nation.

1189, in the 57th year of his age. William Brito thus ſums up his death and character:

> " Jamque ſuprema dies illi Chinona reverſo,
> Poſt triduum occurrit, qui fonte ſepultus Ebrardi,
> Per proprios victus natos & obire coactus,
> Abbreviaſſe ſuæ lugetur tempora vitæ.
> Felix ſi regi regum ſtuduiſſet haberi,
> Gratus & illius metuiſſet lædere ſervos.
> Felix ſi ſancti Thomæ fratrumque ſuorum,
> Non interfector ſed amator amaſſet haberi;
> Felix ſi proles illi ſua chara fuiſſet;
> Ipſeque charus eis, genuit quos omine lævo,
> Ipſius exitii cauſam mortiſque futuros [1]."

Giraldus Cambrenſis, one of the beſt writers of that age, and an author who had full opportunity of knowing this king, gives no favourable account of him. That I may be ſure not to miſrepreſent what this hiſtorian ſays of him, I will give his own words: " Statura mediocris, eloquens & literatus; in armatâ militiâ ſtrenuus; in togatâ providus; in bellis ambigua fata formidans; humanior ſemper militi extincto, quam ſuperſtiti; plus mortuos lugens, quam vivos amans; urgentibus incommodis nemo benignior; reſumptâ ſecuritate nemo rigidior; acer in indomitos; clemens interdum in ſubactos; durus in domeſticos; profuſus in extraneos; largus in publico; parcus in privato; quem ſemel exoſum aut dilectum haberet, vix ad contrarium flecteretur; verbi ſpontaneus tranſgreſſor; moroſus ad cuncta reſponſor; quietis amator, ſed nobilitatis oppreſſor; juſticiæ venditor & dilatator; fidei tranſgreſſor; verbo varius & verſutus; adulter publicus; eccleſiæ malleus; Deo ſemper ingratus; diſcordiam inter filios ſummo opere fovebat, ſolum ſibi ex eorum diſcidio pacem ſperans provenire [2]." This character is probably well founded, for, by nice obſervation, a great deal of it may be diſcovered by ourſelves, as we peruſe the accounts of his behaviour in the different annaliſts of his time. It may give us ſurprize to ſee ſuch a man ſo highly ſpoke of by modern hiſtorians. Mr. Hume ſays of him, " that he had hardly a flaw." And lord Lyttelton devoted 30 years of his life to the writing of his panegyrick. Of Mr. Hume's abilities there can be no doubt; but did he apply theſe in the inveſtigation of Henry's merits? or did he content himſelf, for the ſake of expedition, and his own eaſe, to take the character of Henry upon truſt, and give implicit faith to all that Thomas Carte had ſaid of him? Of the Noble Hiſtorian I recollect Mr. Hume's own ſentiment upon the publication of the hiſtory of Henry II. " That work," ſaid he, " is, like the author, long and lank." Were I to ſuppoſe myſelf qualified to criticiſe it, I would do it with particular animadverſion upon the author, for his partiality to deſpotiſm, and his ſacrifice of humanity at the ſhrine of tyranny and wickedneſs.

Henry hated more than moſt men while he lived, and almoſt deſerted and depoſed before his death, was hardly lamented at his diſſolution. An epigrammatiſt of his own day might perhaps mean no compliment in the following line:

> " Mira canam: ſol occubuit; nox nulla ſecuta eſt."

Upon the death of his father, Richard count of Poitou took upon him the guardianſhip of England; and, among the firſt acts of his adminiſtration, by his writ of ultra mare, ſet the queen at liberty, and gave her power to make ſuch regulations as ſhe pleaſed, during his abſence, for the peace and ſafety of the realm. Being now deprived of his father, he either felt, or pretended to feel, very pungent remorſe for his late behaviour, and determined to be a moſt loving and dutiful ſon to his ſurviving parent. Alſo, among the firſt of his princely acts, he reſtored all the lands and tenements of the earl of Leiceſter which had been ſeized in the year 1183, and, as far as we know, withheld from that earl till the acceſſion of Richard [3].

After his father's death, he had ſo many weighty affairs to ſettle with the king of France as rendered it next to impoſſible to come over to England, for ſome weeks, to be elected and crowned; and beſides, he was detained in Normandy by his election to that dutchy. It was the 12th of Auguſt before he found himſelf at leiſure to croſs the ſea. In the mean while the queen dowager, in quality of adminiſtratrix of the realm, exerciſed the function of high juſtice: as ſuch, ſhe was aſſiſted and accompanied by her court of juſtices or barons, and went from city to city, and from caſtle to caſtle, juſt as ſuited her inclinations; and ſending her legates through all the counties of England, ſhe ordered all captives and priſoners to be ſet free and be diſcharged, as an act of piety for the ſoul of her late royal huſband; at the ſame time indulging a gratification of her own feelings, who, from long impriſonment, knew the miſery of it, and the comfort of freedom. Moreover, ſhe iſſued writs, as by command of her ſon, that all perſons who had been ſeized and kept in durance for treſpaſſes, in regard of the foreſts, ſhould be releaſed; and that all outlaws for foreſt offences ſhould be freely forgiven for offences hitherto committed; and that all other perſons, who had been taken and detained by will of the king or his high juſtice, who had not been detained by the common right of the county or hundred, or by appeal, ſhould be quit: and that thoſe who were detained by common right, if they could find pledges for their ſtanding tryal with thoſe who impleaded them, ſhould be ſet at large; and if they pledged themſelves by their own oath, to anſwer to the charges of their accuſers, they were to be freed conditionally, and as the caſe allowed: and that thoſe who were detained by appeal for any foul offence, if they found pledges to abide a lawful tryal, ſhould be ſet free: and that thoſe who were outlawed by common right without appeal, through the juſtices, might return to peace, ſo that they found pledges to ſtand right, if any one was diſpoſed to ſpeak againſt them; but if they were ſued by appeal, if they made peace with their adverſaries, they ſhould return to peace: and all thoſe who were ſtopped or retained by the appeal of ſuch as acknowledge themſelves criminals, ſhould be diſcharged: and thoſe malefactors, to whom for their probations were granted their limbs and their life, were to abjure the land of the lord Richard and depart; and thoſe malefactors who, without the grant of life and limb to them, appealed others of their own will and inclination, ſhould be kept in priſon till further counſel was had thereupon. And ſhe commanded, that every one of the freemen of England [4] ſhould ſwear that he would bear fealty of his life and members, and worldly honour, to the lord Richard king of England, ſon of the lord king Henry, and of the lady queen Alianor, as to his liege lord, againſt all men and women who could live and die, and that they would be juſticiable to him, and afford aid to him, to keep his peace and juſtice in all things[1].

---

[1] Philippidos, lib. III.

[2] That is, if I tranſlate it right, a man of middling ſtature, of fluent and correct ſpeech, provident both in time of war and peace. In battles diſtruſtful of the event; more affectionate to the memory of a vaſſal than to his living perſon; bewailing the dead more than loving the living; when preſſed with difficulties, no one more kind to others; reſtored to ſafety and eaſe, no one more ſevere and harſh; fierce to ſuch as reſiſted him; now and then merciful to thoſe he had vanquiſhed; ill-natured and moroſe towards thoſe he lived with; profuſe to ſtrangers; bountiful in public; at home parſimonious; if he once loved or hated, he ſeldom altered; breaking his word, when it ſuited him, without any ſcruple; ſlow in anſwering what was put to him; a lover of quiet, but an oppreſſor of nobility; a ſeller and delayer of juſtice; a violator of his faith; inconſtant and ſhuffling in his word; an open adulterer; the very mallet of the church; ungrateful to God always; he ſpared no pains to foment diſcord among his ſons; thinking their diſagreement was beſt calculated for his peace.

[3] Richard came to England Aug. 12; and was crowned Sept. 3. Gervas.

[4] It is remarked among the proofs of the great power of William the Conqueror, that he ſubjected all the freemen of England, of whoſeſoever fief they were, to the oath of ligeance to him. The ſame writer (William of Malmeſbury) takes notice, that Henry I. exacted the oath of ligeance from all the libres homes of the realm, in behalf of his ſon William, as a ſecurity for William's ſucceeding to the throne after king Henry's deceaſe. " Nam & ei (ſc. Willelmo filio Henrici I.) vix dum duodecim annorum eſſet, omnes liberi homines Angliæ, & Normanniæ, cujuſcunque ordinis & dignitatis, cujuſcunque domini fideles manibus, & ſacramento ſe dedere coacti ſunt." In Hen. I. p. 165. About 14 Hen. II. that king ſent his writs to

To Alianor fell the office of preparing every thing judged neceſſary for the coronation of her ſon; and ſhe was very careful to collect, for that occaſion, all the earls, barons, and ſhire-reeves[2] of the realm. Of the names and number of the biſhops we deem it needleſs (ſays my author[3]) to be particular; but from differeut parts came the archbiſhops of Canterbury, Rouen, Treves, and Dublin. Richard count of Poitou, who was now to be promoted to be king by hereditary right, came into England Aug. 12, 1189; and on the 3d of September, after a ſolemn and formal election, both of clergy and laity, was conſecrated and crowned; after which he became involved in a triple oath, namely, that he would employ his beſt endeavour that the church of God and to his immediate tenants in capite, who had fiefs of knights, that they ſhould certify to the king the names of their knights, and the quantity of knights ſervice due from each to the king's immediate tenant in capite. The reaſon aſſigned in the king's mandate for his demanding theſe certificates is, that theſe tenants or feoffees by knight ſervice might all take the oath of ligeance to the king. The impoſition of this oath is authorized by a ſtatute of William I. and in virtue of it the univerſity of freemen became liable to obey the king's ſummons to appear with horſe and arms to defend his perſon and rights againſt all his enemies, whether domeſtic or foreign. By the ſame ſtatute theſe libres homes (for the French phraſe marks the quality of theſe men better than the Engliſh word freeholders) were declared to be for ever exempt from all unjuſt exaction, and from all talliage (i. e. tax) whatever, in conſideration of this oath of ligeance to the king, and the ſervice implied in it. By this law the freemen of the grandees of the realm were no longer ſubject to their reſpective lords in the ſame manner they were before, but became more directly ſubjects of the king. Upon the Conqueſt, a great part of the thane land was converted into military fief, and became ſubject to caſtle-guard at the appointment of the king, and to the ſervice of the king's war, and aid and ſcutage. This ſpecies of tenure was certainly introduced by William I. Bracton aſſerts it, "Scutagium in conqueſtu adinventum." Scutagium applies there to military tenures, or fiefs of knights, for it denotes a pecuniary compoſition for ſuch fiefs inſtead of perſonal ſervice to the king in his war, by the proprietors of ſuch fiefs. And, in an early ſtatute of Edward I. as well as elſewhere, they are declared to be introduced ad defendendam patriam, which ſhews they were created for the defence of the realm, that is, upon a public national account. It has been ſaid, that the Conqueror erected as much feudal tenure of this ſort as amounted to 60,000 fiefs of knights. (See Chron. Walteri Hemingford, & alia Chronica.) The author of a famous document preſerved in the Exchequer (Liber Ruber) ſays, "it was the general opinion, but a very falſe and fooliſh one, that William I. infeoffed the ſervices of 32,000 knights;" that is, I preſume, created ſo many knights fiefs. He declares that he could find no warrant in the Exchequer records for ſuch an opinion, although he had ſpared no pains to inveſtigate the matter. The writers who aſſert that William created 60,000 knights fiefs tells us, "that of theſe, 28 000 were created out of the lands of the church;" I ſuppoſe it means the demeſnes of the church by alienation to tenants by knight ſervice. Many authors cry ſhame upon the Conqueror for this ſacrilegious ſpoliation: that many ſuch tenures were made out of church-lands, is clear from Matt. Paris, and other Chronicles; but how much I know not. It certainly much diminiſhed the demeſne of the church, but the biſhops and abbots do not ſeem in general to have diſliked it; for by theſe alienations they were able to provide amply for their relations and dependants (ſee Liber Niger), and added to their ſuite of vaſſals; for ſuch were their infeoffed tenants, although the king had in part the benefit of ſuch infeodations. The thane or tenant of allodial land ſeems to have had it in his power to convert it into feudal tenure, but the change was not made but by actual infeofment. Much allodial land, held by the thanes of the grandees or great lords of the realm, was, no doubt, converted into fief; but much alſo, I ſhould ſuppoſe, ſprang from the alienation of parcels of the extenſive territories, which compoſed the ſeignories of the Anglo-norman lords by the gift of the Conqueror. Feudal tenures were common, if not univerſal, in France and Normandy, and accompanied the Normans to England. Out of the fiefs given to them in England, and which they held immediately of the king in capite, they were at liberty to erect the fiefs of knights and eſquires, either out of the allodial lands of their thanes (with the conſent, however, of ſuch thanes), or out of their demeſnes, or ſuch lands as were not yet in their ſervice. Such infeofments were beneficial to the king, and very convenient to his vaſſals, whoſe capital fiefs anſwered to the king for the ſervices due to him, as well for his lands in ſervitio as thoſe in dominico. Nor did the king's immediate feoffees in the lands and tenements, held immediately of him by his grant, become leſs his liege-men for the alienation of part, or perhaps the whole, of what was ſo given. Nor do I find they were at all reſtrained in the early Anglo-norman time from alienating as much of their crown-tenement as they pleaſed in the way of military tenure. But they had not the ſame liberty of granting in franc-almoine, becauſe then the ſervices were loſt. As William I. had an almoſt infinite number of retainers to provide for, it ſeems extremely likely that he ſhould, while the eſcheated lands or eſtates of the Anglo-ſaxon rebels were in his hands, and out of which he erected, in part, the baronies which he gave to his Norman favourites to hold of him in capite by knight ſervice (which implied the ſervice of their knights and eſquires, or libres homes), as well as their own, make a great many infeofments by knights ſervice, and include theſe tenements in the baronial fiefs held of him in capite. Such tenements would be an honourable appendage to his chief vaſſals, and give him collateral ſecurity for the performance of the ſervices due from his immediate barons. This tenure by knight ſervice, or that ſervice to which the free tenants of the king's chief homagers or vaſſals became liable in conſequence of their military fief, was conſidered by many of the Engliſh as a degradation and badge of ſervitude. The great men of Kent obtained from the Conqueror an entire exemption from it, and therefore called themſelves free. By virtue of the feudal law, free tenement out of Kent was deemed feudal by common law, juſt as thanage continued to be the free tenure of Kent by the cuſtom of that county. Out of Kent, where thanage could not be proved, the tenure was deemed feudal, juſt as in Kent it was deemed allodial, if feudality could not be proved. Allodial or Thaniſh tenure was not formally aboliſhed by William I; but it gave way, in a great meaſure, to feudal. The number of caſtles erected in the Anglo-norman times, in all parts of England, has been noticed before. Thaniſh or allodial tenants, that is, proprietors of land, holding by that ſort of tenure, either immediately of the king, as lord of the great ſeignory of England, or of his vaſſals, who had fiefs (for I do not diſcover that the Conqueſt made any alteration in their condition, except charging them with a quota of knight ſervice, according to the military tenement held of them by their freemen, that is, their knights and eſquires) under the king, were not obnoxious to caſtle-guard, and therefore but ill-ſuited the Anglo-norman kings and their vaſſals, who wanted all the military fiefs they could get for guarding their caſtles. Frank fief therefore was the ſpecies of tenure moſt encouraged, becauſe it was the tenure moſt convenient, and moſt wanted. As to ſocage, or land held of a ſuperior lord by fealty, and a fixed rent in lieu of all ſervices, none but ſmall tenements were ſo held, although its advantage over frank fief was well known. I preſume, therefore, ſuch kind of tenure was very difficult to obtain.

---

It is time that the ſubject of the feudal law was inveſtigated afreſh by ſome induſtrious and acute antiquary. If any man can make out any thing, either for uſe or amuſement, in all that Engliſh writers have ſaid on the ſubject of feudal tenures, the humble compiler of theſe memoirs felicitates ſuch man's keenneſs of penetration, and laments his own want of capacity. In our day, writers of ſome note ſay juſt enough of the feudal law to ſupply the uſe of opium, and to ſhew us how often men write upon ſubjects they know nothing of; their readers in the mean while giving them credit for profound erudition, and laying the blame upon their own dulneſs and want of comprehenſion that they imbibe no knowledge: when, in fact, the writers themſelves, amidſt great flow of words and a ſeductive ſtyle, ſtill know hardly any thing of the matter.

[1] Hoveden.

[2] Shire-reeves; perhaps it might be rendered viſcounts. Shire-reeve is always Latinized by the writers of thoſe times by vicecomes; although the French viſcount, and Engliſh ſhire-reeve, or, as it might be written, ſhire-grave, that is, prefect of the ſhire, do not ſeem to be of quite the ſame quality. The French viſcount was uſually de feodo, and a prime vaſſal of a king or other ſovereign; and ſome of the Normans, whom William made Engliſh barons, i. e. his tenants in capite by barony, were hereditary viſcounts, being, I ſuppoſe, infeoffed of Engliſh ſheriffwics; but Engliſh ſhire-reeves in general were of temporary appointment, although generally they were biſhops, or earls, or great barons. The ſame perſon was wont to hold the office for many years; and it was frequently obtained of the Exchequer at a great fine or great rent. It was the ſource of great oppreſſion to the nation at large.

[3] Diceto.

the people of Chriſt ſhould obtain true peace; that all rapacity ſhould be forbidden, and in judgements equity and mercy prevail. The coronation feaſt was very ſplendid. Our earl officiated at it in a very high office, which ſeems to have put him upon the ſame rank with earl John, brother of king Richard, and David earl of Huntington, brother of William king of Scots, and that king's preſumptive heir. Before Richard were borne three golden royal ſwords taken out of the king's treaſury, whoſe ſheaths were richly gilt. Of theſe ſwords John earl of Mortagne carried one, and held the middle place, having on each ſide of him the two earls, bearing the two others. At this coronation we find the ſame ſpecies of grand ſergeanty performed de feodo by many perſons as were allowed to their ſucceſſors in the ſame tenements at ſubſequent coronations. Thus four barons of the cinque ports bore the royal umbrella upon four lances, and the citizens of London ſerved as king's cooks, and the citizens of Wincheſter as his butlers, as in after-times. Hoveden's account of this coronation, although fuller than what is given by others, is by no means a complete deſcription of it. He mentions only what ſeemed to him the moſt material parts of it. But he takes notice that the earls and barons ſerved in the houſe of the king, as their dignities required; which ſeems to indicate, that the earl of Leiceſter had a right, as ſuch, to carry one of the three ſwords of ſtate. And he might do this perhaps as ſeneſchallus Angliæ de feodo. But that he formally heard and determined the ſeveral claims of perſons pretending to hold lands or tenements, franchiſes or offices of the king in capite, as John of Gaunt afterwards did at the coronation of Richard II. as hereditary grand-maſter or ſeneſchal of the royal houſehold, I do not find noticed by any author or document of that age.

Gervas, a monk of Trinity church in Canterbury, mentions a certain anecdote of our earl, which ſeems at once to mark his piety and intrepid ſpirit. The commencement of Richard's reign was embroiled by a very fierce and obſtinate quarrel between the archbiſhop of Canterbury and his monks, about their reſpective rights. This quarrel had been carried to a great heighth during the life of Henry II. who had had a great deal of trouble with it. On Richard's acceſſion it fell to his lot to be tormented with it. The monks ſeemed to have the merits with them, if regard were had to their cuſtoms and charters, and papal privileges. But archbiſhop Baldwin wanted to render them leſs conſequential than they choſe to be, and to abridge many of their privileges. It is a remarkable circumſtance that Gervas dwells upon the minute parts of this diſagreement with more detail and emphaſis than on the affairs of king Henry, of England, or of all Europe. So much were the monks of opinion, that hardly any thing was worthy of an hiſtorian's notice but eccleſiaſtic and monkiſh affairs. Both king Henry and king Richard were much embarraſſed with this ſubject, and ſometimes took one ſide and ſometimes the other. At length king Richard grew extremely angry with the monks, and uſed the following threatenings, which, among a thouſand inſtances, ſhew the coarſe and vulgar manners of that age. The monks, hearing that ſomewhat was going on much to their diſadvantage, remonſtrated ſtrongly againſt it to the king; at which the latter, being very angry, ſaid, "By the throat of God, there ſhall not remain one foot of you in the church." To which one of the monks made anſwer, "That, God willing, they would all remain in the church." The king replied, "Do ye be gone: nor ſhall ye eſcape ſo: I ſhall watch which way ye take, and I will follow at your heels." Having ſo ſaid, the king leaped up from his ſeat in great wrath, and went away. And clamour and abuſe aſſailed the monks from all quarters! whereupon they left the council with great diſgrace and trepidation, and fled; rejoicing, however, in their hearts, that they had been bold enough to incur theſe reproaches, and ſtand up ſo well in defence of the liberty of the church. While they were getting away, no one would caſt a favourable eye upon them but the earl of Leiceſter. He went to meet them, and when he was told what had happened, he fetched a deep ſigh: "In the faith I owe to God, I give you this as my firm advice—Caſt your whole thought upon God, and he will preſerve you—." And he added, "All things are to be loſt for God, and the liberty of the church;" and many other things of like ſort. Some other noble perſon ſaid to the monks, "Ye ought never to expect a ſhare in heaven, if ye ceaſe to maintain the liberties of your charters." Others were of the ſame opinion, and ſuggeſted it to the monks, but privately and ſecretly, out of fear for the conſequences. The archbiſhop, after a long conſultation with the biſhops, which was not over till night, was deliberating how, by ſeizing the monks and putting them to torture, he might break their ſpirits to compliance. The above ſpeech of the earl of Leiceſter ſhews how much he was attached to the cauſe of the church; and may juſtify an opinion, that the ſame diſpoſition had moved him to befriend the cauſe of Becket, and made Henry II. uniformly his enemy.

This earl ſoon after ſet out for Palæſtine, purſuant to his late vow. For the ſame ſort of pilgrimage the kings of France and England, and innumerable others of inferior quality, were buſily preparing. Had he lived to diſplay his pious valour againſt the enemies of the croſs, probably another hero had been added to the liſt of warriors who figured in the enſuing cruſade, but he was prevented by death.

Preparatory to his ſetting off on the journey to Jeruſalem, he cauſed enquiry to be made by all his tenants and officers, what rights and liberties the monks of Lira had in his foreſt of Breteuil[1]; whereby it being found that they ought to have the tithes of all the iſſues and revenues thereof, he confirmed them all; and gave his lordſhip of Edmetone to the canons of St. Fridiſwide in Oxford. At the requeſt of his counteſs, and the entreaty of William, Robert, and Roger, his ſons, as alſo at the deſire of Amicia counteſs of Montfort his daughter, he ratified alſo to the monks of St. Ebrulf the grants of all their lands given to them by Hugh de Grentemaiſnell, great grand-father to the ſaid Petronell, and by William Fitz-Oſbern, his own anceſtor[2]; and to the knights hoſpitallers, with the conſent of his ſons William and Robert, he gave the town and church of Brokeſburne, with all their appurtenances[3]. He did not long ſurvive theſe acts of bounty. Being taken ill during his paſſage to the Holy Land in the Mediterranean, he died on St. Giles's-day, September 1, 1190; and was buried at Duras in Greece, the ancient Dyrrachium[4].

His wife was named Petronilla, by Knighton affirmed to be the daughter of an Hugh de Grentemaiſnil. She was certainly great grand-daughter of the viſcount, or, according to ſome, earl Hugh de Grentemaiſnil, ſurnamed the Great; of whom we have given ſome account before, as alſo of his ſon Ivo, and of the manner in which he parted with his fief to the earl of Meulan. After Ivo's mortgage or forfeiture of his Engliſh honour, and Robert earl of Meulan's obtaining it by the help of king Henry I. together with the earldom of Leiceſter[5] (although it ſeems doubtful whether the earl of Meulan aſſumed that title), we hear but little more of Ivo: and not a word can I find of Hugh de Grentemaiſnil, who is ſaid by Knighton to be the father of Petronilla [1]. In the ſixth year of the reign of king John (i. e. circa annum 1204), Petronilla, counteſs of Leiceſter, ſtood charged in the court of Exchequer, for a very large fine, for obtaining the poſſeſſion of the honour of Grentemaiſnel, and the town of Leiceſter, with the appurtenances. The record runs thus:

---

[1] Ex Cod. MS. penès Andr. du Cheſne.

[2] See Appendix, N° VII.

[3] "Ex dono Roberti comitis Leiceſtriæ & Petronillæ comitiſſæ uxoris ſuæ, conceſſione Willielmi & Roberti filiorum ſuorum, villam de Brokeſburne, & eccleſiam ejuſdem villæ, cum omnibus pertinentiis ſuis." Mon. Angl. vol. II. p. 510.

[4] "Die Sancti Egidii obiit Robertus comes Leiceſtriæ, languore præventus in mari Mediterraneo, & apud Duraz Græciæ urbem ſepultus eſt." Chron. Mailros, p. 178. H. Knighton, col. 2346. Brompton, col. 1191, ſays he died in Romania.

[5] Ordericus.

"Petronilla comitiſſa Leiceſtrie debet MMM marcas pro habendo Leirceſtriam cum pertinentiis, cum feodis & dominiis omnibus, que pertinent ad honorem de Grentemaiſnel infra comitatum & extra, ſicut jus ſuum & hereditatem, ita quod regi remaneant omnes terre Normannorum que ſunt de eodem feodo [2], & quod domus de Withewick [3] committatur cui rex voluerit, qui fideliter de rege ſerviendo obſides dabit. Et predicta comitiſſa omnia predicta que rex ei reddidit tenebit, niſi per judicium curie regis diſſaiſietur. Preterea domus de Withewic commiſſa eſt Willielmo de Senevill; & ipſe Willielmus dabit Johannem filium & heredem ſuum in obſide, de fideliter ſerviendo; & Ricardum filium alium ſuum; ſed noluerit [4]."

Here Petronilla, wife as is ſaid of Robert ove Blanchmaines, earl of Leiceſter, and lord of the town of Leiceſter and its caſtle, debits a fine of 3000 marks to have Leiceſter, with the appurtenances, that is, probably the caſtle and its county or earldom (all which, I preſume, were feudal in the perſons of Hugh de Grentemaiſnil and his ſon Ivo), together with the demeſnes and tenements, i. e. knights fiefs, which conſtituted the honour or fief of Grentemaiſnil. The reader may remember that, according to Ordericus, Robert earl of Meulan did not acquire the honour of Grentemaiſnil by a clear or very honourable title. Was Petronilla the heireſs of this her great grandfather's fief? Did Robert Blanchmaines cure the defect of his title by an intermarriage with the true and lawful heir? Did himſelf, his father, and grandfather, hold this honour only by a mortgage title? Was the debt upon it liquidated by a long receipt of its revenue, and now de jure revertible to the true heir? Theſe are difficulties too ſtrong for me to explain. Of our earl's marriage, Henry de Knyghton, canon of the abbey de Pratis near Leiceſter, gives the following account: "He married Petronilla, daughter of Hugh Grantmenyl, with whom he had the whole honor of Hincleye, together with the ſeneſchalcy of England by gift of the ſaid Hugh." He means by this (for ſo he explains himſelf afterwards) that the honor of Hinckley was held by the ſergeancy of the ſtewardſhip of England; if ſo, it muſt have been by ſome grant of the crown poſterior to Domeſday; for at that time Hinckley was in the hands of the king, and had been the fief of earl Alberic, as we learn from Domeſday itſelf. If, therefore, the honour or fief of Hinckley belonged to the family of Grentemenyl, it muſt have been after the making of Domeſday. Again, it muſt have been before the time of Petronilla's father, for the printed documents of the abbey of Lyra ſhew, that Hinckley church, appendant undoubtedly to the ſeignory of Hinckley, had been given to that abbey long before. Therefore through Petronilla's father did not come the honour of Hinckley and the ſtewardſhip of England, as Knyghton reports, to earl Robert ove Blanchmaines. I ſuſpect, that, inſtead of Hinckley in the above paſſage, the true reading is Leiceſtrie; and that the author meant to ſay, that the fief of Grentemeſnel (i. e. the honour of Leiceſter), together with the ſeneſchalcy of England, its appendant, came to Robert ove Blanchmaines by Petronilla, heireſs of the houſe of Grentemenyl, which agrees with the record concerning the fine ſhe paſſed after the death of her ſon Robert Fitz-Parnell, and the unqueſtionable fact of her being great grand-daughter of Hugh the Great, lord of the honour of Leiceſter in the times of the Conqueror and Rufus.

By Petronilla, Robert Blanchmaines had four ſons and two daughters. The firſt of the former was named William de Britolio; the ſecond was our Robert, likewiſe ſurnamed de Britolio; the third Roger, who became biſhop elect of St. Andrew's, in Scotland; the fourth is mentioned, but I ſuppoſe erroneouſly, by the name of William, and founded at Leiceſter an hoſpital for Lepers, dedicated to St. Leonard [5].

From two of the ſons taking the name de Britolio, from the locality, we may ſuppoſe, of their birth, it may be inferred, that the earl and his counteſs reſided a good deal in their town of Briteuil in the life-time of his father Robert the high juſtice.

The counteſs Petronell, who ſurvived her huſband ſome years, and died April 1, 12.., gave to the abbey of Lira forty ſhillings rent out of her mills at Breteuil [6], for the performance of an anniverſary for William de Breteuil her ſon; but this donation probably became of no effect, by the deſtruction of Breteuil ſoon after.

She had in her life-time built the great nave of the abbey-church of St. Mary, de Pratis, at Leiceſter, and was buried in the choir of that church before the great altar. As a proof of her ingenuity, ſhe formed a rope, compoſed entirely of her own hair; and, to ſhew her affection for that church, ſhe appointed it to the purpoſe of ſuſtaining a lamp in the choir, and drawing it up [7].

The daughters of Robert and Petronilla were Amicia and Margaret. The latter became the wife of Seyer de Quinci, a great Engliſh baron; and the former married, A. D. 1165, into one of the moſt illuſtrious houſes of France, viz. that of Montfort l'Amauri. The name of her huſband was Simon II. ſurnamed the bald lord of Montfort and Eſpernon, and afterwards count of Rochfort and Evreux. In Dugdale's Monaſticon ſhe qualifies with the title of counteſs of Rochfort, and ſometimes is ſtyled lady of Montfort. This Simon the bald took the ſide of our Henry II. in his war with Philip Auguſtus, A. D. 1181, and put his fortreſſes of Rochfort, Montfort, Eſpernon, and others, which he had in France, into the hands of Henry II. and died that ſame year [8].

In the ſame year that Robert earl of Leiceſter left England, viz. 1189, his brother Roger, the chancellor and couſin of William king of Scots, was promoted to the ſee of St. Andrew in that kingdom [9]. This promotion was on the 13th of April at Perth. Ada counteſs of Warrenne, mother of this king of Scots, through whom our earl became the couſin of that king, died in 1178 [10].

---

[1] Knyghton.

[2] After the loſs of Normandy, in the early part of the reign of king John, the fiefs of knights, who had eſtates both in England and Normandy, were ſeized into the king's hands if the proprietors preferred the ligeance of the king of France to that of the king of England. But ſuch fiefs were only ſequeſtered, as their owners might be again in the ligeance of the king of England, if Normandy ſhould be recovered.

[3] Witewic, I ſuppoſe, was obtained by the earls of Leiceſter by ſeparate title, and made no part of the fief of Grentemaiſnel. She propoſes that the king ſhould appoint a cuſtos or guardian of it; which ſhews that there was now no earl of Leiceſter.

[4] Mag. Rot. 1205, 6 Joh. 17. b. Warw. & Leic. Madox, Hiſt. Excheq. 338.

[5] Dugd. Monaſticon; and Nichols's Hiſtory of Hinckley.

[6] Ib.

[7] "Comam capitis ſui ad modum funis compoſuit, & ad cordam unius lampadis in choro poſuit, unde more inſtrumenti cum eadem coma crinium ſubtrahendi ſurſumque levando diuturnus uſus dabatur." Knighton.

[8] P. Anſelme.

[9] Benedict. Abbas. He died 1202, and was buried in the church of St. Rule. Keith, Catalogue of Scotch Biſhops, p. 9.

[10] Chron. de Mailros.

Memoir of ROBERT de BRETEUIL, or FITZ-PARNEL, Earl of Leicester, 1190.

Breteuil ſeems to have given a ſurname to the deſcendants of Robert Boſſu [1], on account of his intermarriage with the heireſs of the honour of Breteuil in Normandy. We find the elder brother of Robert ove Blanchmaines called William de Bretolio in the documents of that family; Robert ove Blanchmaines is denoted by the ſame name in chronicles of that age: and Hoveden, the moſt copious hiſtorian of the period in queſtion, gives the ſame ſurname to the earl whoſe memoir we are now about to collect. This Robert de Breteuil, ſon of Robert ove Blanchmaines and Petronilla, obtained from his mother, heireſs, as it is ſaid, of the honour or fief of Grentemaiſnel, the additional ſurname of Robert Fitz-Parnel; by which patronymic he is uſually diſtinguiſhed. We ſcarcely ever find him but in the field of Mars. He was much in the company and ſervice of Richard Cœur de Leon, to whoſe perſon he ſeems to have been much attached, probably from an admiration of that prince's heroiſm, and a ſimilarity of diſpoſition. Fighting was the delight of Richard. He ſeemed to have ſcarcely any other paſſion or purſuit. He was the life and ſoul of chivalry. He courted danger, and ſought opponents in all places. Even in the painful ſuſpence of hoſtile conflict his amuſement was the image and diſcipline of war, and much too ſerious to be called a ſcholaſtic exerciſe. The tilt or haſtilude was the paſtime of his ſportive hours. In this the conflicts of rival knights of the ſame country, or, as it frequently happened, ſet combats of Engliſh and French, with national emulation added to perſonal, ended with broken bones, effuſion of blood, dreadful contuſions, and too frequently loſs of life itſelf.

Richard's pilgrimage to the Holy Land gave him copious opportunity of gratifying his love of fighting, and acquiring military glory. And ſo far as renown obtained in this way was the object of his wiſhes, he had reaſon to be ſatisfied; as not only all Chriſtendom, but even the Infidel hiſtorians, have celebrated his name [2]. Our earl was his companion in this theatre of his glory, and partook largely of his laurels. Between theſe great perſons there was the cloſeſt friendſhip: they vied with each other in martial atchievements, and relieved each other in the moſt dangerous combats. William du Barres, a French warrior, although of very inferior rank to the king of England, yet being conſidered as a man of the greateſt eminence in France in the combats both of battle and the tilt, was thought by king Richard to be a knight not unworthy of his arm [3]. While the Engliſh and French armies halted at Meſſina the beginning of February, 1191, a trifling accident brought on a very ſerious trial of ſkill between king Richard and this William de Barres [4].

One day after dinner the king of England, with a party of his nobles and many gentry, who were in the ſuite of the French king, and of that nation, met in their uſual manner without the city of Meſſina, and entertained themſelves with popular ſports. As they returned home, and were paſſing through the midſt of the city, they met a peaſant coming along with an horſe laden with reeds, which they called canes. The king of England and others began to ſnatch ſome of theſe reeds, and, at length, to fight for them with each other: and in this conflict the king and William du Barres came to a ſerious encounter. They broke their canes, and the king of England's cap received ſo hard a blow from du Barres, as to ſuſtain a fracture. King Richard, being highly incenſed at this preſumption, made a ſerious and fierce aſſault upon du Barres, and had very near unhorſed him, and brought both him and his deſtrer to the earth. In this attempt the king's ſaddle turned round, whereupon he diſmounted with the utmoſt celerity; and a freſh horſe, ſtronger than the former, being immediately offered him, he backed this horſe, and ruſhed again upon the French knight with a reſolution to overthrow him, if poſſible: but the Frenchman, holding cloſe to the neck of his deſtrer, kept his ſeat. The earl of Leiceſter had lately joined the king, and was near his perſon at this critical moment. Eager to aſſiſt his lord, the earl laid hold of du Barres: but king Richard ordered him to quit his graſp, and leave the French knight to him; and when the king and the latter had ſtruggled againſt each other a long time, and had vented the fouleſt reproaches [5], king Richard ſaid to him, "Flee hence, and beware of appearing before me henceforward; for I will never ceaſe to be an enemy both to thee and thine from the preſent time." William du Barres went away grieving, and much mortified at king Richard's diſpleaſure. He loſt no time in relating the affair to the French king, whoſe aſſiſtance he craved on the preſent occaſion. The next day king Philip repaired to king Richard, and beſought his forgiveneſs of du Barres; but king Richard remained inflexible, and ſpurned his requeſt. The day after came to him the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the duke of Burgundy, the Count de Nevers, and many of the chief nobles of France, and upon their knees requeſted him to extend his peace to du Barres, and ſhew him pity. But Richard remained implacable. On the third day, therefore, du Barres retired from Meſſina: for the king of France would not permit him to ſtay againſt the inclination of king Richard. Thus the affair ſtood for a good while: but when the time of embarking approached, the king of France, and all the archbiſhops and biſhops, and earls and barons, and chief men of the whole army of croiſſes, came in a body, and interceded ſtrongly for the French chevalier, repreſenting the many evil conſequences and heavy damage that would attend the loſing of ſo able and valiant a knight as the brave du Barres. Their importunities at length prevailed upon Richard to allow him to rejoin the croiſſes, and to promiſe that he would do him no harm ſo long as they were both in the ſervice of their lord the king of France. Richard then made the king of France and his friends a preſent of many ſhips; and diſtributed his money with ſo laviſh an hand to his own knights, as to cauſe it to be ſaid, that no one of his predeceſſors had ever given ſo much in a whole year as Richard now did in one month. The earl of Leiceſter partook probably of his bounty. He had joined him at Meſſina; and the day before this combat with du Barres, this king had girded him with the ſword of the earldom of Leiceſter, as the heir of his father the late earl.

Before king Richard left Meſſina, his mother Alianor, the queen dowager, arrived in Sicily, and brought with her, as a wife for Richard, Berengaria, daughter of Sanctius king of Navarre, a lady much approved of both by Richard and the queen mother. It was, however, a meaſure highly offenſive to king Philip, who ſaw in it the irreparable diſgrace of his ſiſter Adelais. "The king of England," ſaid he, "has been lately ſeeking occaſions for breaking with me, and has publiſhed many falſehoods. I know very well the drift of all this; namely, that he may abandon my ſiſter, whom he is bound by oath to take to be his wife. But be he aſſured, that if he do deſert her, and marry another, I will be an enemy to him and his to the end of my life." When theſe declarations were carried to Richard, he ſent word to the French king, "that to take his ſiſter to be his wife was utterly out of his power; for that king Henry, his late father, had not only known her, but even had had a ſon by her:" and, in proof of his aſſertion, he produced many and ſufficient witneſſes: which at length ſo fully ſatisfied king Philip, that he purſued the point no further, and allowed Richard to marry Berengaria, whom the queen-dowager had been at the trouble of fetching from the court of Navarre, and conducting in her own ſuite to Meſſina. This may be deemed a remarkable inſtance of Alianor's activity and parental attachment and aſſiduity.

---

[1] Hoveden, Monaſt. Lelandi Collect.

[2] Scultens, in vitâ Saladini.

[3] Hoveden, p. 687.

[4] Galei Scriptores in iter regis Richardi.

[5] The Frenchman called Richard ſon of a whore. Such ſort of language was the uſual whet in the battles between the French and Engliſh knights of that time, the age of Chivalry.

Richard and Berengaria ſoon afterwards received the nuptial bleſſing in the iſland of Cyprus. In the ſubſequent adventures of king Richard, particularly in the conqueſt of Cyprus, our earl of Leiceſter may be ſuppoſed to have had a large ſhare, and upon many occaſions ſhewed himſelf a right valiant knight.

He accompanied his royal friend to the ſiege of Achon, which, after a blockade of two winters and one ſummer, yielded to the victorious arms of Richard Cœur de Leon [1], whoſe heroic behaviour, according to the accounts given of this brilliant cruſade, beggared all deſcription. After the taking of Achon, the croiſſes, in firm phalanx, made towards Aſur; nothing could ſurpaſs the ſkill ſhewed by Cœur de Leon in the diſpoſition of his army during this march. He wiſhed for the preſent to avoid an action; but found it difficult to do it. The Turks were infinitely ſuperior in number, and followed the Chriſtians in the rear, ſending among them ſhowers of arrows; which, however, did but little miſchief; for the Chriſtians were ſo well armed, and marched in ſuch cloſe array, that, had an apple dropped from over them, it muſt have fallen upon ſome of them before it reached the ground. Being galled by this immenſe body of Turks in their rear, the Chriſtians loſt their patience, and became eager for battle, which was at length committed. The earl of Leiceſter, at the head of his corps, ſignalized himſelf in a remarkable manner. As the action began in the rear of the croiſſes, it put the whole army under the neceſſity of new evolutions to enable them to engage. But at length Cœur de Leon, haſtening to the front of his troops, and then plunging into the midſt of the Turks, mowed them down in multitudes before and beſide him with his broad ſword: they were now ſtruck with conſternation; and finding that the ſame ſpirit which animated the Chriſtian leader animated likewiſe his whole army, they gave way on all ſides, and allowed the Chriſtians a greater triumph than they had ever experienced before ſince the commencement of cruſades. The Turks loſt upon this occaſion thirty-two admirals, ſo were called their men of the greateſt renown and diſtinction, and ſeven thouſand carcaſes were found in the field, beſides the wounded, whoſe number was very great.

In thoſe famous campaigns it was not uncommon for ſmall parties, Turks and Chriſtians, to fall-in with each other, while they were ſeverally detached from the main force, for the purpoſe of foraging, or upon other accounts. An adventure of this ſort happened to our earls on the ſixth day of November, anno 1190. While the Chriſtians were encamped between the little forts of de Planis and de Macy, and the Turks were at Rama, not far diſtant, certain grooms and other officers of the Chriſtians went out upon a foraging party, in queſt of graſs for their horſes, and fodder for their cattle. Some Knight-templars marched before to guard them. Theſe excurſions were very dangerous; and, unleſs great care was taken, hardly failed of being deſtructive. The Templars were thus employed in guarding this party, when, lo, they were aſſailed by a body of four thouſand Turkiſh horſe, divided into four ſquadrons, and in very good order for attack. They preſently ſurrounded the Templars, and had no thoughts but of killing them, or making them priſoners; and they were the more formidable, as they continued to be reinforced with other Turks. The Templars, ſeeing that nothing could ſave them but the moſt deſperate valour, alighted from their horſes, and, placing themſelves back to back, faced their enemies on all ſides, and began to defend themſelves with wonderful ſpirit. The Turks ruſhing in killed three of the Templars immediately; the action ſoon became very ſharp; the ſtrokes fell very thick and heavy; the helmets tingled with the blows of the combatants; ſparks were elicited: the arms cracked; the voices reſounded; the Turks attack manfully: at length the Turks multiply to a great degree, and advance to ſeize the Templars, who ſeem to be worn down and quite exhauſted; when, lo, Andrew de Chamgin puſhed on with great impetuoſity, and came to their relief with fifteen knights companions, and delivered the Templars out of the hands of their enemies. The ſame Andrew and his comrades acquitted themſelves moſt nobly in attacking and driving off the Turks. Still the number of the latter increaſed—they now flee, and now advance; and the battle is renewed. In the mean while, king Richard, who was cloſely attending the repair of Fort Maen, being alarmed with the cry of the people who were fighting, ordered the two earls of St. Paul and Leiceſter to ride up to the Templars, and give them ſeaſonable relief. With them he ſent William de Cagen and Otho de Praſinges, who, advancing to the place, heard the grooms calling out for help in behalf of the Templars. The king told the earls to get ready and ſet out immediately: in the mean while he himſelf ran to get on his armour; after which he followed them full-ſpeed. The earls mounted their deſtrers as faſt as poſſible, and ſet out: but in the way a party of Turks, ſtarting from the river, where they had lain in ambuſh, ſuddenly beſet them, and formed into four diviſions [2], each conſiſting of one thouſand men; the whole again formed two bodies of equal number, whereof half went againſt the Templars, and half againſt the two earls and their party; which when the earls ſaw, they put their troops in order of battle, and prepared for action. While they were in this ſituation, the earl of St. Paul made the following propoſal to the earl of Leiceſter; viz. "That he ſhould engage the enemy, and that the earl of Leiceſter ſhould keep apart, and watch the iſſue, in readineſs to lend his aſſiſtance when he ſaw it wanting; or that the earl of Leiceſter ſhould engage, and he the earl of St. Paul ſhould ſtand aſide, and help the earl of Leiceſter when there was occaſion." The earl of Leiceſter deſired to take the fighting part of the alternative, not being willing to look idly on. Being ſeparated, therefore, with his ſuite, he plunged with great ardour among the Turks, chuſing the ſpot where they were moſt crowded, and ſnatched out of their hands two knights whom they had taken; and he fought with ſo much valour and alacrity, overturning theſe, and ſlaſhing others, that from this day's prowеſs he obtained a great augmentation of fame. The engagement now became general, and was waxing very fierce, when king Richard himſelf came up, and took a part in it. People about him, ſeeing how very ſmall his band was in compariſon of the enemy, were in great alarm for him, and urged him not to venture himſelf upon ſuch unequal terms; and repreſented, that it were much better that thoſe who were now encountering the Turks under ſuch manifeſt diſadvantage ſhould periſh, than that he ſhould be expoſed to extreme danger, who was the life and ſoul of the great cauſe wherein they were all engaged. This perſuaſive was not at all reliſhed by Richard; he glowed with anger at hearing it; and anſwered, "When I ſend my friends into battle, with a promiſe of going to their aſſiſtance, and let them periſh for the want of that aſſiſtance which was promiſed them, and in which they truſted, I will renounce the name of king for ever;" and, without ſaying more, he put ſpurs to his horſe, and ruſhed among the thickeſt of the foe, with an ardour like madneſs, clearing and diſperſing all he met with; and then returned, widening as he paſſed the opening he had made in his aſſault. Thus he traverſed the ranks of the aſtoniſhed Turks, brandiſhing his ſhining blade, and going backwards and forwards till the way was cleared of all but the wounded and the ſlain. This victory of Richard was deemed by his people the more glorious, as he had in this action not received the leaſt help from the French.

It happened, on another occaſion, that the noble earl of Leiceſter, at the head of a very ſmall party, put to flight a large body of Turks, who, confiding in their numbers, conſidered the earl as their certain prey. In their flight the Turks were followed too far by three of the earl's knights, whom the Turks ſeized, and were about to carry off. The earl, hearing of their ſituation, was eager to reſcue them, and immediately impelled his horſe among a corps of the Turks, more than an hundred in number, to extricate his knights. And, lo, while he purſued the Turks beyond a certain river, a body of that people, amounting to about four hundred, ſuddenly came upon him ſideways. They concluded, that he and his little party could not poſſibly get back to the main army, from which they were thus ſeparated, and therefore conſidered them as good as taken. Warin Fitz-Gerald being hurled from his horſe, they beat him with clubs tipped with iron: then was there a ſharp encounter; many lances were ſhivered, and made an harſh noiſe as they broke; the ſwords tingled as they ſtruck againſt the helmets; the ſtrokes, dealt reciprocally, reſound; and, lo, not long after, Drogo de Fontinello Putrell and alſo Robert Fitz-Nigel are unhorſed. So large a multitude of Turks and Perſians ruſhed upon the earl himſelf, in hopes of taking him, that at length, after being dreadfully bruiſed, he was thrown from his horſe, and in great danger of being drowned in the adjoining river; but he ſtill brandiſhed his ſword, being ſenſible how ſtrenuouſly he muſt now exert himſelf; and therefore redoubled his ſtrokes upon the Turks who annoyed him. In the inſtant came to his aid Henry Fitz-Nicholas; and the ever-to-be celebrated Robert de Newburg, whoſe noble liberality has made his name eternal, ſeeing the diſaſtrous ſtate of the earl, how he laboured in doubtful conflict amidſt ſo many enemies, propoſed to diſmount, and help the earl upon his own deſtrer, preferring the earl's life to his own. Rare inſtance of philanthropy and friendſhip! Thus did Robert de Newburg preſerve the earl's life; nor did he, as it happened, loſe his own. Beſides theſe, the earl had with him Ralph de Saint Maur, and Arnold de Boſco, Henry de Mailoc, William and Saul de Bruil; but what were theſe among ſo many? However, they defended him with great courage for a good while; but the virtue of a few did not ſuffice againſt enemies out of number: for as ſoon as one ſet of Turks were tired, they were replaced by a freſh one; and the earl and his companions were ſo ſharply mauled and harraſſed, that the weight of the conflict became inſupportable; laying their heads therefore upon their horſes' necks, they ſuffered the blows of the Turks without reſiſtance or motion; and in this ſtate of inſenſibility were carried captive towards Darum. "Oh" (cries my author) "how good is it to hope in the Lord! for He, who watches over Iſrael, does not ſleep, nor ſuffer any one to be tempted beyond his ability to bear." Theſe deeds being told in the army of the Chriſtians, certain knights inſtantly arm, and go forth towards Darum: with redoubled fury they attack the Turks, diſperſe, and mangle them. Of this party the moſt diſtinguiſhed were Andrew de Chamgin, Henry de Gray, Peter de Prael, and ſome others. Our warriors engage the Turks; each ſingly the others ſingly, as they came in each other's way. Peter de Prael encountered a Turk of ſo firm and ſtubborn a courage, that Peter and all his party were not able to make him their priſoner; they could only conquer him by taking away his life. The admiral alſo, whom fortune threw in his way, Andrew de Chamgin run through the body with his lance; and after inflicting the deadly wound, he puſhed him from his horſe, and thus put a ſtop to his commanding of armies: but the ſame Turk perforated the arm of Andrew with his ſpear made of cane. Irritated by the miſhap of their admiral, the Turks rallied and fought with moſt determined valour. The Chriſtians, exhauſted by the length and ſharpneſs of the conflict, were in danger of being overpowered, when they were fortunately reinforced. This ſeaſonable aid enabled them to recover their breath and ſtrength, and both bodies ruſhing furiouſly upon the Turks at the ſame time checked the latter, and again turned the ſcale in favour of the Chriſtians. In this battle the earl of Leiceſter bore a very diſtinguiſhed part. He ſtood the aſſaults of the enemy with great firmneſs, and aſſaulted them with equal, if not ſuperior vehemence. He was overthrown by the Turks; and, in his turn, overthrew them. He hewed off many of their heads at a ſingle ſtroke; and two horſes were ſlain under him. It was the report of that time, that the age had not ſeen ſo many brave exploits performed by ſo little a man as he was: the band of knights, which was ſent to ſupport him, and aſſiſted in putting the Turks to the rout, was ſo ſkilled in war, and ſtood in ſuch firm array, that not one of them fell in the whole action: and after they had put the enemy to flight, they continued the purſuit as long as their ſtrength laſted; and then rejoined the main army.

---

[1] Richardi iter Hieroſolym. apud Galeum.

[2] So my author.

Another time, while king Richard lay incamped in Galicia, our earl had an opportunity of ſhewing his valour, and gratifying his holy zeal in the ſlaughter of Infidels. Advice was brought to the king, that certain caravans belonging to the Turks were paſſing through the country, and that one in particular was in a ſituation very convenient for attack. Cœur de Leon was diſpoſed to intercept this caravan; and, for this purpoſe, made a ſecret march towards it; but his intention being diſcovered by the Turks, they ſtopped the caravan, and formed themſelves in order of battle upon an eminence, from whence they thought they could fight to moſt advantage. Richard had directed an advanced party to hold them in action till he came up. Upon theſe the Turks diſcharged ſuch a volley of darts and javelins, that it might be compared for the thickneſs to a ſhower of dew covering the face of the earth. But Richard coming up with his ſuite, and attacking them with his uſual vehemence, felled ſome, and diſperſed others, and at length drove the remainder before him, who fled with the utmoſt trepidation, like hunted hares. But many of the Turks, in their eagerneſs to eſcape, ſlipt off ſideways, while Richard, on his deſtrer, puſhed ſtraight forward. The purſuit was continued ſo far, that the lateral fugitives, thinking themſelves out of the reach of the Chriſtian prince, took the reſolution to rally, and attack parties of Chriſtians leſs formidable than their chief. About thirty Turks therefore rallying, and facing about, made a furious onſet on Roger de Tooney, one of the moſt eminent barons of Normandy; they killed his horſe, and were near making him captive: a friend of his ruſhed in to ſave him, but he in his turn was likewiſe hurled from his horſe; and, inſtead of ſaving de Tooney, owed his own deliverance to that valiant Norman, who was able both to defend himſelf and his friend. In the mean while other Chriſtians came up, among which the moſt diſtinguiſhed was the earl of Leiceſter, who felled the enemy on the right and left. The battle was now renewed; the air thundered with the craſh of arms, and gleamed with the lightning of ſwords; the ground ran with blood; arms claſhing againſt arms made the welkin ring; carcaſes deſtitute of limbs were ſtrewed over the ground; and arms, hands, feet, and heads, hewed off from carcaſes, and making promiſcuous carnage, exhibited a moſt ſhocking ſpectacle. The bodies and limbs of the Turks lay ſo thick, that the Chriſtians ſtumbled over them, and could hardly get forward. What were left of the Turks were ſo ſpent, that a child might have killed them at pleaſure: in this ſituation they implored the mercy of their conquerors, and ſubmitted at diſcretion.

On another occaſion, king Richard, while himſelf in the heat of action, ſaw at ſome diſtance the noble earl of Leiceſter caſt from his deſtrer in the middle of an encounter, while the earl was fighting right manfully; Richard flew like lightning to his aid, and reſcued him, and aſſiſted in helping him upon his deſtrer. Here the battle again was exceedingly ſharp, and terminated, as uſual, to the honour of king Richard, the advantage of the croiſſes, and the diſgrace and damage of the Infidels.

That age furniſhed no example of heroiſm ſo ſplendid as that of Cœur de Leon. His generalſhip, in all the operations of the war, was not exceeded even by his courage; and the latter ſurpaſſed even what theory had delineated. And although his courage ſeemed to act in defiance of diſcretion, yet it was ſo much under its guidance, that he never attempted what he did not accompliſh. His liberality and honourable conduct made him the darling of the croiſſes, as much as his heroiſm and military ſkill rendered him the object of their admiration. If Paleſtine could have been regained, it muſt have been done by ſuch a genius as that of Cœur de Leon. And probably his expedition would have been ſoon crowned by the capture of Jeruſalem; a conqueſt which the croiſſes ſeemed as much to long for as even for heaven itſelf; if, inſtead of finding the king of France a friend and ally, he had not found him a baſe deſerter of his cauſe, and a betrayer of his unqueſtionable rights. The French king deſerted the Engliſh and French croiſſes before he had done any thing glorious to himſelf, or ſerviceable to the cruſade; and left Richard, with forces far inadequate to the occaſion, to manage the war as he could: while he was intent on taking advantage of king Richard's abſence to deſpoil him of his dominions.

Richard's captivity is told in every Engliſh hiſtory, and therefore need not be related in this memoir.

"In the year of grace 1193, which was the 4th of Richard, Philip king of France was much diſtreſſed about his ſiſter Adelais, who had been ſent into Normandy after the death of Henry II. The king of France demanded her of the ſeneſchal of Normandy; but the latter refuſed to releaſe her, which highly offended Philip. About the ſame time commenced a confederacy between this king and earl John, king Richard's brother: Philip frequently ſent his envoys to John, who was in England; repreſenting to him, that his brother king Richard was held in captivity, and that he never would be releaſed by the emperor of Almaigne; adding, 'that if earl John would hearken to his advice, and comply with his inclination, he would give him his ſiſter Adelais to wife, and render to him Normandy, and Aquitain, and Anjou, and all the other tranſmarine dominions, which king Henry his father had ever enjoyed; and alſo that he would acquire for him the realm of England.' Earl John, as ſoon as Chriſtmas was over, went over to Normandy. On his arrival there, the ſeneſchal of Normandy and other lieges of the king of England met him, and deſired that he would go with them to a parliament in Alençon, to treat with the grandees about the affairs of king Richard and his liberation. He told them in anſwer, "If ye will receive me as lord, and will ſwear fealty to me, I will go with you, and I will be your defender with the king of France: but otherwiſe I will not go with you." The nobles of Normandy, hearing this, refuſed to obey him, or to ſwear fealty to him, hoping that their lord the king of England, by the help of God, would return ſafe and ſound. John, the king's brother, then went to the king of France, and became his ſworn vaſſal for Normandy, and the other foreign dominions of his brother Richard, and alſo for England, as was reported: and he ſware, that he would take Adelais to wife; and he quit-claimed to the king of France for ever Giſors, and the whole Norman Vexin. And the king of France granted him, with his ſaid ſiſter, that part of Flanders which was held of him; and he ſware, "that he would help him to the utmoſt of his power to acquire England, and all the other dominions of the king his brother." Then the earl of Mortagne returned to England, bringing with him many foreigners; and immediately were ſurrendered to him the caſtles of Wallingford and Windſor. He afterwards went to London, where he demanded of the archbiſhop of Rouen, the regent or high juſtice, and the juſtices his colleagues, to deliver up the realm to him; and that the libres homes of the realm ſhould ſwear ligeance to him; affirming, that the king of England his brother was dead; but they did not believe it. The earl, therefore, being thus rebuffed by the juſtices and other magiſtrates of the realm, retired; and, boiling with rage, fortified his caſtles and ſtrong towns, and attacked the lands of his brother in an hoſtile manner. Many therefore flocked to him, deceiving themſelves, who, by juſt judgement of God, being ſcourged, loſt all they had. For the juſtices of England, and the lieges of the lord king, manfully reſiſted the aforeſaid earl of Mortagne, and did him great damage; and they ſtrengthened the ſea-ports with wardens, and ſo well guarded the coaſts, that neither the French, nor Flemins, nor other foreigners, who ſided with earl John, and promiſed him aid, had the courage to put to ſea, except ſome few, who, having the temerity to land in England, were ſoon taken and put in irons. In the mean while, the king of France, unmindful of the oath he had taken to king Richard, when he left him in the Holy Land, to keep the peace between them inviolable, haſtily entered Normandy, burnt the demeſne lands of king Richard, and carried off a great deal of ſpoil. But Robert earl of Leiceſter, who had lately returned from Paleſtine, and the other magnates of Normandy, manfully reſiſted him[1]."

King Richard arrived at Sandwich on the 13th of March, 1194, after an abſence from England of three years and three months, of which one whole year and ſix weeks were paſſed in captivity. On his return to England, he ſoon put an end to the diſorders which his brother earl John had excited there during Richard's captivity and abſence. This king was ſo little in England, and took ſo ſmall a perſonal ſhare in the adminiſtration of his realm, that his people could hardly judge of him but by report. When Philip of France heard of his liberation, he exclaimed, "then the devil is let looſe upon the earth again." The compariſon is in ſome degree juſtified; for although this prince ſeems in ſome reſpects to have had generous ſentiments, yet he was ſo prone to take offence, and ſo violent in his reſentment, that there could be no permanent quiet or ſafety within the ſphere of his activity. He ſeems to have allowed himſelf no leiſure from his purſuit of arms to attend at all to the buſineſs of civil government; which was left chiefly, if not wholly, to ſubſtitutes. Fortunately for him, the principal part of theſe, particularly the archbiſhops of Canterbury and Rouen, diſcharged their difficult truſts ſo much to his and their own honour, that not only the kingdom was preſerved from the evil deſigns of earl John, but the character of Richard himſelf continued in great eſtimation throughout the realm; which enabled him to eſtabliſh his authority from one end of it to the other in a few weeks of reſidence here in the ſpring of the year 1194. In the beginning of May he embarked for Normandy, where Philip and earl John had kindled univerſal diſcord. But theſe commotions were ſoon mitigated by the king's preſence in thoſe parts. The king of France betrayed ſymptoms of fear, and abated his violence; and earl John craved his brother's forgiveneſs, which was procured at the interceſſion of their mother the queen dowager. The earl of Leiceſter had ſhewed himſelf a warm and able friend of king Richard in this war of Philip's; but in the courſe of the ſummer of 1194 had the misfortune to become the latter's priſoner. This king had invaded Normandy, and marched within four miles of Rouen, in which city were the earls of Mortagne and Leiceſter, with many other barons of the ſame party. The two earls, not thinking themſelves a match for Philip, and for want of a perſon of ſufficient dignity to take the command on the preſent occaſion, declined to infeſt him; which encouraged Philip to proceed ſo near to the capital of Normandy, where he took the caſtle of Fontaines, a place of no great ſtrength. After this exploit Philip retreated, and was returning towards France; in which ſituation he was thought by our earl to expoſe himſelf to his attack. But the ſcheme miſcarried; and he himſelf, who hoped to intrap the French king, was intrapped[2] by the other and taken. This was a ſevere blow upon the Engliſh earl; for there was no likelihood of recovering his liberty but by a very heavy fine.

---

[1] Hoveden.

[2] The chronicle of Mailros relates his capture thus: "Rex Gallorum Philippus Rothomago cum xx tantum equitibus Robertum comitem Leiceſtriæ pueriliter egreſſum in Sylva leonis circa feſtum Sancti Botolphi cepit, & apud Eſtampes incarceravit."

The next year, probably towards the beginning of it, a negotiation was ſet on foot for the earl's ranſom; who, to obtain this favour, offered to the king of France a thouſand pounds of ſterlings, and to quit-claim to him for ever, from himſelf and his heirs, the caſtle of Pacy, with all its appurtenances, and to procure for him in that behalf the confirmation of the lord pope, and the confirmation of the king of England[1]: but as the war between the kings of England and France was not yet concluded, Philip reſpited the acceptance of the earl of Leiceſter's propoſal. In the beginning of the year 1196, the differences between the two kings were adjuſted for the preſent by a ſhort truce; and thereupon the earl was delivered from his captivity, upon paying to Philip the ſum of two thouſand marks of ſilver[2], and ſurrendering for ever to him his caſtle of Pacy. At the expiration of the truce the next year, viz. 1188, the war between the two kings raged with more fury than before. The earl of Leiceſter ſeized the opportunity of making a ſtrong effort for the recovery of his caſtle of Pacy. He came before it with forty knights and a ſmall corps of eſquires; and the knights of the caſtle ſallied out of the caſtle with a large corps of eſquires, and the community of the town, and came up with the earl and his forces; but finding himſelf not able to encounter ſo ſuperior a force, he retreated, but made his eſcape with difficulty, and not without the loſs of four of his knights. But the next day, being reinforced with many knights out of the king's family (ſo was called his perſonal guard), he came before Pacy, having diſpoſed before-hand many of his knights and eſquires, ſo as to catch, as he thought, the men of the caſtle. But when the knights of the caſtle, who had driven him out of the field the day before, ſaw him, they ruſhed out with impetuoſity, and he fled before the reſt, till the enemy were got into the ambuſh, and there were taken of them eighteen knights and a vaſt quantity of plebeians.

King Richard Cœur de Leon died April 6, 1199, in conſequence of a wound he received at the ſiege of the caſtle of Chalus near Limoges. Our earl ſerved him with uniform zeal and fidelity, and ſeems to have enjoyed his uninterrupted friendſhip. Richard, during his reign of above nine years, was only twice in England; the firſt time, from the 18th of Auguſt, 1189, to the 11th of December the ſame year; and the ſecond, from the 13th of March, anno 1194, to the 12th of May of the ſame year. It is likely that the attendance of the earl of Leiceſter upon the king, firſt in his cruſade, and afterwards in his French war, hindered him from being much, if at all, in England, during the reign of king Richard. We find him, however, at the coronation of John ſans terre; to which were bidden ſuch as ought to be there, as the hiſtory under the name of Matthew Paris remarks[3]. And although, in the ſhort accounts of that affair, we do not find it expreſsly ſaid, that he officiated as hereditary ſeneſchal of England, yet we may ſuppoſe he did ſo, becauſe ſucceeding earls of Leiceſter enjoyed that office as an appendage to the earldom of Leiceſter, while it was held by the earls of the family of Beaumont or Breteuil.

Every reader of the Engliſh hiſtory, eſpecially ſuch as have entertained a predilection for indefeaſible right of inheritance reſpecting the crown of England (which they think to have been the law of the conſtitution coeval with the monarchy), feel embarraſſed at an example ſo contrary to their ideas of juſt title, which preſented itſelf to their obſervation, when John earl of Mortagne was made king, as ſucceſſor of his brother king Richard I. to the excluſion of Arthur duke of Bretagne, ſon of John's elder brother Geoffry.

This ſeems to be no improper place to ſtate the circumſtances of this curious affair, and illuſtrate it by a few remarks.

Geoffry, duke of Bretagne and earl of Richmond, died the 19th of Auguſt, anno 1186. By Conſtance of Bretagne he had a ſon and a daughter; the former was a poſthumous child, named Arthur, and born anno 1187. Richard Cœur de Leon intended this Arthur to be the heir of his realm and foreign dominions, and ſo declared him (probably in the council of the realm, and with their concurrence) before he commenced his voyage to the holy land in the year 1189. And he declares and confirms this act of ſettlement in his treaty with Tancred king of Sicily, in November, 1190, and in his ſolemn and written declarations made about the ſame time to the holy ſee. But, notwithſtanding theſe proceedings in favour of Arthur, in the courſe of the next year, the regents, ſtyled the juſtices of England and the common council of the realm, the latter being compoſed of biſhops, earls, barons of England, and the citizens of London (having previouſly ſworn fealty to king Richard and his heir), ſwore to receive for their king, if Richard died without heir of his body, his brother John earl of Mortagne. And they ſware fealty to John againſt all men, as their future king, under the limitation here expreſſed. This act of ſtate, done in London in the abſence of the reigning king, ſeems to have been by order of the latter; for the regents had juſt come from king Richard, and, with a commiſſion of their appointment, brought with them powers of great extent, in order to fix the internal quiet of England upon a firm footing, and were beſides zealouſly attached to his intereſt; which makes it utterly improbable they ſhould convene the common council of the realm, and, with the concurrence of that council, decree John to be the preſumptive heir of Richard, but with his privity and direction. And this ſuppoſition is favoured by the hiſtorian's mode of ſpeaking; which implies rather the aſſent of the regents and common council to ſome thing propoſed, or aſked of them, than a proceeding of their own invention[4].

For what reaſon the king changed his intention with reſpect to duke Arthur, and why a ſettlement ſo ſolemnly, and, one might think, ſo properly and conſtitutionally made, was totally ſuperſeded is not recorded. Arthur's youth forbids all ſuſpicion of crime or offenſive behaviour, which could occaſion king Richard's diſpleaſure. Nor, again, can the acts either of this king, or his regents, or common council of the realm, be aſcribed to Richard's partiality for John, or to the latter's overgrown power or popularity: for in theſe reſpects this earl was under every diſadvantage. Richard, however, perſevered in ſecuring the crown for him without any intimation of evil or irregular intention to the end of his life. And when he ſaw his diſſolution certain and near, he deviſed the kingdom of England, as alſo all his other dominions, to his brother John; and cauſed all his nobles and officers who were about him to ſwear fealty to John; and commanded they ſhould deliver to him his caſtles, and three parts of his treaſure[5].

---

[1] Hoveden.

[2] A mark of ſilver 13*s.* 6*d.* ſterling, as counted by Engliſh pennies or ſterlings.

[3] I ſuppoſe he means the clergy and laity, who were to chuſe the king, and aſſiſt at the coronation. See coronation of Richard I. Diceto, ſpeaking of that coronation, ſays, "that queen Alianor was ſolicitous to aſſemble the earls, barons, and ſhire-reeves." We find the ſhire-reeves and aldermen, members of the great council by ſpecial ſummons, at the council of Clarendon, anno 1164. The orders enumerated by Hoveden at the coronation of Richard I. by whoſe counſel and aſſent Richard duke of Normandy was conſecrated and crowned king of England, were archbiſhops, biſhops, earls, barons, and copioſa militum multitudo. Hoveden. The nobleſſe, who compoſed the baronage of the realm, conſiſted of earls, barons, viſcounts, knights, and eſquires, who all held lands and tenements, whether earldoms, ſheriffries de feodo, baronies, and knights' fiefs, of the king in capite by barony or by knights ſervice. All had a right to be of the common council of the realm when their rights were concerned in the buſineſs of it; and their right was reſtored, and ſolemnly recognized by the great charter of king John, c. 14. Theſe were the libres homes of the king, and muſt be diſtinguiſhed from the libres homes, or knights and eſquires, or freemen of theſe vaſſals of the crown. Theſe two orders of freemen, i. e. one holding of the crown, and the other of crown-vaſſals, compoſed the whole body of freemen, except what were in the commune of the cities and burgs.

[4] Hoveden.

[5] Ibid.

In the hiſtory which bears the name of Matthew Paris, although this part of it was written by an earlier hiſtorian, we have the following very curious account of the manner of John's being made king of England. I find no other coeval and detailed narration of this tranſaction.

" About this time John duke of Normandy ſailed to England, and landed at Sorham the 8th of the kalends of June [i. e. 25 May]; and on the morrow, being the vigil of our Lord's Aſcenſion, came to London, in order to be crowned there. On his arrival, therefore, the archbiſhops, biſhops, earls, barons, and all others whom it concerned to be preſent at this coronation, having been previouſly gathered together, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſtanding in the middle of them all, addreſſed them as follows: " May your wiſdom know, that no perſon has a right to ſucceed to this realm, by any previous colour of qualification or claim, nor can he have any juſt pretenſions thereto, unleſs he be, by the univerſity of the realm unanimouſly, after invocation of the Holy Spirit, and according to his perſonal merit, previouſly elected after the example and ſimilitude of Saul, the firſt anointed king, whom the Lord put over his people—not the ſon of a king, nor ſprung from royal race: in like manner after Saul, David ſon of Jeſſe; the firſt, being brave and fit for the royal dignity; the ſecond, being an holy and humble man: that ſo he, who was ſuperior to all others in excellence of ſpirit, might be ſuperior in power and authority. But if any one, being of the ſtock of the deceaſed king, ſhould be ſuperior to others, a more ready and forward aſſent ſhould be given in electing him. Theſe things we ſpeak in favour of the famous earl John, who is here, brother of our late illuſtrious king Richard (who was deſtitute of an heir of his body), who is wiſe and brave, and unqueſtionably noble, whom we, with previous invocation of the grace of God, on account of his merits and royal blood, unanimouſly elect to be our king."

" This archbiſhop," continues the hiſtorian, " was a perſonage of deep reſearch among all the grandees of the realm, a pillar of ſtrength, and incomparable wiſdom. Nor did any preſume to queſtion any part of what he had ſaid; being confident he had not ſo ſtated the matter but with good cauſe. Earl John, and all others, acquieſced to what had been ſuggeſted: and, electing and taking the earl for their king, ſhout " Live the king! live the king!"

" Archbiſhop Hubert," adds the hiſtorian, " being aſked afterwards why he had ſpoken as he had done, replied, " that he had ſpoken by a kind of preſentiment of what would happen; for that he was taught and aſſured, by certain oracles, that this John would ſome time or other corrupt the government and crown of England, and throw them into confuſion. And, that he might not have unlimited ſcope for miſchief, he had affirmed, that he ought to be elected, not on the ground of ſucceſſion, but of mere choice."

This ſtory was probably a fiction broached amidſt John's turmoils with his clergy and nobles; as it is not ſuppoſeable he would hold a language ſo repugnant to what he had ſolemnly, and with ſuch high commendation for wiſdom, uttered before. He died in the ſummer of 1105; that is, before the troubles of John's reign began; conſequently he could ſpeak with no alluſion to them, unleſs he was really inſpired—a ſuppoſition which is utterly inadmiſſible; nor is it much leſs ſo, that he ſhould pretend to it.

Through the troubles wherein Robert Blanchmaines, the father of our preſent earl Robert Fitz-Parnel, had been involved, the cruſade of this laſt earl, which kinds of expeditions were wont in that age to be attended with ruinous expence, and the loſs of his honour and town of Breteuil in Normandy, and the heavy fine exacted of him for his ranſom, it may be well ſuſpected, that the vaſt patrimony of the earls of Leiceſter was at this time greatly reduced. And it was probably in ſome meaſure owing to this conſideration, together with a ſenſe of the great ſervices which Robert Fitz-Parnel had rendered to king Richard, probably to king John alſo, which induced this laſt prince to give this earl, whoſe memoir we are writing, an extraordinary mark of his favour. For in the fifth year of John was beſtowed upon him, by this king, the opulent and magnificent territories of Richmond in Yorkſhire[1]. This was a fief of large extent, endowed with ample and ſpecial privileges, decorated with two caſtles, Richmond and Bowes (of which the former was very magnificent), and a copious liſt of vaſſals, conſiſting of earls, barons, knights, and eſquires. Its juriſdiction was great, its patronage large, its demeſne ſpacious, and its revenue probably not leſs than forty thouſand pounds a year, according to the preſent rate of money. It has been obſerved before, that the caſtles of the great barons cauſed alarm to king Henry II. who therefore took all opportunities to reduce them. King Richard followed the ſame line of policy with regard to his brother earl John, from whom he withheld the caſtles appendant to John's earldoms and other fiefs, which were reſtored upon their reconciliation after Richard's return from Paleſtine. The ſame precaution was now obſerved by John in the grant of Richmondſhire to Robert Fitz-Parnel; for although he granted it, with the foreſt, and knights fees thereto belonging, in as ample a manner as the earls of Richmond had held the ſame, yet he made an exception as to the caſtles, which he kept in his own hands; by which act of caution, he would find it no hard taſk to ſeize the whole domain, if the new lord of it offended him.

While we contemplate with pleaſure this act of royal munificence, whereby the illuſtrious houſe of Bellomont was, as it were, repaired, with an increaſe of grandeur, a tear is due to the ſtill more illuſtrious houſe, which by the ſame act was involved in ruin. Theſe poſſeſſions had, for an hundred years or thereabouts, been enjoyed by the princes or dukes of Bretagne; and it ſhould ſeem to be a ſound meaſure of ſtate to let them continue annexed to that dutchy, as thereby becoming a ſort of pledge to the kings of England for the fidelity of the dukes of Bretagne; who would not be very willing to offend the king of England at the peril of ſuch a ſacrifice.

Henry II. had acted the robber in his manner of getting the dutchy of Bretagne and the lands of Richmondſhire into his family, or, more properly ſpeaking, into his own hands. His ſon Geoffry died poſſeſſed of both theſe honours, and left his widow Conſtance ſeiſed of the ſame, whoſe inheritance they were. She died in 1201, leaving three children, Arthur, Alianora, and another daughter. By the immature death of Arthur, and the commitment of Alianora to cloſe impriſonment, king John got their Engliſh inheritance into his own hands. By the grant he ſoon after made of it to Robert Fitz-Paruel, one ſhould ſuppoſe he conſidered it as completely eſcheated to the crown. Had Arthur, however, been permitted to live, and Alianora to be at large, the validity of John's grant would have been called in queſtion; and, if juſtice preponderated, ſet aſide. It was, however, of little ſervice to the earl, who died very ſhortly after, viz. on the 18th of October, in the ſixth year of John, anno 1204[2].

His conſort (whom he ſeems to have eſpouſed after his return from Paleſtine) was named Loretta, and was daughter of William de Braoſe, who held the honour or barony of Brember of the king in capite, and was conſequently one of the major barons of the realm: but this earl left no iſſue.

---

[1] Gale's Honor of Richmond; and Dugd. Bar. vol. I. p. 88.

[2] " Mem. quod Robertus comes Leyc', fundator hujus abbatiæ, obiit pridie non. Aprilis, ſc. in die Sancti Ambroſii. Item Amicia uxor ejuſdem Roberti obiit die Sancti Egidii abbatis, & ſepulta eſt in mon. prioratus monialium de Eton, Item poſt multum tempus, eodem die, 1190, obiit Robertus ſecundus comes Leyc', filius & hæres prædicti Roberti & Amiciæ, in itinere verſus Terram Sanctam, Item Petronilla de Grantaminele, uxor ipſius Roberti ſecundi, ob. kalen. Septembris. Item in craſtino Sancti Lucæ Evangeliſtæ, 1205, obiit tertius Robertus comes Leyc', filius ſecundi Roberti. Et tam ipſe quam avus ſuus Robertus primus ſepulti ſunt in mon' abbatiæ Leyc', coram magno altari, quam ſimiliter ipſe primus Robertus fundavit. Poſt, die Proceſſi & Maximiani, obiit Rogerus epiſcopus Sancti Andreæ, filius Roberti ſecundi, & frater tertii Roberti." From the original Chartulary of Gerendon abbey, in the library of the marpuis of Lanſdown, p. 34, b.

This earl is ſaid by ſome to have reſided in the latter part of his life chiefly at Leiceſter; but to me this ſeems very doubtful, the caſtle of Leiceſter, wherein his anceſtors uſed to live, having been deſtroyed, as we related above. He might, however, and probably was there ſometimes: and to his burgeſſes there he ſeems to have had great kindneſs, as is evinced by the following charter:

"Robertus comes Leiceſtrie, filius Petronille comitiſſe Leic', preſens ſcriptum inſpecturis ſalutem. Noverit univerſitas veſtra me, pro ſalute anime mee et omnium anteceſſorum meorum, & omnium ſucceſſorum meorum, dimiſiſſe et omnino relaxaſſe à me et heredibus meis in perpetuum, illos denarios qui capi ſolebant annuatim de burgenſibus meis Leic', ad metendum ſegetes meos apud Leic'; et illos infinitos denarios qui capi ſolebant de ſingulis vaccis, in defenſo meo, pro eſcapurâ, et illos infinitos denarios qui capi ſolebant de carectis portantibus bladum de Leic' ad alium molendinum quam ad molendinum de Leic'. Et ut ratum habeatur in perpetuum appoſitione ſigilli mei ſcriptum preſens munivi. Hiis teſtibus, Paulo Abbe Leic', Petro Clerico de Lira, et multis aliis." The ſeal ſhews a knight mounted, his horſe at full ſpeed, a broad ſword in his right hand, his ſurcoat dangling on one ſide; and on the other the arms of Leiceſter [1].

It appears that about the year 1194, our earl ſtood indebted to Aaron the Jew of Lincoln, in the ſum of 452*l*. 6*s*. 8*d*. on a mortgage of ſeveral of his effects [2].

This famous earl was buried in the abbey of St. Mary de Pratis near Leiceſter, before the high altar, between his mother and his grandfather.

Among the records of the burg of Leiceſter, the word alderman firſt occurs in the time of this earl, anno 1203. We are obliged to Mr. Carte for this information: he tells us, "that in a little book in 8vo, formerly in the cuſtody of the mayor's clerk, a perſon named William, ſon of Henerie, is ſtyled alderman of the gyld of Leiceſter." The ſame perſon and title occurs again anno 1213. The true name was probably William Fitz-Leweric; as it ſeems to be the ſame perſon who was witneſs to a deed, whereby Roger Fitz-Simon, of Belgrave, confirmed a meſſuage, with its appurtenances, to Lawrence, ſon of Oſman Seman, of Leiceſter, which Theobald the Harper had bought of his father Simon. "Hiis teſtibus; Willielmo filio Lewerici aldermanni Leiceſtrie. Ric' perſona de Belegraiva, &c."

King John, in the firſt year of his reign, granted to the burgeſſes of Leiceſter the following charter for free paſſage and trading through the whole kingdom, without paying any manner of toll, ſtallage, &c.

"Johannes, Dei gratia, rex Angliæ, dominus Hiberniæ, dux Normanniæ et Aquitaniæ, comes Andegav', archiepiſcopis, epiſcopis, abbatibus, comitibus, baronibus, juſticiariis, vicecomitibus, præpoſitis, et omnibus ballivis et fidelibus ſuis, ſalutem. Sciatis nos conceſſiſſe, et hâc præſenti cartâ noſtrâ confirmaſſe, burgenſibus villæ Leiceſtr', quod liberè et ſine omni impedimento eant et redeant et negocientur per totam terram noſtram, cum omnibus rebus et mercandiſis ſuis; ſalvis nobis et aliis debitis et juſtis conſuetudinibus. Teſtibus, &c. Dat' per manus S. Wellen' archidiaconi, et Johannis de Gray, apud Bur', viceſimo ſexto die Decembris, anno regni noſtri primo [3]."

And by another deed, the ſame day, the king granted and confirmed to the burgeſſes of Leiceſter, that all bargains for buying or ſelling of lands in the town of Leiceſter, which had been, or ſhould be, reaſonably made, in the Portmote court of that town, ſhould remain valid:

"Johannes, Dei gratiâ, rex Anglie, dominus Hibernie, dux Normannie et Aquitanie, comes Andegavie, archiepiſcopis, epiſcopis, abbatibus, comitibus, baronibus, juſticiariis, vicecomitibus, prepoſitis, et omnibus ballivis et fidelibus ſuis, ſalutem. Sciatis nos conceſſiſſe, et hâc preſenti cartâ noſtrâ confirmâſſe, burgenſibus ville Leiceſtrie, quod omnes emptiones et venditiones terrarum ville Leiceſtr', que facte ſunt, et que fient rationabiliter in Portman mot' ejuſdem ville, ſtabiles et firmè permaneant. Teſtibus; Willielmo Mareſcallo, com. de Pembroc, Will' com. Sarum, Will. de Humet, conſtabulario Normannie; Will. de Rupibus; Warino filio Geroldi; Thomâ Baſſet. Dat' per manus S. Wellen' archidiaconi, et Johannis de Gray, apud Bur', viceſimo ſexto die Decembris, anno regni noſtri primo [4]."

In 1204, William de Langton agreed to pay the king a fine of ten marks, to have ſeiſin of one carucate of land in the ſuburb of Leiceſter; which land Robert earl of Leiceſter gave the ſaid William for his homage and ſervice; and William de Albeney was bound for him to ſee that he made payment [5].

The ſame year Richard le Burgeis paid the king a fine of half a marc, that William Fitz-Walter might put in ſecurities to appear at Weſtminſter in the quindiſme of St. Michael, to ſhew why he troubled the ſaid Richard, touching a meſſuage in the ſuburb of Leiceſter, which he pleaded to be his right before the king's juſtices againſt the ſaid Richard [6].

Jan. 18, 1205, king John confirmed to maſter Gilbert de Aquila one hundred ſhillings rent in the præfecture of Leiceſter; the which Robert Fitz-Parnell earl of Leiceſter had given to the ſaid Gilbert for his homage and ſervice [7]. This maſter Gilbert de Aquila was probably one of the family of Gilbert de Aquila, an Engliſh baron, who died before Henry III [8].

From a bag of deeds in the Tally-court of the Exchequer, I have been favoured, by Mr. Ellis, with the following very curious undated grant of this earl:

"Noverint univerſi preſentes & fut̃i, quod ego Rob̄ comes Leiceſtrie, filius Petronelle comitiſſe, conceſſi & hâc preſenti cartâ meâ confirmavi Gaufrido fabro t̃ram que fuit Ricardi filii Herberti avi ſui, quã p̃dc̃us Ric̃ tenuit ꝑ ſerganteriam ap̃d Leiceſtriã ext̃ portã de Su'; hab̄ndam & tenendam de me & heredibus meis, ſibi & heredibus ſuis jure hereditario, lib̄e & quite & honorifice; reddendo inde annuatim mⁱ & heredibus meis VI ſol̃ eſtlingor' ad tres t̃minos, ſcil̃ ad feſtũ Sc̃i Michaelis II ſol̃, & ad Purificationẽ Sc̃e Marie II ſol̃, et ad Pentecoſtẽ II ſol̃, et ꝑ ſerviciũ q̃d p̃dict' Ric̃ fil̃ Herb̄ti fac̃e ſolebat; ſcil̃ eſſe ad cutes com̄is, & ad naivos [9] ſuos vendendos infra co-

---

[1] Carte, MSS; ex autographo penes majorem & burgenſes Leiceſtriæ. See the ſeal, plate XI. fig. 3.

[2] "De debitis Aaron Judei Lincolnie. Robertus comes Leic' debet 452*l*. 6*s*. 8*d*. ſuper Bleneford & Kingeſton, in Dorſeta; & Sepewich, & Hakeneſt, & Cumpton, & Colingeburn, & Everlega, Wikingeſton, & Turmodeſton, & Belegrava, & Schepeheved, & Androdeſbi, & Normanton, & Seldton, Mag. Rot. 5 Ric. I. Warw. & Legerc. Madox, Exchequer, p. 158.

[3] Carte, ibid.

[4] Ibid.

[5] "Willielmus de Langton dat domino regi x marcas, pro habenda ſeiſina de una carucata terræ in ſuburbio Leic', quæ eſt in manu domini regis, & quam Robertus comes Leic' eidem Willielmo dedit pro homagio & ſervicio ſuo per cartam ſuam, & pro habendo inde confirmatione domini regis. Et ipſe domino regi invenit plegium de illis x marcis, ſcil. Will. de Albeney. Et mandatum eſt vicecomiti quod ei inde plenariam ſeiſinam habere faciat." Fines 6 Joh.

[6] "Ricardus le Burgeis dat dimidiam marcam, pro habendo brevi, ut Willielmus filius Walteri ponatur per vadimonium & plegios ſalvos, ut ſit apud Weſtmonaſt. a die S. Mich. in quindecim dies, oſtenſurus, qualiter trahit in placitum præfatum Ricardum de uno meſſuagio in ſuburbio Leic. quod dirationavit ſicut jus ſuum verſus eandem Ricardum coram juſticiariis itinerantibus, per judicium curiæ domini regis. Et mandatum eſt vicecomiti, quod interim faciat habere eidem Ricardo patentes de prædicto placito." Fines 6 Joh.

[7] "Johannes Dei gratiâ, &c. Sciatis nos conceſſiſſe & preſenti cartâ confirmâſſe magiſtro Gilberto de Aquila centum ſolidos redditus in prefecturâ de Leic. quos Robertus comes Leiceſtrie (filius Petronelle comitiſſe Leic.) ei dedit pro homagio & ſervicio, habendos & tenendos ſibi & heredibus ſuis, & heredibus predicti comitis, bene & in pace, libere & quiete, plenarie & honorifice, ſicut carta ipſius comitis rationabiliter teſtatur. Teſtibus; dom. H. Cantuar' archiepiſcopo; W. London', H. Sarum epiſcopis; W. comite Mareſcallo; R. comite Ceſtrie; W. comite Arundel, &c. Dat. per manum H. de Well. archdiacono Well. apud Lamheia, 18 die Januarii, anno &c. ſexto." Cart. 6 Joh.

[8] Dugd. Bar. I. 496. For his homage and ſervice, i. e. free ſervice; this was the uſual manner of conveying free tenement, or that of which the grantee was to be ſeized in his own demeſne, as de feodo & jure ſuo. The grantee did homage and ſware fealty to the grantor, as to his capital or immediate lord, and thenceforth became obnoxious to the ſervice or onus attaching to the fief, according to the tenor of the infeoſment. The uſual terms of tenure were either knight ſervice or ſocage.

[9] Q. nativos.

mitatũ

mitatū Leiceſtrie ad coſtum ſuum, & ext̄ comitatū Leiceſtr' ad coſtum com̄is; ꝓ hac autē conceſſione & confirmatione dedit m^{i} predict' Gauſr̄ fab' xx ſol, eſt̄lingor'. Quod ut ratū habeat̄ & inconcuſſū ſigilli mei atteſtacione reboravi. Hiis teſtibus; Paulo abbate Leiceſtr̄; Phil̄ de Aubign̄; Freeri Maleſmeis; Rad̄ de Martinwaſt' t̄c ſeneſcallo m'o; Ernaldo de Boſco; Rad̄ Friedai; Ric̄ fil̄ Warini; Gunſr̄ capell̄no; Will̄o de Belegua; Will̄o de Seinevill̄; Alano fil̄ Rob̄ti; Phil̄ Cam̄ario; Luca cl̄ico; Rob̄to cl̄ico; Theobaldo cl̄ico; & multis aliis."

To this grant is appendant a large ſeal of green wax, with the figure of a man on horſe-back in armour according to the faſhion of the times: and on the other ſide a counter ſeal of the ſize of a ſhilling, with a ſhield chequé, circumſcribed Secretum Roberti de Bretvel; which was particularly noticed by Peter le Neve [1], on account of the rarity of arms on ſeals in this age.

Of Loretta, the widow of this earl, it appears that ſhe gave to the hoſpital of Bocland, co. Somerſet, to find a prieſt to ſing maſs daily at the altar of our Lady, in the great church there, for the health of her ſoul, and for the ſoul of Robert earl of Leiceſter, her ſometime huſband, their anceſtors and ſucceſſors, all her lands in Noteſton and Ynesford, on both ſides the water; as alſo threeſcore and four acres of her demeſne upon Ruwedone; and moreover, all her lands of Rudeſcote, Hele, Chorlecote, Tunecote, and Boteburne; likewiſe a hundred acres of his demenſe in Brenneſmore, his wood called Ancrewd; and one furlong at Roychey, with all the appurtenances, within the lordſhip of Taviſtoke [2]. In 1214 ſhe made oath to the king, that ſhe would never marry without his conſent; and afterwards ſhe became an anchorete at Hackington, otherwiſe called St. Stephen's, near Canterbury, where ſhe continued a recluſe till her death, and was there buried [3].

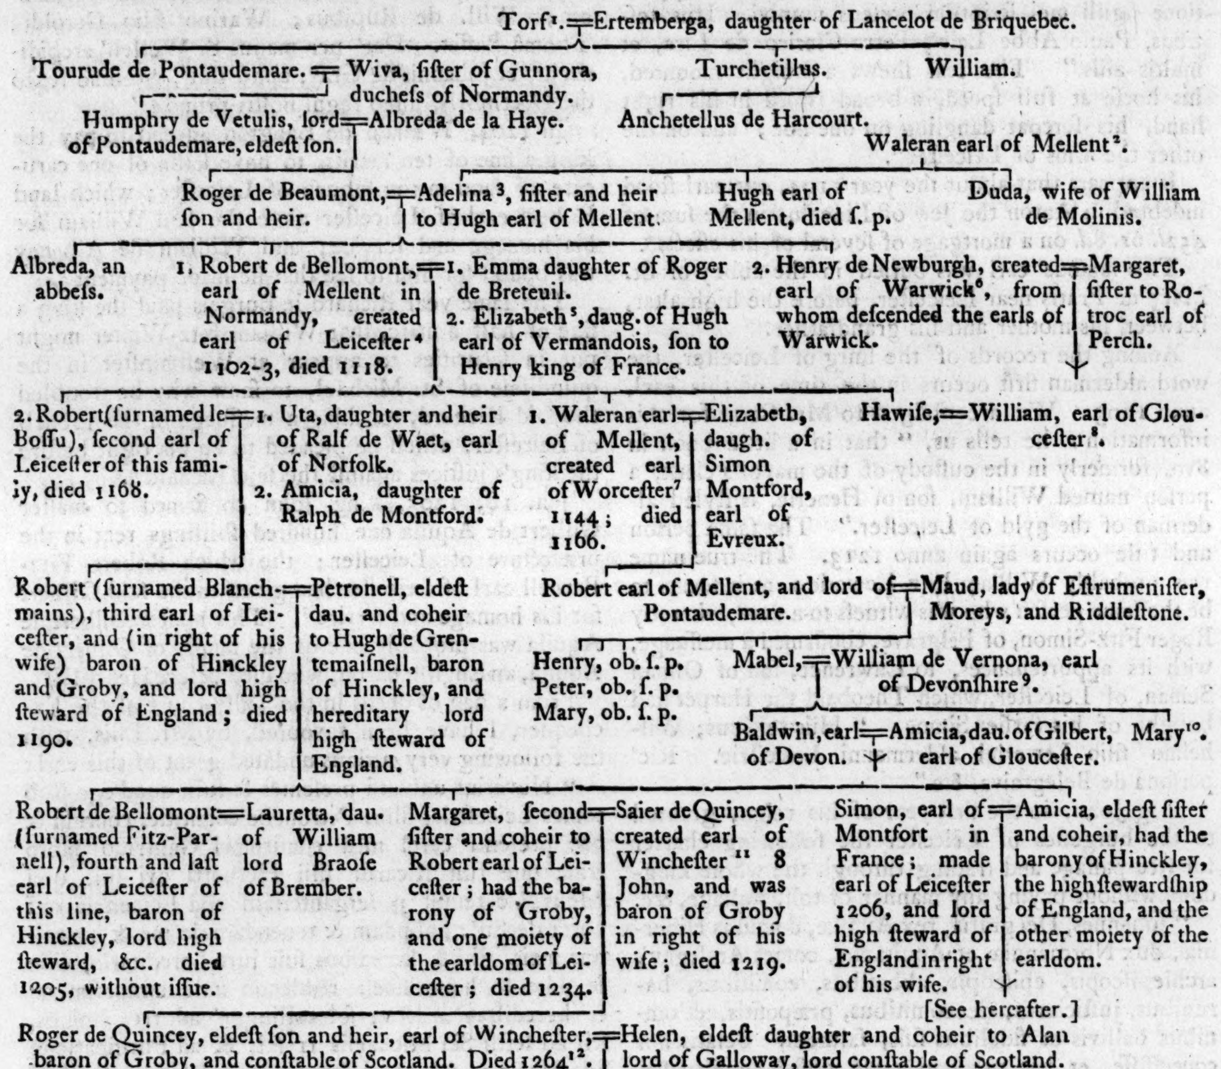
---

[1] MS note in Dugdale's Baronage. I. 88. pen R. Gough. See the ſeal, plate XI. fig. 4.

[2] Mon. Angl. II. 438. See the deed at large in our Appendix, N° XII.

[3] Cart. 16 Joh. n. 14. Dugd. Bar. I. 89.

Genealogy of the BELLOMONTS, Earls of LEICESTER.



Torf [1]. = Ertemberga, daughter of Lancelot de Briquebec.

Tourude de Pontaudemare. = Wiva, ſiſter of Gunnora, ducheſs of Normandy.

Turchetillus.

William.

Humphry de Vetulis, lord of Pontaudemare, eldeſt ſon. = Albreda de la Haye.

Anchetellus de Harcourt.

Waleran earl of Mellent [2].

Roger de Beaumont, ſon and heir. = Adelina [3], ſiſter and heir to Hugh earl of Mellent.

Hugh earl of Mellent, died ſ. p.

Duda, wife of William de Molinis.

Albreda, an abbeſs.

1. Robert de Bellomont, earl of Mellent in Normandy, created earl of Leiceſter [4] 1102-3, died 1118. = 1. Emma daughter of Roger de Breteuil. 2. Elizabeth [5], daug. of Hugh earl of Vermandois, ſon to Henry king of France.

2. Henry de Newburgh, created earl of Warwick [6], from whom deſcended the earls of Warwick. = Margaret, ſiſter to Rotroc earl of Perch.

2. Robert (ſurnamed le Boſſu), ſecond earl of Leiceſter of this family, died 1168. = 1. Uta, daughter and heir of Ralf de Waet, earl of Norfolk. 2. Amicia, daughter of Ralph de Montford.

1. Waleran earl of Mellent, created earl of Worceſter [7] 1144; died 1166. = Elizabeth, daugh. of Simon Montford, earl of Evreux.

Hawiſe, = William, earl of Glouceſter [8].

Robert (ſurnamed Blanchmains), third earl of Leiceſter, and (in right of his wife) baron of Hinckley and Groby, and lord high ſteward of England; died 1190. = Petronell, eldeſt dau. and coheir to Hugh de Grentemaiſnell, baron of Hinckley, and hereditary lord high ſteward of England.

Robert earl of Mellent, and lord of Pontaudemare. = Maud, lady of Eſtrumeniſter, Moreys, and Riddleſtone.

Henry, ob. ſ. p.
Peter, ob. ſ. p.
Mary, ob. ſ. p.

Mabel, = William de Vernona, earl of Devonſhire [9].

Baldwin, earl of Devon. = Amicia, dau. of Gilbert, earl of Glouceſter.

Mary [10].

Robert de Bellomont (ſurnamed Fitz-Parnell), fourth and laſt earl of Leiceſter of this line, baron of Hinckley, lord high ſteward, &c. died 1205, without iſſue. = Lauretta, dau. of William lord Braoſe of Brember.

Margaret, ſecond ſiſter and coheir to Robert earl of Leiceſter; had the barony of Groby, and one moiety of the earldom of Leiceſter; died 1234. = Saier de Quincey, created earl of Wincheſter [11] 8 John, and was baron of Groby in right of his wife; died 1219.

Simon, earl of Montfort in France; made earl of Leiceſter 1206, and lord high ſteward of England in right of his wife. = Amicia, eldeſt ſiſter and coheir, had the barony of Hinckley, the high ſtewardſhip of England, and the other moiety of the earldom.

[See hereafter.]

Roger de Quincey, eldeſt ſon and heir, earl of Wincheſter, baron of Groby, and conſtable of Scotland. Died 1264 [12]. = Helen, eldeſt daughter and coheir to Alan lord of Galloway, lord conſtable of Scotland.

Margaret, eldeſt daughter and coheir, married William de Ferrars, earl of Ferrars and Derby, &c. [13]

Helen, ſecond daughter and coheir, married Alan la Zouch [14], baron of Aſhby.

Elizabeth, third daughter and coheir, married Alexander Comyn, earl of Buchan [15] in Scotland.

---

[1] Gul. Gemet, lib. viii. c. 37.

[2] Ord. Vital. p. 1092.

[3] Gul. Gemet. lib. vii. c. 4. North, MS. notes on Vincent.

[4] Arms: Gules, a cinquefoil Ermine, pierced of the field; ſee Plate X. fig. 20.

[5] It is not at all ſurprizing that this lady ſhould be ſometimes called Elizabeth, and at other times Iſabel, when Sir William Dugdale (Bar. I. 75.) ſtyles her "Iſabel, alias Elizabeth." Brooke, in 1619, ſays that her huſband married "Elizabeth, daughter of Hugh the great earl of Vermandois;" and in the ſame page adds, "This Iſabel, daughter of Hugh the great earl of Vermandois, over-lived her firſt huſband; and married William the ſecond earl of Warren and Surrey." And this is reprinted by Vincent in 1622, without the leaſt remark on it. Among the benefactors to Leiceſter abbey, ſhe is called "Iſabella comitiſſa," which ſeems to have been during her widowhood; and in a deed of gift to the infirm brethren de Belencumbris (Mon. Ang. II. 1012.), we find "Ego Willielmus de Warenna & Yſabella comitiſſa uxor mea." In charta Roberti Pincerne, dat' 1140, pro animâ Roberti comitis Legaceſtrie & Iſabelle comitiſſe. Mon. Angl. vol. I. p. 470.

In p. 23, it appears, that Robert earl of Meulan married Elizabeth, daughter of Hugh the great count of Vermandois. Dugdale, from William Jumieges, ſuppoſes her to be wife to William earl Warren, after the earl of Meulan's death, in 1118. (See Warren in Bar.) Some Engliſh authors make Hugh the great count of Vermandois, ſon of Robert king of France. But Robert had no ſuch ſon, and beſides died in 1031. Hugh count of Vermandois was ſon of Henry I. king of France, and brother of Philip I. and about 1102 (ſays Henault) became count of Vermandois by marriage. His father died in 1060; his brother king Philip I. died in 1108 in the 57th year of his age. Henry I. had no other children but theſe two, and theſe therefore probaly nearly at the ſame age. Philip was ſeven years old at the death of his father Henry I.; ſo that, in in the year 1060, Hugh may be ſuppoſed to be an infant. According to Henault he married the heireſs of Vermandois about 1102; but, if ſo, his daughter could not be mother of the twin-earls Waleran count of Meulan, and Robert earl of Leiceſter, who were young men when their father died in 1118. Either, therefore, their mother muſt have been ſome other lady, or, which is very likely, Hugh the Great married ſome years ſooner. That his daughter, however, was much younger than her huſband, the earl of Meulan, is ſcarcely to be doubted, for he was a chief inſtrument in raiſing Henry Beauclerc to the throne, and was his firſt counſellor (i. e. I ſuppoſe his high juſtice) to the time of his death in 1118, when his widow, the mother of earls Waleran and Robert, was young enough to have five or ſix children by her ſecond huſband the earl of Warren. It deſerves notice that, according to Mezeray, the mother of Hugh count of Vermandois, and his brother king Philip, was Ann daughter of Jerdiſlaus, emperor of Ruſſia. For authorities concerned in the above note, ſee M. Gemet, X ſc. 44. Ann Waverleinſes, Dugdale, Mezeray, Henault.

[6] Arms: Lozengy, Or and Az. on a border Gules, eight plates; fig. 21.

[7] Arms: (the ſame as thoſe of his uncle the earl of Warwick), fig. 21.

[8] Gules, three reſts, Or; fig. 22.

[9] Arms: Or, a lion rampant, Az.; Lozengy, fig. 23.

[10] Firſt married to Sir Robert Courteney (of whom the Courteneys); afterward to Peter de Prouz of Devonſhire; to which Peter, earl Robert Blanchmains gave in franc marriage with the ſaid Mary his grandchild the third part of all his lands in England; and unto Baldwin earl of Devon all his lands in Normandy, with the manors of Eſtrumeniſter, Moreys, and Riddleſtone, in England. Brooke, Diſcoverie of Errors, &c. p. 75.

[11] Arms: Or, a feſs Gules, a file of eleven points; fig. 24.

[12] Arms: Gules, ſeven maſcles, three, three, and one; fig. 25.

[13] See above, p. 18.

[14] Arms: Gules, ten bezants; fig. 26.

[15] Arms: Azure, three Garbs, Or: fig. 27.

Memoir of SIMON DE MONTFORT I, or the Elder, earl of LEICESTER, anno 1209.

The Houſe of Montfort was one of the moſt illuſtrious in France in reſpect to antient nobility, wealth, and alliance, but more ſo for the chieftains and ſtateſmen it produced, who were diſtinguiſhed as well in Aſia as in Europe [1]. It drew its origin from Amauri, or Almeric, count of Hainault, married anno 952, to a daughter of Iſaac count of Cambrai. William, ſon of Almeric, married N—— lady of Montfort and Eſpernon, both noble fiefs held of the crown of France. By her he had Almeric, the ſecond of the name, lord alſo of the above baronies. This Almeric II. was a perſon of great conſideration in the courts of Robert and Henry I. kings of France: his ſon Simon, the firſt of the name, was a perſon of no leſs conſequence in the court of Philip the Firſt, king of France. He died anno 1087; and, by Agnes of Evreux, daughter of Richard count of Evreux, a Norman barony honoured with the title of earldom, he had five ſons, of whom the three eldeſt became in ſucceſſion lords of Montfort. The third of theſe was Almeric, who, ſucceeding his maternal-uncle William count of Evreux by the latter's death, anno 1118, added this Norman earldom to the French fiefs derived from his paternal anceſtors.

This William count of Evreux was the ſon of Richard count of Evreux, and the grandſon of Robert count of Evreux, archbiſhop of Rouen; which Robert was the ſon of the renowned Richard I. duke of Normandy, and brother of Richard II. likewiſe duke of Normandy; which Richard II. was the grandfather of William the Conqueror. Archbiſhop Robert was ſucceeded in his county of Evreux by his ſon Richard, who was father of William and Anne. The former became count of Evreux; and, accompanying his kinſman William duke of Normandy into England anno 1066, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the battle of Haſtings, and obtained an Engliſh fief or barony by the bounty of the Conqueror. In the year 1075 he returned to Normandy, where, after the death of king William I. anno 1086, he took an active part in the diſputes of that monarch's ſons [2]. Probably he took the ſide of Robert Curthoſe; for we find Henry I. refuſing to give him the ſeiſin of his patrimonial earldom or county of Evreux. This ſtretch of power was ſo reſented by Almeric, and conceived to be ſo flagrant an act of injuſtice, both by himſelf and the French, that he took up arms againſt Henry, and perſuaded almoſt the whole French nation to do the ſame. By the friendly interpoſition of the count of Champagne, an accommodation was at length effected between the belligerent parties; and William obtained the ſeiſin of his earldom. By Agnes de Garlande, lady baroneſs of Gurney and Gomets and counteſs of Rochfort, only daughter and heir of Anſeau de Garlande, count of Rochfort, and ſeneſchal of France, he had, among other children, Simon II. lord of Montfort and count of Evreux, ſurnamed the Bald.

This Simon the Bald eſpouſed the party of our Henry II. and committed to him his fortreſſes of Rochfort, Montfort, and Eſpernon, and the others which he had in France, to make uſe of them in the war which Henry had with Lewis le Jeune, anno 1159. This branch of the houſe of Montfort was diſtinguiſhed in France by the name of Montfort-l'Amauri. About the year 1165, this Simon the Bald, ſecond of the name, lord of the barony of Montfort, and count of Evreux, took to wife Amicia, daughter of Robert ove Blanchmaines, earl of Leiceſter, and died about the year 1181 [3].

Some French authors give Amicia a ſecond huſband, viz. Alberic II. count of Damp-Martin. They place this marriage likewiſe in the ſame year, and add that this Alberic died ſoon after his eſpouſals [4].

By Simon the Bald Amicia had three ſons and three daughters. Amauri, or Almeric, the eldeſt, had in partage the county of Evreux, which he ſold to the king of France anno 1200, and died before his mother, and without children. The two other ſons were Simon and Guy. Simon will be the ſubject of this memoir. Guy became lord of la Ferte Aleps in Beauſſe, and of Caſtres in Albigeois. He was one of thoſe who accompanied Philip Auguſtus king of France to Paleſtine, and ſignalized himſelf at the ſieges of Acre and Joppa in the year 1191. After his return, he followed his brother Simon in his war againſt the Albigenſians, and received from him the town of Caſtres, with all the conqueſts he had made in the dioceſe of Albi. He was married towards the end of the year 1202, in his ſecond voyage to the holy land; and died Jan. 31, 1229, by the wound of an arrow, which pierced him before the caſtle of Vareilles near Pamiers. Concerning the daughters, Bertrede, anno 1171, married Hugh de Kevelioc earl of Cheſter, and out-lived her huſband, who deceaſed anno 1181; Petronilla was wife of Barthelemy de Roye, grand chamberlaine of France; and Guiburge eſpouſed Guy de Levis, lord of Mirepoix.

According to the rule of ſucceſſion to fiefs, the earl of Leiceſter's whole land, or eſtate, compoſing his earldom and barony, which he held of the king in capite, as a fief of the crown, ought to deſcend to his two ſiſters, Amicia and Margaret. Allowing, however, the full effect of the counteſs Petronilla's right to the fief of Grentemaiſnil for her life, it makes no difference, in the preſent caſe, whether that fief came to Amicia and Margaret, as heirs of Petronilla, or her ſon Fitz-Parnel, as thoſe ladies were coheirs of both. The firſt of theſe ſeems, at the time of her brother's death, to have been a widow; ſhe was mother of Simon de Montfort, our next earl of Leiceſter. We have already taken notice of the fine to which Petronilla bound herſelf to the king's exchequer, as heireſs of the fief of Grentemaiſnil, and our difficulty in regard of that lady's extraction and claim. Her fine was ſettled in the 6th year of John, according to the date affixed to the document.

Probably Petronilla died very ſoon after; for, in the ſixth year of John alſo, Sayer de Quincy fined to that king in five thouſand marcs, that he the ſaid Sayer might have the whole honour of Grentemaiſnil, with the appurtenances; and in one thouſand marcs, that the king would commit to him all the land which the earl of Leiceſter had in all England, whether in ſervice or demeſne. Let it be noted, that in the feudal times fiefs held of the king in capite by barony upon the demiſe of every tenant eſcheated pro tempore to the crown, and muſt be ſued out of the king's ſeiſin by the heir at law, by a proceſs in the exchequer, called outer le maine. Upon the death, therefore, of the earl of Leiceſter, his heirs would be willing to ſubmit to pay the king a conſiderable fine to recover the poſſeſſion of the fief, with as little loſs of time and as little conteſt with the crown as they could. It was alſo a rule in the feudal poſſeſſions, that no vaſſal, or feodary of the crown, could ordinarily hold fiefs derived from the crown of more than one ſovereign, upon the maxim that "no man could ſerve two maſters." Amicia, therefore, counteſs of Rochfort, the late earl of Leiceſter's eldeſt ſiſter, and one of his coheirs, being a vaſſal of the king of France, would find it difficult to prevail upon king John to admit her claim to a moiety of her brother's fiefs in England. As to the late earl of Leiceſter's eſtate in Normandy, the caſe would be different; for Philip Auguſtus had, anno 1203, gotten full poſſeſſion of that dutchy, and therefore could have no objection to give the ſeiſin of what belonged to her both in France and Normandy, which were now tenements held of the ſame ſovereign. The reader will remember how her late brother loſt his patrimonial honour of Breteuil. Philip Auguſtus had ſo much juſtice, or ſo much generoſity, as to make his ſiſter ſome compenſation for the loſs of this noble fief, the antient reſidence and boaſt of the houſe of Oſbern. In the year 1204, by a deed dated at Paris, Amicia counteſs of Rochfort gave up all her right in the caſtle of Breteuil, and whatſoever elſe her father had had on that ſide the ſea, unto Philip king of France; covenanting, that, if her ſiſter Margaret, then the wife of Sayer de Quincy, ſhould in any ſort oppoſe that her grant, ſhe would make ſatisfaction for it to the French king out of her lands in England; in conſideration whereof the French king gave her the caſtle of St. Leodegar in Aquiline, and the whole honour ſo called, and whatſoever belonged to the conſtablewick of that caſtle, excepting the fief of William de Garlande, and the fief of John de Gobrief [1].

---

[1] P. Anſelme, P. Daniel, Dict. Heraldic. Dugdale.

[2] P. Anſelme.

[3] Brady, Ordericus. P. Anſelme.

[4] Ibid.

It ſeems from hence, that Amicia meant to abide in the ligeance of the French king, and leave her ſiſter Margaret to make what terms ſhe could with king John concerning their brother's fiefs in England. Margaret's huſband, Sayer de Quincy, ſeems to have been very active in his negotiation on this affair. In the 6th of John he gave one thouſand marcs for the cuſtody of all thoſe lands in England which had belonged to the late earl of Leiceſter, as well in demeſne as in fief, excepting the honour of Grentemaiſnil, and excepting the dowry of the two counteſſes (viz. the mother and wife of the deceaſed earl), and excepting the caſtle of Montſorrel, with the appurtenances, which the king did then retain in his own hands; provided, that if Amicia counteſs of Rochfort, ſiſter to the wife of Sayer, ſhould come to challenge her part in that land, then the ſaid lands and fiefs ſhould remain in the king's hands until right ſhould be done to each of them by the king's court. And in caſe ſhe ſhould recover her part in thoſe lands, that then ſhe ſhould make good her proportion of the fine before ſpecified; and likewiſe, that the lands and fiefs of the honour of Grentemaiſnil ſhould be ſet forth by the oaths of lawful men. Whereupon the king ſent his precept to the ſhire-reeve of Leiceſterſhire, to make livery unto him of all thoſe lands lying without the walls of Leiceſter which belonged to the ſaid earl (and whereof he had ſo granted him the cuſtody), provided it were no part of the honour of Grentemaiſnil, nor of the dowry of the counteſs; and excepting likewiſe to the ſaid counteſs all that land which the king had commanded to be given unto her, in exchange for the honour of Grentemaiſnil, which the earl had paſſed to the biſhop of Lincoln by agreement between them; and excepting to the canons of Leiceſter thoſe lands which had been given them by the before ſpecified earl of Leiceſter. Moreover the king then granted to this Sayer the lordſhips of Bagworth, Croft, and Seneby (parcel of the lands of the late earl); as alſo the manor of Hungerford, in the county of Berks; and the next enſuing year, viz. 7 John, in conſideration of 5000 marks fine, gave him livery of all the lands and fiefs of the honour of Grentemaiſnil, which he had formerly aſſigned to Petronil counteſs of Leiceſter, but afterwards reaſſumed into his own hands [2].

But this grant of king John to Roger de Quincy had no laſting effect; for on the 10th of March, 8 John, we find the following document, which ſhews that Simon de Montfort had obtained the earldom of Leiceſter as ſon of Amicia the late earl's eldeſt ſiſter, and with it a moiety of the whole honour of Leiceſter:

"Johannes, &c. Sciatis nos conceſſiſſe & preſenti cartâ confirmâſſe pactionem factam coram nobis & baronibus noſtris, per Simonem de Monteforti comitem Leyceſtrie, & Saiherum de Quenci comitem Wintonie, de omnibus terris & honoribus que fuerunt comitis Roberti Leyceſtrie die quo obiit, cum omnibus pertinentiis ſuis: ita ſcilicet quod tota medietas illarum terrarum & bonorum, in dominiis, & feodis, & omnibus aliis rebus & locis, remaneat uni illorum comitum, & altera medietas alteri; ſalvis predicto comiti Simoni tertio denario comitatus Leiceſtrie & ſeneſcalcia noſtra; ita etiam quod xl librate terre de parte comitis Simonis remanebunt, prefato comiti Saihero preter partem ſuam, quouſque ſimiliter deliberaverit eidem comiti Saihero rationabilem partem ſuam de terrâ que fuit prenominati comitis Roberti in Normannia, &c. Dat. &c. 10 die Martii, anno regni noſtri octavo [3]."

In this 8th year of king John, this prince granted unto Sayer de Quincy a yearly rent of ten pounds, to be received out of the revenues of the county of Leiceſter at Eaſter and Michaelmas by even portions. Simon de Montfort had, we may preſume, a ſimilar grant: and this was probably the twenty pounds paid out of the iſſues of the county to Hugh de Grentemaiſnil, as recorded in Domeſday.

It may be preſumed, that the fiefs of the knights who were in the ſervice of the earl of Leiceſter were divided at the ſame time with the diviſion of his demeſnes. In this partition, each earl had for his ſhare 60 knights fiefs and an half, and one fifth of a knight's fief [4].

From the pipe-rolls, or ſheriffs' accounts, it appears alſo, that, in the 10th of John, Sayer de Quincy gave to the king three excellent courſers (I ſuppoſe horſes for the chaſe), for livery of the moiety of the ſuburb of Leiceſter, which was thereupon divided by a jury by virtue of the king's mandate or writ; and in 12 John gave him another good courſer (ſuch an one as the king already had, called liard), and a good pied brache [5].

After the diviſion of the late earl's lands in the manner here deſcribed, the part which went to the family of Quincy was called land of the fief of Winton; and what remained to the earl of Leiceſter land of the fief of Leiceſter.

Henry de Knyghton, canon of St. Mary de Pratis near Leiceſter, writes of the diviſion of this great earldom as follows: "Simon de Montfort, by Amicia the eldeſt daughter, with a moiety of the earldom of Leiceſter, and of the honour of Hinckley, was made earl of Leiceſter; and, for the honour of Hinckley, by hereditary right, ſeneſchal of England. Sayer de Quincy, by the younger daughter Margaret, with the other moiety of the earldom of Leiceſter, was made earl of Winton. But ſir Simon de Montfort was afterwards, on account of his diſobedience to the king, diſinherited and outlawed, together with his ſons; and the earldom of Leiceſter, with the honour of Hinckley, was given to Ranulph earl of Cheſter." In this ſummary, events not contiguous in point of time are thrown confuſedly together. I do not find that the cuſtody of the earldom of Leiceſter was granted to Ranulph before the 17th of John: but the diſheriſon of the earl of Leiceſter was probably ſix or ſeven years ſooner; as we can ſcarcely believe that it did not take effect upon the following incident, a thing very remarkable, both in the annals of England, and in the ſtory of our earl:

"This year, viz. 1210 (ſo writes the Chronicler of Dunſtable), in the month of Auguſt, the confederate Welſh burned the marche or frontier of England; which being reported to the king, he took his meaſures to avenge the inſult, and was got as far as Northampton with his army, where he received advice of a conſpiracy formed againſt him by his barons, and that they had choſen Simon de Montfort to be king of England. Being much diſturbed at this news, he took the caſtles of his barons into his own hand." The nation at this time groaned under the ſentence of the papal interdict; and king John was for his contumacy juſt before excommunicated; which made it unlawful for any of his ſubjects to obey his commands, or hold any ſociety with him. The barons of England were probably led to confer this high honour upon the earl of Leiceſter, on account of his extraordinary character and talents, ſufficiently evinced by the following memoir.

Probably our earl did not make a ſacrifice of his Engliſh poſſeſſions without due conſideration; nor do I ſee how he could poſſibly retain the earldom and barony of Leiceſter with the county of Montfort, a fief of the French crown. Certainly great proſpects opened to him about this time, which ſeem to be preſented to him in conſequence of his connexions with France.

He had made the voyage to Jeruſalem about the year 1203; and about the year 1208 engaged in a croiſade of a new ſort. This was not againſt the Infidels of the Eaſt, but againſt the Heretics of Languedoc, called Albigenſians, from Albi, a town of Toulouſe, where this hereſy firſt appeared. It ſoon ſpread over the province of Languedoc, and ſeized not only the common people, but even the prince and nobleſſe of the country. At the head of it was Raymond, count of Toulouſe, marquis of Provence, and duke of Narbonne; whoſe dominions were the chief ſeminaries and aſylum of this new ſect. Pope Innocent III. a man capable of the greateſt undertakings, having tried milder courſes without effect, determined to ſtop the growing evil, by ſending an army of Catholics to deſtroy the heretics. He found means to perſuade Philip Auguſtus, king of France, to countenance this war againſt his vaſſal and couſin-german, the count of Toulouſe. That king conſented to have this croiſade preached throughout his empire, and undertook to furniſh towards its proſecution 5000 men, well equipped, and to be maintained at his own expence. This holy war was immediately preached all over France; and the people were invited to take a ſhare in it upon the ſame conditions, and with the ſame indulgences and privileges, as were wont to be granted to the Chriſtians againſt the Saracens. The publication of it was attended with the greateſt ſucceſs. A great number of prelates, lords, and others, enrolled themſelves, and put a croſs upon their breaſt, to diſtinguiſh them from the croiſſes, who were deſigned to go begond ſea, and wore their croſs upon their ſhoulder [1].

---

[1] P. Anſelm. Rot. Fran.

[2] Dugdale, Bar. Sayer de Quincy. Bar. 686.

[3] Madox, Exch. p. 35.

[4] Madox, Exch.

[5] Dugdale, Bar. in Quincy.

The count of Toulouſe, ſeeing the croiſſes aſſembling, perceived his ruin to be inevitable, if he did not immediately reconcile himſelf to the church. To effect which, he ſubmitted to ſuch conditions as the papal legate was pleaſed to impoſe. The principal of theſe were, to renounce the hereſy of which he was accuſed, abandon the heretics, and give an adequate ſecurity for his filial obedience to the church in time to come. But the count's ſubmiſſion was not followed by that of ſome of the lords his vaſſals: they were too much attached to their opinions, and too high-ſpirited to follow the count's example in paying ſuch reſpect to the holy ſee. Roger, viſcount of Beziers and of Carcaſſone, his nephew Bernard count de Foix, Pierſe Roger lord of Cabaret, and ſome others, continued either openly or covertly ſtill to protect the heretics. Againſt theſe, therefore, after peace was made with the count of Toulouſe, the croiſſes aimed their efforts. The viſcount of Beziers and Carcaſſone was firſt attacked, and his capital taken on the 22d of July, A. D. 1209; the town was ſacked and burned; and the number, comprehending men and women, who were killed by the croiſſes without diſtinction, amounted to 30,000 [2]. From Beziers the catholic army marched to Carcaſſone, a very populous and flouriſhing town, rendered ſtrong by nature and art, which capitulated after ſuſtaining a ſiege for eight days. "That the country," ſays M. Paris, "which God had given into the hands of his ſervants might be kept to the honour of God and the profit of Chriſtianity, the noble Simon de Montfort earl of Leiceſter was appointed, by the common voice of the prelates and barons, to be prince of it; and into his hands was committed Roger the viſcount, former lord of it, who was taken priſoner during the ſiege. The whole province, which belonged to him, was reduced within a month, and all transferred to Simon de Montfort. In it were above an hundred caſtles, ſome of which were ſo ſtrong, as ſeemed a match for almoſt any army. To theſe other ſtrong caſtles were added in the progreſs of the campaign; and whatever was taken was conſigned to Simon de Montfort."

In an antient record, dated Nov. 23, A. D. 1209, he is ſtyled earl of Leiceſter and lord of Montfort, and by the grace of God viſcount de Beziers and de Carcaſſone [3].

To the taking of this laſt place, it does not appear that there was any pre-eminence among the lords of this croiſade; but they were kept united by the prudence and authority of the pope's legate, who was conſtantly with them. Theſe lords acted in concert, each commanding his vaſſals, and ſuch men as were aſſigned him. But after the ſurrender of Carcaſſone, it was propoſed to elect a commander in chief, who was to be charged with the defence of the places that had been taken. It was of the laſt importance to chuſe a commander of the moſt diſtinguiſhed merit, capable of conducting an enterprize of the greateſt difficulty and importance; for the earl of Toulouſe was not expected to hold to his engagements longer than till he could break them with ſome proſpect of ſafety and ſucceſs. He had beſides many able ſupporters: the king of England was his relation and friend; Peter, king of Arragon, was his brother-in-law, and diſpoſed to undertake his defence; and a great many lords his vaſſals were ſtill devoted to him and the common cauſe in which they were engaged; the king of Arragon was particularly concerned about the fate of Carcaſſone, of which he was the lord, himſelf holding that town of the crown of France [4].

The election of a commander in chief was veſted by the croiſade-lords in two biſhops, four knights, and the papal legate, who were empowered to chuſe a commander, after giving a ſolemn promiſe to have no regard in their choice but to the glory of God and the common good [5].

The electors, being aſſembled for this purpoſe, with one voice made choice of Simon de Montfort earl of Leiceſter, who abſolutely refuſed the employment, as the count de Nevers and the duke of Burgundy had done before. Theſe two lords, and the greater part of the reſt, uſed their endeavours, to no purpoſe, to induce his compliance: and in vain did the legate throw himſelf at his feet, conjuring and beſeeching him to accept the appointment: at laſt, lifting himſelf up, and aſſuming a tone of authority, which his character allowed, "I command thee," ſaid he, "in the name of God and the pope, and in virtue of the obedience which you owe to them, to undertake the employment, to which you have been choſen for no other reaſon but becauſe it was judged to be neceſſary for the good of religion and of the church." Theſe words ſurprized the earl of Leiceſter, and overcame his reſolution. The whole aſſembly, perceiving him to relent, poured forth upon him a ſhower of applauſe, and reminded him of the honour of ſuch an appointment; of the obligation he would confer upon the pope, the legate, and all the lords of the army, by accepting it; and promiſed him at the ſame time their faithful ſupport [6].

"In truth," ſays father Daniel, "this lord was the man of all the army to whom this honour was moſt juſtly due." He was then the head of the illuſtrious houſe of Montfort-l'Amauri, and yet bore the quality of earl of Leiceſter; a title which came to him from his anceſtors, ſtrongly attached for a long time to the kings of England. He was a very great warrior, and always ſignalized for his courage and his conduct in the moſt famous expeditions. He was the beſt-made man of any of his time; of the fineſt heighth and mien; briſk, active, perſevering, intrepid, enterprizing; equally wiſe and fortunate in his undertakings; and, with all theſe qualities of an hero, he had ſuch meekneſs, affability, integrity, and honour, as charmed all mankind.

As ſoon as he entered upon his new office, he ſent miſſionaries into all parts of the country, to perſuade thoſe who had ſubmitted merely from terror to return to the ſincere obedience of the church.

He ſoon found himſelf in a ſituation, the apprehenſion of which had juſtified his refuſal of the dignity to which he was advanced. The duke of Burgundy and the count de Nevers were upon ill terms with each other; and the intimacy which ſubſiſted between the former and Montfort raiſed the jealouſy of the count de Nevers, who thereupon withdrew himſelf and his troops. This bad example was fol-

[1] P. Daniel, P. Anſelme, Henault.

[2] M. Paris.

[3] Anſelme.

[4] Daniel.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid.

lowed by a great many of the other lords; which much enfeebled Simon de Montfort's army. He did not omit, however, to go with the duke of Burgundy againſt Alzone, which opened her gates to him. He ſiezed the caſtle de Faniaux, which the enemy abandoned; Caſtres and Lumbez ſurrendered to him: the former he conferred upon his brother Guy, the partner of his military toils. He made an aſſault upon the fortreſs of Cabaret, at a little diſtance from Carcaſſone, but was repulſed, and obliged to retreat.

The rigor of winter coming on, which ſeemed unfit for further action, the duke of Burgundy took his leave, and left Montfort with only a very few troops. But his reputation, his good management, and the talent he had of gaining the hearts of mankind, enabled him to make new conqueſts during the winter. He made the count de Foix ſurrender Priſſan, renounce the heretical party, and deliver up his ſon in hoſtage for the performance of his engagements; after which, he returned to Carcaſſone to give ſome relaxation to his troops.

The great ſucceſſes of Montfort, his appropriating, by the legate's advice, the towns and caſtles he conquered, to himſelf, and his overture to the count of Toulouſe, ſpecifying the conditions upon which the latter was to renounce the greater part of his domains, upon pain of open and immediate war, put Raymond into ſerious alarms for his territories; and the places he had given in hoſtage to the legate hindered him more than his oath from putting a check to Montfort, who was ſtripping his vaſſals of all their towns and caſtles. The king of Arragon was not leſs offended at Montfort's making himſelf maſter of Carcaſſone, and refuſed to confirm him in that acquiſition, though Montfort offered to become his homager for it, as viſcount Roger had been before. The king of Arragon amuſed him with a negotiation; but under-hand treated with ſeveral lords and other great perſons of Beziers, Carcaſſone, and Albi, to engage them to take arms, promiſing to ſupport them with all his forces.

Montfort was ſoon ſurrounded with difficulties: he loſt all his places of conſequence, except Albi, Carcaſſone, Pamiers, and five caſtles; his troops were reduced to an handful of men, who were too weak to undertake any important enterprize, and whoſe ſafety chiefly depended upon the fear which their enemies had of not being well ſupported againſt an army of croiſſes. Montfort, however, did his utmoſt to retain what was left him; and, with the help of a reinforcement, brought him by his wife Alix early in the ſpring of the year 1210, he recovered ſome places, and took a few others. But his affairs wore a new aſpect the following year: by the exertion of his own extraordinary talents, and the help of ſome reinforcements he obtained from France at the end of the year 1211, there remained nothing to the count of Toulouſe of all his places, but his capital and Montauban. Montfort therefore, by right of conqueſt, and with conſent of the legates, added to his quality of viſcount de Beziers and de Carcaſſone, which he had obtained from the king of Arragon, that of lord of Albi and of Rhodes; and divided among certain French lords the caſtles and lands of the heretics, which were confiſcated. He began to act as ſovereign of the country; and convened at Pamiers a great aſſembly of the prelates and barons, where many regulations were made for the re-eſtabliſhment of the ſtate, of religion, of the diſcipline of the churches, and of their privileges.

While the earl of Leiceſter was taken up with his croiſade in Languedoc, England was in the utmoſt diſtraction occaſioned by king John's breach with the holy ſee, with the Engliſh clergy, the barons of his realm, and the king of the French. On the 24th of March, 1208, on the king's account ſolely, the whole nation was laid under an interdict. This deprived the people of the rights of burial in conſecrated places, of the ſacraments, and other ſervices of the church. It operated as a ſtop to all communion with God and the hopes of ſalvation. The king, inſtead of taking ſome conciliatory ſtep for his own and people's good, proceeded to exaſperate the pope and vex the clergy of England more than before. He ſent his officers through every county to confiſcate the property of the churches. The hierarchy became enraged at theſe ſacrilegious miſcreants, and fulminated their excommunications. The grandees of England were not leſs inflamed with the king, for corrupting their wives[1], and levying ſubſidies and ſentages by his own authority, and the advice of his council; whereas, in the grant of the firſt, the whole common council of the realm, viz. the archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, conventual priors, deans in the name of themſelves and their chapters, abbeſſes and prioreſſes, earls, barons, knights, eſquires, burgeſſes, and freemen of communities, ought to have concurred; all theſe holding their lands and tenements of the king in capite, and rendered exempt by expreſs ſtatutes or charters from all arbitrary and new impoſitions whatever, in conſideration of ſtated ſervices to be performed by them reſpectively, in full diſcharge of all other burthens and exactions whatever. The ſubſidy was a new tax arbitrarily introduced by the late king Henry II. with the aſſiſtance of the pope, on pretence of the holy war. It was upon the moveables of the whole nation. John had levied it in the year 1207, at the rate of a ſeventh upon the goods of all the earls and barons of England who had left him in Normandy; whereas their default ought to have been ſatisfied by the payment of ſcutage, ſpecified and allowed by the grandees of the realm in the king's council of his parliament. Again, in the year 1207, he took a thirteenth part of the moveables as well of the laity as of the clergy and religious. Scutages alſo, which ought to have been aſſeſſed upon the tenants in capite by knight's ſervice, viz. archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, priors, earls, barons, knights and eſquires, or freeholders holding by barony or knight's ſervice, according to their knights' fiefs reſpectively, after a rate ſettled and allowed in a council of parliament, compoſed of the baronage of the realm, were taken by prerogative, and exacted in a lawleſs and oppreſſive manner. Theſe things had incenſed the whole nation againſt John. The knights and freeholders of England, whoſe franc tenements rendered them obnoxious to ſerve the king with horſe and arms of whoſeſoever fief their franc tenement was held, ſtood peculiarly expoſed to his arbitrary mandates for taking the field in his war both in England and abroad. Although theſe knights and eſquires were the free-tenants of the ſuperior nobility, who were the immediate vaſſals of the crown, and rendered them homage and fealty, and other feudal ſervices, according to their tenures; yet they owed, over and above, the ſervice called forenſic to the king, from which their lords could not protect them. At length, however, the vaſſals of the crown eſpouſed the cauſe of the knights and eſquires, and made a common affair of it: and they formed the project of inviting over the earl of Leiceſter to England, and making him their leader, and at length their king, as was mentioned above. The deſign ſeems to have been carried on very ſecretly: in the latter end of the year 1211, or beginning of 1212, John found it neceſſary to march againſt the Welſh. On his way thither, advice was ſent him of the ſcheme of the barons. At firſt he did not give credit to the advice; but, receiving other of the ſame ſort, he found it neceſſary to abandon his Welſh expedition, and prepare for his own ſafety. Probably the failure of the ſcheme of the barons is the reaſon we hear no more of it. The earl of Leiceſter, however, gained freſh laurels abroad.

The count of Toulouſe, ſeeing himſelf undone, threw himſelf into the arms of the king of Arragon, and implored his help. The latter opened a negotiation with the papal legate, who attended the croiſſes in Languedoc, for the reſtoration of the count of Toulouſe, the count de Foix, and the other lords, who had ſuffered loſſes in this war, to their poſſeſſions.

---

[1] "Rex iſte Joannes——in libidinem pronior: nam—magnatum omnium uxores & dominas concupivit, deridendo maritos eorum poſt perpetrata mala." Henr. de Knyghton de eventibus Angliæ.

But theſe good offices of the king of Arragon in favour of the heretics were not attended with ſucceſs. The legate, as well as the pope, were wholly on Montfort's ſide, and determined to maintain him in his acquiſitions, in order to extinguiſh the epidemical errors of Languedoc. The king of Arragon was charged by the pope not to protect the count of Toulouſe, or appear in defence of heretics. But he made no account of the papal prohibitions, and declared war againſt Montfort in form.

The king of France, as well as the pope, continued to ſupport Montfort againſt all his enemies. His chief ſupplies of men and money were from the former; but king Auguſtus was not able to honour the croiſade with ſuch ample aſſiſtance as he wiſhed in the years 1212 and 1213, on account of the war he then had with John king of England, which demanded all his forces for the preſervation of France.

The king of Arragon, notwithſtanding the promiſes with which he amuſed the legates, was ſecretly employed in collecting a vaſt army, with which he deſigned to enter Languedoc, and fall upon Montfort with a ſuperiority of force that muſt cruſh him at once. Accordingly, having ſucceeded in his preparations, he made a ſudden irruption into the county of Toulouſe, and laid ſiege to Muret, a place of conſequence, but of no great ſtrength, about three leagues from the city of Toulouſe. Thither he brought an army of 100,000 men, whom he poſted near Muret along the Garonne on the ſide of Gaſcogne. With him were the count of Toulouſe, the count de Foix, and the count de Comminge.

The earl of Leiceſter was at Faniaux, eight leagues from Muret, when he received advice of this event. He put himſelf immediately in motion to relieve the place. The viſcount de Corbeil, who was juſt returned from an expedition, joined him on the road, as did likewiſe the earl of Leiceſter's uterine brother, the brave William de Barres, who rendered his name illuſtrious by his atchievements in this war. The counteſs of Montford collected for her huſband likewiſe a ſmall body of troops, which ſhe drew from Carcaſſone and its neighbourhood. His army, after all, amounted to no more than eight or nine hundred men, with a part of which he entered Muret on the ſide of the river oppoſite to him, where the enemy was encamped; the reſt arrived during the night. He had with him the archbiſhop of Narbonne, the pope's legate, and ſome other prelates, whom he wiſhed to employ in making overtures of peace to the king of Arragon. But all propoſitions of that ſort, it was thought, would be of no uſe in a conjuncture like the preſent, when the enemy was an hundred to one. The earl, therefore, determined to riſk a battle, notwithſtanding the inequality of his forces; he took all the precautions of a man reſolved to periſh or conquer; being convinced that if he ſuffered the Arragonian king to advance, every thing would be loſt without reſource, and that the enemy would deprive him of all that in one month which he had been four years in ſubduing; and that he would be obliged to return to France with nothing elſe but the glory of attempting a great project, in which, after all his pains, he had miſcarried. To give his troops the more determined courage, he got the legate to excommunicate the count of Toulouſe and all his abettors. The earl's own piety and reſignation inſpired his men with the ſame temper; and they were taught that heaven would be their certain recompence if they died in this religious cauſe.

Having thus prepared his troops to do their utmoſt, with enthuſiaſtic ardour he put himſelf at the head of eight or nine hundred knights, leaving a ſmall body of infantry to guard the caſtle.

Both armies were drawn up in three lines; Montfort's army was ſuffered to advance; the Arragonians thinking that, by their being permitted ſo to do, they would be ſurrounded at the firſt charge. But the croiſſes made the attack with ſuch amazing impetuoſity, that the firſt line of the Arragonian army was thrown in a moment into diſorder and broken. The king of Arragon was poſted in the ſecond line; and, advancing to check the enemy, was killed upon the ſpot; the report of which accident ſpreading through his army, they were ſtruck with conſternation, and began to flee on all ſides. No farther reſiſtance was thought of; they threw down their arms, and ſuffered themſelves to be ſlaughtered at the diſcretion of their enemies. This great army was diſſipated in an inſtant. According to ſome authors, the number of killed and drowned amounted to 20,000; thoſe who have ſtated the number at the loweſt make it to be 17,000. On the earl of Leiceſter's ſide there were killed only one cavalier and a very few common men. This great victory was obtained upon the 12th of September, 1213. It excited the admiration of Europe, and procured to Simon de Montfort the title of The Valiant and Maccabeus [1].

If the earl of Leiceſter had had an army, nothing would have been able to reſiſt him after the battle of Muret; but he could ſoon after hardly muſter 500 men; with which he contented himſelf to ravage the lands of the count de Foix, the environs of Narbonne, of Toulouſe, and of Montpellier; which, far from ſubmitting as was expected, declared againſt him more haughtily than before. Some fortreſſes even ſurrendered to the count of Toulouſe. But, the croiſade being again preached up in France againſt the Albigenſians, the earl of Leiceſter the year following found himſelf at the head of near 100,000 men, partly cavalry, partly infantry; among which was a great number of people of high birth and rank.

With this army the earl of Leiceſter and Guy his brother reduced all the vaſſals of the count of Toulouſe, and all the great men who ſtill adhered to him in Querci, in Rouvergne, and in Perigord. The king of England was actually near Perigueux at the head of his army, with a deſign to ſuccour the count of Toulouſe: but he durſt not declare himſelf. The greater part of the caſtles which had been taken were raſed; and ſuch only preſerved as were very ſtrong, and moſt fit for holding the country in awe. Into theſe the earl put French garriſons.

After this fortunate campaign, which put the earl of Leiceſter into poſſeſſion of all the count of Toulouſe's territories, a grand meeting was held at Montpellier in December, A. D. 1214, of prelates, abbots, and barons; wherein it was deliberated to whoſe care ſhould be committed the government of the county of Toulouſe. The earl of Leiceſter was named with unanimous aſſent to this honour; and the aſſembly preſſed the cardinal-legate to give to Montfort not only the cuſtody of the earldom, but the inveſtiture likewiſe, by declaring, on the part of the pope, that the count of Toulouſe and his ſon had forfeited their dominions. The cardinal referred the determination of this matter to the council of Lateran, which was to ſit the next year.

In the ſpring of 1215, Lewis, eldeſt ſon of the king of France, went into Languedoc, and joined the Catholics there, in diſcharge of the vow he had made, about three years before, to take the croſs againſt the Albigenſians. He aſſiſted Montfort in the taking of a few fortreſſes; and returned to Paris, where he ſoon after accepted the offer of the crown of England, proffered him by the Engliſh barons, who were determined at all events to depoſe king John [2].

The council of Lateran was opened in November, A. D. 1212, and continued by ſeſſions for ſeveral years. After a long examination of the caſe between the earls of Toulouſe and Montfort or Leiceſter, the council pronounced ſentence againſt the former, and deprived him of his county, as an heretic, and favourer of heretics, and aſſigned him a penſion of 300 marks a year during life; and Toulouſe, and the other towns of his eſtate, were given in property to the count of Montfort, with the title of count of Toulouſe; whereupon he repaired to the court of France to demand of king Philip the inveſtiture of that county, which had been adjudged to him by the council. The king of France received him at Melun with great reſpect, granted him his demand, and, in the month of April, A. D. 1216, accepted his homage for the dutchy of Narbonne, the county of Toulouſe, and the viſcounties of Beziers and Carcaſſone. After which, Montfort qualified with theſe titles: "Simon, by the grace of God, duke of Narbonne, count of Toulouſe and of Leiceſter, viſcount de Beziers and Carcaſſone, lord of Montfort."

---

[1] P. Daniel.

[2] Ibid.

Though he might ſeem now to be arrived at the heighth of his wiſhes, yet, from the time of his being inveſted with the county of Toulouſe, he experienced new difficulties. While he was at the court of France, young Raymond, ſon of the old count of Toulouſe, made himſelf maſter of all his father's fortreſſes in Provence. Montfort was obliged to croſs the Rhoſne to oppoſe him. In the mean while Raymond, the old count of Toulouſe, returned from beyond the Pyrenees, and preſented himſelf before Toulouſe, where the burgeſſes received him with joy. Montfort, after making ſome conqueſts in Provence, marched for Toulouſe, and laid ſiege to that city. The inhabitants, animated by the preſence of their count, repaired the works, and defended themſelves with great bravery for nine months. On the 25th of June, A. D. 1218, the beſieged made a deſperate ſally in two places. Montfort put himſelf at the head of ſome troops, and puſhed the enemy back into their ditch, expoſing himſelf to a ſhower of ſtones and arrows that were ſhot from the ramparts. One of theſe ſtones, launched from a mangonel, ſtruck him on the head and overſet him; and his buckler in the mean time ſlipping from his arm, he was pierced by five arrows, and died on the ſpot.

"Thus," ſays father Daniel, "periſhed the famous and valiant Simon de Montfort, the hero of his age, and one of thoſe extraordinary men, to whom few are equal or comparable."

Our chroniclers, in their ſhort and crude notes upon the incidents of their times, have moſt of them made ſome ſcanty mention of this remarkable Engliſh earl; but not one of them has detailed his actions, or even told us whether he ever reſided in England. This will appear ſomewhat extraordinary, when we conſider the pre-recited paſſage of the annaliſt of Dunſtable, who ſeems to be the only one who has ever mentioned the circumſtance of his being thought of for king of England in the room of John[1]; and it would appear incredible, but for the extraordinary character of Montfort, and the remarkable ſituation of that king.

Another circumſtance related, I think, only by the annaliſt of Waverley, ſhews, "that, though Simon de Montfort is ſeldom mentioned by our chroniclers, he was no inſignificant character in the Engliſh court[2]." Towards the latter end of the year 1213, king John was diſpoſed to make reſtitution to his Engliſh clergy for the depredations committed by his officers in his name. The matter ſeemed nearly accommodated, when the king again diſappointed the public expectations, upon finding that the pope inſiſted upon his making reſtitution likewiſe to Simon de Montfort, for all the things, which king John had taken from him. The hiſtorian undoubtedly alluded chiefly to Montfort's Engliſh honour of the earldom of Leiceſter. John, however, did certainly not comply with his demand; for, in the 14th of that king's reign, the earldom of Leiceſter was accounted for at the exchequer among the eſcheats of the crown. But the king ſome time after ſeems to have been more propitiouſly inclined towards the earl; for, in the 17th of his reign, he put the earldom into the cuſtody of the earl of Leiceſter's near relation Ranulph earl of Cheſter to the uſe of Simon de Montfort, its preſent owner. So things ſeem to have continued till the death of king John, and indeed of Simon de Montfort alſo; for, in the ſecond year of Henry III, who mounted the throne of England on the 19th of October 1216, we find the earldom of Leiceſter in the charge of Stephen de Segrave, one of that young king's chief miniſters. But another change ſoo took place; for, in 4 Hen. III, the earldom of Leiceſter was again committed, upon what conditions I do not find, to the earldom of Cheſter. Henry Knyghton, an hiſtorian, and a canon of Leiceſter abbey, reports, that, after this earl's diſinheriſon and outlawry, the earldom of Leiceſter (the whole honor of that title) was granted by king John to Ranulph earl of Cheſter. But, from the circumſtances juſt ſtated, which are taken from public records, it is evident, that the earldom was not granted to the earl of Cheſter ſo fully as the hiſtorian inſinuates. And it will be ſhewn preſently, that Simon de Montfort was not diſherited of his honour, but died actually ſeiſed thereof. And perhaps the earl of Cheſter was only put into the poſſeſſion of it on account of ſome debt or mortgage incurred either by the earl of Leiceſter or the crown.

Simon de Montfort (called the elder, to diſtinguiſh him from his ſon, the ſubject of the next memoir,) had to wife Alice de Montmorency, ſon of Bouchard the fourth of that name, lord of Montmorency and d'Eſcouen, and of Laurentia of Haynaut, a lady of the moſt illuſtrious birth. He was wedded to her before the year 1190. She brought him four ſons and three daughters[3].

The eldeſt of the former was Amauri, of whom we ſhall ſpeak preſently.

The ſecond ſon of Simon de Montfort the elder was Guy de Montfort, in right of his wife, count of Bigorre. He had a ſhare in the war of Toulouſe; and in the year 1218, or, as others report, in 1220, he was taken by young Raymond, and executed in an horrible manner[4]. He does not ſeem to have left any ſon. In the monaſtery of Montarges, near Montfort, was buried a daughter of this Guy, named Alicia, dignified upon her monument with the title of counteſs of Bigorre.

Robert, the third ſon, died unmarried about the year 1226.

Simon de Montfort, afterwards earl of Leiceſter, was the fourth ſon of Simon the elder.

Of the daughters of Simon the elder, or Simon I. Amicia de Montfort was accorded, in the life-time of her father, to James, the firſt of the name, king of Arragon, ſon of Peter II. king of Arragon; but this marriage not taking effect, in the year 1223 ſhe was eſpouſed to Joigny, lord of Chaſteau-Raynard, ſeneſchal of Nivernois, and died A. D. 1253.

Laura de Montfort, matched with Gerard, lord of Pequigny, and vidame d'Amiens.

Perronelle de Montfort was a religious in the abbey of St. Antoine at Paris.

---

[1] Before the acceſſion of king John to the crown of England, he was occaſionally a reſident at Leiceſter; and a charter of his, to the abbey of Jerpoint in Ireland, whilſt he was lord of Ireland and earl of Mortaigne, Cornwall, and Nottingham, is dated from that town. Mon. Angl. II. 1028. Archdall, Mon. Hib. p. 355. His arms, when this deed was executed, were, Gules, three lions paſſant guardant on a bend, Arg. Plate X. fig. 19. See alſo p. 97.

[2] Ann. Waverley, p. 179.

[3] P. Anſelme.

[4] "Eodem anno (ſc. 1220) Guido frater Simonis de Montfort captus eſt Albigenſibus, & interfectus & eques dilaniatus." Annales de Dunſtaple.

In the famous battle of Muret, of which the particulars are given by William Brito, in his Philippis, our earl of Leiceſter's encounter with the king of Arragon was one of the moſt celebrated incidents. The Britonian poet deſcribes it as follows. We are to know, that the Arragonian king, not able to bear the ſight of ſuch havock, as an handful of French, commanded by Montfort, made in his immenſe army, ſought out the earl to try his arm with him in perſonal combat.

Rex furit Arragonum, ſic cædi ſe ſua coram
Pignora chara videns, nec eis ſuccurere poſſe
Piget eum, tentatque ſuas in Simone vires,
Indignans aliis concurrere, quippe minores
Quoſlibet indignos regali judicat ictu,
Cautior occurrit, pugnæque peritior illi
Simon, & lateris flexu cavet illius haſtam,
Quæ medias veniebat ei transfigere coſtas.
Tunc regis dextra perniciter eripit haſtam
Et ſignum regale ſimul, quod pendet ab haſtâ
Quod populum tanti faciens meminiſſe triumphi,
Nunc cum vexillo Romanâ pendet in æde.
At rex exerto comitem ferit enſe, ſed ipſum
Fortior inſurgens, rapto de vertice cono,
Fortiter a ſella comes elevat, inque vigentis
Circumflectit equi collo, manibuſque duabus
Gnaviter amplexum regem portare volebat,
Et vivum ſervare, neci quia tradere tantum
Fas non eſſe virum comiti putat, ut pius hoſti,
Ut bonus eſſe malo populo laudetur ab omni.
Nititur ille viro elabi, multoque labore
Vix duro amplexu ſublabitur, inque virenti
Gramine ſtare volens, proſtratus corpore toto
Concidit, & ſalva jacuit reſupinus arena.
Arragones comitem circumſtant & magis illum
Debellare ſtudent, quam regem tollere terra.
Ille velut turris ſtat firmus, & enſe rotato
Diſſipat inſtantes & multo ſanguine pingues
Reddit agros, multaque virum ſe ſtrage coronat.
Philippidos, lib. VIII.

The ſame poet has not forgot to celebrate the death of this famous warrior and ſaint.

Non multo poſt hæc Simon, magis unde dolendum,
Martyris in palmâ ratio niſi flere vetaret,
Inclytus ille comis Tholoſanam dum obſidet urbem
Quæ fidei noſtræ contraria, ſuſcipiebat
Hereticos, nec adhuc peſtes evitat eorum:
Raptus ab hac ſubito lacrymarum valle, beato
Martyrio ad ſedes meruit migtare ſupernas.
Gaudia Martyribus addens concivis eorum
Factus ibi ætherea cum Chriſto regnat in aula.
Viſio cujus eum ſic paſcit ſola, quod ipſo
Dum ſemper fruitur nunquam faſtidia ſentit:
Cujus ab interitu valde pars Catholicorum
Infirmata dolet, & pars adverſa ſuberbit.
Sed nec Amalricus ejuſdem nobilis heres
Patris onus ſubiens, ætate inſufficienti,
Tot contra fortes ſolus pugnare valebat.
Philippidos, lib. XII.

A. D. 1218.

Amauri de Montfort Earl of Leicester.

UPON the death of Simon de Montfort at Toulouſe, the earldom of Leiceſter was claimed by his eldeſt ſon Amauri, the ſixth of that name and family, who were lords of Montfort [1].

Before his father's death he aſſiſted him in the war againſt the count of Toulouſe; and at the ſiege of that city commanded a fourth part of his father's army; and, after the latter's death, received the homage of the French nobles eſtabliſhed in the territories of count Raymond as count of Toulouſe: but finding himſelf not able to recover Toulouſe, or cope with young Raymond, in the year 1219 he agreed to yield to the king of France all the rights he had in the county of Toulouſe, in conſideration of the reverſion of the conſtable's ſtaff, then enjoyed by Matthew de Montmorency, called The Great, Amauri's maternal uncle. Upon the death of Simon de Montfort the elder, this Amauri aſſumed likewiſe the title of earl of Leiceſter; but Henry king of England did not chuſe to reinſtate him in that earldom. In the year 1214, this Amauri was eſpouſed at Carcaſſone to Beatrice de Bourgogne-Viennois, daughter of Andrew of Bourgogne and of Beatrice of Sabran-Caſtellard. She was very young at the time of her marriage, which therefore was not conſummated till the year 1222.

In the month of February, 1230, 14 Henry III. this Almaric earl of Montfort, and right heir to the earldom of Leiceſter, by his petition to that king, craved, that he would vouchſafe to reſtore him, or, if not him, his brother Simon, to all the lands and right which he the ſaid Almaric had and ought to have in England, and of which his father, as he alleged, died ſeiſed. His petition was as follows; and is inſerted here for its politeneſs and elegance [2]:

"Excellentiſſimo domino ſuo Henrico, D. G. illuſtri Anglorum regi, Almaricus comes Montisfortis & Leiceſtrie ſalutem in eo qui dat ſalutem regibus, & cum omni ſubjectione tam debitâ quam devotâ ad obſequia famulatus—Veſtre regie majeſtati multoties ſupplicavi humiliter & devotè ut mihi terram meam & jus meum, quod habeo & habere debeo in Angliâ (quod bone memorie pater meus de veſtro tenuit, & tenebat dum deceſſit pacificè & quietè) mihi veſtro militi redderetis. Quod quia dominationi veſtre non placuit hucuſque facere, adhuc veſtre majeſtati ſupplico humilitate qua poſſum, quatenus hâc vice mihi (vobis ſervire parato, ſicut decuit) reddere dignaremini terram meam. Et ſi hoc vobis non placuerit, ego ad pedes dominationis veſtre tranſmitto Simonem fratrem meum, qui de domino rege Francie nihil tenet; cui ſi eam reddideritis, me pro bene payato tenerem. Dat. Pariſiis, menſe Feb.

By another petition he alſo deſired, that the tertius denarius comitatûs Leiceſtriæ might be yielded to his ſaid brother Simon [3].

The king replied [4], that he would reſtore all the ſaid lands in England [5], parcel of the honor of Leiceſter, cum tertio denario comitatûs, to the ſaid Simon, ſo ſoon as he could get them out of the hands of Ranulph Earl of Cheſter and Lincoln, to whom he had formerly granted them.

Lewis VIII. died in 1226; and the kingdom of France fell under the adminiſtration of his queen Blanche, their ſon Lewis IX. being then only about twelve years old. Amauri count of Montfort was among the principal counſellors of ſtate in ſettling the regency of France, and aſſiſting queen Blanche in ſupporting the authority of the crown againſt a powerful confederacy of the vaſſals, who took occaſion, from the weakneſs of the French government at that criſis, to excite diſturbances. But Amauri's connexion with the court of France, and his expectation of the high office of hereditary conſtable, did not induce him to renounce his pretenſions to the earldom of Leiceſter. He aſſumed that title, as the heir of Simon de Montfort the firſt.

And here cloſes our memoir of Amauri in quality of earl of Leiceſter; which title and honour may be ſuppoſed very ſoon after, to be, if not actually conveyed, at leaſt firmly aſſured to Simon de Montfort, fourth ſon of the hero of that name, who acquired ſo much glory in his war with the Albigenſian heretics.

Memoir of Simon de Montfort II. Earl of Leicester.

MATTHEW PARIS relates, that in 1226 happened a diſpute between Simon de Montfort and Reymund count of Toulouſe. The former, he ſays, claimed reſtitution of the fief of the count of Thoulouſe, which he alleged the lord Pope and Philip king of France had beſtowed upon him and his father: That Simon preferred his claim in a great legatine council of French biſhops and clergy held at Bourges, and exhibited the charters made in his favour by the Pope and the king of France; and inſiſted that count Reymund was convicted and condemned for hereſy in a general council at Rome, and ſentenced to loſe the greater part of the land, which, notwithſtanding, he ſtill held. And the hiſtorian adds, that count Reymund offered to refer the whole matter to the deciſion of the king of France and the French peers; and that the legate declined meddling in the diſpute, thinking it proper, before he proceeded, to make the pope and king of France acquainted with what had paſſed.

---

[1] P. Anſelme.

[2] Ex archivis ducatus Lancaſtriæ.

[3] Pat. 14 H. III. m. 6.

[4] Vide ut ſupra.

[5] Quind. Paſch. 23 H. III. 1239.

Paris ſays no more of this affair. And the ſtory ſeems to ſtand in much need of corroborative evidence. For, what right could Simon de Montfort have to the earldom of Thoulouſe, when he had an elder brother, to whom it muſt have deſcended by right of primogeniture? But the relation is hardly credible, even upon ſuppoſition that the claimant was the elder branch of the Montfort family.

For how could Amauri, Simon's elder brother, who had made a formal ſurrender of it to the king of France, in conſideration of the reverſion of the office of conſtable, to which he ſucceeded ſoon afterwards, move any queſtion of right to that earldom? Perhaps, however, our Simon might have juſt pretenſions to ſome part of the lands of the earl of Thoulouſe, as a younger ſon of Simon de Montfort the elder, who was inſtated in the earldom of Thoulouſe, and never made any renunciation of it[1]. And it appears that Philip of Montfort was actually provided for out of the family-acquiſitions in thoſe parts.

Matthew lord of Montmorenci, and conſtable of France, died Nov. 24, 1230[2]; and was ſucceeded in his high office by Amauri count of Montfort and Leiceſter, according to the act of Lewis VIII.

The reaſon aſſigned, by Thomas Walſingham, for Simon de Montfort's quitting France, was his fear of Blanche the queen regent, whoſe diſpleaſure he had incurred. No other author known to the compiler of theſe pages has mentioned this circumſtance, nor do the hiſtories of that time enable us to explain it.

P. Daniel, in his large French Hiſtory, reports, that Simon de Montfort was received very graciouſly in England, and, upon condition of his not living in France, obtained by the gift of king Henry III. the third penny or earldom of the county of Leiceſter, which had been his father's. The Annaliſt of Dunſtaple ſays, he got the ſeiſin of it in the year 1231; but the Hiſtorian, as well as the Annaliſt, ſeem to place this event too early[3]; for, the name of Simon de Montfort appears to a grant of Ranulph earl of Cheſter of the earldom of Lincoln to Hawiſe de Quency without the title of earl of Leiceſter. Probably Simon de Montfort did not get the earldom of Leiceſter till the death of this Ranulph[4], who deceaſed, without iſſue male, on Oct. 25, 1132, 16 Hen. III. It appears, from our public records, that he was earl of Leiceſter in the eighteenth year of the reign of Henry III. Probably, therefore, the earl of Cheſter kept it till his deceaſe.

Henry de Knyghton, an hiſtorian of the fifteenth century, and a canon of Leiceſter, reports, that, by the king's gift, Simon de Montfort obtained the honour of Hinckley, as well as the earldom of Leiceſter. By which he means to ſuggeſt, that he became by the grant of Hinckley hereditary ſeneſchal of England. Of which we ſhall ſay more preſently.

The age of Simon de Montfort is not mentioned by any author known to us. In an altercation he had with the king's uterine brother William de Leſignan, in the year 1258, the latter called him an old traitor. Whether he deſerved the name of traitor will appear hereafter. The epithet old was probably uſed with more propriety. But, from the vigour of his mind and body, from the lead he took in the baron's war, from his perſonal proweſs in arms at the time of his fall at Eveſham about ſeven years afterwards, we may conclude, that, when his enemy called him old, he could ſcarcely be more than fifty-five. It has been mentioned already, that his father was married to Alicia of Montmorency before the year 1190; but it could not be long before that year; for, Amauri their eldeſt ſon was made a knight (which ceremony was ſeldom performed before the party was towards manhood) in the year 1213, and was old enough to take a perſonal ſhare in the war of Thoulouſe, and command a third part of the army before his father's death, and the whole of it immediately afterwards. All which particulars ſhew, that he muſt have arrived at manhood when Simon de Montfort was killed before Thoulouſe. Upon theſe grounds, and that of there being ſeveral children between Amauri and Simon, the age of the latter may be ſuppoſed to coincide nearly with the commencement of the thirteenth century.

Simon de Montfort, having attained theſe honours in England, had not been long in poſſeſſion of them before Fortune ſeemed diſpoſed to give him freſh marks of her favour. In the year 1233, Joan, counteſs of Flanders and Holland, and a peer of France, daughter and heir of Baldwin, the ninth count of Flanders, and emperor of Conſtantinople, became a widow, by the death of Ferdinand, infant of Portugal, to whom ſhe had been married in 1211. If Ferdinand left any iſſue, it was a daughter, who died ſoon after her father. The earl of Leiceſter aſpired to a matrimonial alliance with the counteſs Joan; to which he was probably impelled by ambition; for, Joan at this time could not be much leſs than fifty years of age. Father Daniel has left us the following account of this buſineſs. This lord (ſays he, meaning the earl of Leiceſter) a man of great merit, who had acquired much property and reputation in England, was in a fair way of marrying the counteſs of Flanders; to effect which, a treaty had been opened. But the king of France, in a negotiation which paſſed between him and Joan, took care to make a ſtipulation, whereby the latter laid herſelf under an engagement not to take for an huſband an enemy of the ſtate; and ſuch the Engliſh were conſidered by France. In conſequence of this article, ſhe was obliged to break off her match with the earl of Leiceſter; and, in the year 1236, ſhe gave her hand to Thomas of Savoy, maternal uncle of the queen of France, and brother of Peter of Savoy, and of Boniface archbiſhop of Canterbury. But, before Joan beſtowed her perſon upon the Savoyard, ſhe was obliged to make oath, that ſhe was not already wedded to Simon de Montfort.

On Jan. 20, 1236, king Henry III. kept a moſt magnificent fete at Weſtminſter, in honour of his queen Alianora of Provence[5], to whom he had been lately married, and who was crowned on that day; on this occaſion the king alſo wore his crown. The earl of Leiceſter aſſiſted as grand maſter of the ceremonies, or ſeneſchal of England, which office he claimed as his inheritance; according to ſome as lord of Hinckley; as others think, as earl of Leiceſter. Roger de Bigot, earl of Norfolk, one of the greateſt lords of the kingdom, oppoſed this claim of the earl of Leiceſter, and the affair ſeems to have been warmly agitated. Bigot maintained, that it had been in his family of old time. And of this there ſeems to be ſome proof; for Henry II. (as appears from his charter[6]) granted to Hugh Bigot his ſeneſchalſhip, to hold ſo freely, and acquietedly, as Roger his father had held it in the time of his grandfather king Henry I. And, by another charter, king Richard I. reſtored this office to Roger his ſon, in theſe words: "Know ye, that we have reſtored to him his ſeneſchalcy, and to his heirs, as freely, entirely, and honourably to have it, as Roger Bigot his grandfather, and earl Hugh his father, had done." This Roger Bigot was a Norman, to whom William I. gave great poſſeſſions in England. From the charter of Richard I. juſt cited, he was the king's ſeneſchal. He died in 1107, 7 Hen. I. and was ſucceeded by his ſon William, who was alſo ſeneſchal of that king, as was his brother Hugh, who ſucceeded William. This Hugh held the office of ſeneſchal in the year 1135; in which year Henry I. died; and, by the exertion and oath of this Hugh Bigot, who was about the perſon of Henry I. at the latter's death, the latter was ſucceeded by Stephen earl of Blois; for which kindneſs Stephen raiſed Hugh to the earldom of Norfolk, which dignity was afterwards granted him afreſh by king Henry II[1]. And, by the ſame charter, he had a grant of the office of ſeneſchal, or ſteward, to hold and enjoy in as ample a manner as Roger Bigot his father held the ſame in the time of Henry I.

---

[1] P. Anſelme. [2] Anſelme. P. Daniel. [3] Dugdale's Bar. [4] Matt. Weſtm.

[5] Matt. Paris. Dudg. Bar. Hearne's Curious Tracts. High Steward of England.

[6] Henry II. granted to Hugh Bigot, "Dapiferatum ſuum ita liberè & quietè habendum, ſicut pater ejus Rogerus melius & liberius tenuit tempore regis Henrici avi mei." Again, king Richard I. reſtored this office to Roger his ſon in theſe words: "Sciatis etiam nos ei reddidiſſe ſeneſchalciam ſuam, & heredibus ſuis, ita liberè, integrè, & honorificè habendum, ſicut Rogerus Bygot avus ſuus, & comes Hugo pater ſuus, habuerunt." High Steward of England, pamphlet in 8vo, 1776. Seneſchalcia & Dapiferatus are ſynonyms.

But, notwithſtanding the above charters and long poſſeſſion in the houſe of Bigot, Simon de Montfort I. earl of Leiceſter, litigated the matter with the earl of Norfolk, and claimed the ſeneſchalcy; by ſhewing, we may ſuppoſe, the priority of the grant to ſome of the former earls of Leiceſter, whoſe dignities this Simon de Montfort enjoyed. Judgement was given in favour of the earl of Leiceſter; but clogged with condition, that the earl ſhould give to the earl of Norfolk the ſervices of ten knights, and that the earl of Norfolk ſhould thereupon remit his whole claim to the ſeneſchalcy. Accordingly, the ſervices of ſeven knights and a half were granted by the earl of Leiceſter to the earl of Norfolk; but two and a half remained in arrear, which kept up the diſpute. The affair, therefore, was again diſcuſſed in the fifth year of Henry III. in a great council between Roger earl of Norfolk, and Ranulph earl of Cheſter, who then held the earldom of Leiceſter; and, by judgment of this high court, the earl of Cheſter was ſentenced to render to earl Roger the remainder of the knights fiefs; which implies a ſecond ſolemn adjudication in favour of the houſe of Leiceſter. Still the ſervices remained unpaid at the time of Alianora's coronation; which induced the earl of Norfolk to renew his claim upon that occaſion. I ſuppoſe it was again brought before the council of magnates, or great council. The earl of Leiceſter defended, by alleging, that, according to the law or uſage of the realm, Roger might obtain his arrears in the king's court, and that he (the earl of Leiceſter) ought not to be obſtructed in executing the office of ſeneſchal, when he acknowledged the agreement, and his obligation to fulfil it. And ſo the earl of Leiceſter performed the office at the ſaid coronation.

The ſeneſchalcy, which was ſo warmly diſputed, is called in our records and chronicles, the dapiferate, the ſeneſchalcy of the king, and the ſeneſchalcy of the king's houſehold; which might raiſe a ſuſpicion that the queſtion concerned the ſtewardſhip of the king's houſehold, and not the hereditary high ſtewardſhip of England. But I have no doubt but that the thing contended for was the high ſtewardſhip of England. The ſtewardſhip enjoyed by the family of Bigot was hereditary, or de feodo, as appears both by the charters of Henry II. and Richard I. and by its deſcending to the heirs of that houſe. But the ſtewardſhip of the houſehold was never, that I know, hereditary. Again, if it had been ſo, the earls of Leiceſter, after the adjudications of the great council would have been hereditary ſtewards of the houſehold, but there are no traces of any ſuch thing. Nor need the calling of the ſeneſchal of England by the name of king's ſeneſchal, as it is in the patents quoted, of much weight; for the office regarding the perſon of the king, and the ſolemnities of his court, it might as well be called the ſeneſchalcy of the king, as the feudal offices of marſhal, conſtable, chamberlain, and the like, were called marſhal, &c. of the king; nor does the title of ſeneſchal of the king's houſehold, given to it by our chronicles, oblige us to conclude, the office ſpoken of was merely that of the ſteward of the houſehold, that name being naturally given to an office of the firſt diſtinction in the houſehold, and exerciſed no where elſe. In the court of France, which ſeems to have been the pattern of the Engliſh court, after the duke of Normandy became king of England, the hereditary ſeneſchal of France received the homage of the ſteward of the houſehold, and was attended by him, in quality, as it ſhould ſeem, of his lieutenant and vaſſal; and, probably, the ſteward of the king's houſehold ſtood nearly in the ſame relation to the hereditary high ſteward of England, which accounts for the title of High; which would have been needleſs had there been no other ſeneſchal in the court of England.

Former diſappointments did not make our earl give over the thoughts of matching himſelf with ſome lady of great diſtinction. An opportunity of this ſort ſoon happened; and he ſeems to have been very active in improving it. The beautiful and elegant Alianora was at this time in a ſtate of widowhood. She was ſiſter of Henry III. and, in the year 1224, had been married to William Mareſchal the younger, earl of Pembroke, who, about ſeven years afterwards, was ſnatched away by untimely death, and left her without children.

M. Paris, ſpeaking of king Henry's ardent affection for this earl, repreſents him as making the following lamentation at his funeral, which the king attended in perſon —Alas! alas! is not the blood of St. Thomas the martyr yet avenged?

There was a great impediment in Alianora's way towards a ſecond marriage. Upon the death of the earl of Pembroke, ſhe had taken the vow of perpetual chaſtity in the preſence of holy Edmund archbiſhop of Canterbury. She had betrothed herſelf to Chriſt by receiving the ring, but had not taken the habit and the veil of a religious. Some, therefore, thought ſhe might return to the world, at leaſt by a papal diſpenſation; while the more ſtrict ones conceived, ſhe was bound by her vow for life, and that it was not even in the pope's power to ſet her free[2]. In the beginning of the year 1238, the king held his court at Weſtminſter, and, on Jan. 8, gave his ſiſter Alienor in marriage to Simon de Montfort, and delivered her to him with his own hand in a little chapel[3] adjoining to the king's chamber; Walter, the king's chaplain, performed the ſervice, and ſaid maſs. The earl received her with great joy and gratitude, not only on account of her perſonal accompliſhments, but for the ſplendour of her birth, and royal connexions; her brother being king of England, and her two ſiſters, one empreſs of Almaine, and the other queen of Scotland.

The king's conduct upon this occaſion greatly offended the barons[4], whoſe diſpleaſure was increaſed by his making up a match two or three weeks afterward between Richard de Clare earl of Glouceſter, a great ward of the crown[5], and Maud, daughter of the earl of Lincoln, who enjoyed the king's favour in an eminent degree.

---

[1] Dugd. Bar.

[2] There was a queſtion of this ſort agitated in the beginning of the reign of Henry I. upon that king's marrying Matilda, daughter of the king of Scots. This lady had been educated from her tender years in the nunneries of Wilton and Rumſey, and wore the veil, the badge of holy profeſſion. When, therefore, the king deſired her in marriage, the matter created a diſpute, nor would the archbiſhop of Canterbury conſent to the marriage till lawful witneſſes were brought, who ſwore ſhe had worn the veil without profeſſion on account of ſuitors, for ſhe had determined not to marry beneath her rank. But, after Matilda had borne the king two children, one of each ſex, ſhe deſiſted from the king's bed, and left the court, and being wrapped in hair-cloth under her regal robe, ſhe uſed to tread the threſholds of the churches with naked feet in Lent. Malmsbury, p. 164.

[3] I ſuppoſe St. Stephen's chapel.

[4] Matt. Paris. Chr. Joh. Abb. S. Petri de Burgo.

[5] King Henry (as appears by his letters patent of the 21ſt of his reign) made a grant to the earl of Lincoln, that, in caſe the king could not attract the earl of Marche to his ſervice by the marriage of Richard de Clare with a daughter of the ſaid earl before the feaſt of St. Hilary next (Jan. 12, 1238), then this John earl of Lincoln ſhould have the marriage of the ſame Richard for his eldeſt daughter; for which grant he promiſed 5000 marks, whereof the king acquitted to him 2000; where-

The earls and barons of England took inſtant fire at theſe clandeſtine matches [1], which the king had preſumed to bring about by the advice of foreign counſellors, and without the participation of his Engliſh grandees, to whom he had lately pledged himſelf to do nothing of conſequence but with their concurrence. At the head of this party was Richard earl of Cornwall, the king's brother, whom the king repented to have made ſo rich and powerful, and between whom and the king there was no good underſtanding. Richard reproached the king with great warmth for diſpoſing of his ſiſter without his participation, and that of the baronage, in direct breach of his word, never to act ſeparately from them.

"The city of London, and the people in general, ſupported the earl of Cornwall [2]. The whole nation was thrown into confuſion. Almoſt all the great men aſſembled immediately in Southwark [3], and were inclined to fall inſtantly upon the earls of Leiceſter and Lincoln, and were determined to make the king keep to his engagements. Henry promiſed reformation, and their fury ſubſided. In the mean while the earl of Leiceſter humbled himſelf to earl Richard, and, by the help of friendly interceſſions and preſents, obtained his forgiveneſs. The earl of Lincoln did the ſame, and with like ſucceſs, and gave ſecurity for making ample ſatisfaction for his offence. Richard was ſeverely cenſured by his partizans for compromiſing matters ſo eaſily, and charged with the want of courage and firmneſs, and never thoroughly recovered the good opinion of the public. Otto the papal legate then in England, and William elect of Valence the queen's uncle, and the king's favourite, uſed their good offices to appeaſe the commotion; which did not end, however but with the removal of the earls of Leiceſter and Lincoln from the king's counſels [4]."

It was the opinion of many perſons, that the earl of Leiceſter's marriage was no better than a mere nullity [5]. It was ſtrongly condemned by Edmund archbiſhop of Canterbury, a prelate univerſally revered for the fervency of his piety. The biſhop of Lincoln, another eminently good man, propheſied, that the children of this unhallowed match would never be fortunate in life [6]. Such offence was taken to it upon divers accounts, that the earl found he had loſt the hearts of all the great men; and at length even the king joined in the outcry againſt him. His heart was almoſt broken with grief under the weight of his calamity. He therefore privately embarked for the continent [7], and, having previouſly collected a very large ſum of money (towards which one citizen of Leiceſter advanced him 500 marks), he took his journey to the court of Rome, which he hoped would gratify his wiſhes with the help of the money he brought with him. In his way he viſited his brother-in-law Frederic emperor of Germany, with whom he ſo ingratiated himſelf by taking a ſhare in one of his military expeditions, that that prince ſupported his ſuit with all the intereſt he had at the court of Rome; to which Montfort made the beſt of his way. There, for a very large ſum of money paid and promiſed, he obtained his requeſt. And the pope wrote to his legate then in England, directing him to pronounce ſentence in form for eſtabliſhing his marriage; which conduct of the pope was much objected to by many people in England, and thought to be totally repugnant to the eccleſiaſtical laws. And ſome denied that the pope could, by any authority he had, ratify a marriage of this ſort. The earl returned to England about the middle of October, and was received with the kindeſt welcome by the king, who, in token of perfect reconciliation, honoured him with the kiſs of peace. At the ſame time the whole royal party took him into their favour. During his abſence, the counteſs Alienor remained at the caſtle of Kenilworth, where ſhe was delivered of her firſt ſon in the beginning of December, "for the ſtrength and comfort of the realm; for, it was feared the queen would be barren [8]." On his arrival at Kenilworth he was laid up with a grievous ſickneſs, which brought him to death's door. He ſtayed at Kenilworth till his ſon was baptized, thinking, that by ſo doing he ſhould pleaſe the king. And, on the day of the chriſtening, his indiſpoſition began.

On his return to England, the king conſtituted him his principal miniſter, his firſt counſellor, or high juſtice [9].

"On the day of the purification of the bleſſed Virgin, an. 1239, the lord king beſtowed the earldom of Leiceſter upon Simon de Montfort, and inveſted him in the ſame [10]; Amauri, or Almeric, brother of Simon, having been firſt invited over and ſatisfied; leſt at any time he ſhould move a queſtion upon it [11]." Amauri accordingly came over, and, in the preſence of the king, of the papal legate, the earls of Cornwall, Lincoln, Hereford, and other great perſons, made a deed of ſurrender at Weſtminſter ſoon after Eaſter, for himſelf and his heirs, to Simon de Montfort and his heirs, of the whole moiety of the earldom, with all its appurtenances [12]. The other moiety, the reader will remember, had, in the early part of king John, gone to the houſe of Quenci.

Upon the 21ſt of June, 1239, the earl of Leiceſter aſſiſted at the ſuperb ceremony of baptizing Edward the king's firſt and new-born ſon.

The next thing we find in the chronicles concerning the earl of Leiceſter is a curious trait of the age, upon which the reader will be at liberty to make his own comments. It ſtrongly evinces king Henry's abſurd ſuperſtition, and total want of decorum in his manners. We can hardly account for ſo ſtrange an incident, but on the ſuppoſition that the earl and counteſs had not long ſince incurred papal excommunication.

On the 9th of Auguſt [13], the lords and ladies met to attend the queen to her churching, or purification [14], after her lying-in. The earl and counteſs of Leiceſter came among others. The king, as ſoon as he ſaw them appear in the church, called the earl an excommunicated man, and forbad both him and his wife to be preſent at the king's holy ſolemnities; and at the ſame time he charged Montfort with diſhonouring his ſiſter wickedly and clandeſtinely before marriage; and alleged That, as the reaſon of his conſenting to the match, which, he ſaid he did to avoid ſcandal, and againſt his inclinations. He added, "that "Alianor's vow might not hinder the marriage, thou upon, in the beginning of February 1238, the earl of Glouceſter was married to Maud the earl of Lincoln's daughter, and the lady endowed with a third part of all his lands. Before this marriage was accompliſhed the young earl had been ſecretly contracted to Margaret, daughter to Hubert de Burg, by the ſuppoſed management of Hubert and his wife. This aggravated the king's wrath againſt Hubert, and the contract was ſuperſeded. Dugd. Bar.

---

[1] M. Paris and M. Weſtm.

[2] M. Paris.

[3] It was their cuſtom to aſſemble with a large military ſuite, and in arms.

[4] M. Weſtm.

[5] M. Paris.

[6] Walter Hemingford, p. 560. and Knygton, p. 2426.

[7] This ſeems to have been in the ſpring of the year 1238, ſhortly after the earl's marriage.

[8] M. Paris.

[9] "The king now made him his chief favourite and miniſter. All public affairs were committed to his management; all preferments depended upon his pleaſure; all favours within the king's diſpoſal paſſed through him." Sir Robert Cotton's Remains. Upon what authority this is advanced, the author has not diſcovered.

[10] He girded him with the ſword of the county. Preface to Dugd. Bar. p. 3; and Selden's Titles, part II. ch. 5.

[11] M. Paris, p. 409.

[12] See the inſtruments, in Appendix, N° XV.

[13] M. Paris.

[14] Theſe purifications of women after delivery were wont to be celebrated, if the party could afford it, with a vaſt profuſion of wax tapers. William the Conqueror was much ſwelled in his belly a ſhort time before his death. The king of France, hearing of his being confined with this diſorder, ſaid, jocularly, "The king of England keeps at home, to take care of himſelf, like a woman that expects to be delivered." William retorted, "As ſoon as I go to maſs after my lying in, centum millia candelabrum ei libabo;" alluding to the conflagrations he would kindle in France in revenge of this affront. Upon ſuch ſlight occaſions did the kings of that time waſte the property and deſtroy the lives of mankind. Bleſſed effects of chivalry!

“ wenteſt to Rome, and there, by immenſe bribes, corrupted the Roman court, and accompliſhed thy unlawful ends. And, when you could not raiſe all the money for which you ſtood engaged, you was deſervedly excommunicated. To crown your preſumption, without my advice or privity, you made me your ſecurity by falſe teſtimony.” The earl was abaſhed at theſe imputations, and retired with his counteſs in confuſion. The ſee of Wincheſter being then vacant, the king had ſome time before given him leave to make uſe of the epiſcopal palace in Southwark for his accommodation. Thither he and the counteſs repaired by water from the abbey of Weſtminſter. But the king ordered them to be turned out immediately. And, though they beſought the king with tears and lamentations to give them leave to return, they could not prevail with him or aſſuage his wrath. To avoid the farther effects of his diſpleaſure, the earl and counteſs at the cloſe of the ſame day went down the Thames in a very little boat, with a few domeſtics, and croſſed the water[1].

He returned to England the firſt of April, the next year (1240), and was very graciouſly received by the king and all the great people about him. His wife remained abroad, being again pregnant. He repaired to his own lands, and collected money by the ſale of woods and lands, towards defraying his expences to Jeruſalem, whither he was minded to go with all ſpeed as an atonement for the ſin of his marriage, which exceedingly oppreſſed his conſcience[2]. He ſold one fine wood to the hoſpitallers and canons of Leiceſter for about 1000*l.* Several young noblemen had held a meeting towards the concluſion of 1239 to take the croſs the year following[3]. Richard earl of Cornwall inliſted among the new croiſſes, and embarked for the Eaſt about Midſummer 1240. His leaving England at this time was conſidered by the nation as a great misfortune, the people looking on him as the only one who could put a check upon the king's partiality for foreigners, to whoſe rapacity and inſolence they now conſidered themſelves as the certain victims. Richard alleged it as one reaſon for his leaving England that he foreſaw the deſolation of the kingdom, and was ſuppoſed to be capable of preventing it, which, as he was not, he did not chuſe to remain in it[4].

The count of Montfort, conſtable of France, had gone to Paleſtine towards the latter end of the former year with a reinforcement of troops, and was ſoon after taken priſoner by the infidels in a battle fought before the city of Gaza[5]; whence he was carried a captive to Grand Cairo, and there remained till the year 1241, when he was releaſed, but died on his return home. The earl of Montfort's captivity made great impreſſion on the mind of his brother the earl of Leiceſter, and might induce him to wiſh to reach the holy land as ſoon as poſſible. The emperor of Germany was much concerned at the earl of Montfort's and ſome other French lords falling into the hands of the Saracens, and wrote immediately to the ſultan, commanding him, upon pain of vengeance, to treat his noble priſoners with all poſſible humanity and reſpect.

The annaliſt of Dunſtaple reports, that the earl of Leiceſter accompanied the earl of Glouceſter to the holy land; but we find, from certain paſſages of his life, to be related eight years afterwards, that he had not yet gone to Paleſtine; and Mat. Paris ſays expreſsly, that his vow had been poſtponed to the earl's great uneaſineſs.

In the ſummer of 1242, he went with king Henry upon his ill-adviſed and unfortunate attempt againſt Poitou, which the French king had declared to be forfeited by the king of England, and had given as a fief of the crown of France to his brother Alphonſo. King Henry, who had no ſteadineſs or will of his own, was uſually the dupe of ſome mercenary faction of foreigners. He embarked in the raſh ſcheme of invading Poitou at the inſtigation of his mother Iſabel (nicknamed Jeſabel, for her abominable diſpoſition), and her huſband the count de la Marche and their party. His council of Engliſh grandees, conſiſting of the prelates, earls, and barons, was ſummoned upon the occaſion to give their advice, or rather in truth to furniſh the means of carrying this project into execution, for he was already determined to go, whethey approved of it or not. There was but one mind among them on the propriety of the expedition; and they were well ſatisfied concerning the adviſers of it. Before they gave their opinions upon it in form they bound themſelves, upon pain of anathema, that not one of them would yield to the king's importunity on the ſubject of aid. Accordingly, when the king preſſed them to give him a pecuniary ſupply, they anſwered with great aſperity, that he had committed himſelf in the preſent affair without their advice, and in his aſking them for money had acted very impudently. They told him there were no bounds to his exactions; that thereby they were brought under the moſt abject yoke of ſlavery; that they were tired of giving, and would ſubmit no longer to be plucked and plundered. Henry, not being able to get any ſupply from the aſſembly of his great men, extorted what money he could from individuals, coaxing ſome and threatning to treat thoſe who refuſed as public enemies, and haraſſing them different ways by his emiſſaries. He was cloſely employed in this buſineſs all through Lent, and ſqueezed privately out of the prelates, and religious, and burgeſſes, a prodigious ſum of money, with which he embarked for Gaſcogne on Eaſter Monday, A° 1242.

The effect of this war in Poitou was diſgrace, defeat, and bankruptcy, on the part of the king, and additional deteſtation throughout England of his evil adviſers. The great people, oppreſſed, pillaged, inſulted, and betrayed, by their prince, grew clamorous at his mal-adminiſtration. They had the mortification likewiſe to ſee the king detained ſeveral months at Bourdeaux, by his ſubjects of Guienne, in a condition little better than that of a priſoner. The earl of Cornwall and ſix other Engliſh earls, though they did not approve of the war of Poitou, had been perſuaded to accompany the king in it. The earl of Leiceſter acquired ſingular honour at the famous battle of Xaintes, where he gave gave remarkable proofs of proweſs, and by a bold exertion prevented king Henry from falling into the hands of the French. After the campaign he remained ſome time with him at Bourdeaux, where he had his ſhare of the diſtreſs and poverty, to which the king and all the Engliſh that were with him were expoſed.

The king's connections at Bourdeaux, with the king of Arragon and count of Toulouſe, the hereditary enemies of the houſe of Montfort, who were perpetually vilifying the memory of Simon de Montfort the elder, made the earl of Leiceſter's ſtay at Bourdeaux ſo diſagreeable to him, that he left the king there, and returned to England, before the end of that year. King Henry was under the neceſſity of remaining at Bourdeaux. The earl was nearly ruined, as were ſeveral others of the Engliſh nobility, by the expences of this unfortunate campaign. In the ſpring of the year 1245, the death of Gilbert de Humfrevill, a baron of the North, and keeper for the king in that part of his realm, afforded the latter an opportunity of requiting the ſervices of the earl of Leiceſter, and giving him a ſtrong proof of regard. Gilbert left an infant ſon; the wardſhip of whom the king immediately granted to our earl, to the diſappointment of earl Richard, the king's brother, who had deſired it.

---

[1] The chronicler of Dunſtable, alluding to this ſubject, has only theſe words: “ Eodem anno Simon de Monteforti comes Legeceſtriæ cum comitiſſa de Pembroc ſorore regis in exilium ſe miſerunt, præ timore, a rege fugientes.” P. 241.

[2] Perhaps he had made his peace with the king upon condition that he atoned for his crime by taking the croſs.

[3] M. Paris. [4] P. Daniel. [5] M. Paris.

It is a well-founded opinion of modern times, that the loſs of the Anglo-gallic provinces was a very fortunate event for England. Diſcerning men, who lived in the time of Henry III, ſeem to have adopted a ſimilar opinion. The ſloth and deteſtability of John Lackland was in a great meaſure the cauſe of this loſs. At his deceaſe, nothing remained to England, on the other ſide the ſea, but Poitou and Gaſcogne, which term comprehended Guienne. When we recollect the extenſive and magnificent fiefs enjoyed by John's father upon clear and undiſputed title, and which Henry II, the moſt powerful prince of his time, ſeemed ſo likely to tranſmit to future kings of England, it muſt raiſe our wonder to ſee ſo vaſt a territory ſo ſuddenly raviſhed from his deſcendants. Henry III. was more likely to loſe what he had than to recover what was loſt. Unlike his anceſtors, he had not one particle of a warrior in his conſtitution; and all his projects of a military ſort drew upon him the contempt of the Engliſh milice. He, however, either by the impulſe of his own nature, as very weak men have ſometimes a ſenſibility in certain particulars heterogeneal from their general character, or by the inſtigation of particular perſons of his confidence, was awake to the deſire of regaining what had been loſt, or at leaſt of preventing farther ravages of the ſame ſort. For theſe purpoſes he occaſionally put forth an exertion which ſhewed that the loſs of territory, revenue, and ſubjects, as he conceived, was to him far from a matter of indifference. But the barons of England, either from deſpair of ſucceſs, or from conviction that the conteſt would be more expenſive than profitable, ſhewed very little diſpoſition to enter heartily into any ſchemes concerning their king's foreign dominions.

About the year 1240, both Poitou and Gaſcogne gave the king very ſerious alarm, and the danger they were both in from factions within, and the arms of France from without, inſpired him with reſolution to prevent, if poſſible, the loſs of one or both of them. In that year the ſeneſchal, or lieutenant, of Gaſcogne was expelled the dutchy, and obliged to take refuge in England; where he aſſured the king, with ſincere and deep concern, that, if he did not guard againſt it by the moſt vigilant conduct, he would ſoon be without a foot of land within the pale of the French empire.

In the year 1242, after much bickering and diſagreement with the univerſity of England, who highly diſapproved of the meaſures he had taken, as they ſaid, with aliens, incapable and ſuſpected perſons, refuſed to ſupport him by a general and pledged aſſent, and left him to equip himſelf for his voyage to Gaſcogne, and purſue his project, as he could. That expedition was both calamitous and diſgraceful. Poitou fell into the hands of the French, and Gaſcogne was hardly preſerved. While he was at Xantogne, in the year 1243, he gave that dutchy to his brother Richard earl of Cornwall, as a compenſation for Poitou, juſt ceded to France, and which had been part of Richard's appanage [1]. But this grant of Gaſcogne did not continue of long duration. It was wholly cancelled, and ſatisfaction made to the earl in regard of all his demands ſoon after. All that happened to king Henry in the courſe of this expedition had been foretold by his Engliſh barons, who, however, could ſcarcely brook the villanous uſage the king met with while he was in Gaſcogne. His poverty, and other adverſe accidents, kept him abroad three quarters of a year and upwards longer than he wiſhed or intended to ſtay there. Before he embarked for England, he appointed Nicholas de Molis to be his ſeneſchal of the dutchy. He reached England in October 1243. De Molis became engaged in war with the king of Navarre, who ſome years before had diſturbed the peace of the province; in this war the ſeneſchal acquired ſome reputation; but was not able to repreſs the Gaſcon malcontents, and reſtore tranquillity. In the beginning, therefore, of the year 1247, the king convened his nobles in parliament, and deſcribed to them his fears for Gaſcogne, which was then upon good grounds believed to be in imminent danger from the king of France, who was projecting the entire conqueſt of it. At this meeting, king Henry pointed out the danger of his Gallic dominions, the loſs of which, he ſaid, would not only be a diſgrace to England, but a very ſerious misfortune, as Bourdeaux alone neated a revenue of one thouſand marks a year. Here the hiſtorian drops the ſubject.

Within the ſame year the office of ſeneſchal of Gaſcogne was conferred upon William de Bueles, who had been mareſchal in the king's houſehold. De Bueles (ſays M. Paris) was a Norman; and, like the reſt of his countrymen, talked big, and did nothing. While he held the lieutenancy, the diſtractions there became every day more inflamed, the king's authority leſs reſpected, and the province in greater danger of being loſt. King Henry, therefore, was minded to beſtow the government of Gaſcogne upon his brother-in-law the earl of Leiceſter, "a man of martial ſpirit, well verſed in military affairs, and of a capacity ſuitable to ſo arduous a ſituation [2]." Prudent, probably, as was his choice as to the man, he could hardly be free from apprehenſions about raiſing the money that would be wanted for the earl's equipment. He had ſounded the community a year before, to no purpoſe, on the ſubject of an aid, and no intimation is given of any change of mind on their parts. The hiſtorian, indeed, does not expreſsly tell us, that his requeſt had been flatly denied; but that it was ſo we have no reaſon to doubt, from his aſſembling them again ſo ſoon after, and from the treatment he met with on his ſecond application, which was, as we may ſuppoſe, in perfect accord with the firſt. I ſhall tranſlate M. Paris's relation of this affair for the curioſity of it:

"In the beginning of the year 1248, viz. on the octaves of the Purification, the nobility [3] of the whole realm, being called together by royal edict, met at London; that they might diligently and effectually, in concurrence with the king, treat upon the affairs of the realm, which was then in a very diſturbed, impaired, and impoveriſhed, condition. There came, therefore, thither, beſides of barons, knights, nobles, and alſo of abbots, priors, and clerks, a large number, nine biſhops, with as many earls; namely, the archbiſhop of York, the biſhops of Winton, Lincoln, Norwich, Worceſter, Chicheſter, Ely, Rocheſter, Carliſle; earl Richard of Cornwall, the king's brother; earls of Leiceſter, Gloceſter, Winton, Hereford; earl Roger Bigod, mareſchal; earl of Oxon; and, beſides theſe, the earls of Lincoln, de Ferrers, de Warrenne, and Richmond, to wit, Peter of Savoy. But at this great meeting were not preſent Boniface archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was fighting for the pope in foreign parts, and the biſhop of Durham, who was a great way off, and an invalid. The biſhop of Bath had deceaſed a little before. And when the king began to ſolicit an AID, of which deſign the univerſity was apprized, he was ſharply taken to taſk, for not being aſhamed even to mention a thing of that nature; when, in the very laſt exaction, which had been very reluctantly complied with, he had actually pledged himſelf to his grandees, by his charter, not again to commit the ſame injury and oppreſſion. He was alſo moſt ſeverely rebuked, and no wonder! for his raſh invitation of aliens to this country, to whom he had prodigally and prodigiouſly diſtributed and diſperſed all the ſubſtance of the realm, and for marrying the nobles of it to ignoble foreigners: ſpurning and rejecting his indigenous and native people, and in making theſe marriages without even requiring the conſent of the parties who were thus diſpoſed of; which was the eſſential part of matrimony. He was blamed alſo, and not undeſervedly, for his mode of procuring victuals and drink

---

[1] Rymer.

[2] M. Paris.

[3] The reader is requeſted to peruſe the comments upon this recital of M. Paris before he proceeds. They will be found at the end of the memoir, marked [A] [B].

4

(particularly his wines), alſo his robes; all which were wont to be ſeized by violence againſt the will of the true owners, and of thoſe who ſold them; on which account, both native and foreign tradeſmen withdrew and hid themſelves; and goods were not imported, nor brought to market; trade became extremely injured, and the publick much diſtreſſed and incommoded; for, in truth, mercantile people, experiencing this vile treatment, went home full of invective and contemptuous reports of the king. In all theſe, and many more inſtances of rapine, the king ſeemed to ſtudy how to act the tyrant and madman. Even the poor fiſhermen were not ſuffered to ſell their fiſh in the markets, but were robbed of them, and glad to hurry for ſafety to the ſea, where they thought they ſhould be ſafer than on ſhore. Moreover, the poor huckſters were miſerably harraſſed by the king's agents in their bodies, and carts, and jaded horſes; being compelled to take away, and carry to a long diſtance, and through bad roads, and in bad weather, their goods, which had been wreſted from them by force. The king was likewiſe reprehended for keeping vacant ſees and abbies, and wardſhips of the crown, ſo long in his own hands, who held theſe things only in truſt as a guardian, and whoſe coronation-oath ought to have checked him from ſuch abuſes. He was likewiſe charged, by each and by all who complained vehemently againſt him, for not having, as the magnificent kings his predeceſſors had had, a juſticiary, a chancellor, and a treaſurer, by the common advice of the realm, as he ought to have done; whereas the perſons he had employed had no rule for their conduct but their own ſelf-intereſt, without the leaſt regard to their duty, or the public good."

"When the king had heard all theſe things, he ſhrunk within himſelf from mere ſhame, knowing that all theſe allegations were founded in truth. At the ſame time he had no ſincere remorſe, but counterfeited it, from an opinion, that by ſuch hypocriſy he ſhould be moſt likely to ſoften the aſſembly, and carry his point: they conſulted apart, and gave for anſwer, that time would ere long ſhew the ſincerity of the king's profeſſions; and that they would wait with patience to ſee the event. Every thing therefore was adjourned and reſpited to the quindenes of the Nativity of St. John the Baptiſt. But the lord king, either hardened by his own diſpoſition, or by the inſtigation of his courtiers, who wiſhed not to ſee his power abridged, became more bitter againſt his own people, and took care to correct none of his exceſſes, notwithſtanding the ſolemn promiſes he had made to his lieges [1]."

"At the time appointed, namely, on the quindenes of St. John Baptiſt, in the month of June, the whole nobility of England met at London, firmly believing, from the abſolute promiſe of the king, that, having renounced his errors, he would, by the divine grace aſſiſting him, incline to more wholeſome counſels. All the primates then of the realm being convened together, this ſtupid anſwer came from the royal mouth: "All ye, the primates of England, want to bend your lord king to your own unreaſonable will, and impoſe upon him a ſlaviſh condition; that ſo he might be haughtily denied to do what every one of you thinks himſelf at full liberty to do. For each of you may and does uſe whatſoever and whoſeſoever advice he thinks proper. And every father of a family prefers or ſets aſide any of his domeſtics, in this or that office, according to his pleaſure; which ye raſhly preſume to hinder your lord king from doing: whereas ſervants ought not to judge their lord, nor vaſſals their prince; nor is he to be reſtrained by their conditions. But, on the contrary, inferiors of every ſort ought to be controuled by the will of their ſuperiors, and to be ruled by their inclinations. For the ſervant is not above his lord, nor the diſciple above his maſter. And, in truth, your king would not be ſo, but as it were your ſervant, if he were thus brought under your will: wherefore he will neither amove the chancellor, juſticiar, nor treaſurer, as ye have propoſed, nor will he appoint others in their room." In like manner to other articles, calculated for his own benefit, he anſwered captiouſly. "He demands of you an aid of money to recover his rights in foreign parts; which rights concern yourſelves as well as him." When the magnates heard this, it was to their eyes clearer than light, that theſe things iſſued from his council; namely, from thoſe whoſe power and influence, if the baronage of the univerſity were attended to, would be ſoon utterly extinguiſhed. But ſeeing that they were anſwered craftily, and reſiſted, they all replied firmly, and with one voice, "that they would no longer be impoveriſhed to no manner of purpoſe, to the enriching of aliens, and filling them with pride, and to the ſtrengthening of ſuch as were in fact enemies both of king and kingdom;" as it lately happened in Poitou, and alſo in Gaſcogne, whither the king raſhly and haſtily, and againſt their poſitive advice and judgement, had made an expedition, attended with many adverſe effects. And we do believe, becauſe it appears from the king's avidity and penury, that he was ſecretly made a priſoner, and kept in hold, and cautiouſly diſmiſſed by compoſition ratified by his oath, and promiſes, and charters, and ſo ſuffered at length to depart, with the loſs of his honour, territory, and treaſure, and thus moſt diſgracefully leave the country. This council then being diſſolved with the higheſt degree of indignation, each man, diſappointed of what he had long expected from this parliament, was only laughed at, and went home, as it often happened, with an empty purſe [2]."

But when the king ſaw the iſſue of the buſineſs, he conceived the moſt violent wrath againſt his counſellors: "Lo (ſaid he), through you the hearts of the magnates are gone from me. After being deſpoiled of Poitou, I am now about to loſe Gaſcogne; and, now become deſtitute of money, what am I to do?" Adopting therefore very puſillanimous counſel, it was improvidently provided that the rich vaſes and utenſils, and jewels of his treaſury, ſhould be all ſold for their weight, without any regard to the gilding or workmanſhip; that at any rate money might be got. His counſellors told him, that the loſs of ſuch things would be ſoon compenſated by the preſents that would be made him; and that therefore he need not be uneaſy about the matter. After the ſale of theſe trinkets and plate, the king aſked, "Where, and to whom they were ſold?" and being told, "At London;" "I am ſure (he replied), that, if the whole treaſure of Octavian were expoſed to ſale, the city of London would buy it all. Thoſe London ruſtics, who call themſelves barons, are full even to nauſea. That city is an inexhauſtible mine." And immediately he determined, that, as ſoon as he could find a pretence for it, he would give their purſes a good ſqueeze.

By the refuſal of the community of the realm to give the king an aid, he was precluded from all kind of demand of it, as well with reſpect to themſelves as to all their frank tenants; that is, in fact, he became debarred of any aid whatever from all the frank tenants of the kingdom, who all held immediately either of the king or of his vaſſals. Frank fief, according to the feudiſts, gave equal rights to all who enjoyed it. One deſcription went to the whole of it. The tenant was ſeiſed in his demeſne as of his fief and right. It was as much, therefore, at the diſcretion of every frank tenant to give his lord an aid (no matter for whoſe uſe), as it was at the lord's diſcretion, who was the king's vaſſal, to give an aid to his lord the king. To obviate the difficulty that might enſue from ſo delicate a queſtion, it was an uſual article in deeds of infeofment, that, when the chief lord of a fief holden of the king had granted the king an aid from his fief at large, ſuch frank tenants ſhould pay their ſhare according to the ſum ſpecified in the deed of infeofment. "Ex comitatibus & baroniis totum regnum dicitur eſſe conſtitutum," ſays Bracton. Regnum is a common term for the collective body of the king's tenants in capite, at leaſt, of the whole lay-part of them. Earldoms were only baronies of larger extent. Citizens, burgeſſes, and tenants of the king, holding any of his towns or manors by fee-firm, are out of the queſtion, as comprehended under the general notion of perſons belonging to the king's demeſne; with which neither the king's vaſſals, much leſs the latter's vaſſals, had any thing to do. Bracton's baronies, therefore, can mean only fiefs held of the king in capite, and poſſeſſed partly in demeſne, and partly in ſervice, by the king's vaſſals. And thus barony, we ſee, includes all the frank-tenements of the kingdom.

---

[1] Lieges—Fideles; A general word for his principal tenants in capite, or ſuch as compoſed the common council or univerſity of the realm.

[2] M. Paris.

The king, however, was not left entirely without reſources. M. Paris deſcribes his uſe of one of them in the following manner:

“ And at the ſame time the lord king had recourſe to mean and paltry tricks for the raiſing of money, ſuch tricks as are often practiſed for the ſame purpoſe at the court of Rome. When he found he could not bend the congregated nobles to his views, he either called them to him ſingly, or wrote to them, and impudently addreſſed them in the following ſort of language: ‘ I am poor, and entirely deſtitute of treaſure; it is neceſſary that each of you ſhould afford me relief, for I am bound by my charter in a debt of 30,000 marks; and yet I do not aſk any thing but in the way of favour; whoever will oblige me ſhall have as much again when I have opportunity; and he who refuſes to help me ſhall be requited in kind another time.’ And alleging a falſe pretence, as if he were going to war with the king of France, and about to demand a reſtitution of his right with a high hand, at the approaching expiration of the truce, he got nothing from the knowing ones but ſneers and hiſſes. For, it had lately been forbidden him on the part of the lord pope by maſter Albert, to infeſt any land whatſoever that was poſſeſſed under any ſort of title by the French king, who was now in the Holy Land, ſigned with the croſs for God and the Catholic church. And, if he had not been ſo prohibited, it is thought, upon good ground, that both military force and courage would have been wanting in him, to deprive the king of France of an inch of his dominions: for, France is thought not to be wanting either in men or money. But, that the prohibition of maſter Albert might not get wind, he took all poſſible care to keep it ſecret. It was ſaid alſo, that Albert had received a power, from the holy ſee, of laying England under an interdict, if king Henry ſhould be refractory. But all theſe things were concealed from the public, to give the king better opportunity of ſucceeding in his main object, the getting a ſupply of money.”

“ In this hungry and greedy ſtate of mind, happening to make a journey towards Huntingdon, about the feaſt of St. Hilary, he ſent for the abbot of Ramſey. Having taken him apart, “ My friend (ſaid he), I moſt earneſtly requeſt of you the loan of a hundred pounds.” And when the abbot could not decently make him any anſwer, he replied, “ I have been ſometimes a giver; but I have never lent you money, nor I never will.” And immediately borrowed that ſum at immenſe intereſt of the Caurſini, to ſatisfy this begging kingling. About the ſame time he attacked the abbot of Peterborough with the like requeſt, craving pecuniary help, and aſſuring him, that to relieve him was greater alms than to give to a beggar begging from door to door. The abbot did every thing he could to prevail upon the king to excuſe him: but this had no effect; he was foully abuſed, and ſneaked away amidſt a torrent of reproaches. From the abbot of St. Albans the king found more generoſity upon a ſimilar application. He advanced the king ſixty marks, although the latter had very recently, upon falſe pretences, wrung from him no ſmall ſum [1].”

“ Finding the abbots and priors either not diſpoſed, or not daring to reſiſt his ſolicitations after the example of the magnates, the king made a ſpecial application to each of them by letter, and employed Simon Paſſelewe and the ſheriff of each county to conduct the buſineſs, and collect ſuch money as they could procure. One cauſe of this general reluctance to recruit his treaſury ſeems to have been a well-grounded ſuſpicion, that what money the people of England ſhould advance to him would go to the Gaſcons, for the liquidation of the king's debt to them, and to the aliens, and other favourites about king Henry, who was entirely governed by them, and thought nothing too much that he could give them.”

A ſecond way of raiſing money was talliaging the Jews. Theſe people at that time were very numerous both in England and other parts of Chriſtendom. Uſury being forbidden to Chriſtians by the eccleſiaſtical canons, this branch of buſineſs was open to the Jews, who knew how to manage it. But they had many diſcouragements; for, Chriſtian princes, among whom they ſojourned, thought them fair objects of plunder. And a rich Jew in England muſt expect to bleed very freely, either in his purſe or natural veins, if he did not yield the ſum demanded, or ſettle the matter with the juſtice of the Jews, and the king's exchequer, by a round fine. In many caſes they hoped to eſcape plunder by hiding their treaſures, and denying their ability to pay. To believe their affirmation was not uſual; and, indeed, to take a Jew's word about his riches would have argued a childiſh ſimplicity. Matthew Paris, ſpeaking of two talliages upon the Jews, one cloſe at the heels of the other, ſays, by the one they were flead alive, by the other their guts were torn out.

A third way of raiſing money was by the king's talliaging the cities, burghs, and certain towns of his demeſnes, granted to patentees in fee-firm. Although all theſe were free in ſome degree, and although, in moſt of their charters of franchiſe, which have come to us, there are exemptions from Danegeld, and other ſuch impoſitions, in conſideration of fee-firms, that is, perpetual fixed rents, yet it does not ſeem they were ever allowed an abſolute exemption from talliage. Nor does Magna Charta clearly and preciſely emancipate them. Talliage was the impoſition of the lord upon his baſe tenants; and as other grandees as well as the king levied it upon their demeſne towns and manors, it is probable the grandees, who, by their Magna Charta, ſhewed very little attention to the peaſantry and common people, who were in the ſame ſtate of ſlavery in England as elſewhere, were not very anxious to give that liberty to the plebs, which was enjoyed at all times by the nobleſſe or gentry. Concerning talliage of the king's antient demeſnes (viz. towns which had been ſtrictly and properly once in his real demeſne, but at ſome time or other put into grant), the barons of exchequer, in the time of Edward II, made the following ſolemn deciſion: “ Conſiderato, quod tallagium in locis, qui ſunt de antiquo dominico regis, eſt merè annexum coronæ Angliæ; & quod videtur non poſſe aliquo modo ſeparari a coronâ, &c. niſi per ſpeciale factum quod expreſſam facit mentionem inde, videlicet, quod dominus rex, cujus tallagium eſt de jure coronæ ſuæ, &c. dederit tallagium per expreſſa verba, aut etiam expreſſè conceſſerit quietantiam [1].”

It ſhould be obſerved, however, that places infranchiſed were not talliageable at the abſolute will of the lord; but only, that now and then, in his great neceſſity, the lord might lay on them a reaſonable or juſt talliage. We find, therefore, that it was frequently aſſeſſed by the ſoft names of donum and auxilium, and often on the king's part humbly ſolicited of the principal towns of the realm. The king's authority for laying the talliage through the cities, burghs, and his other chartered or privileged towns [2], was the ſanction

---

[1] E recordis Madoxi, Firma burgi, p. 250. Charters of franchiſe and fee-firm, in lieu of all talliage whatſoever, are the ground of burgage freedom or exemption from talliage, i. e. taxation.

[2] In the Anglo-ſaxon books, civitates are rendered by burghs, and burghs are Latinized by civitates; which ſhews them to be conſidered as the ſame thing. And, agreeably to this idea, London, Paris, and other great cities, are ſtyled burghs. After the Conqueſt, however, there ſeems to be a notion of ſome difference by the general uſe of both words, with the diſcriminate article and between them. Their common property ſeems to be, that they were mercantile towns actually infranchiſed by charter, or allowed to be free by preſcription; fortified with walls, or ſome ſort of meaner work, ſuch as could be afforded, for ſanction of his domeſtic or ordinary council [1]. This muſt not be confounded with the commune concilium regni, or baronagium regni. The firſt conſiſted of the king's officials, as his guides and aſſiſtants in the executive department; the others were an integral part of the realm, hereditary counſellors of the king by reaſon of their fiefs, whoſe preſence was eſſential to parliaments, and concurrence indiſpenſable in the framing of new laws, in the ſupreme adminiſtration of juſtice, and in the general ſuperintendency of the realm. The inconvenience of convening the whole baronage of England, upon every occaſion where the executive power wanted their ſanction or advice, might be a plauſible pretext for aſſembling upon common exigencies only a part of them. Whence we find parliaments diſtinguiſhed by parliamenta generalia, and parliamenta generaliſſima. But the aſſembly conſiſted in the ſtrictneſs of the whole baronage; of which the individuals had all equal rights, implied in the very term of pares, or more ſtrongly in compares.

The king's familiar or domeſtic council ſeems to have been reſident in his houſehold; and ſome of them to have attended him in his journeys, to his manors, or country palaces. We find our kings continually on the move; for, I ſuppoſe, their vaſt houſeholds ſoon made proviſions ſcarce in any one place, and their manors were ſtored with corn and all kinds of live ſtock for preſent uſe. On his journeys, the king received petitions, redreſſed complaints, decided queſtions, gave directions, and in ſhort his journeys were more like the iter of a juſticiar, than the movements of a prince. The common oath, required of all the king's conciliarii, was little more than a proviſion to ſecure integrity in the adminiſtration of juſtice; which ſhews, that juriſprudence was their chief province. Certain grandees ſometimes highly reſented their excluſion from the council, and demanded admiſſion to it with threats, as their right.

Talliage was a quotum of the rents of cuſtomary and other baſe tenants, and of their movables or chattels, and extended to the chattels of all reſiants within the place, except perſons privileged by rank, or order, or tenure, or charter, from ſuch kind of burthens.

The earl of Leiceſter was appointed to the government of Gaſcogne, by royal charter, for the term of ſix for the protection of trade, and ſecurity of mercantile articles. The capital burgeſſes were ſeiſed of certain tenements, being field-lands, houſes, ſtalls, or other edifices, alſo grounds, or other immovable property, within the place or its territory. The freedom of ſuch places conſiſted in ordinary chartered rights, and particularly in being exempt from the juriſdiction of the ſhire-reeve, and other bailiffs, whether of the crown or inferior lords, in whoſe fief or manor the franchiſe lay. The capital burgeſſes were the immediate tenants of the lord of whom they held, and each burgage-tenement, was charged with a rent to its lord, and other ſervices. Burgeſſes might diſpoſe of their own burgage-tenement without licence of alienation, and ſuch transfers were rehearſed in the portmote or town council, and inrolled in the public records of the place. Towns within the king's demeſne manors or towns, being themſelves the king's manors, were uſually the places infranchiſed; for, no feudal lord could give to any town of his all the privileges which were neceſſary to conſtitute a burgh. Such places, therefore, held of the king in capite; but, by the king's aſſignment, many burghs rendered their common rents, and other ſervices, to mean lords. But their tenure of the king in capite remained unſhaken. In like manner, individual burgeſſes might be aſſigned. Thus the city or burgh of Leiceſter (for I find it called the former in Domeſday, and in the very early Anglo-norman time, and afterwards invariably the latter) held of the king in capite, probably from very antient times, certainly before the Conqueſt, as a franchiſe within the manor of Leiceſter, a demeſne manor of the king, and annexed to the honor of Leiceſter by royal grant ſoon after the Conqueſt. Still, however, becauſe the burgeſſes held of the king in capite, it retained the name of the king's demeſne in various public documents; being by aſſignment only, and with reſpect to the reſerved rights of the crown, with exception probably as to talliage, the frank-tenement of the earls of Leiceſter. This manor was of great extent. The franchiſe of a burgh conſtituted a bailiwic or juriſdiction. The juriſdiction of a bailiwic implied regal juriſdiction, exerciſed either by the king's proper bailiff, or by ſome bailiff out of the uſual courſe, in conſequence of ſpecial charters of the king; on which ground burgeſſes acquired the bailiſhips of burghs, and feudal lords the nomination of bailiffs within their franchiſes. But bailiwic concerned police, and criminal juriſdiction conſtitutionally veſted in the crown. To burgeſſes were committed the repair of the walls or works of their burgh, and the defence of it, if attacked, as part of their ſervice. The inhabitants at large within a burgh do not ſeem to have been more free than inhabitants of towns not infranchiſed. The franchiſe, as far as I can ſee, was only a benefit to the chief burgeſſes, or to their tenants, or to ſuch perſons as they choſe into a partnerſhip of burgage rights; all who together made the community of the burgh; no others had liberty of trading within the burgh; and this community governed the burgh, and levied the talliages, and ſcot and lot, too often with great injuſtice to the unprotected inhabitants. In conſideration of lands and tenements, and perquiſites of courts, and other iſſues, which would have been the king's or other lord's property, but for the burgage-franchiſe; the community paid a fief-firm, annually, either to the king or ſome other lord. From this deſcription of a city or burgh (for, the difference between them after the Conqueſt was ſo little as not to be worth our preſent notice) it is eaſily ſeen how burgeſſes acquired emancipation from the ordinary condition of villans. Ordinary tradeſmen had no higher title than that of ſervi. Burgeſſes were tradeſmen of a higher order, and better means. But trade in common implied ſomething mean and ſervile. No ingenuous perſon ſtooped to trade; it would be the forfeiture of his rank and dignity. And tenure in burgagio, and tenure in villenagio, were reckoned almoſt upon a par. Rights, however, of intrinſic importance were given to burgage tenants, which, when they and their burghs got to be rich and proſperous, they knew how to turn to account. If their lord claimed a right to talliage them, they determined at all events to keep that claim within due limits; at will, they ſhewed their charter of exemption; and were to allow the exerciſe of it only ſecundum bonum & equum; and at length, to make it better for their lord, reſpectfully to ſolicit an aid, than contemptuouſly levy a talliage. Beſides cities and burghs ſo conſtituted, certain of the king's towns, parcels of his manors, were granted in fee-firm to certain patentees, who, by their patents, were to pay their fief-farm in lieu of all ſervices. Such thought themſelves and their tenements exempt, if not from all, yet at leaſt from exceſſive and violent talliage. Of ſuch, therefore, the king was wont to beg an aid. Of the communities of cities and burghs were demanded troops for the king's war. They ſeem to conſiſt chiefly of infantry; but, if horſemen, not milites, but equites. They were no part of the milice or chevalerie of the realm. Perhaps in this account there may be ſome miſtakes. The author of this memoir will be happy to ſee the ſubject more clearly and happily inveſtigated.

---

[1] I find this council called regis familiare concilium, and regis concilium domeſticum; and I read of a moderator or preſident of it. Were I to call it the king's privy council, as oppoſed to the commune concilium magnatum regni, I might miſlead the reader, who might thereby be induced to think it was juſt like the preſent privy council, which, indeed, in many things reſembles it, and did iſſue from it; but time has made ſo much alteration, that they cannot now be called the ſame thing. The king's familiar council was a tribunal, a deliberative aſſembly, a concurrent in all the king's ordinary regal acts. The king nominated the members, who conſiſted of nobility or gentry, of officers of ſtate, and ſome other perſons who ſeemed by their rank or abilities to be proper members of it. So far it had the properties of the modern privy council. But it had other properties peculiar, and the functions were conducted under other regulations and maxims. The king's juſticiars formed part of this council; and the whole compoſed his curia; for we only read of his curia, not of his curiæ; which word is not to be taken in the abſtract, but concrete ſenſe, as a noun of multitude, denoting the judges. If the courts of king's bench and common pleas were then completely formed, and had then appropriate and ſelect judges, they had been but recently eſtabliſhed; for, I find the juſticiars, who had cognizance of common pleas, various in their numbers, and men of all ranks taken out of the council, and called the council, and flying in all caſes of difficulty to a larger aſſemblage of counſellors. And, again, the juſticiars, whoſe ſpecial department was deſignated by coram rege, or coram nobis ubicunque fuerimus in Anglia, ſo intimately blended with the concilium, that I can conceive of them, but as an occaſional detachment of the council, prepared and conſtituted to act collectively, when it is neceſſary. Theſe compoſed a tribunal delegated by the crown; but the ſupreme direction of the realm was in the council of grandees of the realm, or baronagium regni. This was the baſis of the monarchy itſelf, and not derivative, but independent, and original. Before them the king's acts were cognizable, and by their acts he was concluded. And, therefore, in all writs for their meeting, we find their function deſcribed by de regni negotiis tractaturi. If preſent in their deliberations, which I believe he could not be when a party, he ſeems to have had no ſuffrage.

years. I do not know whether the charter be yet in being among the national archives; but no printed copy of it has come to my knowledge, nor do I diſcover when the appointment took place. Probably the earl was detained in England longer than he wiſhed, in hopes that the univerſity of the realm would have granted the aid, which the king had twice ſo earneſtly craved, and the earl may be ſuppoſed to be in much need of. That he was hindered from embarking ſo ſoon as he wiſhed ſeems highly probable, from the king's having ſent over a corps of troops ſome time before. He left England a very ſhort time after Michaelmas [1]. Before he went away king Henry intreated, commanded, and exhorted him to treat the Gaſcons with ſeverity, even to fury, particularly thoſe traitors who had divers ways over-reached and robbed him, when he was in their country; as Gaſto of Bearne, and his mother the counteſs, and many others [2]. Towards the earl's equipment the king advanced him ten thouſand marks, of which ſum two, or, as many others ſay, three thouſand, were extorted from the citizens of London, who, although oppreſſed and impoveriſhed to the greateſt degree by the king's frequent and heavy demands, yielded to his preſent requiſition out of reverence to him, as their lord, and on account of his preſſing difficulties.

"Before the end of this year (1248) the earl of Leiceſter forced Gaſto of Bearne to accept a truce againſt his will. This Gaſto had been indefatigable in doing king Henry all the miſchief he could in thoſe parts, and had almoſt deſtroyed the whole country; was cloſely leagued with the king's enemies, and had alienated the minds of the king's lieges from their fealty by deceit and treaſon. He abounded in money extorted from the king when he was laſt in Gaſcogne. His mother, the counteſs of Bearne, a woman of gigantic ſtature and monſtrous diſpoſition, had enriched herſelf by the ſame artifices, and upheld her ſon in all his ſeditious machinations. The earl alſo, reinforced by the king's lieges, delivered into cuſtody, to be kept in chains in the tower of Riole, a certain public robber and traitor, the king's moſt bloody enemy, namely, William Bartram, of Acremont, who had done infinite miſchief in Gaſcogne and its confines. The caſtle of Acremont, or Egremont, was built upon an inacceſſible mountain. It was hedged up by impaſſable rocks, on the points of which were raiſed towers, which overhung the valleys. Tradeſmen and travellers, and even the people of the neighbourhood, could not go that way, but the banditti who inhabited this place fell upon them and plundered them, and ſometimes murdered them. But they were all brought under ſubjection to the king's authority, and the road which they were uſed to infeſt was rendered ſafe to all that paſſed that way. The earl's intention was to keep this monſter in priſon till after his own next return from England, when, if the king's council ſhould direct it, he might make ſevere examples of him and the reſt of the king's enemies [3]."

"While king Henry was celebrating his Chriſtmas at Weſtminſter with great magnificence, the earl of Leiceſter, with ſome other great men, knights, and eſquires, who had been in Gaſcogne, and faithfully ſerved the king there in his wars, arrived at that city. After ſuch rapid and important ſucceſs, the earl was received by the king and all the great men, with every mark of joy, and all poſſible reſpect [4]."

"Henry was not ſufficiently thankful to the Lord of hoſts for the great advantages lately gained by his lieutenant. He was only intent upon ſqueezing money out of the pockets of the people; as if England was a mine never to be exhauſted. The great men having peremptorily refuſed to comply with his requeſt, which he made to them upon the pretext of an expected rupture with France, he ſolicited them apart, both perſonally and by letter. He reminded them of his debt of 300,000 marks, and complained that he could procure no money but by private and voluntary contribution; and promiſed to reimburſe thoſe, who would lend him money, whenever it was in his power [5]."

During the earl's reſidence in Gaſcogne he had opened a negotiation with Theobald king of Navarre, for ſettling ſome very difficult diſputes that had ariſen between that king and the Engliſh monarch. By the earl's management, theſe controverſies were put in a train for amicable adjuſtment. King Henry expreſſed the higheſt ſatisfaction at what had been done by his lieutenant; and on Feb. 6, 1249, gave him full powers for ſettling the matters in queſtion according to his own judgement. We hear no more of this buſineſs; but it appears, from the records of the year 1253, that theſe diſputes had either broke out afreſh, or not been reconciled [6].

On the 2d of February the king made a grant of Kenilworth caſtle to the counteſs of Leiceſter, to hold the ſame during her life [7].

In the ſummer of this year (1249) Sir William de Longeſpee, and Sir Robert de Vere, with the other nobles, who had taken the croſs with the earl of Leiceſter, embarked for the Eaſt; and ſhortly after they happily joined the French king. But the earl of Leiceſter did not accompany them in this journey, having either delayed his vow, or commuted it. But about the ſame time he returned to Gaſcogne, where he ſafely arrived with a good recruit of men and money, and proceeded immediately in the work of bringing the king's enemies to a peaceable and obedient behaviour.

While he was at Bourdeaux there happened a moſt alarming inſurrection in that city [8]; which being oppoſed by the earl's party, an encounter followed, in which were ſlain William Gondomer the elder, one of the earl's knights, and Gondomer's ſon, the earl's ſtandard-bearer. The ſeneſchal was able to ſuppreſs the tumult for the preſent; and, to prevent farther miſchief, which was threatened, he clapped ſome of the inſurgents into priſon, and others were expelled from the town. Some of thoſe who had been concerned in theſe outrages refuſed to ſubmit to his juriſdiction, and made their way to England, where they preferred their complaints to king Henry, and appealed to his own tribunal. But that king ſupported the authority of his lieutenant, and ordered them to be arreſted, and required them to give hoſtages for their ſubmitting to take their trials at Bourdeaux, and ſent them back to Gaſcogne. Some of the circumſtances of this affair are mentioned in the following letter, from which the reader will likewiſe perceive how high the earl of Leiceſter ſtood at this time in the king's eſteem:

"The king to his beloved and faithful Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, his ſeneſchal in Gaſcogne, greeting.

"We return you our greateſt thanks for the care and ſolicitude you have ſuſtained, and the prodigious labours you have undergone with ſo much firmneſs and ſpirit, in the conducting of our affairs in Gaſcogne. We perceive clearly the great advantages that muſt reſult to us and our poſterity by what your fidelity and diligence have effected there; and how much that country will be improved by your means, of which we and our deſcendants to the remote times ſhall reap both honour and profit. Upon theſe accounts, and becauſe we repoſe the ſame confidence in you which we have in ourſelves, we beg and intreat that you will proſecute this important undertaking with all your power, till you have brought it to a happy concluſion; that you may have from us and our heirs ſuitable acknowledgements, and all poſſible proofs of our reſpect and kindneſs. But, that your diſcretion may be well informed concerning certain matters touching our country of Gaſcogne, we have judged it adviſable to intimate to you, that our beloved and faithful Amalvin de Varcis has lately come into England, and in open court appealed the viſcount de Fronzac of ſedition; offering to prove, according to the judgement of the ſaid court, that he was perſonally preſent, when the viſcount made the agreement with the count of Poitou for betraying our country of Gaſcogne to the count, our mortal enemy. At the hearing of this, our court agreed that the viſcount ſhould be ſummoned to appear before us on the morrow of the Purification of the bleſſed Virgin, to receive and do juſtice. We therefore command you, that you cauſe the viſcount to be regularly ſummoned, that he be before us in our court, to anſwer the aforeſaid Amalvin concerning the ſedition abovementioned, and to do and receive juſtice as aforeſaid. As to the exchange of Burge ſupra mare, and of Fronzac, of which our beloved and faithful William de Chaeny has made report to us on your part, we have to anſwer, that we leave the exchange to be ſettled as your own prudence, fidelity, and diſcretion, ſhall direct; deſiring only, that what you think moſt to our advantage may be diſpatched as accurately and as expeditiouſly as poſſible, and that you give us the quickeſt advices you poſſibly can of what ſhall be ſo done; for which we ſhall hold ourſelves exceedingly obliged to you. Moreover, you have to know, that Gayllard de Salariis, and William Ernald Muneder, and ſome others, being their accomplices and partizans (who, as is ſaid, were preſent with force and arms at the conflict you had in the city of Bourdeaux, wherein one of your knights and a ſtandard-bearer were killed in contempt and reproach of us; and who afterwards were in the caſtle of Fronzac againſt us and you, whereby the ſurrender of that caſtle was retarded), came to us into England, whom we immediately ordered to be arreſted and detained; and, when they were taken, they offered to ſtand to the judgement of our court for thoſe treſpaſſes; and to ſubmit to ſuch ſentence as our court ſhould inflict. And they have given us hoſtages in this behalf, viz. one of the ſons of Ruſtan de Solar, and the aforeſaid William Ernald Moneder; concerning which matter our court decreed, that the aforeſaid treſpaſſers ſhould ſtand to the judgement of our court of Gaſcogne, where the offences were committed, and where proofs might be had concerning them, in order to inflict ſuch penalties as the parties deſerved. We therefore command, that, after you have taken from the perſons aforeſaid a ſufficient ſecurity for their appearing before you in our court in Gaſcogne to ſubmit to juſtice on the points aforeſaid, you ſignify the ſame to us; and we will then remit to you the hoſtages, that they may be brought to trial with the others; and if any more of their accomplices and fautors come to us, we will cauſe them to be arreſted, till they alſo give hoſtages for their ſubmitting to the judgement of our court; upon which points we think it proper you ſhould be ſeriouſly adviſed, in the execution of theſe affairs, not to be lukewarm and remiſs, leſt, by the facility of obtaining pardon, encouragement be given to others of like diſpoſition to offend; and, on the other hand, not to be cruel in puniſhing beyond what the offences merit. But we would have you obſerve the ſtrict line of juſtice, as becomes a ſteady and good judge; and as will procure you fame and reputation for ever; and becauſe, pending the trial, through the ſecurity of the hoſtages, we have granted them our ſafe conduct, we direct that they may not have it to ſay that they are judged by a prejudiced and partial judge. Witneſs ourſelf, at Clarendon, 30 Nov. and 34th of our reign."

---

[1] M. Weſtm.

[2] M. Paris.

[3] Ib.

[4] Ib.

[5] Ib.

[6] Rymer.

[7] Dugdale's Baronage.

[8] Rymer.

It may be preſumed, that the trials of theſe criminals, and the unſettled ſtate of Gaſcogne, detained the ſeneſchal abroad during the following winter and ſpring; for, we do not find him again in England till towards the middle of the next ſummer.

The ſeneſchal came back to England in Rogation week 1250. While he was here at this time, he had an opportunity of rendering himſelf uſeful to the citizens of London, whom the king had forbidden to ſell any of their wares, except at Weſtminſter, during a fair, which he had granted the abbot of that place for ſeveral days; to the intent that this prelate might make immenſe profit of the tolls. I ſuppoſe the king's intention was to aſſiſt the abbot by theſe means in defraying the expence of re-building that abbey.

"London was thrown into confuſion by the king's violent invaſion of their liberties, to the grievous detriment of the citizens[1]. The king committed this outrage to enrich the abbot of Weſtminſter, who was in great favour with him. The mayor and whole community of the city reſiſted as long as they were able the king's violence and madneſs; but he continued inflexible; at which the citizens being much diſturbed, they repaired with doleful countenances and heavy hearts to earl Richard, and the earl of Leiceſter, and other great men of the realm, and told them that the king, perhaps intending to follow the pope's wicked example, was not aſhamed to violate his charters granted to them by his anceſtors[2]. The great men, much diſturbed at what they heard, and fearing that the king would make ſimilar attempts upon them, very ſharply rebuked the king for what he had done, and added even threats. They alſo ſeverely reprimanded the abbot, who was ſuppoſed to be the ſecret author of the miſchief. And thus the wiſdom of the great men very fortunately put a check upon the king's impetuous intentions[3].

The ſeneſchal of Gaſcogne probably at this time made no long ſtay in England."

The rebellion in Gaſcogne ſeems to have been very ſtifly maintained during ſome, if not the greater part of this year. Beſides certain of the nobles or barons of that province, who were leagued together againſt the ſeneſchal, many of them countenanced a party of the burgeſſes of Bourdeaux, and had actually been concerned in the affray, wherein the Gondemers were murdered. Nothing was heard, for ſome time, but demands of ſatisfaction, plaints and actions at law, for injuries real or pretended. The diſcontented entered into aſſociations with each other, under written engagements, adding thereto the ſolemnity of oaths, to defend themſelves, and take vengeance of their enemies. Conſanguinity, affinity, friendſhip, and other connexions, were thought ſufficient excuſes for illegal combinations, and defiance of public authority. Some of the moſt deſperate and formidable, who had been concerned in the death of the Gondemers, had been expelled from Bourdeaux, and were yet kept out of the city. At length the earl brought the malcontents to conceſſions. By conſent of all parties it was agreed to ſurrender the bonds of aſſociation by the following Epiphany into the hands of the earl of Leiceſter, or of his ſubſtitutes duly authorized in that behalf. Thoſe who had been expelled the city, and had any pretenſions to favour, were to be re-admitted, upon giving ſecurity to the earl for their good behaviour, and undertaking to oppoſe to their utmoſt Gallard de Solar and his adherents, whoſe goods had been ſeized for their late offence, and who were adjudged to be the children of diſcord for obſtinately oppoſing peace, and refuſing to obey the lord earl, and ſubmit to the juſtice and laws of Bourdeaux. To the earl was reſerved the power of making any addition or alteration he pleaſed to this inſtrument of accord; whereby it could be rendered more effectual for the purpoſe of eſtabliſhing peace and quiet; ſaving, however, the rights of the mayor, jurats, and communes of Bourdeaux; and both parties bound themſelves by oath, and added hoſtages, for leaving all matters, whether civil or criminal, entirely to the earl's deciſion. All the particulars which were acceded to upon this occaſion were inſerted in the inſtrument of accord, by the agreement of both parties, and approved by the archbiſhop of Bourdeaux, the biſhop of Auxerre, and many other barons of Gaſcogne, and of the whole community of Bourdeaux, ſpecially convened for the purpoſe of hearing theſe articles of accord. This document is dated on the firſt Sunday in Advent, 1250.

[1] The king ſeems to be always preparing either for outrage or diſgraceful humiliation. Of his behaviour, in the preceding month of March, M. Paris has left the following ſtatement: "The citizens of London were therefore aſſembled by his writ before the king at Weſtminſter on the next Lord's day before the feaſt of Saints Perpetua & Felicitas, in the greater palace, which is called the Great Hall. The citizens were all ſummoned, from the old ones down to their children of twelve years old. The hall overflowed with the people, and was exceedingly crowded, as well as the court about it. To this aſſembly, thus collected, king Henry made humble ſupplication, ſeemingly even with tears, that each citizen would remit his anger, and all manner of malice and rancour, and be reconciled to him with heart and mouth; for, he himſelf, as he publicly confeſſed, frequently, and his miniſters ſtill more frequently, had done them all manner of wrong, by taking away, ſeizing, and detaining, their goods, and violating their liberties almoſt times without number; for all which he humbly craved their forgiveneſs. The citizens, finding that nothing elſe would be of any uſe to them, complied with the king's requeſt. But no ſort of reſtitution was made of the things which had been taken from them." M. Paris, 1250, p. 670.

[2] This alludes to the king's practice of ſuperſeding the eſtabliſhed liberties by a clauſe, in ſome of his late writs of non obſtante. The pope, as head of the church, aſſumed a power of vacating any immunities granted by his predeceſſors by inſerting a non obſtante in his briefs. King Henry had a mind to do the ſame in temporals. When he firſt made this innovation, about the year 1251, Roger de Thurkelby, a diſcreet juſticiar, hearing of it, fetched a deep ſigh, and ſaid, "Heu, heu, hos ut quod dies expectavimus! Ecce jam civilis curia exemplo eccleſiaſticæ coinquinatur, & a ſulphureo fonte rivulus intoxicatur." Such an idea had the great men, as well as the moſt learned and upright lawyers of that time, of the king's diſpenſing power with regard to charters.

[3] M. Paris, p. 678.

The inſtrument was immediately afterwards ſent over to England, and received the king's ratification under the great ſeal, Jan. 18, 1251.

M. Paris, ſumming up the events of the year 1250, ſpeaks thus of Simon de Montfort's exploits in Gaſcogne:

"This year Gaſcogne was ſo ſubdued by the earl of Leiceſter, that Gaſto de Bearne, one of the moſt formidable of the king's enemies, if not the moſt ſo of any of them, being taken priſoner, and humbled, was permitted and adviſed by the earl of Leiceſter to go over to England; and, inſtead of demanding a trial, to throw himſelf entirely upon the king's mercy, and intreat him to ſpare his life, his limbs, and poſſeſſions. Gaſto ſubmitted to this humiliation, and found that mercy from the king which he did not merit. But the king received into his own hands, by means of the earl of Leiceſter, certain caſtles of the ſame Gaſto and his partizans, namely, Fronzac and Acremont, and many others. Gaſto's ſubmiſſion was all downright deceit and hypocriſy. He pretended to be related to the queen, and, with the help of her interceſſion, wrought ſo effectually upon the king's compaſſion, as to obtain the recovery of his lands, having previouſly given ſecurity for his good behaviour."

"The earl of Leiceſter, emulous of his father's glory, and ambitious even to exceed him, ſo thoroughly repreſſed the inſolence of the other mal-contents who oppoſed the king's authority, that he baniſhed and diſherited ſome of the principal of them, and made ſevere examples of others by hanging them upon lofty gallowſes.

"The ill behaviour of the Gaſcons, particularly their inſolent treatment of king Henry when he was laſt among them, juſtified the earl of Leiceſter in what he did, and demonſtrated his zeal for the honor and intereſt of king Henry."

But neither the earl's ſucceſſes in Gaſcogne, which M. Paris repreſents as having been conquered by him the preceding year, nor the terms of compromiſe and pacification, which the public records ſhew to have been acceded to in the month of December juſt paſt, prevented another civil commotion cloſe on the heels of the former.

"On the day of Epiphany [1] ſuddenly arrived from the parts of Gaſcogne Simon earl of Leiceſter. His return was haſty, and deſtitute of eclat; his retinue conſiſting of hardly three eſquires, with horſes exhauſted by fatigue and labour. On his reaching London, and finding the king there, he demanded of him, moſt preſſingly, aſſiſtance for repreſſing the inſolence of his Gaſcon rebels; affirming, that he was unable to continue ſo expenſive a war without the king's ſupport; and that he had ſpent all the revenue of his earldom [2]."

He reminded the king how the Gaſcons had refuſed to give him the leaſt aſſiſtance when he fled to them in his diſtreſs, and was then in the utmoſt danger, being then purſued by the king of France. He recalled at the ſame time to his recollection their inhumanity to his queen, both near and at the time of her lying in, and while ſhe was indiſpoſed at Reole. The king could not help pitying the earl's diſtreſs. "By the head of God (ſaid he), earl, thou haſt ſpoken the truth; and I will not refuſe ſufficient help to thee who haſt ſo nobly fought in my cauſe." But a report is come up with heavy complaints againſt thee, how thou didſt commit to priſon men who came peaceably to thee, and even ſuch as thou thyſelf didſt invite, as in good faith, and not only didſt impriſon ſuch, but didſt bind them, and put them to death."

This was poſitively denied by the earl. "Sir (ſaid he), the perfect knowledge you have of the treaſon of the Gaſcons renders ſuch reports of theirs altogether unworthy of credit."

"Though the earl was much mortified at being driven out of Gaſcogne by the general riſing and attack of the Gaſcons, yet the conſolation he received from the king revived his ſpirits, and gladdened his hopes. Being recruited with no ſmall ſum of money obtained from the king's bounty (who advanced him 3000 marks), and from his own earldom, and the lands of his rich ward Gilbert de Humfrevill, he returned immediately with great joy to Gaſcogne. Application was made by him to the duke of Brabant, and his neighbours, that, upon his coming to their courts, they ſhould furniſh him with a body of knights and eſquires, well armed, who ſhould go with him into Gaſcogne; where, if they behaved well, they ſhould be paid beyond their deſerts. The duke of Brabant yielded to the earl's overture, and tranſmitted him 200 routiers [3], and with them ſome croſs-bow-men, who put themſelves under the earl's command, and thirſted eagerly for the blood of the Gaſcons; but the latter betrayed no diſmay, and fortified themſelves againſt the attacks with which they were threatened."

On the firſt of March, the king authorized him to appoint ſome fit perſon to go on with the negotiation for prolonging the peace with the king of France; provided, that either of the two Gaſcons, already commiſſioned to conduct that treaty, ſhould die or decline the employment [4].

"When the earl of Leiceſter reached Gaſcogne in the ſpring, he found all the great people there were combined in one general league, and determined to reſiſt him, and rebel; upon which the war was renewed, and the Gaſcons had the worſt of it [5]."

"The earl triumphed over a great many of the king's enemies, and ſeized upon the caſtle of Chaſtillon, which had been their principal place of refuge [6]."

So writes the hiſtorian in his looſe and indiſtinct way. The next time he mentions the earl of Leiceſter he gives the following account, which the reader muſt reconcile to the former as he can. The compiler is not willing to ſupply the defect by his own fancies:

---

[1] Our author, in his ſummary of the events of the year 1250, had ſaid, that Gaſcogne was ſubdued by the earl of Leiceſter. How is this conſiſtent with what the hiſtorian here relates? There muſt be an anachroniſm, either from a ſlip of the author's memory, or from an error of the text; too often found in M. Paris's printed work. We ſeem juſtified in ſuppoſing Epiphany to be wrong, and that it ſhould be die paſchali, or ſome time later.

[2] M. Paris, 1251.

[3] Soldiers or mercenaries—reputed low and plebeian in compariſon of barons, knights, and eſquires, who ſerved on deſtrers in complete armour with a ſuite. The infantry were ſupplied by the communia of cities and burghs; I ſuppoſe univerſally by preſſing the common people.

[4] Rymer. [5] M. Paris. [6] Ib.

"About the month of November Simon earl of Leiceſter, with his wife, embarked at Witſand for England, taking with him Guy de Leſignan the king's third uterine brother. And when, with the benefit of a fair wind, they had almoſt reached the haven, the wind ſuddenly ſhifted, and they were driven back to Witſand with imminent danger of their lives. Soon after, they ſafely reached the port of Dover. Before the earl came from Gaſcogne he intruſted his affairs there to ſome ſtaunch friends, who proſecuted the war, and bravely withſtood the attacks of the Gaſcons. When the news of their arrival reached the king, he ſet forward to meet them, not from reſpect to the earl, but to his uterine brother[1].

"During the ſhort ſtay that the earl of Leiceſter made in England, the Gaſcons roſe again, in breach of their engagements, and made war againſt the king, and more daringly than before annoyed thoſe whom the earl had appointed in his ſtead to keep in ſafety his caſtles with their poſſeſſions. Moreover, they ſent word to the king, that the earl of Leiceſter was a moſt wicked traitor, who had heaped up an infinite quantity of money extorted from the nobility, citizens, and common people, without diſtinction, under a pretence that this money was for the king's uſe, to relieve his neceſſities, and go towards equipping him for his croiſade; which, nevertheleſs, the earl had appropriated to his own uſe. They reported too this heavy accuſation; that the earl had called to his counſel peaceably the Gaſcon nobles, who had been the king's moſt faithful ſubjects; and, after they had been ſo called, he guilefully detained them, and wickedly deſtroyed them by hunger. By theſe artful inſinuations they rendered the earl much ſuſpected by king Henry; who, being in this uncertainty about the lieutenant's conduct, ſecretly and immediately ſent over into Gaſcogne his own ſpecial clerk[2] Henry de Wengham, a man of ſenſe and penetration, to make careful enquiry into theſe matters, that the king might be informed without danger of miſtake. But nothing was gained by this meaſure; for, to ſeek a flaw in the earl's conduct was like looking for a knot in a bulruſh, or an angle in a circle. When the earl heard of all theſe things, he was angry upon a double account; and in the king's preſence vindicated his innocence.

"What is the reaſon," ſaid he, "ſir king, that, by lending your ear and belief to the reports of theſe traitors to you, you are more inclined to give credit to them than to me your liegeman?" The king, being become a little more calm, replied, "If every thing be clear, what harm will the inquiry do you? it will better eſtabliſh your reputation." The earl, therefore, being brought to ſubmit, and prepared to return to Gaſcogne, ſucceeded in his application to the king, and obtained from him a pretty large ſum of money, and without loſs of time embarked for Gaſcogne, but with a mind not perfectly reſtored to its eaſe. Collecting a numerous army of French knights and ſtipendiary eſquires, he put himſelf out of all danger from the king of Navarre and the count of Bigorr; and ſo ſeverely chaſtiſed the Gaſcons, that, if it had not been for the ſake of ſelling their wines to the Engliſh, they would have all revolted from the king of England, and ſought for another maſter. And, as a market for their wines ſeemed now to be opening in ſome of the chief ports of Spain, it was feared by the Engliſh they would throw themſelves upon the protection of the king of Caſtile; for, as to France, it deſpiſed the acquiſition of Gaſcogne, which now was the only province remaining to the Engliſh on the other ſide of the water[3]."

"When the earl arrived at Bourdeaux, he had many difficulties to encounter. He found many of the citizens againſt him, old contrivances of miſchief were revived, and new ones deviſed, and ſecret conſpiracies formed to accompliſh the purpoſes of revenge and hate. This ſituation obliged him to incur the hazards of war, and riſk his life in the conteſt[4]."

"To add to his troubles at this time, he had the misfortune to loſe his friend and maſter, John de Baſingſtoke, archdeacon of Lincoln, a man well verſed in the buſineſs of life, who had improved his ſtock of literature by travel, and was an adept in the Greek and Latin languages. The earl's grief was much increaſed by the death of ſo valuable a friend[5]."

"This year, 1252, the earl of Leiceſter was cruelly defamed, and grievouſly accuſed before all the great men of the parts beyond ſea. It was laid to his charge that he had traiterouſly behaved to the king's lieges[6], and inhumanly deſtroyed them by famine, ſword, and impriſonment, and had ſeized caſtles and lands, acting more like a violent uſurper of towns and cities, and a ferocious murderer, than the preſerver of the king's poſſeſſion. It was, therefore, reſolved by the common aſſent and conſent of the whole univerſity of the Gaſcons[7] to ſend an embaſſy to king Henry, who, in ſupport of the accuſation againſt the earl, ſhould carry with them written depoſitions from the communities of the cities of Gaſcogne[8], from the great men, from the caſtellans, and from the bailiffs[9]; and it was provided by a general decree, that the greateſt and moſt dignified perſon in all that country, namely, the archbiſhop of Bourdeaux[10], with ſome other eminent great men, to whom credit would be given to the earl's utter confuſion, ſhould be diſpatched with all poſſible haſte to the king of England[11]."

"Theſe delegates arrived about Whitſuntide, 1252, in London, where they found the king, to whom they preferred their complaints againſt the tyranny of the earl of Leiceſter, who had been ſent to them for a keeper or governor, and whom they accuſed of moſt iniquitous treaſon. The king did not immediately yield full belief to their aſſertions, becauſe he himſelf had found the Gaſcons to be traitors. He ſent, therefore, Nicholas de Molis and Drago Valentine to find out whether the Gaſcons were innocent or otherwiſe; and whether Henry de Wengham and they agreed in their report concerning the matters in queſtion. Theſe proceedings diſpleaſed the earl of Leiceſter, which cannot be wondered at[12]."

"When the perſons who had been ſent upon this buſineſs returned home, they reported to the king, that the earl had handled ſome men with a conſiderable degree of ſeverity, but not beyond their demerits; but this, on account of the earl's abſence, was not examined. At this the Gaſcon delegates, who ſtood before the king, expoſtulated with him, ſaying, "the proof ſhall be given according to truth; after which we demand that judgement ſhall be pronounced." And they proteſted, with an oath, that they would never again regard or obey the inhuman earl of Leiceſter; and, rather than ſubmit to him, they would provide themſelves ſome other lord inſtead of the king of England."

---

[1] M. Paris, 1251.

[2] With Wengham went Geoffry de Leſignan, and R. maſter of the milice of the Temple in England. They impoſed a ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities between the parties at variance till the 24th of June following. Rymer, tom. I. p. 474.

[3] M. Paris, 1252.

[4] Theſe hoſtilities were probably interrupted by a truce made by Geoffry de Leſignan and Henry de Wengham, mentioned above. After the truce, was the natural time for the Gaſcons to accuſe the earl in the aſſembly of their great men, which is the next thing mentioned by M. Paris.

[5] M. Paris.

[6] The king's vaſſals, or feodaries, who held fiefs of him in capite; for which their liege homage was due.

[7] The general council of the magnates or great men of Gaſcogne, the vaſſals or feodaries of the dutchy. They are juſt before called the great men of the parts beyond ſea.

[8] The freemen of privileged or chartered towns, who compoſed the magiſtracy of ſuch towns, and monopolized the whole power. We muſt not underſtand by communities the inhabitants at large, who were in a ſtate little better than ſervitude to their ſeveral communities.

[9] Lords of caſtles beneath the rank of barons, and prefects or reeves of populous towns.

[10] This is not true. The archbiſhop, and others, came over by the king's ſpecial order, as appears from record. Rymer.

[11] M. Paris, 1252. [12] Ib.

"When advice was carried to the earl of Leiceſter of theſe proceedings, he made all the haſte he could to England [1], that he might give a full anſwer to every part of theſe defamatory charges. As ſoon as it was known that he was arrived, a day was appointed him for making his defence. Finding himſelf in a very doubtful ſituation, he took care that Richard earl of Cornwall ſhould be preſent, who never thoroughly forgave the king for thrice giving him, and afterwards taking away from him, the dutchy of Gaſcogne, and was therefore ſecretly rejoiced at the preſent broil about that country [2]."

"Likewiſe he got to be preſent the earl of Glouceſter, who was his friend upon this occaſion, the earl of Hereford, and many other barous and great men, who would be ſure on no account to ſuffer the earl to come into any danger. For, it was much feared leſt the king, by ſudden impetuoſity through his predilection for aliens, would order the earl of Leiceſter, a noble man, and a natural-born ſubject of England [3], to be ſeized and detained, and committed to priſon as a traitor convict, which would by no means be ſuffered.

"The archbiſhop of Bourdeaux and his aſſociates appeared as adverſaries of the earl, together with the king, and, looking ſpitefully at him, bitterly accuſed him in the king's court [4] to the king, and to earl Richard, and to the other great men. They ſaid that they had come to England with letters of credence from all the nobles of Gaſcogne, the king's lieges, the knights, citizens, caſtellans, and inhabitants, who had in common appointed them to declare their complaints. They contraſted the piety, diſcretion, moderation, and peaceableneſs of former ſeneſchals with the overbearing violence of the earl of Leiceſter. They ſaid that perſons who had been tried and pardoned under other ſeneſchals, and afterwards kindly treated by them, and behaved very quietly, were attacked afreſh by the earl of Leiceſter and deſtroyed. That, without paying any regard to the adjudications of ſo many nobles, or to charters, he had ſent many of the nobles of the land, the lieges of the king, into France [5], there to be incarcerated, to the contempt of the Gaſcons, and to the prejudice of the king; and that ſome of the perſons ſo incarcerated had died in priſon through hunger and the weight of their chains. He was charged likewiſe with extorting an infinite quantity of money from them, to the irretrievable damage of the king, and without making him at all acquainted with it, or giving him any part of it. They aſſerted, that the earl invited many of the king's lieges to come to him peaceably and friendly as to a colloquy, and that, having thus moſt villanouſly trepanned them, he retained them for execution. It was affirmed alſo, that he deſired to have the caſtles, as if for the king's uſe; and that, when he had gotten them by this treacherous artifice, he kept them as his own, and made the keepers of them, who had kindly delivered them up to him, his captives."

"To theſe things earl Simon made anſwer without fear or embarraſment. He ſaid, that what they aſſerted did not deſerve the leaſt credit; for, that the king himſelf, when he fled to them in his diſtreſs, and expected to have them faithful and friendly, had diſcovered them to be his enemies, and moſt foul impoſtors. "You," ſaid the earl, "are the proſecutors; and neither your teſtimony nor judgement is to be regarded. It may poſſibly be, that there are ſome perſons in your country, to whom earl Richard, and other great men, appointed your keepers, have granted life and peace, who then pretended to be peaceably and well affected; but afterwards, as ſoon as they got an opportunity, lifted up the heel again; and, being found the ſons of treaſon, forfeited life and peace. Nor was this manner of treating them unjuſt; for, it is God's own manner of dealing, who is more righteous than man. He rewardeth thoſe, who perſevere in righteouſneſs, and puniſhes ſuch as return to iniquity. No injury, therefore, or affront was done to my predeceſſors, your keepers, or to the king himſelf, by this kind of proceeding; and at a convenient time I will be prepared to prove what I ſay, by witneſſes more numerous than you, and worthy of more credit. But what need we of witneſſes concerning theſe things. Sir king himſelf, if he will be pleaſed to ſpeak the truth, has experienced your deceitfulneſs, and felt your falſehood and malice. With reſpect to other articles objected to me, the truth will be declared, not by you, but by thoſe who better deſerve attention."

"Earl Richard, and the other great men, who had learned by experience in Gaſcogne the deceit and treachery of the Gaſcons, approved of what the earl of Leiceſter had ſaid; and by no means applauded the behaviour and temper of that people."

"When the earl of Leiceſter had entirely evinced his innocence, and the adverſe party were confuted and put to ſilence; the king himſelf ſpoke againſt the earl; but when he found that earl Richard favoured earl Simon, and all the reſt of them, becauſe they were influenced by wiſdom and prudence, his ſeverity could not be poured out againſt him, though it was greatly inflamed. Mutual contradictions between the king and earl of Leiceſter produced wrangling and paſſion on both ſides; and, in their tranſport of temper, things that had happened long before were brought forward. The earl reminded the king how he had ſaved him from the ſnares of the French at Xantogne, and how the king, juſt before the earl firſt went for Gaſcogne, had made uſe of coaxing and ſoothing, in order to perſuade him that he muſt cruſh the traitors there. He told him of the charter he had given him for holding the government of Gaſcogne for ſix years certain, and how the king had promiſed to afford him his advice, and ſuch pecuniary help as was wanting, but had not kept his word. He added, "Sir king, your words ought to be made good—perform your engagements. Either let me retain the government according to your charter, or reimburſe me the expences incurred in your ſervice; for, it is well known, that, in ſupport of your honour, I have impoveriſhed my earldom beyond redemption." To which the king haſtily, and unadviſedly, anſwered, "Know that I do not hold myſelf in any reſpect bound to keep any engagement made to thee, an unworthy deceiver and traitor [6]. It is lawful for the other party to recede from his compact, when one previouſly ſets the example." The name of traitor [7] was the fouleſt reproach that could be caſt upon a knight, and what no honourable perſon of that order could endure. The earl, therefore, as ſoon as the king's laſt words reached his ear, kindled into a violent rage, and, riſing up, openly proteſted, that in calling him traytor the king manifeſtly lied; and that, if he was not dignified with the kingly title and ornaments, it ſhould be a bad hour for him, in which ſuch a word had iſſued from his lips. Whereupon the king being hardly able to contain his fury, would have ordered the earl to be laid hold of, but he was aſſured that ſuch an attempt would not be endured by the great men. The earl, moreover, added, "Who could believe you to be a Chriſtian! have you ever confeſſed?" The king returned, "Yes, I have." The earl rejoined, "But what avails confeſſion, without repentance and ſatisfaction?" As if he had ſaid, If ever you did confeſs, you were deſtitute of contrition, and made no competent ſatisfaction. The king at this growing more enraged, "I repent of nothing I ever did in my life ſo much as of ſuffering thee to ſet a foot in England, or to poſſeſs any land or honour in the ſame; wherein thou waxedſt fat, and kickeſt." By the interfering of friends, the quarrel ceaſing, they parted.

---

[1] So M. Paris, although he had omitted to tell us that the earl had gone again to Bourdeaux.

[2] M. Paris.

[3] It ſhould hence ſeem, that Montfort, being deſcended from the earls of Leiceſter, was not conſidered as a foreigner.

[4] What court? This does not ſeem to have been a formal impeachment, but a proceſs of enquiry. If it were a regular impeachment touching the earl's life or property, the Magna Charta ordered it to be before the earl's peers. But a proceſs of enquiry might perhaps lie before the barons and juſtices of the king's council, which ſeems to have been the higheſt branch of the king's court, below the court of the peers of the realm. About this time, parliamentum got into the Latin chronicles inſtead of colloquium; each ſignified "ſolemne colloquium regis ex edicto regio cum magnatibus regni—utriuſque ordinis, ſc. prelatis & proceribus."

[5] The cuſtom then was, that perſons made captive in war ſhould be redeemed by pecuniary compoſition to the uſe of the captors. Simon de Montfort, fearing that his priſoners might eſcape from his cuſtody without paying their ranſom, might rigorouſly enforce confinement, or ſend them for greater ſafety to be impriſoned in France.

[6] A traitor, i. e. a vaſſal who had been falſe to his liege lord, to whom he was bound by homage, ſervice, and fealty. See Selden's Titles, p. 634.

[7] "Fidelitatis vinculum, quo vaſallus tenetur domino eſt adeo celebre apud omnes, ut etiam religione juramenti, qua vallari aſſolet, circumſcripta, ipſum per ſe vinculum, quaſi pro ſacro ubique terrarum & gentium habeatur, nec æſtimentur levem notam incurrere, quicunque illius extiterit violator. Unde qui veteres revolvere vult hiſtorias, inveniet multos pro illo ſervando inhumanis cibis urgente obſidionis anguſtia eſſe uſos, & illis quoque deficientibus elegiſſe potius fama deficere, quam ipſum fidelitatis vinculum violare." So Pope Honorius III. argues with the Albigenſian nobles, who had revolted from their liege lord the king of England, and gone over to the king of France. Vide Rainaldi Pontif. Hiſtor. ad ann. 1226. ſect. 44.

"Soon after the earl's trial, the king perſuaded him to go back to Gaſcogne, in hopes that he would periſh there. "Go back (ſaid he) to Gaſcogne, that as you are a lover and fomenter of war, you may there have your fill of it; and meet with the ſame rewards from it that your father did." To which the earl briſkly replied, "I go moſt willingly; nor do I think to return till I have made your foes your footſtool; though I expect no thanks from an ungrateful man." Whereupon the earl left England, and went back to the parts of France [1] which he was well acquainted with; and there, by the help of his friends and relations, he collected a ſufficient army of brave ſtipendiary troops, whom he engaged in his ſervice by the promiſe of copious ſpoil they were to find in Gaſcogne.

"Though king Henry had twice given Gaſcogne to his brother the earl of Cornwall, and as often taken it from him, and could not therefore with any honour confer that province upon any other; yet he was minded at this time [2], through the inſtance of the queen, to beſtow it upon his ſon Edward, who was now about thirteen years of age.

"Accordingly, without delay, he ordered the Gaſcon delegates, who were yet at London, to be convened; and when they were aſſembled, he told them that he had given Gaſcogne to Edward his eldeſt ſon, and obſerved, that earl Richard did not wiſh to have it, or ſee it more, being ſick of going to ſea [3], and of the expences he had incurred in Gaſcogne. The delegates were highly pleaſed with this intelligence; and immediately all of them preſent performed their homage and oath of fealty; and the lord Edward preſented them with noble and coſtly gifts in gold and ſilver, collars, girdles, and rich ſilks, and promiſed them greater. But the king reſerved to himſelf the ſupremacy of Gaſcogne, viz. the liegeance. And they feaſted together ſumptuouſly, and merrily; and, during dinner, vain-glorious boaſtings and threatnings were poured forth, concerning what would be done to the earl of Leiceſter, and great mirth and pleaſure was excited at the thought of his being utterly diſappointed of the riches he expected to flow in upon him in full ſtreams, and of his being ſoon killed, and quartered, or ſentenced to perpetual baniſhment and ruin. Full of theſe hopes the Gaſcons returned to their own country; but they had ſcarce got thither, and before they were recovered from the fatigue of their voyage, or had time to publiſh what had paſſed in England, they found earl Simon ſtrengthened with a numerous army, and well prepared and fortified againſt them. Calling together, however, many of the earl's principal enemies, and animating them againſt him, by telling them, that they had now a new lord, who was able and ready to blunt and pare the horns of earl Simon, they collected a great army, which was thought ſufficient to aſſure the deſtruction of the earl. With this they aſſailed him with great fury. The earl had laid an ambuſh for them in a narrow turning, and thought to have taken them unawares; but the attempt miſcarried, and a bloody ſkirmiſh enſued, in which one of the earl's moſt valiant knights, whom the earl had appointed to be his deputy in Gaſcogne, was taken, and put in irons, and the reſt of the earl's party diſperſed. The earl, though not preſent at this encounter, was at no great diſtance, eagerly waiting for, and expecting the enemy's approach, and flattering himſelf with the ſucceſs of his ambuſh, having placed himſelf in a ſituation whence he thought he might ſee the place where the action would happen. When, lo! one who eſcaped from the engagement, borne upon a ſwift horſe, came to him, bloody, wounded, maimed, and panting, and adviſed him of the miſhap, and of the capture of his moſt dear friend the knight, who had been his commander upon this occaſion. The earl, awakened as out of a dream and aſtoniſhed, aſked inſtantly, how far the enemy were diſtant. A moment's delay is too much. He was told that the foe was very near, and approaching to aſſail him, and in high ſpirits on account of their late ſucceſs. The earl would hardly wait for the finiſhing of his anſwer, before he ſet out, and flew like a whirlwind, ſcarcely waiting for his own forces; and, taking the meſſenger for his guide, riding full ſpeed to reſcue his knight. As ſoon as he reached the enemy he inebriated his ſword with the blood of many of them; and, with a high hand, ſet his captive people free, and cut and tore their chains in pieces. Theſe, acquiring freſh ſpirits from their ſudden deliverance, ruſhed furiouſly upon their adverſaries, and the conflict became bloody and dubious. The Gaſcons, confiding in their ſuperior numbers, levelled their united force againſt the earl, whom they were impatient to kill or take. They had now encircled him on all ſides in a cloſe and compact body, and the earl was unhorſed, and in the moſt imminent danger. His knight, who had been juſt reſcued, ſeeing his ſituation, exclaimed, "Oh! moſt brave earl, it is juſt that I ſhould deliver my deliverer!" and, with rapid force, piercing through the thick body of the enemy, he ſet the earl upon his horſe, and mortally wounded ſome of his opponents, and others he laid flat to be trodden under foot. The engagement laſted almoſt half the day; and the Gaſcons were all either diſſipated or taken priſoners. Among the latter were five of the firſt perſons in Gaſcogne. The earl obtained a moſt glorious triumph, but was never in ſuch danger of his life. After this his enemies dared not growl againſt him any more.

"King Heury convened again his great men, who had before reſiſted his violence. He aſſembled them to take their advice upon the ſtate of Gaſcogne. They made anſwer, That if the earl of Leiceſter was bent upon ſubduing the king's rebels, it was no matter of ſurprize or grief; eſpecially as the Gaſcons ſtood ſtigmatized for ruining the king when he fled to them in his diſtreſs. They repreſented the Gaſcons as public thieves and robbers, who plundered travellers, and then took refuge in their ſtrong holds; and reminded the king of the ignorance they were in of the preſent ſtate of Gaſcogne, and of earl Simon's having a right to retain the lieutenancy of that country for three years and a half longer according to the letter of his charter. The king was not at all pleaſed at their juſtifying and upholding the earl in this manner. For it was the king's intention to deal very rigorouſly by him; he wanted to have him looked upon as a traytor, and to be condemned as ſuch and diſherited, which was no ſecret to the earl of Leiceſter, though he was at a diſtance. When he was told of it, he ſaid, he knew it very well, that the king, when he had ſtripped him of his earldom, might beſtow it upon ſome Provençal or Poitevin. This council, therefore, was diſſolved, and the king highly offended.

---

[1] Probably, therefore, he did not go again to Gaſcogne, but returned in dudgeon to France. He ſeems to have been concerned upon a double account; firſt, at the mortification of being ſo let down by the king; ſecondly, at the thought of having no opportunity of getting the ranſom of his priſoners, and other emoluments, which alone could prevent his ruin. The earl ſoon afterwards reſigned his government, according to the king's report, for three thouſand pounds; but what likelihood was there of getting this money?

[2] This is one, among many others, of the author's intimations of the queen's forwardneſs to do things that were neither juſt nor popular. It ſeems likewiſe to indicate that the queen was conſidered as being no friend to Montfort.

[3] By the hiſtorian's quaint manner of telling this, he ſeems to intimate, that what the king ſaid was a lie.

"The earl of Leiceſter, before the end of this year, being traduced and vilified by the Gaſcons, reſigned his lieutenancy of Gaſcogne to the king; who, that he might not ſeem to be a downright robber, bought out the remainder of the earl's term for the ſum of ſix thouſand marks. This money, for which the king, who was not able to advance it at that time, gave the earl his bond, helped to ſwell the general debt under which Henry laboured. We find, from unqueſtionable vouchers, that king Henry was in great arrear to the earl ſix years afterwards, when the commotion began between him and his barons[1]. And there is every reaſon for concluding, that no part of this bond for ſix thouſand marks was ever paid by the king to the earl of Leiceſter, or any of his family.

"From a deſire to oblige the king, the earl had expoſed himſelf and his friends, and all he had in the world, to the perils of war; had cut down all his woods and ſold them, and ſpent all the money he could poſſibly raiſe, and brought himſelf to beggary and ruin; for which, in the end, theſe were the returns he met with from the king, who, by his fickleneſs, thus ſacrificed a man that had ſerved him in the niceſt affairs to humour the Gaſcons, as was pretended, whoſe demerit no one was better ſatisfied about than king Henry himſelf[2]."

Thomas Wykes, a chronicler who flouriſhed in the time of the two firſt Edwards, and maintained the doctrine of non-reſiſtance, wherein he totally diſagreed with the monkiſh writers that went before him, tells us, that the earl of Leiceſter, wounded in ſpirit on account of his being depoſed from the lieutenancy of Gaſcogne, concealed his reſentment againſt the king for a time, and ſtayed in France, waiting for an opportunity of gratifying his revenge. Whether Wykes is to be credited in this evil report concerning Montfort, the reader will judge from what follows. If he deſerved this character, M. Paris, and other contemporary writers, were groſly deceived in him, or willing to deceive poſterity by a falſe narration. The firſt of theſe is his copious panegyriſt upon all occaſions. Another contemporary annaliſt[3], dropping the name of Montfort, adds the parentheſis, "magnâ cum reverentiâ nominandus." The chronicler of Dunſtable, another contemporary monk, ſums the ſubject of the earl's lieutenancy in the following ſhort manner among the affairs of the year 1252: "The ſame year, upon the feaſt of Pentecoſt, came the archbiſhop of Bourdeaux, and other great men of that place, into England, bringing a complaint to the lord king concerning lord Simon de Montfort; alleging, that he had committed many injuries againſt them, by hanging ſome, and impriſoning others even to death. And when the lord Simon was prepared to anſwer to all the things objected to according to the law of England, or according to the law of Bourdeaux, they told the king poſitively that they never would receive earl Simon again as their keeper, or obey him. And they earneſtly beſought the king that he would give them another keeper; who at their inſtance appointed for their lord and keeper ſir Edward his ſon; to whom they all did fealty, alleging, that they ought not to do homage to him ſo long as his father was living. But the ſaid Simon de Montfort, becauſe the lord king had granted him the keeperſhip of Gaſcogne by his charter for ſix years, could by no means be induced to give it up; but left the court in anger, and waged infinite war againſt the Gaſcons."

The concluding part muſt allude to what happened between the earl's examination and ſurrender of his charter.

The removal of the earl of Leiceſter from the government of Gaſcogne produced important effects, both with reſpect to king Henry, and the earl himſelf. If Montfort had been ſupported as he ought to have been by his royal maſter while he held that province, the king's enemies would have been ſoon entirely ſubdued, and the peace of the country reſtored. Nothing ſeemed to have any influence upon the Gaſcons but terror; the firmneſs, therefore, of the earl of Leiceſter was a good qualification of a ſeneſchal, and the ſeverity he ſhewed a neceſſary principle in the mode of governing that dutchy.

The only way of reducing it to obedience was to get poſſeſſion of the caſtles and ſtrong places held by the rebels[4]. This was a work of difficulty, wherein he was to encounter all the oppoſition which men who had been accuſtomed to power, and almoſt independence upon the king, could give him[5]. Henry, in liſtening at laſt to the falſe reports of the ſeditious Gaſcons, failed in the point of honour to his lieutenant, and of policy with reſpect to himſelf. No longer awed by the ſtrong hand of Montfort, and thinking themſelves at liberty to do what they liked under the government of ſir Edward, the king's ſon, a boy of thirteen or fourteen years old, they began to commit all ſorts of outrage, and to aſſail each other with the fury of wild beaſts. They ſeized the perſons of men, and treated them as their priſoners; houſes were burnt to aſhes, and the miſerable inhabitants butchered. The parties at variance attacked each other's caſtles, and the whole province was a ſcene of riot, miſery, and confuſion. Of theſe diſturbers of the public peace the chief was Gaſto lord of Bearne, a ſworn vaſſal of the king of England, whom no kindneſs could ſoften, no ties of honour or conſcience reſtrain from acts of malevolence and ſedition. He excited ſuch a ſpirit of diſaffection throughout the dutchy, that Bourdeaux itſelf, which was wont to be the granary of Gaſcogne, began to be in want of proviſion. But theſe were not the only dangers that threatened the ſafety of that country.

"Alphonſo king of Spain, finding that the earl of Leiceſter had retired from thence and reſigned his charter of lieutenancy, inſtantly made a claim to the whole of the dutchy, and conceived the moſt ſanguine expectations of getting it. Theſe were founded in ſeeing the martial earl of Leiceſter withdrawn, and a child placed in his ſtead to govern it. Alphonſo obtained ſuch favour from the pope, that the latter gave him leave to enforce his right derived from the grant of Henry II, and the confirmations thereof by the kings Richard I. and John, and recover the dutchy by his arms. To accompliſh his purpoſe, the Caſtilian invited the viſcount of Bearne and other great men of Gaſcogne to a conference; who thereupon deſerted the king of England, and made a friendſhip with the king of Spain. The party at Bourdeaux, who ſtill retained their fidelity to Henry, ſeeing this, ſent advice of it to England. The king was made very uneaſy by this intelligence, and ſorely repented of having ſuperſeded the earl of Leiceſter, a man full of reſources in difficult ſituations, and in whoſe hands the province would have been ſafe. But it was now too late to recal that haſty action[6]. The earl, that he might not be compelled by the king's intreaties to return to that country, went into France, where the great men of that realm would have been glad to have him remain; wiſhing to have him, on account of his great honour and bravery, to be a ſtay to that kingdom in its diſtreſs, to aſſiſt it with his advice, and act for it as ſeneſchal; for, France at this time was in a ſtate of affliction bordering upon deſpair, on account as well of the abſence of king Lewis, as the death of

---

[1] Pat. 42 Hen. III. Vide Dugd. Bar.

[2] M. Paris.

[3] Ann. Waverleienſes, p. 213.

[4] Rymer.

[5] M. Paris.

[6] M. Weſtm.

Blanche the queen regent, who was ſnatched away by death on the firſt of December, 1252.

“ About the feaſt of Eaſter, 1253, the great men of the Franks, conſidering the danger to which that realm was expoſed for the want of counſel, their king being abroad in the holy war, and the queen regent dead, and many of the grandees of France cut off in the Holy Land, and viewing the fidelity and magnificence of the earl of Leiceſter, who made his illuſtrious father the pattern of his conduct, and knowing him to be diſcharged from the lieutenancy of Gaſcogne, devoutly requeſted him to remain with them, and be one of the keepers of the crown and realm of France; and promiſed, upon his yielding to their requeſt, to beſtow upon him all the honours which his merit deſerved; for they were well perſuaded, as they told him, that he ſincerely loved the realm of France, as his father had done before him; who had fought for the church againſt the Albigenſians, and they reminded him of his being allied by blood to the houſe of France. This was the ſecond time the grandees ſolicited him with great ſolemnity on this ſubject. But nothing could perſuade the earl of Leiceſter to ſwerve from his engagements to the king of England. In a matter which ſo eſſentially concerned his honour, he was reſolved to abſtain from every appearance of evil; and he thought that to renounce king Henry looked too much like treaſon and baſe deſertion of his liege lord[1].

“ About the ſame time the Bourdegalians ſent the king certain advice, that unleſs he repaired to Gaſcogne in haſte, and with great force, he would ſhortly loſe every thing there; adding at the ſame time what was very falſe, viz. that the king had loſt many ſubjects by the tyranny of the earl; whereas that earl had reduced to the king's obedience many powerful and formidable rebels. But the king, who was ſtill deſirous to humour the Gaſcons, ſent them word, that nothing but death ſhould hinder him from going to them, and maintaining their honour and happineſs. And he ordered public notice to be given that no one ſhould pay any obedience to the earl of Leiceſter. And he ſignified to the Gaſcons, collectively and ſeparately, that, out of regard to their complaints and diſcontents, he had depoſed that earl, and redeemed the charter which had been granted him by a large ſum of money. Theſe things were very agreeable to the Gaſcons; and ſuch was their deceitfulneſs and treachery, that thoſe, who while the earl's power laſted pretended to be his ſteady friends, changing ſides with fortune, appeared to be his greateſt enemies[2].”

On the 13th of May, the king pledged himſelf to his great men for the ſtrict obſervance of the Great Charter, which he ſwore to obſerve under the moſt tremendous penalties, and ratified with extraordinary ſolemnity[3].

“ In return was granted to the king the tenth part of all the eccleſiaſtical revenues, which he was to receive of the church for three years towards his croiſade; the ſaid term to commence when the king, by view of the great men, ſhould begin his journey to Jeruſalem[4]; and by the knights at the ſame time was given a ſcutage for that year, at the rate of three marks for each knight's fee.” So ſays M. Paris; but it appears, from the Fœdera, that the pope, in the year 1250, made a grant to the king of the eccleſiaſtical tenths of his dominions for three years towards his croiſade. This grant of the pope, as the bull ſtates, was made with the conſent of the biſhop of Hereford, and others of the realm of England, and the collection of tenths to begin two years before the king's paſſing beyond ſea. The time of his ſetting out was not yet determined. But, on fifteens of Eaſter 1252, the king, in the preſence of many of his great men, ſolemnly undertook to begin his journey on St. John Baptiſt's day (June 24), in the year 1256. The reader is deſired to take particular notice of theſe circumſtances, which produced very important effects.

“ After the diſſolution of the council, about the beginning of June 1253, Henry being adviſed of the deſolation of Gaſcogne, ſent ſummonſes for all the knights throughout England, who owed him military ſervice, to prepare to attend him with their men and horſes into Gaſcogne, and commanding them to meet him at Portſmouth on the octaves of Trinity.”

Notwithſtanding his late confirmation of the Great Charter, he did not ſcruple to violate it in many articles before he left England. In the beginning of Auguſt he embarked for Gaſcogne, having previouſly by common counſel appointed his queen Alianora regent of England, to act by the advice and council of his brother earl Richard[5].

Upon king Henry's arrival at Bourdeaux, which he reached about Auguſt 15, 1253, the citizens received him with all due reſpect. But his enemies either fled, or betook themſelves to their caſtles. He, therefore, inſtantly ordered Riole to be beſieged, wherein the partizans of Gaſto of Bearne had moſt of them concealed themſelves. Gaſto himſelf made his eſcape to the king of Spain, and entered into a league of friendſhip with him, and promiſed him the poſſeſſion of Gaſcogne, which he told him was his right. The people in Riole, depending upon the protection of the Spaniſh king, defended themſelves with ſpirit and manlineſs. Nor could the place be taken till, at length, in the following ſummer, viz. 1254, hunger compelled the beſieged to capitulate[6]; whereupon they agreed to ſurrender the caſtle, and every thing therein, to the king; the latter having previouſly bound himſelf by oath that he would neither kill, nor take vengeance of, any perſon whatever.

In the proſecution of this Gaſcon war king Henry ordered the vineyards of the Gaſcon mal-contents, in which was their principal dependence, to be rooted up, and their caſtles and houſes to be demoliſhed to the foundations[7]. The Gaſcons conſidered the deſtruction of houſes and fruits as a very mean and childiſh way of carrying on a war, and thought the earl of Leiceſter's method much more laudable, whoſe efforts were bent againſt their caſtles and ſtrong holds[8].

King Henry, having taken Riole and Kenauges, made a grant of the freemen[9] to Peter of Savoy, the queen's uncle, and to the king's uterine brothers of Poitou. The hiſtorian[10], to mark the injuſtice of this, obſerves, that theſe places had been won by the toil and money of the Engliſh; and he adds, theſe freemen were inſtantly adjoined to the king's enemies. Theſe freemen, I preſume, were all the people of rank and free condition in the caſtles that had been taken. It was one of the principal emoluments of war in thoſe days for military men to make a profit of their priſoners, by releaſing them for ſuch ſums of money as were agreed upon between the parties; and theſe ſums wete generally regulated by the rank and fortune of each priſoner. The injuſtice, therefore, of king Henry upon this occaſion towards his Engliſh ſubjects muſt have given much umbrage to the latter, and probably helped to bring forward thoſe violent animoſities at court, which at length kindled into civil war.

---

[1] M. Paris. [2] Ib. [3] Rymer. [4] See Annaliſt of Dunſtable, p. 296.

[5] M. Paris. Rymer. [6] Annales Waverleienſes, an. 1253. Annales de Dunſtable. [7] M. Paris, p. 675.

[8] The earl of Leiceſter thought the king's authority in Gaſcogne, and the quiet of the province, depended upon taking and keeping of theſe. And his attempt to do ſo ſeems to have been what gave ſo much offence to the Gaſcons, who claimed them. See Rymer.

[9] Freemen, i. e. the military tenants of thoſe caſtles. It may ſeem odd, but one chief object of William I. in inſtituting military fiefs in England, was the garriſoning of the caſtles built by the king and his Normans in this country. Caſtle-guard was the uſual ſervice impoſed on military fiefs.

[10] M. Paris.

"The earl of Leiceſter, whoſe reputation for courage and honour had procured for him the offer of being made ſeneſchal of France, and which he had refuſed becauſe he thought it repugnant with his engagements to king Henry, repaired (we may ſuppoſe in obedience to the king's ſummons) to his lord the king of England in Gaſcogne, ready and diſpoſed to perform his perſonal devoir, and to aſſiſt him in the vanquiſhing of his enemies. The Gaſcons were not more afraid of lightning[1] itſelf, than of the earl of Leiceſter. He took with him a numerous and ſelect body of knights and eſquires, all maintained at his own charge, and to be diſpoſed of and ſupported juſt as the king ſhould direct. This was purſuant to the good inſtructions he had received from his friend the biſhop of Lincoln. The king was ſtruck with admiration at the earl's generoſity and affection, and received him with the greateſt exultation. The Gaſcon inſurgents ſeeing the earl of Leiceſter arrive with ſo formidable a ſuite; and learning, moreover, that the king of Caſtile had ſettled matters amicably with the king of England, were humbled and terrified, and made the ſubmiſſion that became them to their antient and legal lord king Henry[2]."

By the end of the ſummer the king got poſſeſſion of his own proper caſtles, but not without great toil and expence. Though the mal-contents, who had maintained them againſt him, had killed a great many of his people during the ſeveral ſieges by miſſile weapons, and huge mill-ſtones diſcharged upon them, yet the king was prevailed upon by the Poitevins[3], who had no regard to his true intereſt, and contrary to the opinions of his Engliſh friends, who were zealous for his honour and ſafety, to grant them ſuch good conditions, that they ſuffered little more than the deſtruction of their vineyards for their obſtinate and malicious oppoſition, which had involved the king and his whole realm in ſuch expence and difficulties[4].

On the 9th of October, in this year 1253, the earl of Leiceſter ſuſtained an irreparable loſs in the death of his friend Robert Groſſeteſte, or Greathead, biſhop of Lincoln.

This prelate's intimacy with the earl of Leiceſter reflects no ſmall luſtre on the character of the latter, and entitles the former to ſome particular and honourable mention in this memoir of his friend.

Robert Groſſeteſte was born at Stradbrook in Suffolk. His birth, if not infamous, was low. After ſtudying ſome time at Oxford, he changed his learned reſidence for the univerſity of Paris, next to Oxford, at that time the firſt ſeat of learning in Europe. French at that time was the language of the Engliſh court and bar; even the king's writs were many of them in that tongue, as well as the ſcanty notes that were made of ſome of the moſt important paſſages of the great councils[5]. This language, therefore, was an indiſpenſable qualification for every public man, or one who pretended to the ſociety of the great or learned. Robert went to Paris to acquire it. And this he did in ſo great perfection, that he has obtained a place among the French poets, by a work ſtyled, "The Hiſtory of the Creation of the World[6];" which is yet in being, as we are informed by a late writer. Whether Robert acquired the name of Greathead from the ſurprizing magnitude of his intellectual powers, or from the unnatural bigneſs of his head, has not been noticed by our chroniclers. But the name is well applied in the figurative ſenſe. He was remarkable for the vivacity of his genius; and ſo renowned for the extent and variety of his erudition, that he was looked upon by his contemporaries throughout Europe as a prodigy, or, to ſpeak ſtill ſtronger, a ſort of monſter in learning. His proficiency in aſtronomy and philoſophy was ſo great, that inferior ſcholars in thoſe branches ſuſpected that Robert muſt hold converſe with dæmons to excel as he did. He was equally eminent in ſcholaſtic divinity, knowledge of the Scriptures, and claſſical learning; without a rival in the Greek and Latin, and, as ſome add, in the Hebrew languages. After his return from Paris he was made archdeacon of Leiceſter, and, in the year 1235, biſhop of Lincoln[7]. At this time the pope was a kind of univerſal ſovereign, both in ſpirituals and temporals over all Chriſtendom. And ſo great was the corruption of the holy ſee, that as there was hardly any thing it could not do, ſo there was nothing almoſt that it was aſhamed to do.

The practice of admitting appeals at the Roman court from eccleſiaſtical judicatures in England, was a diſgrace to the juriſprudence of England, whoſe legal deciſions were thereby rendered of little or no avail, and proved to be no great honour to the Roman court, where every thing was carried by dint of money. The clauſes of non obſtante in the papal briefs, by which all the privilegia of former popes, made in favour of communities or individuals, were cancelled at once; the acts of proviſion and reſervation, by which the pope contrived to ſecure to himſelf the diſpoſal of ſuch Engliſh benefices and dignities as he liked beſt, and which he uſually gave to foreigners, who neither reſided in England, nor had the leaſt connexion there; were part of the abuſes particularly inſulting and injurious to the nation; and which biſhop Greathead employed his talents and his ſpirit, which was equal to his talents, to redreſs.

He expoſtulated with the biſhop of Rome upon the abuſe of the keys, in letters addreſſed to the pontiff full of invective. To procure ſome ſatisfaction from his holineſs, in the beginning of the year 1250, he made a journey to Lyons, where the pope then reſided, and rebuked him with great aſperity to his face, for which Innocent was diſpoſed to take inſtant revenge, but was reſtrained from it by the holy college, who reminded him, that Robert biſhop of Lincoln was the moſt eminent prelate in Chriſtendom for piety, orthodoxy, and every kind of learning. The pope, therefore, treated and diſmiſſed him civilly, but gave him no redreſs. Upon this occaſion the biſhop was abſent from England till Michaelmas 1250. Seeing the confuſion that was coming upon the Church, and grieved at taking ſo much fruitleſs pains to rectify what was amiſs, upon his return home he committed the adminiſtration of his function to a ſufficient official, and formed a reſolution to renounce worldly avocations, that he might devote himſelf to ſtudy and meditation. He wiſhed to reſign his biſhoprick; but was not come to a determination upon that point, ſuſpecting, that, if he gave up his biſhoprick, it would be the worſe for the Church, as the king would probably do upon that as upon ſimilar occaſions, ſtrip and plunder the ſee during the vacancy; and then fill it up with ſome unworthy perſon.

This biſhop was very diligent in his viſitation of religious houſes, and rigorous in puniſhing ſuch abuſes as were diſcovered in them. His manner of viſiting the religious houſes belonging to females ſhall be given in M. Paris's own words: "Et quod indignum eſt ſcribi, ad domos religioſarum veniens, fecit exprimi mamillas earundem; ut ſic phyſice, ſi eſſet inter eas corruptela, experiretur."

"In the following Lent he was ſuſpended from his epiſcopal office for refuſing to admit a certain Italian, who knew nothing of the Engliſh language, to a rich benefice in his dioceſe[8]."

To this affair Fabian ſeems to allude in the following paſſage[9]: "This Robert, for ſo much as the fourth Innocent grieved the Church of England with taſks and payments againſt reaſon, he therefore ſent unto him a ſharp epiſtle. This pope then gave unto a chylde, a nephew of his, a canonry which fell void in the church of Lincoln, and ſent the chylde unto the biſhop, charging him to admit the ſaid chylde, and to ſet him in his place. But this byſhoppe boldly denied the reſceyt of the chylde, and wrote to the pope that he would not, nor ſhould receive ſuch to the cure of ſouls, that could not rule himſelf. Therfore this Robert was ſomoned to appear before the pope, and therupon accurſed."

---

[1] The cauſe of this meteor being then not known, it was conſidered as a ſupernatural intimation of divine diſpleaſure. A ſtorm of thunder and lightning put Edward III. into ſuch diſmay, that he dared not engage the French at the moment of onſet, or purſue the war with the people. Voltaire diſbelieved the fact; but nothing could be more probable.

[2] M. Paris.

[3] To whom the king was very partial.

[4] M. Paris.

[5] M. Weſtm. M. Paris. Cavei Hiſt. Literaria. Godwin.

[6] Lacombe Dictionaire du vieux language François.

[7] Godwin.

[8] M. Paris.

[9] Fabian's Chronicle.

"In this year, 1252, the avarice of the Romaniſts was come to ſuch a paſs, that Robert biſhop of Lincoln, amazed at it, got an exact computation made by his clerks of the revenues, which foreign eccleſiaſtics had from England; and it was found, upon a careful and accurate eſtimate, that the preſent pope, viz. Innocent IV, had impoveriſhed the univerſal church more than all his predeceſſors from the earlieſt times of popery; and the rents of aliens, whom the Roman church had enriched in England, amounted to more than 70,000 marks[1]. But the whole revenue of the king was not computed to be a third part of that ſum."

Matthew Paris has left an account of a very remarkable converſation, which paſſed between the biſhop and his phyſician[2] John de Sancto Ægidio, a friar of the order of Preachers, and a reader in theology, a learned and agreeable companion, in whoſe ſociety the biſhop tock much pleaſure. The hiſtorian ſums up biſhop Groſſeteſte's character as follows[3]:

"He was a manifeſt blamer of the pope and king, a reprover of prelates, a corrector of monks, a director of prieſts, an inſtructor of clerks, a ſupporter of ſcholars, a preacher to the people, a perſecutor of unchaſte livers, a diligent ſearcher of the ſcriptures, a mallet and deſpiſer of the Romaniſts. At the table of bodily refreſhment, elegant, plentiful, obliging, chearful, and affable; at the ſpiritual table, devout, mournful, and penitent. In his pontifical duty, diligent, ſolemn, and indefatigable[4]."

His various and ſhining virtues procured him the name and veneration of a ſaint with the vulgar. And even the Univerſity of Oxford gave into the ſame eſtimation of his ſanctity, and, preſenting a memorial of Robert's miracles to Clement IV, deſired that pontiff to inroll him in the catalogue of the ſaints. This learned biſhop was the author of two hundred treatiſes, which are enumerated by our Bale, and left by his will a large collection of books to the Friar-minors in Oxford.

"The earl of Leiceſter[5] was ſtudious to recommend himſelf to this prelate, and to his care committed his little ones to be trained. By the biſhop's advice the earl conducted his moſt arduous affairs, undertook doubtful and difficult ones, went on with what he had begun; in particular, proſecuted thoſe ſchemes which appeared to be meritorious and laudable. It was believed that the biſhop even enjoined him for the remiſſion of his ſins to engage in that cauſe, for which he contended even to death; declaring, that the peace of the Engliſh church could not be eſtabliſhed but by the material ſword, and conſtantly maintaining, that all who died for it would be crowned with martyrdom. "Some perſons (continues my author) report that the biſhop, laying hand one day upon the earl's eldeſt ſon, ſaid to him, "Oh! my deareſt ſon, thou and thy father ſhall fall both together in the ſame day."

The earl of Leiceſter, who lived in this cloſe friendſhip with biſhop Groſſeteſte, and opened to him the receſſes of his heart, and ſought advice from him as his father-confeſſor, received ſome important leſſons from him after the ſhock which the earl's mind had lately felt by the king's very extraordinary behaviour to him. Upon trying occaſions, the biſhop recommended to him the exerciſe of charity and meekneſs, which, he told him, ſet men above others in real excellence, and induced them to return good for evil. He adviſed him, therefore, to overlook the raſh and impetuous words of king Henry, and rather to call to mind the king's former loving-kindneſſes. In particular, how he had given him his ſiſter in marriage, granted him the earldom of Leiceſter, and the cuſtody of the heir of Humphrey d'Umfreville. The earl reſpectfully complied with the biſhop's advice[6].

The earl of Leiceſter remained with the king at Bourdeaux during the following winter.

Notwithſtanding the fair proſpect which Henry had before the end of the year[7] of accompliſhing the projected marriage between his eldeſt ſon Edward and Alianora of Spain, the baſis of which treaty was to be Alphonſo's reſignation of his right to Gaſcogne; and though the Engliſh plenipotentiaries, the biſhop of Bath and Sir John Manſel, had been for many months negotiating at the Spaniſh court to adjuſt the ſeveral matters between the two kings, and had almoſt, if not quite, ſettled the ſubject of their embaſſy; yet king Henry, a few days before Chriſtmas, ſent over the earl mareſchal and Gilbert de Segrave to England, to obtain from the univerſity of the realm a copious and ſufficient aid, pretending that he was in the utmoſt diſtreſs, as well from the diſaffection of the Gaſcons, who were not all ſubdued, and were preparing to deliver the country of Gaſcogne to the king of Caſtille, as from the hoſtile intentions of the latter, who was making great preparations for invading the dutchy the following ſpring; and, after the conqueſt of Gaſcogne, purpoſed to carry his arms into England and Ireland. The great men of England, who were convened at the beginning of the year by the earl of Cornwall for taking the king's meſſage into conſideration, expreſſed their zeal for the king's ſervice, and declared their readineſs to go over in perſon, and fight in his defence, and to aid him with money to ſupport his honour and juſt rights; but, at the ſame time, as they could not really believe that the king of Spain had any intention of invading Gaſcogne, they would take farther time with reſpect to the aid which the king deſired. And thus the council broke up. The[8] deliberations of the great men were reſumed upon this ſubject after Eaſter; by which time the earl of Leiceſter was returned to England. He attended this meeting, and told them the whole truth; by which they eſcaped the ſnare, which the king, by the advice of the Poitevins, his favourites and counſellors, had laid for them.

On the 25th of Auguſt, the king, by a ſpecial order, ſent the earl of Leiceſter to the king of Scotland [1] upon ſome ſecret buſineſs not committed to writing, which he put into the earl's mouth, and which he was anxious ſhould be unfolded to the Scottiſh king; and he deſired the king of Scotland, by his letters, to pay the moſt entire credit to what ſhould be communicated to him, as from the king, by the earl of Leiceſter.

---

[1] In their memorial to the pope the clergy ſtated it at 50,000 marks, and upwards. See the pope's anſwer in Rymer, tom. I. p. 471. The Italians alone had benefices to the amount of 8,000 marks.

[2] Medicine, as well as divinity and law, ſeem at that time to have been engroſſed by churchmen.

[3] Migravit igitur ab hujuſmodi, quem nunquam dilexit, exilio ſanctus Lincolnienſis epiſcopus Robertus ſecundus apud Bugedonam manerium ſuum in nocte ſancte Dionyſii. Domini, papæ, & regis, redargutor manifeſtus, prælatorum correptor, monachorum corrector, preſbyterorum director, clericorum inſtructor, ſcholarium ſuſtentator, populi prædicator, incontinentium perſecutor, ſcripturarum ſedulus perſcrutator diverſarum, Romanorum malleus, & contemptor. In menſa refectionis corporalis, dapſilis, copioſus, & civilis, hilaris, & affabilis. In menſa ſpirituali devotus, lacrymoſus, & contritus. In officio pontificali ſedulus, venerabilis, & indefatigabilis.

[4] The biſhop employed his laſt breath in bewailing the corruptions of the church of Rome—"Et cum hæc & alia enormia, videlicet omne genus avaritiæ, uſuram ſymoniam & rapinam, omne genus luxuriæ, libidinem, gulam, & ornatum, quæ in illa curia reguant deteſtaretur, ut vere de ipſa judicatur.

Ejus avaritiæ totus non ſufficit orbis:
Ejus luxuriæ meretrix non ſufficit omnis."

[5] Riſhanger, ad an. 1265.

[6] M. Paris.

[7] Ib. and Rymer.

[8] Parliamentary Hiſt. and Brady's Introduction to Engliſh Hiſtory.

This is the whole that is tranſmitted to us on the buſineſs for which the earl was to go to the king of Scots.

The next time we read of him is at the following Michaelmas [2]; when he attended the magnificent funeral of the young and accompliſhed Sir William de Cantelupe, the third brother of that noble and opulent family that had died within a few years of each other, ſeveral other earls attended this melancholy ceremonial. The earls of Leiceſter and Hereford depoſited the corpſe in the ſepulchre.

Prince Edward and his ſuite remained all the winter in Gaſcogne. But the king and queen of England obtained leave of the king of France to paſs through his realm and viſit Paris in their way home; and reached Dover Dec. 27, 1254, after Henry had been abſent from England about ſeventeen months.

Before we proceed in our memoir of the earl of Leiceſter, it ſeems neceſſary to ſtate an important intrigue, opened and conducted during the king's reſidence in Gaſcogne, and which at length contributed to a civil war in England, wherein our earl, after riſing to the pinnacle of glory, involved himſelf and family in total ruin.

The long and calamitous conteſt between the Holy ſee and the houſe of Suabia, for the empire of Italy and the realm of the two Sicilies, has been amply delineated by various hiſtorians. At this time the power of the keys was carried to ſo extravagant an height, that all the kings and potentates of Chriſtendom ſeemed to hold their dominions, and even their very lives, at the mercy of the Roman pontiff. For, let him but lay a kingdom or province under an interdict, and all who lived within them were ſhut out of the church, and deprived of baptiſm, burial, all other religious offices, and even the benefit of the ſpiritual courts; let him thunder his anathema againſt a prince, and immediately the latter loſt the obedience of his ſubjects; let him proclaim a cruſade againſt him, and the Chriſtians, who were reputed the moſt devout, thought it their duty to oppoſe him in arms, and deſtroy him. In this arduous conteſt with the powerful houſe of Suabia, Innocent IV was deeply involved, while Henry king of England was ſtaying in Gaſcogne in the years 1253 and 1254. His vengeance was firſt diſcharged againſt the emperor Frederic, whom he excommunicated, and declared to be depoſed; and, not being ſatisfied with the eccleſiaſtical cenſures he had iſſued againſt him, ordered the princes of Germany to chuſe another ſovereign, and put himſelf at the head of ſuch of them as he could influence, and ſome of the ſtates of Italy, in order to effect the total overthrow of Frederic and his children. The two Sicilies were a fief of the holy ſee; and, therefore, by the judgement inflicted by the church upon Frederic, the king thereof, were claimed as an eſcheat of the church, which the pope thought himſelf at liberty to diſpoſe of as he thought fit. In the midſt of this confuſion died the emperor, carried off, as his ſon Conrad conſtantly affirmed, by poiſon, which the pope had contrived to be given. His death happened on the 13th of December, 1250. By his laſt teſtament, he left his kingdom of the two Sicilies to his ſon Conrad, king of the Romans. The pope had for ſome time paſt patronized William count of Holland as a candidate for the empire; and the object neareſt to his heart was to prevent in time to come to an union of the realm (ſo the two Sicilies were called) with the empire, as ſuch a junction made the king of the Sicilies too great for a vaſſal of the holy ſee. Upon the death of Frederic, therefore, Innocent redoubled his efforts to defeat the juſt pretenſions of Conrad. The late emperor had driven the pope out of Italy, and obliged him to take up his reſidence for ten years in the city of Lyons. But, upon the news of Frederic's death, he began without delay to prepare for repaſſing the Alps. It took him up ſome time to make the neceſſary arrangements for this important journey. In the mean while, he entered into new negotiations with the ſtates of Italy for the furtherance of his projects, exerted himſelf afreſh in Germany to defeat the hopes of Conrad reſpecting the empire, and multiplied his agents in the realm, to alienate the people there from all attachment to the houſe of Suabia, and render them ſubſervient to his own views; and directed the German prelates to declare thoſe to be ipſo facto anathematized, who ſhould dare afford any aſſiſtance whatever to any perſon who ſhould affect the realm, the ſole diſpoſal of which he ſaid belonged to the holy ſee. This Innocent did to prevent any aſſiſtance going from Germany to help Manfroi, the viceroy in the abſence of Conrad. Theſe meaſures were accompanied with others calculated to ruin Conrad, and fix the count of Holland on the imperial throne. Moreover, he wrote to the Suabians, to command them not to obey Conrad, and to tell them ſolemnly, that he ſhould never enjoy either the empire or that dutchy; alleging that Conrad, deſcended from ſuch anceſtors, could not be ſuppoſed to be untainted with heretical depravity. It was not till Eaſter week, A. D. 1251, that Innocent could begin his march for Italy. On the feaſt of the Supper of the Lord, i. e. on Thurſday in Paſſion-week, and juſt before his departure, he anathematized Conrad afreſh for daring to aſpire to the empire, ordered the anathema to be publiſhed all over Germany, and commanded the Germans to receive the count of Holland for their ſovereign.

Innocent was no ſooner got back into Italy than he viſited the chief cities of Lombardy, and invigorated the league, that, under his auſpices, had been formed againſt the houſe of Suabia, and by his intrigues in the realm had engaged ſome of the people there to form a plot for the deſtruction of his enemies. Manfroi prince of Tarento, and ſon of the late emperor, in the abſence of Conrad adminiſtered the affairs of Sicily in quality of bailiff or viceroy. Perceiving the pope to aim at nothing ſhort of getting the kingdom into his own hands, and excluding for ever the poſterity of Frederic from their juſt inheritance, he levied an army, and marched into Apulia, and laid ſiege to Naples. Such rapid ſucceſs attended his enterprize, that, when Conrad came into Sicily by ſea with a reinforcement of Germans the next year, he found all the realm in a ſtate of allegiance, except Naples, Capua, and a few other places; and theſe were beſieged and taken by Conrad, who thus became maſter of all Sicily. The pope ſeemed now to be in a ſtate of extremity. By his expenſive conteſt with the houſe of Suabia he was not only deſtitute of money, but become ſo deeply plunged in debt with the people of Rome, as to make him afraid to venture his perſon there ſince his coming back into Italy. It occurred to him, as the beſt expedient he could adopt, to look out for ſome foreign prince who was hardy and rich enough for ſuch an undertaking, and beſtow upon him the grant of the realm in fee, to hold the ſame of the holy ſee, as its vaſſal or feodary. Accordingly, it is reported to have been offered again and again to any of the brothers of the king of France, who all declined it. In the year 1252, we find a tender of it made to Richard earl of Cornwall, whoſe immenſe riches were a ſpecial recommendation in the eyes of the pontiff. A negotiation was ſet on foot between the parties, which ſoon terminated in the abſolute refuſal of the Engliſh earl. In 1253, the earl of Anjou, brother of the French king, ſeems to have been almoſt brought to an intention of acceding to the pope's overture; for, among our archives, we find a formal grant of Sicily to that prince, containing all the conditions upon which the holy ſee allowed him to hold it[1]. But this treaty proved alſo abortive. There ſtill, however, remained a certain great prince, who languiſhed for ſo rich a jewel, and cared not by what ſteps, or at what expence, he could put in even for the chance of it[2].

---

[1] Rymer.

[2] M. Paris Annales de Dunſtable.

“ The pope (ſays M. Paris) having failed in the ſucceſs of his negotiation with earl Richard, ſent his nuncios ſecretly to the king of England, to circumvent his ſimplicity, whom he knew to be weak enough to believe any thing, and always ready to do any thing that would prove hurtful to himſelf; and he offered and granted to him the kingdom of Sicily and Apulia, telling him, that he would furniſh ſuch ſupplies of money towards getting the actual poſſeſſion of that crown as he conveniently could, with a farther promiſe, that he (the pope) would make the matter eaſy to the king; for, that he would order all the croiſés, who were intended for the Holy land, and all the money which had been, or could be, collected for the king's cruiſade, to be employed in the Sicilian war. Henry was too eager to have his ſon a king to make any ſerious demur to ſo tempting a propoſal. But one thing ſtuck a little in his conſcience, about which he wiſhed to be made eaſy, before he finally concluded matters with the pope. To accept of the realm of Sicily, he thought, looked like wiſhing to clothe himſelf with the ſpoils of his nephew prince Henry, ſon of the late emperor by Iſabella, ſiſter of the king of England, who might eventually be heir to the crown of Sicily. But in the following winter this difficulty was wholly removed; for, that amiable and beautiful youth was taken off by poiſon. It was for the pope's purpoſe to have the world believe that Conrad was the author of this atrocious deed; and that he committed it from a ſpirit of jealouſy. This report was ſeduloully diſſeminated by the papal faction, to render Conrad odious, and to furniſh the pope with a freſh pretence for perſevering in his endeavours to ruin him; and fixing ſuch a crime upon Conrad would be a good colour for the king of England's going to war with that prince, merely to revenge the death of his nephew. But no proof was brought of Conrad's having any hand in the death of that young prince, and he reſented the imputation, as an outrageous calumny, deſtitute wholly of foundation in truth. This event, however, brought matters to a ſpeedy iſſue with king Henry. The firſt grant of Sicily to Edmund was made by Albert, the pope's notary and legate, by the pope's order, and in his name, on the 6th of March, 1254[3]. To ſupply any defects, real or imaginary, of this grant made by Albert, it was confirmed by another, bearing the pope's own name, of the ſame purport, and partly of the ſame tenor, dated the 14th of the ſame month.

No joy could exceed that of king Henry upon his receiving this acquiſition of honour to his family. His tranſport of exultation almoſt overſet him. He began inſtantly to ſalute his ſon Edmund with the title of Majeſty. But the legate told him, that he was premature in giving the title of king to the young prince; and that the affair at preſent muſt be a ſecret. This he did (continues my author) leſt the friends of the king, who were well acquainted with the artifices of the court of Rome, ſhould apprize him of them, and put him upon his guard. The chief perſon who conducted this intrigue and guided Henry was Thomas of Savoy, uncle of the queen, and brother of Peter of Savoy and Boniface archbiſhop of Canterbury. The firſt of theſe was complimented with the earldom of Richmond, and the latter had been forced upon the monks of Canterbury for the primacy of all England, although deſtitute of every qualification for that dignified ſtation. Thomas of Savoy had married the pope's niece; and, being thus connected with the pope by affinity, and with the queen of England by blood, he was likely to have the eſteem and confidence of both, and to take a willing part in a project which might eventually be productive of much advantage to himſelf. The great men of England, whoſe council a king of that realm was bound by law to take in all public affairs of importance, either knew nothing of this tranſaction, or, at leaſt, were not conſulted about it.

In the ſummer of this year, 1254, the queen and prince Edward both went over to Bourdeaux, as if to viſit king Henry. Their going was matter of ſurprize to the Engliſh, and ſeemed very myſterious, as king Henry had ſent over to the regency, to deſire a copious ſupply of money, on pretence that he was likely to have a war with the king of Caſtille. The nobles of England remarked, that, if the king had expected Gaſcogne to be diſturbed by a Spaniſh war, he would hardly have wiſhed his queen and eldeſt ſon to be there while it laſted. Nor do we find, in the buſineſs which the regent was ordered by king Henry to communicate to the aſſembled grandees of England, the leaſt hint about Sicily.

In this eſtate of the affair concerning that kingdom, an event which could not have been expected, placed the king in a new ſituation. This was nothing leſs than the death of king Conrad, on the 21ſt of May, 1254, and in the 27th of his age, leaving a ſon of about two years old, named Conradin. Conrad is ſaid to have been beholden for his death to ſome of the popiſh agents, who got him diſpatched by poiſon. However, according to Raynaldo, he ordered, by his will, that Conradin ſhould be committed to the grace and protection of the holy ſee.

Berthold marquis of Hoemberg, a German, who had been much employed by the late emperor, and alſo by Conrad, and commander of the German troops in the realm, was, by Conrad's will, appointed to the bailiffſhip, as the truſtee for Conradin; and into his hands, upon the death of Conrad, fell the royal treaſure, and all the valuables of this king. Aſſuming, therefore, the bailiffſhip, or viceroyalty, Berthold ſent legates to the pope to deſire the grace of the holy ſee towards Conradin, purſuant to Conrad's teſtamentary direction. The pope, who conſidered this appointment as the reſult more of fear than of love, returned for anſwer, that he muſt have the poſſeſſion of the realm; that Conradin ſhould enjoy the kingdom of Jeruſalem, and dutchy of Suabia, and every thing elſe, whether in the realm or elſewhere, to which he ſhould be found when he came of age to have a right. He required of the Sicilians, that they ſhould take the oath of fealty to the holy ſee, but allowed them to add, ſaving the right of the infant Conradin. It muſt ſeem very ſtrange to find Conrad leaving the guardianſhip of his ſon to the pope; for, though in ſtrictneſs of feudal law, which put the cuſtody of noble fiefs during the minority of the heir, as well as the perſon of the heir in the lord, of whom the fief was held; yet here the compliance with that rule could hardly produce any other conſequence than the certain deſtruction of the ward. For, what had Conradin to expect of the pope, if the latter ſhould be put into the quiet poſſeſſion of the infant prince's inheritance, who had at this very time beſtowed it upon an Engliſh prince? While this was in agitation, the pope did not fail to improve his correſpondence with king Henry.

The king was impatient to be formally releaſed from the vow he had made of going into the Holy Land, and for compounding that matter by ſerving the church perſonally in Sicily. Thomas of Savoy, and others, the king's ſpecial nuncios, were employed to procure this exchange. The pope's anſwer, dated May 31, 1254, was, that, as great honour would accrue to the king from his affording ſeaſonable relief to the holy land, and as a voyage there would be made very eaſy and convenient to the king out of the realm when he he had got it, which would now, by the death of Conrad, be greatly facilitated (the principal obſtacle to his acquiſition of the realm being thus removed), he was in doubt whether he ſhould comply with the king's petition. But, neverthelеſs, if the commutation of the vow was ſtill a thing which the king greatly wiſhed, he (the pope) would agree to it, as far as he could do it with the approbation of God.

---

[1] Rymer.

[2] Here M. Paris roundly aſſerts, what was probably true, that the pope made the firſt propoſal for applying the eccleſiaſtical tenths, granted for the holy wars to the war of Sicily. By the documents printed by Rymer, it might be thought, that the ſcheme originated with king Henry; for, among theſe documents, he makes it his humble requeſt to the pontiff, that the eccleſiaſtical tenths might, by his holineſs's permiſſion, be diverted to the Sicilian; to which the pope yields with an appearance of heſitation.

[3] Rymer.

In another letter of the 9th of June, the pope tells him, that it was the opinion of ſome people, that Conrad being dead, he (the pope) ought to carry on the matter of Sicily no farther with him; but, that as he panted moſt impatiently to raiſe the king's family, and even preferred their good to his own, he ſhould be more eager than before to proſecute the affair with diligence and ardour; in proportion to the fairer proſpect of a ſpeedy and ſucceſsful iſſue. He deſires the king, on his part, not to be negligent and tardy, which would expoſe both of them to diſgrace, but ſo to go into Sicily and take their common ſon Edmund with him with a ſtrong hand, as that each might acquire commendation. "To this work you ought to be more ſtrongly animated, becauſe God ſeems to be with you in it, by thus unexpectedly clearing the way before you. The treaſures of the holy ſee had been exhauſted by this war, and its credit too much ſunk to raiſe any ſufficient ſupplies for the payment of armies. But now the king of England was anſwerable for the money which the pope ſhould raiſe and expend in the proſecution of the war. And all the money which the pope could borrow, upon any terms, was placed to the king's account. Upon this dependence Innocent raiſed forces, and took all other ſteps for carrying his point in favour of Edmund, whom he wiſhed to make king of Sicily, becauſe that ſeemed to be the only way of paying his debts, and eſtabliſhing his right of ſovereignty with regard to the realm.

The marquis of Hoemburg, who, by Corrad's will, was bailiff of the Sicilies, a German, and an unpopular man, ſeeing a party formed in favour of the church, which he doubted whether it would be in his power to defeat, and a great army raiſing by the pope was thrown into a ſtate of great perplexity, and renounced the bailiffſhip; upon which, the counts and barons, and other great men of the realm, who continued in fealty towards Conradin, together with the marquis Berthold himſelf, made their requeſt to the prince of Tarento, that he would take the government of the infant king, as his neareſt relation in ſucceſſion to the crown of Sicily, and reminded him how much it behoved him ſo to do, as well for a juſt regard to himſelf as his defenceleſs nephew. Manfroi having acceded to this propoſal, Berthold, and the counts and barons, and other lieges of Sicily, took the oath of fealty to Conradin and Manfroi, with this ſtipulation, that, if the young king lived, they would regard and obey Manfroi as his bailiff, or governor; but, if Conradin (who was in Germany) were dead, or ſhould die without iſſue, they would have no other king but Manfroi. Innocent, to be nearer the ſcene of action, had now betaken himſelf to Anagni, where, hearing of the above proceedings, and that Manfroi was preparing to oppoſe him with a formidable army, did there, on the feaſt of Aſſumption (Auguſt 15), fulminate the cenſures of the church, and other grievous penalties, againſt Manfroi, the marquis of Hoemburg, and all their abettors and partizans whatſoever. To prevent matters from going to extremity, Manfroi made an overture to the pope, importing, that, as he had taken upon himſelf the office of bailiff out of compaſſion to his nephew, he was ready to relinquiſh the ſame, and put his pupil into the hands of the holy ſee, whoſe ſpecial duty it was to protect the helpleſs and innocent; and that he himſelf would, if the pope wiſhed to govern Sicily for his royal ward, help to put that kingdom into his holineſs's adminiſtration, provided his own rights, and thoſe of his nephew, were ſecured. Upon the ground of theſe ſtipulations, it was agreed on both ſides, that the pope ſhould have admiſſion into the realm, but without prejudice to the right of Conradin or the prince of Tarento; which being concluded, Manfroi was reſtored to the peace of the church, and confirmed in his territories given him by his father, and did himſelf conduct the pontiff into Capua, holding with his own hand the pope's mule. Innocent, having thus got poſſeſſion of the realm, appointed his nephew, William Cardinal deacon of St. Euſtachius, to take the charge of it in quality of legate. His powers were very large, ſuited to the purpoſes of coercion or conciliation as circumſtances required. And every thing was now in the very train which the pope wiſhed. And from Capua the pope proceeded to Naples, where he remained, thus fixing his reſidence in the capital of the realm. At the ſame time king Henry was amuſing himſelf with the fond conceit of his ſon's being king of Sicily. On the 3d of October, in the name of king Edmund, he gave and granted to Thomas of Savoy, who had taken a deep part in this buſineſs, the principality of Capua, with all its appendages and appurtenances, to hold to Thomas and his heirs for ever. And, on the 14th of the ſame month, Henry, as tutor of king Edmund, by his letters patent, addreſſed to the biſhops, abbots, priors, counts, barons, knights, freemen, and all others of the realm of Sicily, made known to them, that, the pope having granted the kingdom to Edmund, he required them to be aiding and aſſiſting to Henry archbiſhop of Ebridunum, and Peter biſhop of Hereford, or either of them, who ſhould come among them, concerning the poſſeſſion and ſeiſin of the ſaid king Edmund, as to the ſaid kingdom; and that they ſhould be obedient to the ſaid archbiſhop and biſhop, in all things touching the ſaid ſeiſin, till they ſhould be otherwiſe informed by the king of England[1]. This letter was iſſued at Bourdeaux. On the 17th of November, the pope ſent again to the king, to expreſs his joy, that the biſhop of Hereford had been appointed to go to the holy ſee upon the arduous and ſecret buſineſs then in agitation, and to perfect what remained on the king's part to be done. He farther aſſured the king, that every thing went on there juſt as he could wiſh, and that he muſt not delay his journey, for at this time nothing was wanting but the king's coming to aſſure the object, which might now be attainted without difficulty, if the king would ſet off immediately. On the other hand, that the holy ſee did not brook negligence and delay, and that the ſoft government of the church might not perhaps be ſufficient to keep the kingdom in certain and perfect ſubjection[2].

The cardinal legate, as ſoon as he had gotten the adminiſtration of the kingdom into his hands, began to rule it, not as the guardian of Conradin, but as lord of the realm, and to ſubvert the rights both of that prince and of Manfroi. The pope had agreed, that the Sicilians ſhould take the oath of fealty to the holy ſee, with a ſaving of the rights of Conradin; but the legate exacted the oath of fealty to the holy ſee from all the great men, and even from Manfroi, generally, and without that qualification. So writes an antient and anonymous author of Manfroi's life. But the documents juſt cited demonſtrate, that the pope was at this time meditating to put the realm into the actual ſeizing of Edmund. The Sicilians, therefore, could now be no longer ſtrangers to the pope's treaty with the king of England; and M. Paris relates, that when the Sicilians diſcovered that the pope meant to put over them, without their privity or conſent, a mere boy, a ſtranger and a foreigner, they fired with indignation, and determined not to ſubmit to it. Manfroi now revolted from the pope; and, having prevailed with the people of Nocera, a city built by Frederick, and inhabited by the Saracens, to ſupport his own cauſe, and that of his nephew Conradin, muſtered a very formidable force, and without delay marched againſt and took Foggia; whereupon the legate in a fright fled from Troya, and made all the haſte he could to Naples, where he found pope Innocent recently dead. His deceaſe was on the 7th of December. The cardinals, and whole Roman court, then at Naples, were ſtruck with ſuch a panic at what they were told of Manfroi, that they were deſirous of leaving Naples, and retreating into the Campania. But at length they were perſuaded to remain in that city till they had found a ſucceſſor for the late pope; accordingly, the papal chair was filled the next day with Alexander IV, a nephew of the late pope Gregory IX, and a man of mild temper, and devout and mortified life; but weak enough to be guided by thoſe who pretended to have nothing ſo much at heart as the intereſt of the holy ſee, while in fact they were purſuing ſuch meaſures only as were dictated by their rapacity. The late pope, who breathed an implacable hatred to the houſe of Suabia, had left it as his dying injunction to the cardinals, to proſecute the war againſt the prince of Tarento, and all the partizans of the late emperor Frederic. This had great weight with Alexander, and, jointly with the advice of thoſe in whom he implicitly confided, inclined him to perſevere in the ſchemes of the late pope. As ſoon, therefore, as he was raiſed to his new honours, he became fixed in his reſolution to adopt the plan of his predeceſſor, with regard to Sicily; and was ſoon addreſſed by the king of England's miniſters on that ſubject.

[1] Rymer.

[2] Ibid.

The perſon to whoſe management was principally intruſted this important negotiation was Peter biſhop of Hereford. The reader may remember that pope Innocent, who had been apprized of Henry's intention of ſending Peter to the court of Rome, on the buſineſs of Sicily, had expreſſed, in a ſubſequent diſpatch to that king, his entire approbation of the king's choice.

The biſhop's commiſſion bears date the 14th of October, 1254.

As pope Innocent died on the 7th of December following, it is probable that he did not arrive at the Roman court till after that pontiff's death. We do not, however, find that Peter returned to England, or was furniſhed with freſh credentials on account of the deceaſe of pope Innocent. It may be ſuppoſed, therefore, he treated with the new pope, viz. Alexander IV, by virtue of the power he had lately brought from England before Innocent's deceaſe. As the account of this biſhop is very curious, and gives us new knowledge of that age, and of the court of Henry of Wincheſter, I am induced to exhibit it to the reader as the concluſion of the tranſactions of the year 1254. Peter, biſhop of Hereford, had the ſurname of Aigle-blanche from the place of his birth, Aquila-bella, in Savoy [1]; to which he retained ſome partiality to the day of his death; for, he built a monaſtery there, and thither his heart was carried after his deceaſe; his body being depoſited in the church of Hereford. M. Paris calls him a Provençal. Before he was taken into the ſervice of the king, he was a domeſtic clerk of William the biſhop elect of Valence, and the ſteward of his houſehold. The queen was a daughter of the earl of Provence, and conducted to England by this William, who was her uncle, and had an active part in making up the match between king Henry and Alianora. Peter de Aigle-blanche, having this connexion with the houſe of Provence, might induce M. Paris to think, or to call him a Provençal. By which we may gather, that Peter was one of the queen's party, and included in the claſs of Provençals, whoſe influence gave ſo much juſt offence to the Engliſh nation, and helped to bring on the ſucceeding troubles.

In the year 1240, Peter was elected biſhop of Hereford, and the choice made in that inſtance by the canons of Hereford much approved by king Henry, who confirmed him in that ſee with great ſatiſfaction to himſelf. The canons of Hereford had previouſly elected a perſon whom they liked much better, and one in every reſpect worthy of the promotion, a certain canon of Lichfield; but the latter foreſeeing bad times, and ſatiſfied that the king would hardly allow any one but a foreigner to be biſhop, recommended the church of Hereford to God's protection, and withdrew."

The next year the king recommended him to the monks of Durham, and deſired them to chooſe either this Peter, or the queen's uncle Boniface, for their paſtor; though they had no ſort of knowledge of the diſpoſition or learning of either of them; but they knew they were both foreigners, and not qualified to be their biſhop.

"England needed not to go a-begging to foreign countries for capable perſons to govern her churches [2]; ſhe was wont rather to ſupply other regions with men of that ſort. The chapter of Durham would chuſe neither of them. Before the end of the year, the king ſolicited the canons of London to elect Peter to that ſee; but they fixed upon their own dean, Fulk Baſſet, a perſon of noble birth, and great reputation. A ſhort time after the death of the earl of Leiceſter's great friend Robert Groſſeteſte, biſhop of Lincoln, the king again exerted himſelf in favour of Aigle-blanche, and uſed all the influence with the canons of Lincoln in his behalf; but without effect. The perſon recommended to them knew not a word of the Engliſh tongue, and was exceptionable on many other accounts. He had been thruſted by violence, and the ſecular arm, into the ſee of Hereford, and was ſtigmatized throughout England as one of its moſt dangerous enemies, and a man ever ready to betray and ruin it."

In the month of February, 1254, he was joined with ſir John Manſel, provoſt of Beverley, the king's ſecretary, in a commiſſion for carrying on and confirming the treaty of marriage between Edward the king's ſon and Alianora of Caſtille.

Henry had entertained an apprehenſion, almoſt immediately after Montfort's quitting the lieutenancy of Gaſcogne [3], that the king of Caſtille meditated the conqueſt of Gaſcogne; and, ſo long as the middle of May 1253, had taken meaſures to prevent it, by courting a matrimonial alliance between the royal houſes of England and Spain. The biſhop of Bath and ſir John Manſel had been ſent to Caſtille with the firſt overtures for this connexion. And it ſucceeded ſo well in their hands, that, when the biſhop of Hereford was employed in it, the affair was nearly ſettled. In the ſame year, 1254, Aigle-blanche was impowered by the king to adjuſt the diſputes between him and the earl of Thoulouſe. We find him with the king in October the ſame year at Bourdeaux, and his name annexed to moſt of the regal inſtruments iſſued about that time, while Henry was at Gaſcogne, which indicates, that he was much about the king's perſon, and deeply engaged in his councils. And here we leave this biſhop for the preſent.

"King Henry, on his arrival at Dover at the cloſe of the year 1254 [4], found there his brother Richard and other lay-nobles, who had all come from diſtant parts to pay their duty to him on his landing in England, and had been waiting for him for a long time. They received him, therefore, with great reſpect and pleaſure, and made him coſtly preſents. The prelates did the ſame, eſpecially the abbots and priors, as behoved them in particular. Theſe preſents conſiſted of the moſt curious and coſtly articles in gold and ſilver; ſuch as were very captivating to the eye. All which the king demanded imperiouſly and impor-

---

[1] Godwinus. M. Paris.

[2] M. Paris.

[3] Rymer. M. Paris.

[4] M. Paris. M. Weſtm.

tunately, with the ſame kind of eagerneſs as a famiſhed man would ſeize upon food that was within his reach. Theſe valuable donations would have been of uſe had they been properly managed towards the diſcharge of ſome part of his immenſe debt; though it was thought impoſſible for him ever to pay off an hundredth part of it; the whole being reported to be three hundred thouſand marks."

"The Londoners, certified of the king's arrival, and for whoſe welfare and proſperity they had been laviſh of their prayers and alms during his abſence, preſented him with a gift of 100*l.* But the king had ſo often received the like ſum, that he looked upon it as his due by cuſtom, and would not take it as a mark of their reſpect for him, or thank them for it. "Let them (ſaid he), if they expect my thanks, make me a large and voluntary preſent of what is their own." The citizens, hearing this, and being deſirous of pleaſing him, bought a very curious and rich vaſe, which was then to be ſold in London for 200*l.* and, with great reverence, offered this coſtly gift to him. He vouchſafed to accept of it, but took it very coolly, and hardly thanked them for it."

"A few days afterwards he levied a fine of 3000 marks upon the city of London, under the name of a talliage and penalty for not keeping the priſon of Newgate in a better manner. The occaſion was very trifling. A certain clerk had murdered a prior of the Black Order abroad, for which he was impriſoned in England. The murderer, being a clerk in orders, was demanded by the biſhop of London to be put into his cuſtody, which the king ordered to be done. But, as the biſhop had no proper priſon of his own, he deſired the citizens of London to allow him to put the culprit into their priſon of Newgate till the time of trial. This was complied with, and the man made his eſcape by deceiving the keepers whom the biſhop had placed over him. This was repreſented to the king by the citizens, who humbly craved, that he would remit his diſpleaſure againſt them, as they had committed no fault, and recalled to his mind the liberties of the city, and its reſpect and devotion to him, and the many times he had ſworn and engaged by his charters under pain of excommunication to keep the ſame inviolate. But all this had no effect. The prior who had been killed had pretended to be a kinſman of the queen's. She, therefore, inflamed the king's anger againſt the citizens; and their expoſtulation with him ſerved only to make him more enraged. He ſwore, by a terrible oath, that he would have what he demanded, or more, and very indecently called the citizens villans[1], and got ſome of them apprehended and impriſoned."

So M. Paris, concerning the talliage laid upon the city of London after the king's return from Gaſcogne. I preſume it is in reference to the ſame talliage, that our records furniſh the following information. The document is intituled, "Pro rege contra cives Londoniæ[2]." I ſhall tranſlate it. The king by his mandate to the barons [ſc. of his Exchequer] made known his pleaſure, that, in the 29th year of his reign, after his return from Gaſcogne, it was provided by the council of the king at Merton, after the feaſt of St. Hilary, that he ſhould talliage his demeſnes[3] throughout England for the heavy expences ſuſtained while he was in foreign parts. And when the citizens of London were ſummoned, before the king and council firſt at Merton to talliage the aforeſaid city[4], there came Ralph Hardil, then mayor of the city, with many others of the ſame city; and the king aſked of them 3000 marks in the name of talliage; and they, having held a previous conſultation with their co-citizens, came to the ſame place, and offered the king 2000 marks by the name of aid, and ſaid explicitly, that they were not able to give more, nor would they. And then the king, by advice of his council, ſent Philip Lovel, his treaſurer, Henry of Bath, Peter de Rivalle, Roger de Thurkelby, and Edward of Weſtminſter[5], to St. Martin's, to receive the fine of 3000 marks for talliage, if they would enter, as had been told them before; and, if they would not, then they ſhould aſſeſs the talliage by poll; and each man ſhould ſwear the chattels of another. And all the men aforeſaid came accordingly. And when the citizens aforeſaid would not enter the fine aforeſaid of 3000 marks, the aforeſaid treaſurer and others willed to aſſeſs the talliage by poll, and that every man ſhould ſwear the chattels of another. And when they would not take the oath, nor ſpeak in the fealty whereby they were bound to the king concerning the chattels of each, the ſaid treaſurer and others departed, the buſineſs being not done. Afterwards the aforeſaid citizens came before the king at Weſtminſter on the Lord's day after the Purification of the bleſſed Virgin Mary, and before his council, viz. R. earl of Cornwall, brother of the king, R. of Clare, earl of Glouceſter and Hertford[6], A. elect of Winton, and William biſhop of Worceſter, and others of his council. And when a ſtrife aroſe, whether this ought to be called talliage or aid; the king cauſed the rolls to be ſearched, whether they gave any thing to the king or his anceſtors by the name of talliage; and, the rolls being ſearched, it was found as well in the rolls of the Exchequer as in thoſe of the Chancery, that, in the time of ſir John, father of ſir king, in the 16th year of his reign[7], the aforeſaid citizens were talliaged at 2000 marks for the interdict; and in the 7th year of the reign of the king they were talliaged at 1000*l.* and, in the 26th year they gave 1000*l.* for talliage for that turn; and, in the 30th year, they gave 1000 marks, and twenty marks of gold, for talliage. Afterwards, on the morrow, to wit, on Monday following the feaſt of the Purification of the bleſſed Mary, came the aforeſaid Ralph, and citizens, and made recognizance, that they were talliable, and gave the king 3000 marks for talliage. Witneſs, &c. at Weſtminſter, 14th Feb. &c. Breve eſt in forulo Mareſchalli. Mem. 39 Hen. III. rot. 9. a. See Madox, Exchequer, 4to, vol. I. p. 712[1].

---

[1] It is common with the hiſtorians of that age, when they mention the citizens of London, to add, "who are called barons." M. Paris obſerves, that this title was given them on account of the dignity of the city of London. By barons it is meant that they were conſidered as of equal rank with the barons of the realm. "Cives Londoniæ, qui baronibus æquiparantur," ſays Paris, or ſome other chronicler; and they are ſometimes ſtyled proceres, an appropriate term for nobility. Theſe important perſons king Henry inſultingly and injuriouſly called villani, i. e. bondmen, bond ſervants, men of ſervile condition, and of the loweſt degree. M. Paris relates other inſtances of king Henry's brutality towards the city of London, and gives us his opinion of the treatment they met with: "Cives Londonienſes iterato ad quingentas marcas talliantur: Et ut color cauſæ variæ, nunc ad opus regis, nunc ad opus reginæ expectantes ut ad opus Edwardi quaſi ſervi ultimæ conditionis ad regis arbitrium non obſtante aliqua libertate apporrientur, jugum ſubeunt ſervitutis." The text here ſeems corrupt. Vide Hiſt. ad ann. 1256.—"Rex autem eodem tempore a civibus Londinenſibus, qui ſecundum cartarum ſuarum tenorem & antiquam conſuetudinem fore deberent liberrimi viginti marcas auri precibus extorſit imperioſis, velut a ſervis ultimæ conditionis, ut jam jam viderentur ſervilibus Judæis paulo minus æquiparari." Ib. ad ann. 1252.

[2] Madox, Exch. vol. I. in Talliage.

[3] The cities and burghs of England, and ſome other privileged towns, all held of the king in capite by patentees of ſuch franchiſes, and were conſidered as his antient demeſne manors, or parts thereof, over which he retained his manerial privilege of impoſing, on certain occaſions, a tax, or contribution, called talliage. It was levied on ſuch as were liable to it upon their rents and chattels, or movables. It differed from ſubſidy in the manner of laying it on. Talliage being frequently in conſequence of the lord's demand, and challenged partly de jure; the ſubſidy was more of the nature of an aid done, or free gift.

[4] This ſhews that London was conſidered as antient demeſne, contrary to a received notion. See Fitzherbert's and judge Hale's Natura Brevium.

[5] Theſe ſeem to be juſticiars of the king's council, and men merely forenſic. The king's juſticiars in eyre were wont to talliage his antient demeſnes. Hence, among the capitula of the pleas of the crown, committed to king Richard the Firſt's juſtices in eyre were found the following: "Preterea tallientur omnes civitates & burgi & dominica domini regis." See Brady's Hiſtory, vol. I. in Appendix, No. 77.

[6] Theſe ſeem to be men of rank much ſuperior to the juriſts abovementioned; and yet each is ſaid to have been of the king's council. In matters of difficulty, probably, reference was made to the more auguſt part of the council, the grandees of the realm who had ſeat in the council.

[7] From an extract of a record concerning this talliage, it ſeems to have been aſked as a loan. King John tells his reſpectable men of Canterbury, that, if they would be ſo kind as to furniſh the ſubſidy he aſked, "Plene vobis reddi faciemuscum gratiarum actione." Brady's Introduction, p. 40. The curious reader is deſired to peruſe the whole document here referred to.

Notwithſtanding the king had by his repeated oppreſſions reduced the Jews to the verge of ruin, yet he was determined to bleed them afreſh by another infliction of talliage.

In the month of February, 1255, he required of them the ſum of 3000 marks, upon pain of immediate hanging. The Jews remonſtrated againſt the demand. They declared their utter inability to pay the money, and deſired permiſſion to leave the kingdom. Henry pleaded his neceſſities, and ſaid, he muſt have money wherever he could get it. His jewels had been pledged already to the Jews for 5000 marks; and the 3000, which he now demanded in the name of a talliage, were to go towards the payment of the 5000, for which his jewels were engaged. The Jews, however, were not able to raiſe the money which the king demanded. Whereupon the earl of Cornwall, ſeeing his brother's diſtreſs, conſented to lend him the money required of the Jews; and the king, by his letters patent, bearing date Feb. 29, made over to the earl the perſons and effects of the Jews[2], to be diſpoſed of juſt as he pleaſed, if they failed to pay the inſtalments according to the king's injunction; that is to ſay, they were to pay 1000*l.* a fortnight after the next Trinity Sunday, a like ſum at Michaelmas, another at the Purification of the bleſſed Virgin, another a fortnight after Trinity Sunday, in the year 1256, and on the feaſt of St. Martin, the ſame year, 2000 marks more; and, if any failure happened as to the payment of the inſtalments, the Jews for each default were to pay 500 marks more.

M. Paris, ſpeaking of this tranſaction, ſays, "the king ſold the Jews to the earl of Cornwall for ſome years, that, after the king had flead them alive, the earl might pluck their guts out. Richard's love of money is frequently girded by the hiſtorian; he adds here, however, much to the earl's honour, "that he ſpared the Jews in conſideration of their grievous poverty, which put it abſolutely out of their power to advance the ſum demanded."

"King Henry's expedition to Gaſcogne, and his proceedings there, were conceived by diſcerning men to have done no good at all, but a great deal of harm to England[3]. It was aſked, what aid or ſuccour could a king of Caſtille afford the king of England againſt the king of France, of whom the king of England had ſpecial ground of jealouſy and complaint; ſince the Caſtilian was too remote to be of uſe to England, and was ſo ſurrounded with enemies, and beſet with difficulties, that he could hardly preſerve himſelf? It was found too, by careful calculations, that king Henry, on account of this flimſy expedition to Gaſcogne, where he got nothing but what was his own before, and which he could even now ſcarcely call his own, had drawn from England, and conſumed in idle expences, above 2,700,000*l.*[4] beſides the lands and rents which he had unadviſedly laviſhed upon undeſerving perſons, who were never to be ſatiſfied; and like to prove very pernicious both to himſelf and his realm; and over and above 30,000 marks, and rents, and wardſhips, horſes, and jewels, ineſtimable, given to his uterine brothers, Poitevins as well by diſpoſition, as birth. And thus, within a few years, what by his late expedition ſome years before to Poitou, which he loſt, and by this late one to Gaſcogne, which he hardly retained, he expended more money than both thoſe countries would have fetched, had they been fairly ſold to the higheſt bidder. When an intimate friend of Henry's apprized him of the immenſity of his debts, and of the great ſums he had improvidently ſpent, he was all aſtoniſhment. "Oh! for the head of God (he cried) what can this mean! but do not let any body know of it, leſt the whole world be amazed and confounded at ſo unheard of and extraordinary a thing."

Another gulph of the royal revenue about the ſame time was the laviſh grant he made of 10,000*l.* a year to his eldeſt ſon upon his marriage with Alianora of Caſtille. Gaſcogne, Ireland, Wales, the palatine earldom of Cheſter, the towns of Briſtol, Grantham, and Stamford, with the honours of the high Peak in Derbyſhire, and Tickhill in Yorkſhire[5], choice portions each of the royal demeſne, were transferred to prince Edward (I ſuppoſe in fee to hold of the king) towards making up the nett revenue to which the king was pledged.

M. Paris, ſpeaking of this defalcation of the royal revenue, ſays that Henry was rendered by it a mutilated king.

Theſe grants were found to produce a revenue of no more than 12,000 marks a year. The king, therefore, farther engaged to diſpoſe of no wardſhips of the crown than to Edward, till the deficiency was made up, and the king could add 3000 marks more out of ſuch eſcheats as might fall to the crown, or other lands in his diſpoſal[6].

The king farther gave his ſon upon the ſame occaſion the iſland of Oleron[7], and whatever he held beyond the ſea, and made a formal ſurrender to Edward and his heirs of all his claim and title to Normandy, and the other provinces raviſhed from him and his anceſtors by the kings of France. The parting with ſo much of his authority muſt have aggrandized his ſon by the diminution of himſelf; and the extravagance of his grant amounting to a fifth or ſixth part of the whole revenue of England[8] was but ill-ſuited to his own deſpicable poverty and inſolvence. This prodigality, and conſequent poverty of the king, muſt have been very alarming to the earl of Leiceſter, who, we may venture to ſuppoſe, never recovered the 4000*l.* or any part of it, in conſideration of which he had yielded up the ſeneſchalcy of Gaſcogne. And there ſeems ſufficient ground for charging the king with diſhonourable behaviour towards the earl, in ſacrificing him to his enemies, and, after pretending to ſooth his mortification and loſs by redeeming his charter of appointment, and promiſing indemnity, failing to perform his engagements.

"On the fifteens of Eaſter, vulgarly called Hokeday, were aſſembled at London all the nobles of England, both eccleſiaſtical and ſecular[9]; ſo that there never was ſeen before in that place ſo numerous a multitude. That I may abridge as much as poſſible my account of what happened there, the king complained that he was overwhelmed in debt, and that he could not poſſibly recover himſelf without the effectual aſſiſtance of his great men; and therefore he cloſely and importunately craved of them an aid of money; to wit, that he might have a full portion out of the baronies; which had not been comprehended in the late grant of the diſme; and then he ſaid, he could not over-rate his obligation; but the complying with ſuch a requiſition muſt have been the deſtruction of the realm. For, when drained of all its money, it muſt ſoon become the prey of any who were to ſeize it. After conſultation, therefore, ſeeing that what the king aſked could by no means be yielded to, they concurred in this conceſſion, that they would ſubmit to be burdened, upon condition that the great charter of liberties, which the king had ſo often promiſed, and even ſworn by the moſt ſolemn adjurations to maintain, might thenceforth be duly obſerved. They demanded, moreover, that, by the common council of the realm, they might chuſe to themſelves an high juſtice, a chancellor, and treaſurer; as was cuſtomary, and a thing which ought to be: and that thoſe officers ſhould not be amoved, but for glaring crimes, and by the advice and deliberation of the realm ſolemnly convened[1]. For, there were ſo many kinglings in England, that former ages ſeemed to be revived. The people's grief was conſpicuous; for neither the prelates nor the great men could poſſibly tell how they could bind their Proteus, the king, even if they were to aſſent to all that he aſked; in every inſtance he treſpaſſes upon the bounds of truth; and, where there is no truth on one ſide, there can be no reliance on the other. His ſecret adviſers exhorted him by no means to grant what was propoſed concerning the juſtice, chancellor, and treaſurer. The prelates, when they ſaw the diſme, which had been granted conditionally, now torn from the church, as if ſhe were reduced to the loweſt bondage, were put to grief as if their very blood had been drawn from them; and the nobles were not leſs wounded through the immenſity of the king's demand. At length it was agreed in common, that report ſhould be made to the king on the part of the univerſity, that the buſineſs ſhould ſtand over to the feaſt of St. Michael; that in the mean time they might experience his fidelity and benignity; if, perchance, he would regain their affections, and render himſelf deſerving of their love, by adhering to the great charter ſo often redeemed; on which condition they ſhould ſtill find themſelves inclined to oblige him. This the king is ſaid not to have acceded to, but rather to have diſliked from his ſilence on the ſubject. Thus after many uſeleſs and tedious doublings, the council being diſſolved, the nobles, now rendered ignoble, returned to their homes in grief and deſpair."

---

[1] The citizens paid it punctually—"Cives Londoniæ debent MM marcas de tallagio. Reddiderunt totum." Memorand. 31 Hen. III. rot. 10 a. Madox, Exch. vol. I. p. 711.

[2] M. Paris and Rymer.

[3] M. Paris.

[4] So in the text of M. Paris; but, certainly, there is a miſtake in the text. We may venture upon good authority to aſſert it was under 60,000 marks. See Letter of the grandees and univerſity of England to the pope, in Brady's Hiſtory, vol. I. Appendix, p. 200.

[5] Rymer.

[6] Ib.

[7] Ib.

[8] According to M. Paris, the revenue was about 20,000 marks a year.

[9] M. Paris, and M. Weſtm.

The annaliſts of Dunſtaple and Burton have left each a ſhort note of this remarkable parliament. The three narrations will reflect uſeful light on each other.

"In the year of Grace 1255 (I am now tranſlating the former of theſe chroniclers), the king convoked all his great men, and held a ſolemn parliament with them; aſking aid both of clergy and laity, beſides the diſme granted to him by the lord pope. They all deſired a truce to the ſucceeding feaſt of St. Michael; that they might then give a plain and final anſwer; provided, that in the mean while the king kept the liberties in the Great Charter, and in the charter of the foreſt, which he promiſed to do, but did not."

"On the fifteens of Eaſter (ſo writes the other annaliſt), king Henry held his parliament at Weſtminſter, having convened thither Walter de Grey, archbiſhop of York, Richard earl of Cornwall, and all the biſhops, abbots, earls, and barons, of the whole realm. They all came, except a few who were excuſed on account of health, and Boniface archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was then in foreign parts. The king urgently and warmly required an aid to be given, and, as ſome who were preſent affirmed, he was inclined to have horngeld[2]. On the other hand, the great men petitioned, that, according to the cuſtom of the realm, they might have three perſons in the realm by election, to wit, the chief juſtice, the chancellor, and the treaſurer, for the common utility of the realm; and then they ſhould be willing and able, by their and the common council, more fully and plainly to make anſwer to the king's exaction. And thus, neither of theſe being granted, reſpite was given until the feaſt of St. Michael next coming, and every one went to his own home."

"Shortly after, proclamation was made in the counties, and it was announced in ſynods, churches, and other places, that the Great Charter ſhould be kept inviolate. But the king ſtill ſhewed but little or no regard to it in practice[3]."

During the receſs of the council of great men (the prelates and barons of England) ſome remarkable things took place, which had great influence on the ſubſequent events, and which, therefore, require here ſome notice. I ſhall ſtate them as briefly as poſſible.

Peter biſhop of Hereford had recommended himſelf to the office of confidential miniſter at the court of Rome, by ſuggeſting to king Henry, that if he would aſſiſt him in getting him appointed by ſome of the chief abbots their agent at the papal court, as if to tranſact for them ſuch buſineſs as thoſe abbots might happen to have there concerning their abbeys, and would get him appointed to ſuch agency under their reſpective ſeals, he would ſo contrive matters between the pope and cardinals, that he would get all the chief monaſteries of England bound ſeverally in ſuch large ſums of money, as collectively would be ſufficient to anſwer all the king's wants[4]. The ſcheme was highly pleaſing to Henry; and Aigle-blanche went abroad furniſhed with the powers he had deſired.

King Henry, in the year 1250, had made a vow to go the holy voyage for the remiſſion of his ſins[5]. In the year 1252, he publicly took the croſs, and ſwore to commence his journey on the feaſt of St. John Baptiſt, anno 1256. The clergy of England, to ſecond his pious ardour, generouſly agreed to give him, for three years, a tenth of their rents and chattels towards the expence of this undertaking; the firſt collection to be made in the year 1254 for that year, and the two remaining aſſeſſments to follow in the two next ſucceeding years. When the univerſity of the clergy of England conſented to this act of beneficence, they had a ſuſpicion of fraud on the king's part, whom they did believe to be neither fit for leading a cruſade, nor ſeriouſly inclined to an affair of that ſort. They, therefore, clogged their grant with an expreſs proviſo, that ſuch tenths ſhould be levied if the king did really go to Paleſtine; otherwiſe the grant to be void. This tenth was levied by the biſhop of Norwich, whom the pope had commiſſioned ſpecially for that purpoſe in the year 1254; while the king was at Bourdeaux. It was an expedient of which both the pope and the king meant ſecretly to avail themſelves from the commencement of their project concerning Sicily, and it was ſuch a ſort of expedient as by their joint efforts was in no danger of miſcarrying.

Accordingly, in the courſe of this ſummer, the pontiff gave his nuncio, named Ruſtand, whom he was ſending into England with definitive powers concerning Sicily, full authority to allow the king of England to make his cruſade in Sicily, on the pretence that a war againſt a Saracenical colony at Nu-cera, which was now in league with the excommunicated Chriſtians of Sicily, would be as meritorious as the going directly againſt the Saracens of Syria[1].

---

[1] This was no new claim. The great men had very nearly carried their point about theſe great officers in the year 1249. "The great men met according to agreement, that what the king had ſo often promiſed he might then perform, viz. appoint the high juſticiar, chancellor, and treaſurer, by their advice. But when they were all met, and perſuaded in their own minds that they ſhould ſucceed in their wiſhes, the buſineſs was ſuſpended on account of the abſence of the earl of Cornwall." M. Paris, ad ann. 1249.

[2] Horngelt, according to Skinner, was a tax upon horned cattle within the foreſt. Perhaps a rumour was ſpread, that a tax ſhould be aſſeſſed upon all the horned cattle of England; which might have grievouſly affected the poor. No tax, however, of this name was then, or, as far as I know, ever levied. And M. Paris ſays nothing about it. It looks as if the king was thought to be ſo much diſtreſſed as to ſtick at no impoſition, however odious, to recruit his coffers.

[3] M. Paris. An. Dunſtaple. [4] M Paris. [5] Ib.

It had been originally the propoſal of archbiſhop Boniface, that the king ſhould ſolicit the pope for this indulgence; and now Ruſtand was furniſhed with letters from the pope, addreſſed to that primate, and authorizing him to abſolve the king from his former vow, upon condition of his making his cruſade in Sicily. Ruſtand had alſo, among his other powers, one for extending the diſme of the clergy of England from three years to five by the pope's ſole authority, and even to aſſeſs the ſpiritual baronies or lay fiefs, which were held of the king, and other lords, in capite, by the dignitaries of the church[2].

The pope, by virtue of his ſpiritual ſupremacy, might challenge ſome right over the eccleſiaſtical tithes and offerings that were the proper patrimony of the church; but to preſume to exerciſe a kind of deſpotiſm over lay fiefs or baronies held by the clergy, which, in their very nature, were honourable freeholds, protected by the fundamental laws of the realm from all ſervices or burdens whatever, except ſuch as were attached thereto by the expreſs tenor of the ſeveral charters of infeoſment, or reſulted from neceſſity when aid was wanted for the immediate defence of the realm, was ſuch a daring infringement of property as muſt excite at once ſurprize and horror. The king, who ought to have prevented and chaſtiſed ſuch an atrocious oppreſſion, was ſecretly the adviſer of it, having no ſcruple at all about the means, ſo he could compaſs the end, namely raiſe the money for the aggrandizement of himſelf and family.

When Aigle-blanche reached the papal court, he found the pontiff in great dejection on the melancholy ſtate of his affairs. Manfroi's late ſucceſſes, and his aſpiring views, had created juſt alarm in his holineſs's breaſt. And the apoſtolic chamber was not only exhauſted, but the very eſtates of the church were pledged in great ſums to the utmoſt ſtretch of its credit. The Engliſh commiſſioner afforded him much comfort by the flattering account he gave him of the good diſpoſition and proſperous condition of his lord the king of England. He told his holineſs, that Henry was exceedingly rich, and the very idol of his people, who, in return for his goodneſs, were willing, and even deſirous, with leave of his holineſs, to render themſelves reſponſible for any ſums which the king had occaſion for. And among his other credentials he ſhewed the pope the letter of attorney which he had gotten from ſume of the Engliſh abbots. The pope applauded his induſtry, and bade him execute his deſign in the manner moſt agreeable to himſel; a permiſſion which Aigle-blanche knew very well how to make his advantage of[3].

About Eaſter, anno 1255, he obtained from pope Alexander[4] a new privilegium of conceſſion, amendment, and confirmation, of the grant of Sicily, in which were ſpecified the terms upon which the parties were to proceed, and more particularly with reſpect to the king of England, the guardian of king Edmund. The realm was granted in fee to this young prince, and his heirs, of either ſex, to hold the ſame of the holy ſee by liege homage. If Edmund, or his heirs, ſhould be elected to the Roman empire, they were to refuſe the ſame, or reſign the realm; which was upon no account to be ever held with the empire. In this famous document the pope requires the king to defray the expences hitherto incurred, amounting to the ſum of 135,541 marks ſterling; in which groſs ſum were included 20,000 marks, which the king of his own generoſity gave to the pope and cardinals. One half of this ſum the king ſtood bound to pay at Chriſtmas following; the other half at Michaelmas, A. D. 1256; unleſs the king ſhould depute and appoint fit and ſufficient merchants approved of by the pope; who would be reſponſible in their own perſons for the money, and might give the king, if they thought fit, a reſpite till the Chriſtmas following.

With reſpect to the reſt of the king's debt, he was to pay it off entirely, with all the intereſt and charges, and burdens incident thereto (calculated at about ſeven or eight thouſand marks more) by Michaelmas 1256, or find the pope ſufficient ſecurities in caſe of default, from among the merchants of Sienna, Florence, and Bologna, to the content of ſuch merchants, and to the ſatiſfaction of the holy ſee. If payment were not made by the time ſpecified, or ſufficient ſecurity given, then the whole grant of Alexander was to be of no avail, and the queſtion of the king's right to Sicily, by virtue of former grants, to be left undetermined, each party being left at full liberty to act as it ſhould think fit[5].

The king ſtood farther obliged to go into the realm himſelf, or ſend over a commander thither with a competent army, according to the quality of the buſineſs, at Michaelmas 1256; but if he did not go himſelf, nor ſend ſuch a commander by that time, it ſhould be in the pope's own option, without farther advice or ceremony, to declare the privilegium null and void. But, if the king ſhould neither go in perſon, nor ſend a commander as aforeſaid, by that time; or if he ſhould neglect to pay within the time abovementioned, or give good ſecurity in caſe of nonpayment of that ſum, as well as for all other ſuch ſums as might ariſe in the progreſs of this buſineſs; he ſhould then entirely loſe and forfeit all the money he had paid on account of this affair, and ſhould himſelf be involved in the knot of excommunication, and the whole realm of England be laid under an interdict. Moreover, the king was to be reſponſible, and bind his whole realm of England in that behalf, for all the expences that ſhould accrue between Michaelmas 1255, and that of 1256; and, for farther ſecurity, the churches and receipts of the realm of Sicily ſhould be pledged to the pope till full payment of the ſame. Again, if the king's commiſſioners did not ratify the ſeveral articles of this privilegium by the firſt of December, 1255, the whole of it was cancelled. Moreover, king Henry and Edward his eldeſt ſon, and a good number of their great men, or chief nobles, and counſellors, were to ſwear, that they would uſe their beſt endeavours to make Edmund, as ſoon as he ſhould arrive at the age of fifteen, to take the oath of liege homage to the holy ſee, and perform all the conditions ſpecified in the privilegium. This famous document bears date at Naples, April 9, 1255[6].

The biſhop gave his full approbation in the name of king Henry to this extraordinary diploma; after which the pope, with the advice and aſſent of his brethren of the holy college, proceeded to inveſt him as the appointed proctor of Edmund in the realm of Sicily, and in the name of the latter, by a ring; aſſigning to his proctor under the conditions agreed upon the poſſeſſion of the ſaid realm, and the lands thereto belonging, and then taking back the poſſeſſion of the ſame, to hold them for Edmund, till ſuch time as the ſeveral ſtipulations contained in the privilegium ſhould be fully ratified by king Henry, by king Edmund, and by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and others in that behalf; after which the ſame was to revert freely to Edmund, and his heirs. The inſtrument was teſted by the pope and ſix cardinals[7].

With the help of the money that was borrowed by Aigle-blanche of the Italian merchants, and paid over by him to Octavian the papal legate in the Sicilian kingdom, this cardinal took the field againſt Manfroi in the beginning of June this year (1255)[8]. The military department under the legate was intruſted to the marquis of Hoemburg, whom the pope had lately favoured with extraordinary grants of money, lands, titles, and offices (which had received the confirmation of king Edmund); but the marquis, who had been employed by the late emperor in the higheſt truſts, was, notwithſtanding theſe graces of his holineſs, ſtill ſecretly in the intereſt of that monarch's unfortunate children. The object of the legate in this campaign was to intercept Manfroi, by getting between him and Nocera, the Saracenical garriſon on the borders of the Adriatic, a very ſtrong city, and his ſureſt refuge in caſe of great danger. But this ſtratagem did not ſucceed; Manfroi, by rapid marches and bold adventure, puſhed through the country, and arrived at Nocera; whereupon the papal army made it their next attempt to attack Nocera; and for that purpoſe went and laid cloſe ſiege to that city. In the mean while, the pope, ſtill remaining at Naples, was taking his meaſures for keeping the king of England to his engagements, and ſecuring the large ſums of money he expected from England.

---

[1] M. Paris. [2] Ib. [3] Ib. [4] Rymer. [5] M. Paris.
[6] Rymer. [7] Ib. [8] Rainald and M. Paris.

John biſhop of Bologna was in the courſe of this ſpring appointed the pope's ſpecial nuncio for proſecuting the buſineſs between the pope and king Henry, and received the papal order for going into England. The biſhop was probably well diſpoſed to undertake this commiſſion, as he had a demand ſanctioned by the pope for 4000*l. Tours*, in which he made himſelf the king's creditor for troops he had brought to the late pope's aſſiſtance in the Sicilian war, and for loſſes ſuſtained in conſequence thereof. This money the pope, by his letters of the 21ſt of April to king Henry, directed him to pay. To him the king intruſted the charge of the ring, which his holineſs had put to the finger of the biſhop of Hereford, as the ſymbol of inveſtiture, and which the biſhop of Bologna was to put on the finger of king Edmund, as the pope's repreſentative, when he arrived at the court of England. To the ſame perſon were committed other points touching the affair of Sicily. About the ſame time the pope appointed another of his emiſſaries to go to England, namely, one maſter Ruſtand, who was furniſhed with ample powers in the part he was to ſuſtain on the preſent occaſion. It was made his ſpecial province to look after the collection of the diſme, and exact it with rigour; to demand all ſums of money that had been by any perſons deceaſed left towards an holy war, likewiſe all legacies bequeathed in general to charitable uſes; redemption or compoſition-money of croiſés, who had taken the vow, and wiſhed to be relieved from the neceſſity of performing it in perſon, and in general whatever was intended or accruing for the ſervice of the holy war. Ruſtand, in ſhort, was appointed the executor of the croſs in England againſt Manfroi; he was to preach it there, and collect all the money he could, and keep it in ſafe cuſtody to defray the king's debt in Italy. To Ruſtand alſo was left the recovery of the money from the monaſteries, in which they were bound by the bulls mentioned above, machinated by Aigle-blanche; and to him, in conjunction with Boniface archbiſhop of Canterbury, was given the authority to abſolve king Henry from his vow of going into the Holy Land, and changing it for the expedition againſt the Saracens of Nocera; that was, in fact, againſt Manfroi and the Chriſtians of Sicily, Apulia, and Calabria. Ruſtand alſo was furniſhed with the papal brief for aſſeſſing the lands and tenements of baronies or lay fiefs holden by the church to the diſme, lately impoſed upon the benefices of England.

The biſhops of Bologna and Hereford, and alſo maſter Ruſtand the pope's nuncio, got to England about Michaelmas 1255; to the quindenes of which, the reader will remember, the great men had the Eaſter preceding adjourned their deliberations concerning the matter ſubmitted to them by the king.

"On the feaſt of St. Edward, moſt of the great men of England met at Weſtminſter[1]. The firſt of them to whom the king applied was his brother Richard earl of Cornwall, of whom he importunately craved a pecuniary aid. This earl had been ſolicited by the pope on the ſame ſubject. His holineſs intreated him by letter to lend his brother the king 40,000 marks, by way of example to others, that they might contribute liberally to relieve the king's wants. But the earl continued inflexible to the importunities both of the king and pope; and particularly for this reaſon, that the king, bewitched and faſcinated by the glaring ſounds of the Tranſalpines, had, without the earl's advice, and the aſſent of the king's baronage[2], undertaken the affair of Apulia. But, notwithſtanding this repulſe from earl Richard, application was made to others for affording the king relief. But it was anſwered, that all were not then ſummoned according to the tenor of Magna Charta, and, therefore, without their peers then abſent, they would not give an anſwer then, or grant or afford an aid. The king, therefore, having recourſe to his old tricks, that he might bend the great men to a conſent, protracted the buſineſs of the parliament to ſuch a degree, that, upon feigned excuſes, he kept them in hand for a month; and even then, when their purſes were emptied by ſo long a ſtay at London, he convoked, or rather provoked them to another place, to bring them, if poſſible, to adopt his propoſition. But earl Richard, a circumſpect and wary man, very ſharply and deſervedly rebuked the biſhop of Hereford, and Robert Walerand his aſſociate, for ſo groſsly miſleading the king, to the ſubverſion of the realm. At length, all the great men returned to their homes in great diſcontent, without going through the buſineſs of their aſſembling; and thus this council was, as it were, maimed and mutilated. On the laſt day of it the barons made anſwer, that they would not in future impoveriſh themſelves, as they had done, for the benefit of others, nor would they meet to treat together of the arduous affairs of the realm. For, wherever they turned their eyes, they had ſeen nothing but what raiſed ſuſpicion, and betrayed inſidiouſneſs and craft. The city of London was now not only over-run with Poitevins, Romans, and Provençals, but with Spaniards, who machinate miſchief to the Engliſh in general, but particularly to the city of London[3], by adultery, fornication, quarrellings, and murders; the king by no means reſtraining them, but rather defending them. And ſo this council, if it could be called a council, was diſſolved, to the grief and lamentation of many."

In the above parliament or colloquy happened a ſharp altercation between the king and Roger de Bigod the earl mareſchal; it was occaſioned by an affair of Robert de Ros, a Northern baron, whom the Scottiſh council had made the guardian of the young king and queen.

Robert de Ros had incurred the reſentment of queen Margaret, by not ſuffering her to cohabit with her huſband, and laying her under other diſagreeable reſtraints[4]. King Henry conceived great diſpleaſure againſt Robert de Ros, John de Bailiol, and the whole Scottiſh council, for ill-treating, as he alleged, his daughter the queen of Scots. For ſetting matters to rights there, he ſent to Edenburgh Richard earl of Glouceſter, and John Manſel, who got clandeſtinely into the caſtle of Edenburgh, where the king and queen were; and having turned out of the place the Scottiſh keepers they found about them—"Regem & reginam ſimul in lecto poſuerunt; & ſic ipſa nocte, cum famulis ſuis, ad loca remota receſſerunt[5]." They then wrote word to the king, who was going towards them, of what they had done; and acquainted him, that if he would march down thither with his poſſe[6], and in the honourable manner that became him, it would redound to the king's honour, and the advantage and benefit of the king of Scots.

---

[1] M. Paris.

[2] That is, of the grandees or magnates of the realm aſſembled in parliament. "Verum in receptione literarum ipſarum magnates regni noſtri, per quorum conſilium pro majori parte regitur regnum noſtrum, ad diverſas & remotas partes regni noſtri erant diſperſi." Edward I. in a diſpatch to the king of France, A. D. 1280. See Rymer.

[3] This is expreſſed by M. Paris in no unpleaſant jingle—"Adulterando, fornicando, jurgando, vulnerando, & interimendo; rege eos minime refrænando, ſed potius defendendo.

[4] M. Paris.

[5] Chr. de Dunſtable.

[6] Rymer, 39 H. III. p. 500.

Henry, therefore, on the 16th of Auguſt, being then at York, commanded his great men[1], by a writ of ſummons, ſent ſpecially to each, by the ſhire-reeves of the ſeveral counties of England, that in the fealty, homage, and love, by which they were bound to him, they ſhould, upon ſight of the king's letters, and without lett or delay, move towards him by day and night, with horſe and arms, and their whole poſſe, to go with him for the parts of Scotland. Likewiſe, commands were ſent to each ſhire reeve, to cauſe it to be proclaimed throughout his bailiwick, that all thoſe who held of the king in capite, and owed him ſervice, without excuſe or delay, ſhould go to the king with horſe and arms, and with their whole poſſe, accompany him to the parts of Scotland, as they loved the king and his honour, and their lands and tenements, which they held of him; and that other vavaſors and knights[2], who held nothing of the king in capite, ſhould likewiſe go with horſe and arms, as they loved the king and his honour, and wiſhed to have his grace and favour for ever. The barons of the North had made a great ſtand againſt king John[3], which prejudiced Henry much againſt them, and had induced him to break them down as much as poſſible; and he had actually ſtripped them all of their greatneſs, and transferred their poſſeſſions to ſtrangers, except thoſe two powerful barons Robert de Ros and John de Bailiol, whom he was now intending to ruin. Robert de Ros alleged in his excuſe, that he had hindered the king and queen of Scotland from ſleeping together on account of their youth, and till a certain time arrived, which he proved was not yet come. This did not ſatisfy the king. John de Bailiol was very rich. By advancing a great ſum to Henry, whoſe neceſſities were urgent, he bought the king's peace. But Robert de Ros was cited to appear in the king's court to anſwer the things laid againſt him; who agreed to come upon certain conditions, and pledged himſelf to the king to anſwer to the charges; but the king, by the advice of thoſe in favour about him, ordered the accuſed to be dis-ſeiſed of the caſtle of Werk and other lands. The king impleaded Robert at London in this council, and arraigned him criminally in ſuch a manner that the knight's life was in danger. The earl mareſchal offered a few words in behalf of the accuſed, founded in juſtice and propriety. Upon which the king launched the moſt abuſive language as well againſt the earl as Robert de Ros, and publicly called the earl mareſchal a traitor; to which the latter, with a fierce countenance and angry look, retorted, "You lie. I never was, nor will be, a traitor;" adding, "What can you do to me, or how can you hurt me, while law and juſtice guide you?" To which the king replied, "I can ſeize your corn, and afterwards get it thraſhed, and expoſed to ſale; and, when you are ſubdued by that means, you will be humbled." The earl replied, "If you ſhould do this, I will ſend you the heads of your thraſhers." Greater extremities were feared; friends therefore interpoſed, and the parties at variance were ſeparated, but not thoroughly reconciled. Robert de Ros made great ſubmiſſions, but without avail. Soon afterwards Robert's effects were taken away; his beeves, ſheep, the ſtock upon his land, and every thing he had in England, were inhumanly ſold at ſuch prices as the buyers were pleaſed to put upon them[4]."

"After the feaſt of St. Luke (18 Oct.) a numerous aſſembly of the great men, called together by the king's edict, met at Weſtminſter[5]. Thither came on the part of the pope the biſhop of Bologna, bringing with him the ring of inveſtiture, which, in the pope's ſtead, he beſtowed on Edmund, to inveſt him in full form with the kingdom of Sicily and Apulia; which threw the king into as great a tranſport of joy, as if his ſon had received the actual homage of all the Sicilians and Apulians, together with their cities and caſtles, and had been really crowned their king. Inſtantly Henry openly called Edmund king of Sicily; being quite ignorant that at this very time the marquis of Hoemburg had betrayed his army into the hands of Manfroi, and that it was entirely diſperſed and ruined. But knowing nothing of this diſaſter, and truſting too much upon the pope's aſſiſtance, he ſtarted forward in the midſt of his great men[6] to the altar, and there ſwore by St. Edward to go into Apulia. There was only one difficulty that occurred to him, namely, how he ſhould be able to paſs peaceably with his army and treaſure through France. He turned it, therefore, immediately in his thoughts, whom he ſhould ſend to the king of France to obtain from him this favour; and he became ſo fluſhed with the ſanguine idea of his approaching greatneſs, as to think that, when his ſon was inſtated in the throne of Sicily, France would find herſelf between two mill-ſtones, and be obliged to reſtore to Henry his rights on the other ſide of the ſea[7]."

The great men of the whole realm, with whom the king entered into a long and ſerious diſcuſſion of the affair of Sicily (we are now giving his own account to the pope), were of opinion that the conditions of the papal grant were extremely hard. They particularly complained of that article; by which the king ſtood obliged either to go into Apulia in perſon, or to ſend thither a general with a competent army by Michaelmas following, and likewiſe within the ſame term to pay the ſum of 135.541 marks, upon pain of forfeiting pope Alexander's grant; the king himſelf, moreover, remaining excommunicated, and the whole realm put under an interdict. Theſe conditions and penalties they thought very hard; ſince, beſides the aforeſaid ſum, the king, according to the report of his nuncios, was bound to pay another ſum of no ſmall amount. "No prince in the world (he ſaid) could raiſe ſuch a prodigious quantity of money in ſo ſhort a time; when he had, beſides, the expence of ſuch an armament and expedition to provide for." They, therefore, adviſed the king to drop all thoughts of the affair, and not involve himſelf in ſo much danger. In the midſt of this deliberation with his great men arrived (he ſays) in England the news of Hoemburg's perfidy, and the entire diſſipation of Octavian's army." With this intelligence, which was ſent by the pope, came alſo from him advice that he was utterly unable to borrow or furniſh any more money for the war, and that the king muſt inſtantly make him a large remittance for new troops, and think of ſending over a general, and whatever elſe was neceſſary, without delay; aſſuring him that the terra de Lavora was not yet in the hands of the enemy, and that, if the king would be expeditious in furniſhing an army, matters might be ſtill retrieved, as the poſſeſſion of the Lavora would ſecure a paſſage into the heart of the country[8]. The great men, who had complained of the hardneſs of the conditions, and had but a bad opinion of the whole affair before, were, by theſe advices and reports, brought to utter deſpair about it, and ſcarcely any of them could be perſuaded to act with the king in the farther proſecution of it. Thus Henry in his own diſpatch to the holy ſee[9].

Henry, however, ſtill relying on the pope's honour and mercy, performed every thing required of him in the privilegium as far as he was able.

The annaliſt of Burton monaſtery relates, that the king bound himſelf to perform the conditions of the charter ſealed with his own ſeal, and the ſeals of ſome of the biſhops, and of a good many of the great men of the realm. The pope obſerved a nice precaution in requiring the great men to join with the king in aſſenting to the privilegium, as thereby he would alledge that the grant of Sicily was aſſented to formally by legal authority. That the ſeals of ſome of the great men were put to theſe inſtruments is ſeen from the king's mandate to his miniſter of all work, ſir John Manſel, of the 18th of October, viz. "The king to John Manſel, provoſt of Beverley, greeting. Whereas the lord pope has thought good to grant to our beloved ſon Edmund the kingdom of Apulia, which we thought good to accept by the venerable biſhop of Hereford, we command you in the fealty and love which you owe us, and as you would be willing to avoid the indignation of us and ours for ever, that you, together with other our lieges, accept the ſame; and to the reſcript made upon ſuch acceptance affix your ſeal, together with the ſeals of ſome other of our lieges, who, in like manner, have acceded to the ſaid acceptance[1]. In teſtimony of which, &c. Witneſs the king, at Weſtminſter, October 18th."

---

[1] Here we ſee the difference between the great men and tenants in capite. The former had the honour of a ſpecial ſummons each; the latter were ſummoned by the ſheriff. This ſhews Mr. Selden's miſtake, who ſuppoſed all tenants in capite to be barons.

[2] Mark the difference here between the great men and tenants in capite, and other vavaſors and knights. All vavaſors and knights, therefore, were not tenants of the king in capite, nor bound upon pain of loſing their fiefs to follow him perſonally.

[3] M. Paris.

[4] Ib. and Rymer, and Chr. de Dunſtaple.

[5] Does not this ſhew that this meeting was in a church or chapel? Very likely to have been in the abbey of Weſtminſter, and in St. Edward's chapel.

[6] Here is the true deſcription of a parliament.

[7] M. Paris.

[8] Rymer.

[9] About the ſame time (he obſerves) a rumour prevailed in England, that the Pope and Manfroi were perfectly reconciled.

Ruſtand, after his arrival in England, loſt no time in taking the meaſures he thought adviſable for the punctual diſcharge of his commiſſion. The cruſade was ordered to be immediately preached againſt Manfroi, at London firſt, and then elſewhere, with the ſame or greater privileges than were wont to be granted to thoſe who went in perſon againſt the infidels of the Eaſt. His various commiſſions were made public[2]; by which the Church of England was to be inſulted, enſlaved, and beggared. By the papal diplomas he was appointed ſole executor of the croſs; and all former commiſſions of that ſort were revoked. He produced the papal mandate for rating the eccleſiaſtical baronies within the king's dominions to the tenth, in common with other poſſeſſions, and rents of the church[3].

He likewiſe thought it his duty to levy the tenths, not as the biſhop of Norwich had done by former valors, but by new ones, made with the utmoſt rigour, and extending to the moſt trifling articles of ſtock and houſehold furniture; by which many poor religious houſes, as well as clerks, would be ruined; and in the making theſe new eſtimates, and collecting the tenths, and remitting them to the places directed by Ruſtand, ſuch infinite trouble was to be given to the clergy, and ſuch horrid oppreſſions enſue, as would drive them to deſperation. The ſhort time too allowed for paying-in ſuch an immenſe ſum[4] of money as the pope required in diſcharge of the king's debt, and before the latter muſt preſume to go himſelf, or ſend any forces with a commander into Apulia, was another moſt tormenting circumſtance. The calling a war againſt Manfroi, and the Chriſtians of Apulia, a cruiſade, was an inſult to the moſt ordinary underſtanding; and to employ the money belonging to the church, and intended only for its pious and charitable uſes, in a war of abſurdity, ambition, and injuſtice, and againſt Chriſtians, ſtuck ſo hard in the conſciences of the devout and ſerious, that they could not poſſibly digeſt it. When to theſe accumulated iniquities was added the diabolical device of Aigle-blanche for loading the monaſteries by forged letters of attorney[5], the whole conſtituted ſuch an immenſe maſs of impudence, tyranny, and oppreſſion, as can hardly be matched in the annals of hiſtory[6].

"All the prelates of England[7] were ſummoned by Ruſtand, on the pope's authority, to meet at London on the quindenes (Oct. 13) of St. Michael, where they were told they ſhould hear the pope's commands, and were to treat of the arduous matters of the pope and king, and, it was hoped, would give ſuch diſcreet and favourable anſwers to ſuch things as had been, and were to be, demanded of them, as became the children of obedience. After the prelates were come together at the place and time appointed, and Ruſtand's powers had been read and conſidered, he procured a ſpeech or ſermon to be ſpoken, in which was demanded, by virtue of the injurious and iniquitous inſtruments juſt recited, ſuch a prodigious ſum of money as would wound and deſtroy the greateſt patience that ever man was bleſſed with. When the prelates and Ruſtand had ſpent many days in eager debate, and without coming to any terms of agreement, Fulk biſhop of London, fetching a deep ſigh[8], ſaid, "Before I will ſuffer the church to be reduced to ſuch ſervitude, and ſubmit to ſo much injury, I declare I will loſe my head." Walter biſhop of Worceſter, admiring his ſpirit, immediately ſubjoined, "And before I will ſuffer the church to be ſo overturned, I will be condemned to be hanged." By which reſolute proteſtations the reſt being encouraged, vowed, that they would, one after another, follow the ſteps of St. Thomas of Canterbury, and have their brains beat out like him, in defence of the liberties of the church. They were, however, reduced to great difficulties, and hard preſſed on all ſides. The king was againſt them; and the pope would not forego the money. Ruſtand was a man of abilities and experience, and able to hurt them very much. They were in a ſtate almoſt of deſolation. The archbiſhop of Canterbury was in foreign parts; the venerable Walter de Grey, archbiſhop of York, had died a few months before; the biſhop elect of Winton was a Poitevin, and alſo the brother of king Henry their proſecutor, and was therefore ſuſpected and ſhunned; the biſhop of Hereford their open and confirmed enemy."

"Having therefore prayed for the conſolation of the Holy Spirit, they appealed to the preſence of the pope from Ruſtand's oppreſſions and threats. And the biſhop of London ordered proclamation to be made, that no one, for many days, ſhould execute the orders of Ruſtand; which, as ſoon as it came to the ears of the latter, was carried by him to the king, with the farther complaint, that the biſhop of London inſtigated all the other prelates to reſiſt the king and pope's will. This put the king into a great rage againſt Fulk. He launched againſt him the ſharpeſt invectives, and told him, that neither he nor any of his kindred loved him, and that he would take care to have him properly puniſhed by the pope; to which the biſhop replied, "Let the pope and king take away my biſhoprick, though that they cannot do with juſtice; if they deprive me of my mitre, an helmet will ſtill remain to me[9]. The bulls produced by Ruſtand were ſo abominable, that it was ſuſpected they were forgeries. The biſhop of Hereford, Ruſtand, and the other Tranſalpines, finding the prelates united in their reſolution to make their appeal to the pope, ſpared no pains to create a diviſion among them; thinking, that the beſt way would be to weaken the whole party, and divert them from their purpoſe. At length Ruſtand, on account of the archbiſhop of Canterbury's abſence, and the vacancy of the ſee cf York, and the abſence of ſome of the biſhops, gave them to the feaſt of St. Hilary (13 Jan.) to deliver their final anſwer. Being thus ſeparated, they went, after all this weariſome and expenſive attendance, each to his own home, not knowing what courſe to take. For, if any one of them, juſtly or unjuſtly, ſhould be ſuſpended or excommunicated by Ruſtand, the king, like a lion in ſecret, ſeeking whom he might devour, after forty days, would confiſcate all his property [1]."

---

[1] Rymer. [2] M. Paris, p. 787. [3] M. Paris.

[4] M. Paris, and Ann. Mon. Burton. In their remonſtrance to the pope, they declared, the clergy could not ſatisfy his demands if they could turn clay into gold. See Ann. Burton.

[5] So the annaliſt of Dunſtaple expreſsly calls them. M. Paris's deſcription of this dark affair is very confuſed.

[6] M. Paris. In that age it was no diſgrace for a biſhop to be a military man. After Richard earl of Cornwall's advancement to the German crown, anno 1257, he wrote to prince Edward, eldeſt ſon of king Henry III. ſome account of his election In his letter is the following paſſage: "Ecce quam animoſos & bellicoſos archiepiſcopos & epiſcopos habemus in Alemannia; non multum vobis inutile reputantes, ſi tales in Anglia crearentur, quorum miniſterio uti poſſetis ſecure contra importunos rebellium veſtrorum incurſus." Ex litera Ricardi regi Romanorum Edwardo illuſtris regis Angliæ primogenito. Dat. 18 Maii, anno 1257. Ann. Burton, anno 1257.

[7] Authors of that age uſually mean, by prelates, abbots and priors. In a larger ſenſe it comprehends biſhops and beneficed clercs. The perſons concerned in this diſme were ſuch as had tithes and offerings; and are frequently ſtyled univerſitas cleri, including all beneficed clercs; which ſhews the convocation to have exiſted at this time. We find here the clergy met on the ſame day with the magnates, or great men.

[8] M. Paris.

[9] Such was the diſpoſition of many biſhops of that age, and with little or no ſcandal to their function. Richard earl of Cornwall, after his election to the throne of Almain, in a letter ſent to a friend in England, talks with great approbation of the martial ſpirit of the Teutonic biſhops, and regrets that Engliſh biſhops were ſo inferior to them in that reſpect.

To M. Paris's account of this great council, I ſhall add the relation given of it by another contemporary monk [2].

"To this colloquy were ſummoned the biſhops, abbots, and priors, the earls, and barons, and the majors [3] of the whole realm; in which the king aſked of the clergy a contribution out of their lay-fees towards proſecuting the affair of Sicily, in which he had fooliſhly and incautiouſly engaged; being diſpoſed of his own unjuſt inclination to extort ſuch contribution firſt from the clergy, and afterwards from the people great and ſmall [4] (a populo majori & minori exterquere). But the biſhops, abbots, priors, and the proctors, who were for the univerſity [5], being unwilling to ſubmit to this exaction, and reſolving rather to reſiſt and contradict it, having digeſted into writing a ſtate of their affairs and their grievances, ſent the ſame, ſealed with their ſeals, by faithful and diſcreet nuncios of their own choice, to the high prieſt [6]." Then follows in my author the liſt of grievances of which they complained.

In the Additamenta of M. Paris may be ſeen a letter to the king from the pope, dated Nov. 8, 1256, in which he admoniſhes the king to correct his errors, and protect the eccleſiaſtical rights, as he had ſo often ſworn to do. And yet the pope himſelf was the chief author of their oppreſſion.

"On the morrow of the Purification of the bleſſed Virgin [7], the king of France held a general colloquy with his great men; to which the king ſent his ſpecial nuncios, of whom John Manſel was chief, to deſire a free paſſage for the king of England, and his army and people [8], and treaſure, through France into Italy. The nuncios, upon their arrival in France, heard all the particulars of the overthrow of the pope's army in Apulia. This made them think that Sicily was loſt beyond all poſſibility of recovery, and that it would be needleſs and ridiculous to open the principal ſubject of their embaſſy. They returned, therefore, without ſaying any thing about it; but they found the French in no diſpoſition to oblige England [9]."

On the 15th of February, the king, then at Wodeſtoke [10], iſſued his mandate to the barons and bailiffs of the king at Dover, and to Roger de Cobham, keeper of the cinque ports, that they ſhould permit no clerc to paſs by Dover, or the cinque ports, unleſs ſuch clerc was firſt ſworn, that, if he went to the court of Rome, he would obtain nothing there againſt the king in the affair of Sicily, or concerning the ordinance made thereupon by the lord pope, or about other things, againſt the crown and dignity of the king of England. The reaſon of this mandate was, that the univerſity of clercs had come to a reſolution to appeal to the pope himſelf from Ruſtand's exactions.

The king was not able yet to bring the biſhops to conſent to allow him a tenth out of their baronies, without which he found it impoſſible to go on with the Apulian war. But he had ſtill ſome hopes left, from ſome late appearances of compliance, that they would at length yield to the pope's commands. The eccleſiaſtical tenths lately collected by Ruſtand, together with the ſums he ſhould be able to raiſe from the monaſteries by virtue of Aigle-blanche's bonds, were ſufficient to diſcharge 60,000 marks due to the merchants of Sienna and Florence, for which the pope was their ſecurity; and likewiſe to liquidate ſome part of the remainder due to the holy ſee. The king, therefore, wrote to the pope about March, A. D. 1256, that, as he ſhould be able to pay off ſo much money within that year, he hoped for a farther indulgence, as well with reſpect to the outſtanding arrear as to his ſending a commander and an army into Apulia; for doing both which things he deſired to have more time than was given in the privilegium. And, as the holy ſee was ſo impatient for farther remittances, and too poor to borrow any more money upon the pope's churches in Italy, Henry propoſed, that he ſhould apply to the merchants of Sienna for a new loan, which the king thought might be done with effect, when the old debt was diſcharged, which he conceived might be done by Midſummer following. His anxiety to go on with this project was not at all abated by his poverty and the remonſtrances of his great men; and, to keep the pope in good humour, and prevail with him to diſpenſe with thoſe parts of the engagement by which the king ſtood obliged to defray 135,541 marks by Michaelmas 1256 and within the ſame term to go in perſon, or ſend a captain, into Apulia, he intreated ſix of the cardinals who had moſt might in the Roman court, by a polite and reſpectable letter addreſſed to each of them, to intercede between him and the holy father. As the biſhop of Bologna was at this time preparing for his return to Italy, theſe diſpatches were probably taken by thoſe who were to accompany that prelate [11].

Another affair had lately happened, which ſtruck in with the king's project about Sicily. About the 29th of January periſhed in his war with the Friezelanders William count of Holland, the late pope's king of the Romans. Henry thought it would help forward his ſcheme concerning Sicily, if he could get ſome perſon elected king of the Romans who was his friend, and devoted to the ſee of Rome; for, he found that the French were endeavouring to counteract him; and he thought nothing ſo likely to defeat their deſigns as procuring ſome perſon to be choſen king of the Romans who was attached to the Engliſh intereſt. Very ſoon, therefore, after the death of the count of Holland, he ſent William Bonquer (whom M. Paris calls William Bonover) to the court of Rome, to communicate his ſentiments about the election of a king of the Romans, and to deſire the pope to ſend one of the three cardinals, whom the king names, into Almaine, to bring that about which he thought ſo neceſſary for the accompliſhment of his wiſhes. Theſe particulars appear upon the face of our records [12]. What effect the king's propoſitions met with at Rome we are not informed. But the pope does not ſeem to have ever lent his hand towards raiſing Richard earl of Cornwall to the Teutonic throne, of which we ſhall ſay more hereafter; only obſerving here, that, if any thing were wanting to crown the king's folly and madneſs, it was this new conceit of making his brother Roman king or emperor.

"On the quindenes of Eaſter, 1256, the biſhops, worn out with vexation, met at London, to give a definitive anſwer to the demand of maſter Ruſtand. At firſt they were divided, and about to part in diſagreement; but afterwards, encouraged and ſupported by the barons, they gave their refuſal, and would not afford the king any contribution from their baronies, or lay-fiefs[1].”

---

[1] M. Paris.

[2] Annales Monaſt. Burton, p. 355.

[3] Cum proceribus & majoribus totius regni. Rymer, p. 487. They are ſometimes in thoſe ages called majores natu, i. e. the elders, or aldermen. The reader may obſerve here two claſſes or orders of peers, or parliamentary barons. William of Poitou, a chaplain of William I. calls the Britiſh kings of old times, as Cingetorix, &c. majores.

[4] Sometimes called magnates & univerſitas regni: not comprehending plebs. They are ſometimes called majores & minores; but uſually, and to this day, magnates & proceres regni. See Parliamentary writs, and ſee ſtatute of Marlborough, and ſome other ſtatutes of Edward I.

[5] Sc. of the clergy, or that body collectively.

[6] The pope.

[7] M. Paris, 1256.

[8] See note [4].

[9] M. Paris.

[10] Rymer.

[11] M. Paris, Annales Waverl. Rymer.

[12] Ib.

He was not more ſucceſsful in his demands upon the Ciſtertians, of whom he aſked the ſum of 25,000*l.* the paying of which would have ruined them. But they would not ſubmit to ſuch an exaction in violation of their moſt ſacred privileges. The king endeavoured to bring them to a compliance firſt of all by ſoothing and coaxing; this failing, he had recourſe to reproach and threats; which producing no better effect, he ordered all grace and favour to be with-held from them, and directed his ſheriffs to annoy and perſecute them as much as poſſible, without any ſort of regard to the privileges of their order[2].

“This year an edict iſſued from the king, commanding, and proclaiming throughout the kingdom, that every one who had 15*l.* a year in land, ſhould be decorated with arms, and be preſented with knighthood; that England, as Italy was, ſhould be ſtrengthened with milice; and they, who either would not, or could not, ſupport the ſtate of knight, ſhould redeem themſelves by money[3].

“The citizens of London are talliaged again in 500 marks. Upon different pretences, ſometimes for the king's uſe, ſometimes for the queen's, and now for the lord Edward's, like men in the loweſt degree of ſervitude, they are brought to beggary at the king's will, by a clauſe in his writs of “any liberty notwithſtanding,” and undergo the yoke of ſervitude.”

Manfroi's legitimacy was now diſcovered and eſtabliſhed in the realm of Sicily, it having been proved that the emperor had married Manfroi's mother after the birth of her ſon; and it was held by the church, that marriage legitimated natural children as to hereditary ſucceſſion[4]. All the Apulians, therefore, and Sicilians, ſupported him againſt the pope and king of England; nor did any body pity the pope when they ſaw Manfroi make himſelf maſter of Naples, and the maritime cities, Capua, and many other cities and towns. The pontiff was engaged in ſo bad a cauſe, and he ſo cruelly treated the Chriſtians, that people, rather than commiſerate the bad ſtate of his affairs, were glad to ſee them as they were[5].

“The lord abbot of Weſtminſter, and maſter Ruſtand, and the biſhop elect of Sarum, by the king's command, and upon ſome ſecret buſineſs of his, probably of no good ſort, croſſed the ſea[6].”

“There was at this time a certain knight, rich, plentifully furniſhed with goods, whoſe land was eſtimated at 150*l.* a year. This man, though rich, wanted to be richer, and for that end found means to ſupplant the former ſhire-reeve of Northampton, and get that office for himſelf. Having ſo done, he extorted money from all ſorts of people, without any regard whatever to crimes or cauſes. His name, William de l'Iſle. As this man was going about the country, he found in his way a beautiful paſture, in which were feeding ſome fine fat oxen. As ſoon as he ſaw them he could not help envying the owner, and coveted them for himſelf. Having contrived, without loſs of time, a trick for getting them, he ſaid to the herdſman, “Whoſe man are you?” The other anſwered, “I am the man of your friend ſuch an one, and theſe are his cattle.” The ſhire-reeve had borne an old grudge to the perſon whom the herdſman named, and this increaſed his deſire to entrap the herdſman, and make himſelf maſter of the other man's goods by any means, right or wrong. For, the perſon, whoſe oxen they were, was rich and diſcreet, and reſpected by the whole country. Looking ſternly, therefore, at the herdſman, the ſheriff ſaid to him, “You are a thief, and the ſervant of a thief; for, how elſe could he poſſeſs ſo many beautiful cattle? You ſteal oxen by night, and he is the receiver of them.” To this, when the herdſman denied the charge, affirming, that his maſter, as well as himſelf, were honeſt men, he replied, “You lie; you are a thief, and the domeſtic of a greater; I ſeize you and the cattle which your maſter the receiver takes in to fatten, that when they are fatted he may ſell them.” In great wrath, therefore, the ſhire-reeve, without farther ceremony, having either taken the oxen, or put them in ſafe keeping, binds the herdſman as a priſoner, and hurries him away to his maſter, declaring, with an horrible oath, and making uſe of a very coarſe phraſe, “that he would make him ſing; and that in ſinging he ſhould be made to confeſs, that both he and his maſter ſhould confeſs the truth concerning the ſtealing theſe oxen.” Having, therefore, incarcerated the herdſman, he had him queſtioned by ſo many and ſuch exquiſite kinds of torture, that the man was brought to death's door. After which, he inhumanly called out to him, ſaying, “The torturer ſhould give over, if the herdſman would confeſs himſelf to be a thief.” The man, therefore, who was almoſt dead, did as was deſired; though, in fact, he was no thief at all. The ſhire-reeve then ordered him to be placed before him; and then ſaid to him, “You have now confeſſed, in the hearing of ſundry perſons, who are able and willing to give teſtimony of it, that you are a thief, and the ſervant of a thief; for which you ſhall be judicially ſentenced to be hanged, and nothing can ſave you from the gallows; but I am powerful to crucify thee or releaſe thee; do, therefore, boldly what I adviſe, and you ſhall be releaſed; appeal your maſter of theft, and maintain it ſteadily before the juſticiars, that you are a thief, and the ſervant of a thief; you the actor, and he the accomplice and receiver.” The ſervant, trembling, and frightened leſt he ſhould be ſent back to the place of torment, conſented to all that was propoſed. Whereupon the ſhire-reeve kept him ſtill in cuſtody, but not in a very ſevere manner, till the arrival of the juſticiars, who were ſhortly expected. When theſe things were made known to the maſter of the neat-herd, who was extremely ill of a fever, ſome good-natured friends were employed to intercede with the ſhire-reeve, and implore his compaſſion; for, this miſery, added to his ſickneſs, was too much for him. At laſt, by the help of a large ſum of money, the ſick man obtained a little time, and got the thing reſpited till he was got better; and, as his health was mending, he conſulted the moſt able lawyers about the means of extricating himſelf out of his preſent difficulty. And, when he was informed how to act, he was reſtored to health and ſpirits at the ſame time. The ſhire-reeve, perſevering in his malicious intention, though he was courted by intreaties and preſents to forbear, at leaſt to put an end to the ſcandal of the thing, went on with this act of oppreſſion. When the juſticiars[7], therefore, arrived, he made the neat-herd be put before them, as if he were ready iniquitouſly to appeal his maſter of the theft. The vaſt preparations that were made upon this occaſion by the great perſons concerned had excited an eager and general curioſity to ſee the end of this affair; the neat-herd, therefore, was patiently liſtened to while he told his ſtory. He addreſſed the juſticiars in this manner—“Sirs, juſticiars, without doubt I am neither a thief, nor the accomplice of one, nor the ſervant of one: but this ſhire-reeve, in order to deſtroy my maſter, had me queſtioned by ſevere and tedious torments, which made my cry be heard through the whole neighbourhood. He did this to make me confeſs what he wanted. And when I had confeſſed that I was a thief, though I was not ſo, he ſaid to me, ‘Since you have confeſſed that you are a thief, nothing remains for you but the gallows; but I will diſcharge you if you will appeal your lord, as one thief does another.’ But what I ſaid under the dread of torment was not true; and I now openly proteſt, affirm, and declare, that I am the ſervant of an honeſt lord; and if any one deny it, and appeal either my lord or me of theft, or any other crime, we will defend ourſelves rightfully, according to the laws and cuſtoms of the realm." The lord of the neat-herd being preſent, reſolutely maintained that he had committed no crime whatever. The juſticiars nicely weighed in their minds every circumſtance of what was told them. For, what was ſaid made ſtrongly againſt the ſhire-reeve; and it was notorious to the whole county, and to the juſticiars themſelves, that he was covetous, mercenary, and guileful; and the lord of the neat-herd, like a good and honeſt man, had ſome time before withſtood in a full county-court his unjuſt determinations and violent ſentences, which had made the ſheriff hate and perſecute him. Beſides, the lord of the ſervant, and the ſervant himſelf, were men of unſullied reputation, and had never been reproached with any crime whatever. The juſticiars balanced all theſe matters, as they had good cauſe; but, as the ſheriff was a man of authority, well-born, and the great bailiff of the lord king, they were unwilling to fulminate the ſentence of death againſt him haſtily, though it was ſo juſtly his due. The clamour of complaint reached the king, and the court of the king, who were amazed at the magnitude of the crime. The king ſaid he would find out whether the complaint was well-grounded, and accordingly ſent down wiſe and powerful men, who would not be corrupted by fear, nor intreaty, nor money, to ſearch carefully into the true ſtate of the fact; that, the truth being fully diſcovered, and the guilty puniſhed as he deſerved, others might take warning, and not do the like. The perſons he ſent were the earls of Glouceſter and Leiceſter, Henry of Bath, and Robert Walerand, knights, men both well verſed in the laws of the realm. After diligent inquiſition made upon the matter by knights of the county, and worſe things than the former brought out againſt the ſhire-reeve, they made their report to the king, who was much aſtoniſhed, as every body elſe was, that a man could be capable of ſuch an horrid act of iniquity. The ſhire-reeve, therefore, was ſentenced very juſtly to an ignominious death, viz. that he ſhould be drawn to the ſtake, and hanged. His fate was drawing near, when his wife, anxious to prevent it, haſtened to the king and queen of Scotland (who made a viſit in the autumn of this year to the king and queen of England), and, with doleful cries and lamentations, beſought them to intercede with the king to ſpare her huſband's life; and ſir John Manſel, out of pity to the woman, likewiſe ſpoke in her favour. The king and queen of Scots preſſed the king ſo forcibly in behalf of the ſhire-reeve, that Henry, rather than grieve them by refuſing the requeſt of perſons ſo powerful and near to him, granted to the ſheriff his life and limbs, notwithſtanding his monſtrous offence, and the king's wiſh to have him exemplarily puniſhed [1]."

---

[1] M. Paris. [2] Ib. [3] Ib. [4] Vide Statute of Merton, 20 Hen. III. ch. 9. [5] M. Paris.

[6] The annaliſt of Dunſtable has ſaid a little more concerning their buſineſs—“Ad inſtantiam domini regis adierunt curiam Romanam pro negotiis ſuis expediendis contra clerum & populum Angliæ;” i. e. againſt the clergy and laity of England.

[7] Juſtices in eyre, who had commiſſion of gaol-delivery.

On the 12th of June, the king, then at Weſtminſter [2], iſſued his letter to all and each of the princes of Germany, deſiring them to receive his recommendation of the noble and wiſe perſon Richard de Clare, earl of Glouceſter and Herts, and his beloved ſeneſchal Robert Walerand, his lieges, and to give full and entire credit to what they ſhould lay before them on the affairs committed to their management by the king. Such is the purport of the king's letter to the princes of Almaine. The truth of the matter was in fact no other than this: Upon the death of the count of Holland, the pope's king of the Romans, the electors began to be divided about the choice of a ſucceſſor [3]; pope Alexander wrote to them upon no account to elect Conradin, declaring, that if they did they ſhould be excommunicated, and the election be null and void. The electors, therefore, who foreſaw what conteſts would enſue in the empire from chuſing a German, caſt about for ſome rich foreigner, who could pay them largely for their votes, and maintain his own ground by his wealth, poweſs, and connections. Two competitors of this deſcription ſoon entered the liſts for this great prize. Theſe were Alphonſo the wiſe king of Caſtille (of whom ſo much mention has been made before) and Richard earl of Cornwall. The former had pretenſions, in right of his mother Donna Beatrix, to the dutchy of Suabia, of which he thought he could avail himſelf if he were choſen king of the Romans; and he flattered himſelf, that, if he marched into Italy, many ſtates and princes there would declare for him; and that thence he might march into Germany, and eſtabliſh himſelf both in the German throne and the dutchy of Suabia. The other candidate, viz. Richard earl of Cornwall, was reputed the richeſt man beneath the great ſovereigns of the Weſtern world, and therefore able to bribe as high, and ſpend as much money, in maintaining his claim, as any that could be found; and king Henry projected his brother's elevation, with the hope that it would facilitate his grand object, which had taken the entire poſſeſſion of his heart, the fixing his ſecond and youngeſt ſon in the throne of Sicily.

"On October 9, while the barons were ſitting at the exchequer, the lord king went thither in perſon, and with his own mouth declared, that every ſheriff, who failed to appear every year on the octaves of St. Michael, with the king's money due from firms, and amerciaments, and other debts, ſhould be amerced, in caſe of abſence, the firſt day in five marks, the ſecond in ten, the third in fifteen, and the fourth be redeemed. The ſame declaration was likewiſe made againſt the cities which had liberties, and anſwered at the exchequer by their own bailiffs; to wit, ſo that the fourth day they ſhould loſe their liberties, unleſs they appeared in the ſame manner as the ſheriffs ought to do; and be it known, that on the ſame day were amerced all the ſhire-reeves in England, namely, in five marks each, in as much as they had not diſtrained in their ſeveral counties every man having ten librates of land, that he might be made a knight; or had ſought reſpite from the king, as he had directed by his letters ſent to the ſheriffs [4]."

"About the feaſt of All Souls, the Welſh, diverſly oppreſſed, and ſold from time to time to thoſe who would give moſt for them, were at length ſo exceſſively ill treated by Geoffry de Langley, the royal exactor, that they roſe for the defence of their country, and the preſervation of their laws [5]; and being leagued together, they invaded the parts of England adjoining to Wales, and hoſtilely attacked the men [6] of Edward their lord, whom they by no means acknowledged. Theſe martial attempts proved ſucceſsful, which made it believed that they were countenanced by the Engliſh on the borders. As ſoon as Edward heard of this inſurrection, he haſtened to his uncle Richard (for, the king was too poor to afford him any money), and got from him 4000 marks, to enable him to repel the outrages of the Welſh, and chaſtiſe with exemplary ſeverity their raſh preſumption. But the following winter proved ſo wet and miry, that the whole country of Wales, which is pathleſs and marſhy, was impaſſable to the Engliſh; and thus Edward loſt both his labour and his money. Geoffry ſaw his error too late, in driving the Welſh to take up arms, and beggaring them juſt as a few years before he had ſerved the people of the North. Some perſons were of opinion that he would be obliged, at his own coſt, to repair the loſſes ſuſtained by Edward."

---

[1] M. Paris. [2] Rymer. [3] Rainald, Ferrara, Th. Wykes. Rymer. [4] M. Paris.

[5] Eodem anno Wallenſes fines ſuos egreſſi maximum congregaverunt exercitum, quibus præerat Lewelinus ſecundus, vir pulcherrimus, & bello ſtrenuus; qui omnes Wallenſes habuit quaſi ſibi conglutinatos. Eo tempore dominus rex & regina & concilium eorum dominum Galfridum de Langeleye terræ domini Edwardi, quam in Wallia habuit, cuſtodem poſuerunt; qui Wallenſes legibus Angliæ ſubdere nitebatur. Et cum ex parte hoc feciſſet, credens rem ad effectum perducere, jactabat ſe coram rege & regina, quod omnes Wallenſes habuit in manu ſua clauſos. Et cum poſtea comitatus & hundredos ordinaret, Wallenſes, habito conſilio, confidenter reſponderunt, quod nihil pro eo contra leges paternas facerent. Et ſic ad invicem cum maxima diſcordia diſceſſerunt. An. Dunſtaple, anno 1256. Alfred divided England into bailiwics or prefectures of police and judicature, called aldermanries, or earldoms, and hundreds.

[6] The men, ſc. homines, or vaſſals of the lord Edward.

"Edward's retinue by his permiſſion[1] committed ſuch damage all through the country where it paſſed, that the injuries committed by his father were thought trifling in compariſon of his. For the routiers and robbers bred in his court over-run the country far and wide, laid violent hands upon the horſes and carriages of trading people, and alſo upon the proviſions of the people in the country, and took both away." And Edward ſhewed ſo many ſigns of a cruel, arbitrary, and overbearing ſpirit, that though ſome imputed his errors to the levity of youth, others thought him to be of a very indifferent diſpoſition. "In the mean while, the Welſh not reſpecting, or not fearing the tyranny of Edward, or of his ſuite, drove every thing before them, and penetrated even to Cheſter[2]."

"About the ſame time the king gave a ſtrict charge, that no writ, on any account whatever, with his ſeal to it, ſhould iſſue from the chancery, if it contained any thing to hurt, or endamage, his brother Richard, or Richard earl of Glouceſter, Peter of Savoy, or any of his brothers[3], which was manifeſtly repugnant to all law and juſtice, and even the peace of the realm."

"The king alſo, about the ſame time, commanded that his ſatellites ſhould make a careful ſurvey of the meaſures of wine and ale, called lagins, or gallons, and the meaſures of corn called buſhels, and the weights of ſcales. They were to do this in order to raiſe money for the king's exchequer by exceſſive fines, from which, guilty or innocent, none would eſcape, in the way theſe men would proceed in the buſineſs; and thus every day new devices were framed for extorting money. The little matters of property belonging to traffickers of various ſorts were wreſted from them by force, and nothing at all paid in return. The party deſpoiled was content to loſe his things, if he eſcaped a great deal of abuſe, and blows. And as lately an handle had been taken from clientſhip[4], which we call ſerjeantry, for extorting money; ſo now pretences for doing the ſame aroſe from ſuit of court, forcing men to be knighted, enquiring into weights and meaſures, and many other contrivances of rapacity. Rapine ſhot up ſo faſt as to threaten the entire devaſtation of the realm, and the ſervitude of the church. There were as many tyrants now in England as there were in former ages petty kings within it[5]."

"The violence of the Welſh was particularly troubleſome to king Henry at this time, when all his thoughts were turned towards Apulia, and his invention racked to find out the means of performing his engagements to the pope. Both he and earl Richard humbly intreated the Welſh to forbear their depredations for a little time; but the Welſh, thinking the wet ſeaſon favourable for their incurſions, refuſed to be quiet, and grew more fierce and miſchievous, increaſing in their numbers, and combining in cloſer union; by their reſolute and manly ſpirit giving good cauſe to the Engliſh to be aſhamed of their own puſillanimity, who put their necks under every one who choſe to tread upon them, crouched to every alien that came to England, and were now, like ſome poor pitiful nation, afraid even of the Welſh, mere ſhrimps in human form[6].

But the crew of foreigners[7], whom Edward had imported and kept about him, was hurtful both to church and realm, and abſolutely intolerable; they were worſe than the French who came with Lewis into England in the time of king John.

Henry was not at this time in much greater eſtimation at the court of Rome than in England. By the pope's own account, in a letter to the king of the 11th of June, the terra di Lavoro, which opened a paſſage to the reſt of the kingdom, was now overrun and reduced by Manfroi, whoſe ſucceſs the pope aſcribed ſolely to the neglect and tardineſs of Henry. But as the loſs of Lavoro, in which was Naples, did not induce the king of England to give up his project, and ſave his money; ſo neither did it move the pope to relax in the ſmalleſt degree with reſpect to the money he demanded of king Henry. By freſh bulls, iſſued this ſummer, he made a formal and abſolute demand, upon pain of excommunication, of the tenths of the eccleſiaſtical baronies and manors, derived from royal bounty, and owing ſervice to the king. He complied with the king's deſire, and gave him the fruits, rents, and provents, of all the dignities, parſonages, and other eccleſiaſtical benefices, which lapſed to the holy ſee, as likewiſe the rents and iſſues of all eccleſiaſtical dignities and benefices belonging to perſons who, without proper diſpenſations, were non-reſident upon the ſame, and one year's whole profits of all ſuch dignities and benefices as ſhould be vacant for five years to come. The money that had been raiſed by Ruſtand towards the diſcharge of the king's debt had been kept in hand till order ſhould be given about the application of it from the pope; for, as the creditors were clamorous, and there was not enough to ſatisfy all of them, it was judged proper to receive directions from the holy ſee, who ſhould be paid in preference. Accordingly, the pope named the perſons who were to be conſidered firſt; and he conſented to the king's requeſt, who had deſired more time for ſending the captain and army into Apulia, and for payment of the reſidue of his debt. Upon condition that the money collected, and to be collected, from the eccleſiaſtical tenths, was not ſtopped or detained by the king, but paid truly and without obſtacle to the merchants for the exoneration of the debts of the Roman church as ſoon as the biſhop of Meſſina ſhould bring the king the inſtrument of reſpite, the pope undertook to allow him ſix months, the ſame to be reckoned from the firſt of December, 1256, for ſending a capital army into Apulia. The biſhop of Meſſina, a man of noble birth, and of a grave and diſcreet temper, was judged by the pope and cardinals a proper perſon to be ſent to England, to communicate with king Henry on the general ſubject of Sicily, and impart to that prince ſuch advice and reſolutions of the holy ſee as were conceived to be moſt conducive for the promotion of its views. His letters credential are dated Nov. 9, 1256. Before we ſpeak of his arrival in England, it will be proper to take notice of a very remarkable incident, which, from the commiſſions mentioned above, as given to William Bonquer, and to the earl of Glouceſter, and Robert Walerand, the reader will perceive was owing to a train of negotiation inſtituted by king Henry. The incident alluded to was the election of Richard earl of Cornwall to be king of the Romans, of which the following ſeems to be an exact ſtatement, collected from the proceeding of the parties at the court of Rome[8]. William count of Holland died about the 29th of January, 1256. It was held by ſome to be the law of the empire, that an election of a king of the Romans ſhould not be deferred longer than a year and a day after the throne ſhould become vacant. There were at that time ſeven princes of Germany compoſing the electoral college, viz. the archbiſhops of Cologn, Mentz, and Triers, and the four ſeculars, the king of Bohemia, the duke of Saxony, the marquis of Brandenburg, and the count Palatine. It was deemed eſſential that the election ſhould be at the city of Frankfort, in a place called Franckeſerde. There the electors agreed to meet on the octaves of the

---

[1] M. Paris.

[2] Ibid.

[3] i. e. his uterine brothers.

[4] The ſervices of fiefs in conſequence of the feudal law.

[5] M. Paris.

[6] Ibid.

[7] Edward, king Henry's eldeſt ſon, brought his wife, an infanta of Spain, to England, about Michaelmas, anno 1255, attended by a vaſt ſuite of foreigners, particularly of Spaniards.

[8] Raynald, Rymer, Ferrara, Hiſt. Hiſp.

Epiphany (viz. Jan. 13), 1257. Thither accordingly came the archbiſhop of Triers and the duke of Saxony, both for himſelf and for the marquis of Brandenburg, and likewiſe the proxy of the king of Bohemia; and afterwards the archbiſhop of Cologne and the count Palatine arrived in the neighbourhood, with ſuch a vaſt multitude of armed men as gave great and juſt alarm to the archbiſhop of Triers and his party. A meſſage, therefore, was ſent by the latter to the former, to deſire that the archbiſhop and count would enter the city with only a decent and proper retinue, to fix quietly a day for electing a king of the Romans. This propoſal was refuſed; and therefore they were not ſuffered to enter the town. It was pretended by the archbiſhop of Cologne and the count Palatine, that the meeting was for electing, whereas the others inſiſted that it was only for appointing a day for electing a king of the Romans, and denied the neceſſity of filling up the vacancy in a year and a day; whereupon the archbiſhop of Cologne and the count Palatine proceeded without further ceremony to nominate Richard earl of Cornwall to be king of the Romans, throwing in the vicarious vote of the archbiſhop of Mentz, who was then in bonds, and the priſoner of ſome great perſon in Germany, and whoſe proxy the other pretended to be. In the mean while, the electors aſſembled at Frankfort proceeded to appoint a day, by common conſent, for chuſing their king, and fixed the fifth Sunday in Lent, when they met, and unanimouſly made choice of Alphonſo king of Caſtille. The three electors, who had anticipated the buſineſs in favour of earl Richard, were ſummoned to this ſecond meeting, but refuſed to come to it, maintaining the validity of what had been done by themſelves, which was held by the other party to be altogether nugatory and informal. They ſaid, that if it were neceſſary to come to an election within a year and a day after the vacancy of the German throne, the time of Richard's election was within fifteen days before the expiration of that term, whereas it ought to have been on the laſt day, as a majority might agree in electing ſome one elſe within thoſe fifteen days. Moreover, it was urged, that the archbiſhop of Cologne, acting as proxy for the archbiſhop of Mentz, was not admiſſible, the latter not being at this time maſter of his own perſon; and beſides, both the archbiſhop of Cologne and the count Palatine were at this time excommunicated, which laid them under a perſonal incapacity.

Such is the papal ſtatement of Richard's election to the throne of Almaine. I ſhall ſubjoin the account of this affair given by our Engliſh hiſtorian, that the reader may compare and make his obſervations upon both recitals.

"In the year of our Lord 1257[1], which was the 43d year of lord king Henry III, the ſaid king was at London at the Nativity of the Lord, where came to the lord king (who had aſſembled many of the grandees, together with earl Richard,) certain of the chief men of Almaine, reporting to all perſons, who had been there, that, by unanimous conſent, they had regularly elected earl Richard to be king of Almaine. And they demanded the ſaid earl Richard to be their king and lord, if ſo be he would comply with their wiſhes; and the archbiſhop of Cologne, proto-chancellor of the ſacred empire, and certain other grandees of Almaine, diſpatched by general voice their ſolemn nuncios, bearing letters teſtimonial of this event and confirmation thereof, affirming that at no time had any perſon ſo clearly, ſo unanimouſly, ſo perfectly without oppoſition, been choſen to that dignity. And while all were in doubt what ſhould be done, becauſe the preſence of the earl was very neceſſary to the realm of England, the king ſaid openly and plainly, for fear the earl's refuſal ſhould be imputed to puſillanimity, "I do adviſe and beſeech, that this honour, being the gift both of God and man, be accepted." And when others were alarmed with the reflection, that two perſons within a few years choſen and appointed kings of Almaine had come to ſiniſter and fatal miſhaps, as if through the anger of Heaven, there were not wanting ſome who counſeled the earl with theſe words: "O, ſcrupulous and diſtruſting earl, why do you demur; as if the miſhap of the landgrave Henry, and the miſhap of earl William, the Hollander, alarmed you? Does not the pope thruſt you in by violence, who, out of the ſpoils of the church, and the rapines of the croiſés, promiſes to you neceſſaries which would never do you any good? Theſe baſely acquired things have provoked not to mercy but to wrath. The treaſure is reſerved to you, which is collected from the realm of Almaine, and faithfully kept to your uſe. You abound in treaſure of your own, like another Octavian. You have a good ſtore of friends both Almaine and Engliſh. You are buttreſſed with relations of your blood. Let not the numbneſs of diſtruſt, or faintheartedneſs diſmay you, as if you were a man inactive and timorous. Let the misfortune which formerly befel Robert Curt-hoſe, duke of Normandy, in the Holy land, fighting for God, admoniſh and raiſe you. To him was offered voluntarily, and from above, the realm of Jeruſalem, that he might rule the heritage of Chriſt. He perverſely rejected the tender; which God afterwards ſeverely avenged. Nothing proſperous ever befel him from that day. The king likewiſe and his brothers, eſpecially the elect of Winton, plied him with words of animation, affirming that this honour would exalt the Engliſh nation for ever." Which when the earl had liſtened to; putting on the man, and created into lively hope, he ſaid, with a free and briſk voice, "And I, confiding in the mercy of God, although inſufficient and unworthy, accept with thanks this burden and honour tendered to me, as I hope, by God; that I may not be thought fainthearted and cowardly." And then, his face being turned to the biſhops (of whom one was Richard biſhop of Bangor, who related what is here written to the writer thereof), added, "I, ere I go out of this chapel, will be burnt by hell-fire, and die by ſudden death, if I do theſe things either on account of ambition or avarice; but that I may bring the realm, which God gives me, to a better ſtate, and rule thoſe, who have voluntarily choſen me into the office of lord, with all modeſty, juſtice, and honour." By which words he drew tears from many, and made the hearts of the nuncios of Almaine more joyful. And thoſe who had entertained doubts of his conſent, being now certified of his inclinations, went home very much pleaſed; being to report to thoſe grandees, by whom they had been ſent, the earl's anſwer on the twentieth day after the Nativity of our Lord."

"The ſame year, in the middle of Lent, a great parliament was made, wherein, by writ of the king, came the maſters of Oxford, that peace might be reſtored between the biſhop of Lincoln, who annoyed them, and the univerſity of Oxford. Moreover, there haſtened to that parliament the earl of Glouceſter, Richard, and ſir John Manſel, who had been diſpatched into Almaine to examine the ſtate of the country, and make preparations for the journey of Richard earl of Cornwall, elect king of the Romans. But they did not diſcover the crafty election of the king of Spain, who afterwards aſſerted that he had been firſt elected, as the following narration will ſhew. At the ſaid parliament were preſent, the newly-elected king of the Romans, earl Richard being about to bid farewell to the univerſity of England; for, at the ſame place were almoſt the whole nobility of England. The ſaid earl appointed Fulk biſhop of London the chief manager of his eſtates which he had in England. At that time there was ſo great a multitude of men in the city of London, that the city could hardly contain them in its capacious boſom[2]."

Maſter Ruſtand, the papal nuncio, having in his firſt viſit to England met with great oppoſition in the buſineſs committed to his management, had thought it neceſſary to return to Italy in the ſummer of the year 1256, to explain his difficulties at the holy ſee, and receive freſh inſtructions. Theſe were given him ſoon after; and towards the end of that year, or beginning of the year following, viz. 1257, he came again to England with a commiſſion ſimilar in general to his laſt, but with additional articles and new powers of extortion. And in this journey he was accompanied by the archbiſhop of Meſſina, whom the pope appointed to take the lead in his negotiations concerning Sicily, and from whoſe talents, and reſpectable rank and character, his holineſs expected a ſucceſsful iſſue to this arduous affair.

---

[1] M. Paris, 1257.

[2] M. Paris.

"On the fifth Sunday in Lent, when prelates, clergy, and laity, were aſſembled in vaſt multitude in the chapter-houſe at Weſtminſter, the archbiſhop of Meſſina laid before them the buſineſs of Sicily, for which he came to England, endeavouring by ſermons, by converſation, and by exhibiting the papal letters, to induce the aſſembly to take upon them the conqueſt of Sicily, and proſecute the war there to a ſucceſsful concluſion. After deliberation had upon this ſubject for many days, the project by common [1] reſolution was negatived as well by the clergy as the laity, for the reaſons aſſigned below, and delivered to the king, as well as the ſaid archbiſhop, both in French and Latin [2]."

"The things ſubſcribed make us deſpair concerning the affair of Apulia.

Reaſons of the grandees againſt the king:

The things underwritten make us deſpair concerning the affair of Sicily.

Firſt, the diſtance of that realm;

Alſo, the paſſing through the countries of powerful men, adverſe to the lord king, and perhaps inclined to his adverſary;

Alſo, the occupation of the Lavoro and other places through which lies the paſſage to the other parts of the realm;

Alſo, the eſtabliſhment of the prince in the realm;

Alſo, the confederation of the ſame perſon with the natives and neighbouring inhabitants;

Alſo, the detention and occupation of almoſt all the cities, caſtles, and other fortreſſes;

Alſo, the abundance of riches which the prince every day collects from the realm;

Alſo, the loſs of immenſe charges already made on the part of the lord king, when little or nothing has been gained, or rather, every thing loſt;

Alſo, the coſts neceſſary and ineſtimable; firſt, for the diſcharge of debts; ſecondly, for the expences of the journey; thirdly, for the acquiſition of the realm aforeſaid; for which coſts all England is not ſufficient;

Alſo, the deſtruction and impoveriſhment of the realm of England, by the frequent iters of juſticiars, and by manifold extortions, and prizes, and other oppreſſions;

Alſo, the ſmallneſs of the treaſure of the lord king, and of his ſon, the poverty of all the natives, as well of the clergy as laity;

Alſo, the diſorders of Gaſcogne, Ireland, and Scotland;

Alſo, the hoſtile invaſion of the Welſh in ſtrong force, to the expulſion of the natives now exiſting;

Alſo, the diminution of the power of the realm of England in council, money, and perſons, by the going away of Richard earl of Cornwall;

Alſo, the great men of the neighbouring countries, viz. the king of France, and others, particularly thoſe who ſome time ago had lands in England, would be encouraged to attack England, if, for the affair of Sicily, it were ſtripped of perſons, arms, council, and money;

Alſo, becauſe we neither are willing nor conſenting that the king ſhould undertake the weight of this buſineſs, leſt he ſhould ſeem by our conſent to deliver himſelf into the hands of his enemies. Nor are we able or willing to undertake it in conjunction with him for the reaſons aforeſaid, and on account of the immoderate and unknown weight of expence to be ſuſtained in this buſineſs, which we deſpair of being equal to;

Alſo, on account of the difficult and grievous conditions annexed to the undertaking, by reaſon of which the king, after infinite labour and expence, might eaſily miſcarry, as to his right to the realm.

Reaſons of the biſhops and clergy againſt the petition of the king [3]:

Firſt, that the petition of the lord king cannot poſſibly produce effect, becauſe that ſo great a ſum of money is uſeleſsly expended, and manifeſtly loſt, as is demonſtrable and notorious;

Alſo, whereas, for the payment of that money we were not called upon at the firſt, nor any way bound, nor did the lord king contract for it with our conſent tacitly or expreſsly; nay more, he did it without our knowledge; we neither will, nor ought to be preſſed to the accompliſhment of this undertaking;

Alſo, whereas we have nothing but what is of the patrimony of Chriſt, whoſe ſtewards we are, what we are bound, by the divine law, to beſtow upon the poor, that we cannot give to the king, without offending God, and converting the eccleſiaſtical goods to prohibited uſes; which upon no account we will, or ought to do;

Alſo, for ſo great a burthen the whole realm of England is not ſufficient, even although clay could be converted to gold, eſpecially as the realm of Sicily is impregnable, and as it were inacceſſible with an army from hence; and if we were to have ſtipendiary and hired knights of that country, great doubt might be conceived of their fidelity, becauſe of their old intimacy and friendſhip with the late emperor Frederick and his family;

Alſo, if an Engliſh army were led to thoſe parts with as much money as were wanting upon ſuch an occaſion, we might fear that the neighbouring kingdoms might invade ours, and lay us at the mercy of the ſword; and thus both kingdoms, viz. that which is in our poſſeſſion, and that which we covet; eſpecially as the lord king of the Romans is about to take out of England with him a great part of our militia;

Alſo, we have ocular proof that the Welſh have gone out of their bounds, and got into ours for many miles together, where they neither ſpare men nor things; and it is neceſſary that they be ſtrongly reſiſted, before we turn our eyes to foreign realms;

Alſo, it is ſaid, and teſtified by common report, that a compromiſe has taken place between the church and Manfroi, concerning the kingdom of Sicily, and all its appendages."

"In this council, and moſt general and populous parliament, there were no leſs than ſix archbiſhops, viz. thoſe of Cologne, Canterbury, York, Dublin, Meſſina, and Tarentum. The firſt of theſe came over with the biſhops of Leyden and Utrecht, and ſir Florence count of Holland, and other great men of the empire, to excite Richard earl of Cornwall to go over into Germany, where it was ſaid he had nothing to do but to enjoy the crown of Almaine in peace and ſafety. Not a word was ſaid of his having a powerful competitor in the king of Caſtille, and of the French giving the latter all the aſſiſtance which they could. The archbiſhop of Tarentum had been deeply concerned in carrying on the correſpondence between the holy ſee and king Henry about Sicily, and miſleading him in that affair. The archbiſhop of Meſſina was ſent ſpecially on the ſame account [4]."

The convocation of prelates and clergy was protracted to a great length [5]. Ruſtand, ſupported by pope and king, continued obdurate in his exorbitant demands. At length, as it ſhould ſeem, ſome time in the month of June, this aſſembly propoſed a compromiſe with the king, viz. that they would raiſe 52,000 marks for his uſe upon certain conditions, "which were digeſted into articles, containing all their grievances, in number about fifty, which they meant ſhould be read before the king, the grandees, and the prelates, and which they hoped would produce the intended effect. Theſe articles, or capitules, were like thoſe for which St. Thomas, archbiſhop of Canterbury, fought, and glorioufly triumphed [1]."

---

[1] That is, of the clergy and laity, convened to this parliament. They were all tenants of the king in capite, and were eſſential to a grand and complete parliament, when money was to be aſked. The clergy and laity deliberated apart, then together. Their united reſolution was called their common act. "Tandem requiſiti fuerunt ex parte eorum [ſc. epiſcoporum, abbatum, & priorum,] comites & barones, ſi vellent ſuis conſiliis unanimiter conſentire in reſponſione & proviſione ſuper his facienda. Qui reſponderunt, quod ſine communi univerſitate nihil facerent. Tunc de communi aſſenſu electi, &c." M. Paris, apud Watts, p. 563, anno 1244.

[2] Annales Burton, p. 372.

[3] In their convocation. Annales Burton.

[4] M. Paris.

[5] Ib. Ann. Burton.

"It was made alſo a part of their demand, that all the exactions, which were called graces, granted to the lord king, and publiſhed by maſter Ruſtand, ſhould ceaſe altogether, and the Magna Charta be duly kept by the king in future [2]."

"This grant of 52,000 marks was a moſt grievous burden to the church, which conſented, however, to pay it, in hopes of having what is called its liberties recognized by the legiſlature of England, and practically eſtabliſhed in time to come. The king's critical ſituation too was an auxiliary motive for ſtraining every nerve in his ſupport. His poverty was extreme; and he ſtood bound to the holy ſee for the payment of 135,501 marks before the enſuing feaſt of St. Michael [3]."

"The latter end of May, the king's health ſuſtained an alarming ſhock, being the conſequence of multiplied afflictions[4]. In the beginning of that month he loſt his daughter Catherine, who was pretty in perſon, but not likely to be of much uſe in the world, by reaſon of dumbneſs. The queen about the ſame time was ſeized with a diſorder in her ſide, which no medical efforts could relieve, and her life was deſpaired of. While ſhe lay ill at Windſor the king was ſeiſed with a tertian fever at London, occaſioned by grief and vexation. The murders and ravages of the Welſh upon the borders and marches of Wales, their late ſucceſſes againſt prince Edward and the Engliſh, their increaſing ſtrength and audacity, his apprehenſions for the crown of Sicily, and fear of having thrown away all the money which that project had, and was like to coſt him, the loſs of his daughter, and the queen's ſevere indiſpoſition, overwhelmed him in ſorrow, which brought on a tertian fever of long continuance."

Had the king's hiſtorian been diſpoſed to enumerate all the things which gave a preſſure to the royal mind about this time, we ſhould probably have found among them the little ſatisfaction which Henry had in the behaviour of prince Edward his heir apparent. The latter was now entering, or entered, into his 19th year, had been married a year or two to the infanta of Spain, and had obtained from his father both the government of Wales and of Gaſcogne. In his government of Wales his conduct had been ſo deteſted as to make the Welſh riſe under their native prince Llewellin, as one man, againſt his arbitrary and provoking treatment. The king ſeems to have been in no condition to give the pecuniary help that Edward ſtood in need of, and the prince was obliged to negotiate a loan with his opulent uncle the earl of Cornwall, exalted about Midſummer, A. D. 1257, into the ſublime throne of Charlemagne. This ſupply, however, added as it ſhould ſeem to the money he acquired by mortgaging and alienating ſeveral fiefs, appendant to the crown of England, and according to law not alienable but by act of parliament, proved all inſufficient to reduce the Welſh to his obedience. From ſeveral hints in the chronicle it ſeems as if the king expected the prince ſhould enforce his authority by the united ſtrength of his own body and purſe. Here was matter ſufficient to create diſcord between the parties. But the diſagreement between Henry and Edward did not begin now. It had ariſen to a very ſerious height a year or two before, and it ſeems not to have been adjuſted in the year 1257, becauſe nothing is reported of that ſort, and mention is made of a reconciliation in the year following, viz. 1258. The cauſe of their former miſunderſtanding, as ſtated by Paris, was the conduct of ſome of the king's officers towards certain vintners of Gaſcogne, who made their complaint to the prince as their lord, and whom Edward in that character was diſpoſed to ſee redreſſed. In a hearing before the king, to which the latter's bailiffs came to account for their conduct, and at which prince Edward himſelf alſo made his appearance, "the latter, highly enraged at what paſſed, told the king, that the ill uſage his people had ſuſtained was intolerable, and that he would not bear it. At which the king, fetching a deep groan, exclaimed, 'Behold my blood and my bowels attack me. Behold, as my brother earl Richard was lately moved againſt me, ſo now alſo is my firſt-born ſon. Behold, now are revived the times of my grandfather Henry the Second, againſt whom his children, moſt tenderly beloved by him, inſolently lifted up the heel!' Many perſons auguring ill from ſuch an incident feared worſe conſequences. But the king, following good advice on the occaſion, paſſed over in ſilence, and with temper, all that had happened, and mildly ordered ſatisfaction to be made, as the prince demanded But Edward, as if taking precaution for his own ſafety, enlarged his family [5], and rode with two hundred horſe [6]."

"When Edward was recalled from Gaſcogne towards the cloſe of the year 1255, the king intended that he ſhould go into Ireland and ſpend the following winter in ſettling the affairs of that lordſhip; but Edward did not go, though Ireland had great need of his preſence[1]."

---

[1] M. Paris.

[2] Annales Burton.

[3] Rymer.

[4] M. Paris.

[5] Familiam ejus, i. e. his military ſuite, his body-guard, his houſehold troop.

[6] The prince here ſpoken of became afterwards king of England by the name of Edward I. M. Paris did not live to ſee him mount the throne of England; but the morning of the prince did not promiſe, in the hiſtorian's opinion, a mild and auſpicious day. "Familia autem Edwardi, ipſo permittente adeo omnium, per quos tranſitum fecerat, incolarum tam poſſeſſiones, quam perſonas perturbavit: ut ejus reſpectu patris ſui domini regis injuriæ leves cenſerentur. Ruptarii * enim & prædones, quos ſua curia educavit, longe lateque ſcatentes negotiatorum equos & bigas & compatriotarum victualia violenter rapuerunt, & abduxerunt. Et ut de multis exactorum improbitatibus unam explicem; hanc lectoribus hujus paginæ duximus explicandam. Cum dictus Edwardus veniſſet ad comitem Richardum, ut prælibatum eſt, & ipſum apud Walingford inveniſſet, & ipſe in caſtro civiliter receptus hoſpitaretur, ejus familia in prioratum caſtro vicinum ſe procaciter & impetuoſe ingeſſit, non, ut moris eſt, hoſpitium poſtulando. Secus quoque, quam decuit aut licuit, monachis irreverenter repulſis omnia menſæ neceſſaria, ignis fomenta, jumentorum pabula diripientes oſtia feneſtras & tripodes confringentes famulos monachorum quaſi vilia mancipia vel latrones convictos retrudendo & convitiis laceſſitos, vel baculis appetitos retroire compulerunt: vixque conceſſus eſt locus refectionis pranſuris locutorium, & potantibus dormitorium. Amici autem Edwardi volentes errorem palliare: non malitiæ, ſed pueritiæ omnia hujuſmodi aſcribebant deliramenta non conſiderantes illud Lucani prognoſticum

"Ætas Niliaci nimium ſuſpecta tyranni
Ardua nempe fides maturos exigit annos.

"Edwardus non mediocriter verecundatus & damnificatus ex Wallenſium rebellione, & alacritate, quia dominus Walliæ dicebatur, nec potuit eorum rebellionem refrænare. Adiit igitur filius iterato tam patrem ſuum & matrem quam avunculum efficax poſtulans auxilium ab eiſdem. Sed rex adeo alieno ære in partibus tranſalpinis obligabatur, & comes multis theſauri commodationibus ſui, ſc. quatuor millium marcarum, fatigatus: Regina quoque mater ejus in profuſione expenſarum in bellum contra civitatem Taurinam inutili fatigata adeo theſaurum ſuum mutilaverant, ut non poſſent Edwardo aliquatenus ſubvenire. Et quia pater ejus dominus rex, ut ſparſim dicebatur, Anglos nitebatur obruere; aliqui de Marchiſiis occulte Wallenſibus favorem & conſilium præſtiterunt. Maxime cum dictus Edwardus familiam tenuiſſet, eccleſiæ & regno nocivam: ita ut diceretur quod nunquam Lodovicus invaſor Angliæ tam ſordidos ſecum ruptarios vel protervas adduxerat in Angliam, ſicut dictus Edwardus in clientela & curia ſua educavit. Et de multis eorum improbitatibus unam tyrannidem præter illam, quæ prænotatur, ut legentibus pateat, in quam alyſſum deſperationis Anglia demergatur, duximus huic paginæ annotandam. Cum tranſiret per viam pacificam & tranquillitatis tempore, obviam ei venerat quidem juvenis, & abſque cauſa mortis & mutilationis juſſit ut ei auricula abſcinderetur,

* Foreign mercenaries, devoted to the ſervice of thoſe who hired them, a ſort of pandours, plunderers, and deſtroyers, wherever they came, and delighting in cruelty and ſlaughter.

He ſeems at this time to have been as poor as his father. This obliged him to have recourſe to the earl of Cornwall for a ſmall loan, and may be ſuppoſed to account in part for the rapine of his ſuite, committed throughout the country, to the great grievance and ſcandal of the whole nation. To the ſame cauſe may be aſcribed his making a grant of the iſle of Oleron, an appendage of the crown of England, and inſeparable from it to Guy de Leſignan, the king's half-brother, for the latter's life, without the king's advice, who had given Edward that iſland merely towards his neceſſary ſupport.

On the 26th of October, 1257, "the king, by the advice of the great men of his council[2]," [that is, with advice of the grandees aſſembled in parliament], declared Edward's grant to be abſolutely null and void, and forbad the people of Oleron from paying any ſort of regard to it. In the ſame inſtrument the king declares his intention of ſending very ſoon into Gaſcogne a ſeneſchal for that dutchy, who ſhould take ſuch meaſures as were proper, with reſpect to Oleron.

Among the documents[3] of the year following, it appears that Edward had actually or intentionally diſpoſed of the ſeneſchalcy of Gaſcogne to Geoffry de Leſignan, another of the king's half-brothers, of the hateful houſe of March, without the king's knowledge or concurrence; and which Edward was prevailed upon to cancel, as irregular and illegal, and prejudicial to the crown of England. In corroboration of theſe remarks, a paſſage in Matthew Paris deſerves our attention. After the Welſh had over-run the lord Edward's territory in Wales, repelled his forces, and done him infinite miſchief, he went to the king and complained to him of what had happened, with the hope of ſome aſſiſtance.

"The king is reported to have made the following anſwer[2]: What is all this to me; the country is not mine, but yours by my gift[4]? Exert yourſelf, diſplay the ſpirit of youth, that hereafter your enemies may be afraid of you. As for me, I am engroſſed by other affairs."

In the ſpring of the year 1257, the king, among other great concerns, had theſe two moſt important ones—the making a firm peace with France, and ſending a ſolemn embaſſy to the court of Rome on the ſubject of his debt to the holy ſee, and the affair of Sicily. The earl of Leiceſter was choſen to manage both theſe matters[5].

On the 22d of June, the king, under his letters patent[6], by the will and conſent of his eldeſt ſon and heir, gave full and free power to Walter biſhop of Worceſter, Hugh le Bigod, and friar Adam de Mariſco, to negotiate and confirm a peace between the king of France and his heirs and the king of England and his heirs, with the aſſent and advice of the king's beloved and liege Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter[7], and Peter of Savoy, concerning all controverſies moved on either ſide between the kings and their progenitors. And the king promiſes to ratify what the biſhop and the two others ſhall in his name ſo agree to with the advice of the earl of Leiceſter and Peter of Savoy. Four days after the date of the former commiſſion, the earl was appointed, by the letters of Edmund king of Sicily, together with the archbiſhop of Tarentum, Peter of Savoy, and John Manſel, to be Edmund's proctor and ſpecial nuncio at the court of Rome, to petition his holineſs to ſoften and reform the conditions upon which the pope had by the tenor of the privilegium made to Edmund the grant of Sicily, and to obtain new and better conditions, and to bind Edmund to the obſervance of the ſame in what manner the earl and his colleagues might think fit. By another inſtrument, dated two days afterwards, they were expreſsly empowered to make an abſolute ſurrender of the pope's grant of Sicily. But this was not to be done, unleſs they ſhould find the pope reſolved not to mitigate the conditions of the grant. The earl of Leiceſter was recommended to this appointment by Ruſtand, who was to return himſelf this ſummer to the court of Rome, and intended, we may preſume, to accompany the ambaſſadors. And it was the king's earneſt deſire, that the earl and Peter of Savoy would not decline the employment. If they went themſelves, the whole treaty with the pope was left to their diſcretion and final deciſion. But, if they could not be prevailed with to go, the king intended to appoint others, who ſhould act under explicit inſtructions. The earl of Leiceſter muſt have gone into France before the iſſuing of theſe inſtruments; for, they were ordered to be ſent to him there with a large number of blank parchments having the king's ſeal to them, in which the earl was to inſert in the king's name ſuch writing as he ſhould think fit, after he had adjuſted matters with the holy ſee. But the earl declined the commiſſion; and therefore the blank inſtruments, together with the privilegium of Alexander IV, which had been ſent to France with the former, were returned to the king in London, and the archbiſhop of Tarentum, and the biſhops of Bath and Rocheſter, and maſter Nicholas de Plumpton, were appointed the king's nuncios and proctors at the court of Rome, in the room of the former, and to act under the ſpecific and limited powers given them by the king. Their inſtructions conſiſted of the various ways in which they treat with the pope about Sicily. They were to try to procure that the penalty contained in the privilegium of pope Alexander (namely, that, if the king did not pay the money, or come, or ſend, it ſhould be in the pope's ſingle power to caſſate and annul what had been done jointly by him and his brethren; and that, nevertheleſs, the king ſhould be excommunicated, and the realm of England be interdicted) ſhould be taken away altogether. And if, after removing theſe penalties, the pope would preſerve the grant made by pope Innocent IV, or make a new one upon conditions that were tolerable, or at leaſt conſent that the penalty of annullation be removed, and that of the interdict remain, the king would be content; but, if the pope would neither preſerve the old grant, nor make a new one, but under the ſame penalties, the king then deſired, that the term might be lengthened to prevent the breaking up of the affair; that in the mean while, with leave of the church, a treaty of peace might be between the king and Manfroi, viz. that the principality of Tarentum, and all the other lands which Manfroi had before he was deprived of them, might remain to him, and the realm be reſtored to ſir Edmund; and for doing which, that ſir Edmund take the daughter of Manfroi to wife, or that the marriage take place, and Manfroi hold the realm, until out of the provents of the ſame be paid the debts of the church, in which the king of England was bound; which being diſcharged, Manfroi to deliver up to Edmund all the realm, excepting the lands he had ſcinderetur, & unus oculorum ei erueretur. Quod contra omnem juſtitiam fuerat perpetratum. Quod videntes multi, & ad memoriam plures reducentes, qualiter adhuc junior cuidam nobili tactum fecit enorme & cruentum, cœperunt deſperare de eo, dicentes—"Et hæc facit in viridi, in arido quid ſperandum? Familia inſuper, ut prætactum, omnia venalia ſine pretii retributione rapientes equos bigas & veredarios violenter homines immiſericorditer vexaverunt; & diatim malis mala, & damna damnis cumularunt cum augmento." M. Paris, 1256.

---

[1] M. Paris.

[2] Rymer.

[3] M. Paris.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Rymer.

[6] If conjectures were allowable in detailing matter of fact, one might ſuppoſe, that the king, who was now courting popularity, was inclined to ſhew due regard to the talents of the earl of Leiceſter. It will appear in the ſequel, that the king's uterine brothers had engroſſed his regard; and from divers intimations and occurrences it may be gathered, that the earl of Leiceſter had no fellowſhip with the favourites.

[7] Rymer.

before his privation of them; and immediately, by hoſtages and the delivery of his fortreſſes, give ſecurity for ſuch reſtitution of the realm. But, if no compoſition could be made with Manfroi, and the pope would not do what was propoſed, then they were to ſettle with the church by one of theſe three ways: if the church would beſtow the realm upon ſome perſon who would diſcharge the debt, then the king of England ſhould be reimburſed, as to all the money he had advanced, and renounce all right, which he or his ſon Edmund had to the realm: or, if the realm ſhould not be given to another, or ſhould be given to one who did not pay the debts, the church ſhould have the terra di Lavoro, and the king the reſidue; ſo that the church ſhould free the king from the debts, not uſurious, which were due to the chamber, and the king pay the debts due to the merchants; but that he ſhould have a truce for this till he obtained the poſſeſſion of the realm of Sicily; that, out of the money to be collected in England, he might make war againſt Manfroi; but not be bound to pay thoſe debts under the penalties by which he was bound at preſent: or, if the church would not conſent to this, the king propoſed this compoſition, viz. that the king and his heirs ſhould be entirely acquitted and diſcharged both of his engagements and the penalties altogether, and the graces granted for the proſecution of his vow beyond the ſea might remain in full force, whether he actually went beyond ſea or not. But, before the laſt way were taken, the king wiſhed the pope and cardinals to conſider, that he had engaged in this buſineſs out of devotion to them, that he had been ſincere and zealous in it from the beginning; but that the impediments he had met with, firſt by the war in Gaſcogne, and then by the late ſudden and unexpected eruption of the Welſh, who had been uſed to be quiet and well affected, had defeated his intentions, and that he had lately made many regulations for furniſhing the neceſſary money for the undertaking, and ſubmitted to make a diſadvantageous adjuſtment of all his diſputes with France as the pope deſired, for the ſame end. And with theſe overtures he left the determination of the matter to the mercy, juſtice, and friendſhip, of the holy father and college.

Notwithſtanding the vaſt ſum taken by the earl of Cornwall out of England[1] when he went into Almaine, before the end of the year the want of caſh obliged him to ſend orders to have his woods cut down and ſold to raiſe another ſupply. The king had now hardly any other hope of fixing his ſon Edmund on the throne of Sicily, than what depended upon Richard's previous eſtabliſhment on that of the Romans; and Richard's ſcheme was full as deſperate, and equally chimerical, as the other.

The Welſh had by the middle of this ſummer rendered themſelves more troubleſome than before. The old antipathy between the North and South Welſh was ſacrificed to the general deſire of revenging themſelves upon the tyrants of England who had ſettled in the marches, and wanted to reduce the whole country to an abject ſubmiſſion to their lawleſs will. But the ſucceſs they had lately met with inſpired them with unwonted courage to make further eſſays of their military proweſs; and theſe being equally fortunate, king Henry, on the 18th of July[2], iſſued his ſummonſes to all his prelates and great men who owed him military ſervice, and commanded them, by the debt of fealty and homage they owed him, and as they valued the lands and tenements they held of him, to attend him, with horſe and arms, and their full ſervice, by the 1ſt of Auguſt in his expedition againſt the Welſh. It was judged expedient to invade North and South Wales by diſtinct armies; the forces, therefore, were to rendezvous partly at Briſtol, and partly at Cheſter. The king himſelf went to Cheſter, and hoiſted his ſtandard of the royal dragon, to denote that he intended to deal very furiouſly by his enemies. Thence he went on to Gannoc, where he tarried as long as he remained in that country[3], much to his own loſs (for, by the corruption of meat and drink, he loſt many of his men), and very little annoyance to the Welſh, who, according to cuſtom, ſheltered themſelves, while the danger laſted, in their mountains, woods, and marſhes, and then renewed their attacks. The king had committed great part of his army to the command of Richard earl of Glouceſter to march into South Wales; but the earl left the country all on a ſudden, retired precipitately from the army with one eſquire, and repaired to the caſtle at Tutbury that he might ſpeak to the queen, who abode there, not being able to ſtay at Nottingham, where the king had ſent her, on account of the ſmoke of the ſea-coal in that town; and thus both the king and the earl returned ingloriouſly about the feaſt of Michaelmas to London, where the king wiſhed to be, to celebrate, on the quindenes of St. Michael, the feſtival of St. Edward. Upon account of this expedition into Wales, ſcutage was collected throughout England[4].

This year was marked by ſome other very inauſpicious incidents which ſwelled the catalogue of Engliſh calamities, and could not but increaſe the diſcontents of the people againſt their king. From the beginning of February to that of May, there had been ſuch inceſſant rains, that the whole country had almoſt the appearance of one great lake; what had been ſown in the winter was in a great meaſure deſtroyed by this deluge, and many people attempted to repair the deſtruction by ſowing their land a ſecond time. This misfortune was followed by another; for, in the ſummer, a peſtilential fever ſwept off the people with ſuch cruel havock, that in Edmundſbury only above one thouſand people were hurried to the grave[5]. Nor was this all: the kingdom had been ſo drained of its wealth by the papal agents, and the earl of Cornwall's expedition, that there had not been left in the kingdom money enough to carry on buſineſs, or even to get the lands properly ſowed; whereby a great part of the country was left uncultivated, and the people were deſtitute of ſuſtenance. The famine followed upon the heels of the epidemic fever, and proved more fatal. The towns were thinned by its ravages, and the roads ſtrewed every where with the horrid ſpectacles of thoſe who were dying or dead of hunger. The king was obliged to iſſue his writ to each county, requiring it to bury the dead to prevent contagion. An author of that time reports, that he ſaw people fighting for the carcaſes of dead dogs and other carrion, and glad to devour the waſh that was ſet for the ſwine. Diſcord and robbery added their baleful influence in perfecting the wretchedneſs of the people. The ſtrong plundered the weak; hardly was any man able to protect his property, or travel the road ſafely, but by being well armed.

THE YEAR 1258 preſents to us one of the moſt remarkable epochs of the Engliſh hiſtory. The executive department had dared to violate the conſtitution by arbitrary and illegal exactions of money from the free orders of the community, by perſevering in and multiplying this ſpecies of tyranny without end, and in making itſelf the ſole judge of political meaſures and projects, in diſregard of the council of the baronage, that is, the great landed intereſt of the realm. That age was not advanced to ſuch an affectation of political ſcience, as to oppoſe the crown on the ground of rights of man. They ſaid only, let the nation be preſerved in glory and proſperity, and let the king govern the realm according to the cuſtoms and ſtatutes of England. Henry of Wincheſter is called a weak prince; certainly he was far from ſplendid in natural capacity. But his greateſt weakneſs conſiſted in loſing the affections of his people, and not availing himſelf of the ſecurity which he might have derived from the nature of the Engliſh government; namely, by adhering ſcrupulouſly to the laws which at his election he had ſworn to obſerve, and in all arduous affairs acting as the conſtitution directed, by the advice and control of his grandees aſſembled in parliament[1].

---

[1] Chron. Dunſtab.

[2] Rymer.

[3] M. Paris. M. Weſtm.

[4] M. Weſtm. Chron de Dunſtable.

[5] M. Paris. Tyrrel. Sir Robert Cotton's Remains.

To the glory of William the Firſt, that legitimate monarch had, by advice of the grandees of the realm, iſſued commiſſions through the ſeveral counties of England, ordering ſtrict inquiſitions to be made by the community of each county aſſembled in county court, to collect and inrol the antient uſages of their reſpective counties; which inrolments were preſented to the king, who, by the aſſent of his grandees aſſembled in his parliament, therefrom made a digeſt of national or common law, ſtyled the laws of Edward the Confeſſor, that is, the Anglo-ſaxon cuſtoms and conſtitutions; which digeſt the Conqueror (a term of vulgar invention, in no reſpect applicable to this king, who, like the illuſtrious houſe of Brunſwick, acquired the crown by regular and lawful entail) ratified by his own, and general adjuration, and bound upon his own people under the ſevereſt penalties.

This conſtitution the Engliſh were zealous to uphold, and made it the baſis, when they elected their kings, of thier elevation. Feeble, however, were the huge, but ill-cemented, buttreſſes which the common univerſity of the realm had provided againſt the attacks of tyranny. Henry II, a prince always ready to invoke God or devil, as beſt ſuited his luſt of money or dominion, had, by the vaſt reach of his territories, and the joint influence of his ferocity and ſubtilty, contrived to render himſelf the completeſt deſpot of Europe. Richard Cœur de Lion had very little of the ſtateſman; to ſlay men, break their bones, ſlaſh their fleſh, knock out their teeth and eyes, if opportunity offered, in war, otherwiſe in a tilt, were the delight and paſtime of this prince of chivalry. But his diſpoſition was not leſs arbitrary than his father's; and to compaſs his ends, either of ambition, vain-glory, or revenge, he never cared about the means.

In John's time the crown of England loſt one of its faireſt jewels by the return of Normandy into the demeſne of the crown of France. This eſcheat was in the regular order of things; for, although the Engliſh pretended that Normandy, being once annexed to the crown of England, became a perpetual and inſeparable appendage thereof; yet this reaſoning was certainly falſe; for, Normandy was a fief of the French crown, liable by the whole tenor of the feudal law to revert to its chief lord for default of heir in the vaſſal, or rebellion againſt his ſovereign. The confiſcation of Normandy, and the conſecutive diminution of power, reduced the king of England to a condition leſs formidable to the people of that country. John reſided chiefly in England. Parliaments became more frequent and copious, rights were inveſtigated, and at length inſiſted on. John was deteſtable in his moral character. Deteſtation inflamed oppoſition. His neceſſities gave it freſh force; he cozened his ſubjects of their money under the colour of loans which he never paid. He ſtrove to make the lands and tenements of the libres hommes, or freemen, tributary to his will; he confiſcated their fiefs by the illegal ſentences of his juſticiars, without the judgement of their lawful judges, viz. their peers. His ſhire-reeves and other bailiffs were a worſe ſcourge to the nation than plague or famine. The barons of England began to pluck up their courage, and take ſide with the knights, whom John could treat, he thought, more freely; imitating the hawk among ſmall birds. John ſans terre was at length openly reſiſted, and ſoon compelled to recognize the rights of the grandees, and community of the people, by the conceſſion of the two charters. He ſwore ſolemnly to allow thoſe charters; and then fought with deſperate courage againſt his ſubjects to reign like a deſpot. From rex, he ſaid he ſhould be ſex, by the reſtraints of Magna Charta. He was, however, obliged to ſubmit to the law. This formal ſolemn recognition of rights was a bitter doſe to his ſucceſſor. Henry of Wincheſter could not obtain the crown, but by ſubmitting to this act of diſcipline. He firſt ſolemnly at his election, then a boy of nine years, took the oath to allow and maintain both the charters. When arrived at years for aſſuming into his own hand the helm of government, he publickly declared his intention no longer to regard them; alleging, that the oath he had taken did not bind, it having been impoſed on him in his childhood, when he knew not what he did. He was ſoon, however, forced to recant, and ſubmit again to the ſame humiliating ceremony. As ſoon as the turn was ſerved, he committed freſh perjury. Throughout his reign he always declared himſelf the vaſſal of the pope for his crown. His lord and his God (ſo he conſidered the pope in his double character of feudal and ſpiritual ſovereign) now threatened him with depoſition and damnation, unleſs he paid him without further demur the damages ſuſtained in the affair of Sicily. Henry, terrified out of his little ſenſe, threw himſelf upon the whole community[2] of England, craving their counſel, their protection, and, above all, their pecuniary aid, to help him out of his difficulty.

The criſis was ſingular; the conſequences very important with reſpect to the government of England.

In detailing this intereſting ſubject; from a fear of with-holding circumſtances which ought to be brought forward to enable the intelligent reader to judge accurately, I feel it a duty to be as copious as is conducive to that end: I ſhall, therefore, in cloſe tranſlations, give every thing I find in coeval chronicles and records on the ſubject. With the ſame view to preciſion and full information, I ſhall not make a ſalmagundi of the materials, but keep each extract, whether of chronicles or records, ſeparate and diſtinct. The perſons who are likely to peruſe a narrative of this ſort want only to be furniſhed with full and exact ſtatements. To ſuch my comments would be ſuperfluous. Like the officer of a library, I only mean to hand to my intelligent readers the things neceſſary for their information and guidance. I will not waſte their precious time with my fancies or opinions: they ſhall make their own reflections; founded not on the purport of antient authors and records, but the tenor of them. A great deal of ſuch reading as the preſent is diſpatched in a ſhort time. And if I inform, I ſhall not be blamed for being prolix.

"[3]So many aliens of divers tongues were now, and had been for many years, multiplied in England, enriched with ſo many rents, manors, towns, and other ſort of wealth, that they held the Engliſh in contempt, as much their inferiors. It was even reported, by ſome who knew their ſecrets, that if their power went on, they would extinguiſh all the majors[4] of England by poiſon; and king Henry himſelf being depoſed, they would appoint another in his room at their own will, and ſo at length ſubject England to their own perpetual rule. Four of the king's brothers alſo, viz. Almeric biſhop elect of Winton, William[5] earl of Valence, Guy, and Geoffrey, being elevated beyond meaſure above other aliens, lorded it over the Engliſh with intolerable inſolence; nor was there found any perſon to check their audacious exceſſes, for fear of the king. But not only they, but, which is more to be lamented, Engliſh roſe againſt Engliſh, to wit, the great againſt the ſmall, inflamed by a ſpirit of covetouſneſs; by pleas, amerciaments, talliages, exactions, and various other oppreſſions, endeavouring to ſtrip others of their own.

---

[1] "Verum in receptione literarum ipſarum magnates regni noſtri per quorum conſilium pro majore parte regitur regnum noſtrum ad diverſas & remotas partes regni noſtri erant diſperſi." Rymer, II. 158. Edward I. to the king of France, 18 E. I.

[2] Prelates, barons, and community of the people, aſſembled in general council, or, as we may ſay, in parliament.

[2] Ann. Waverl. anno 1258.

[4] Majors of the realm. The ſame order as are uſually denominated by grandees or magnates. "Licet plurimum reſiſterent & reclamarent regni noſtri majores et magis diſcreti. Ex epiſtola Hen. II. ad papam." Chron. de Dunſtaple, an. 1175.—"Rex Henricus anno regni ſui 40 curiam ſuam ſolemnem tenuit apud Weſtm. ad paſcha generaliter cum omnibus regni majoribus." M. Weſtm.

[5] Not earl of Valence; but William of Valence, earl. I think he was count palatine of Pembroke.

The laws and antient cuſtoms were either too much corrupted, or entirely caſſated; every one's tyrannical will was his only law, and no juſtice could be had but by the means of money. No one is able to enumerate all the evils, which at that time were done in England. At length, in this year, earls[1], barons, archbiſhops, biſhops, and the other grandees of England, as it were awaked by heaven from a dream, ſeeing the miſerable downfall of the realm with one voice confederated, and collected courage, after the manner of a lion, fearing no one's approach. They were determined to expel the king's brothers, and reform and renew the antient laws and cuſtoms of the realm."

"Thenceforth entered the court of the king, innumerable Frenchmen[2], juſt as the Provençals had done before; the affairs of the crown were tranſacted by aliens, and unknown perſons; and England was rendered by them as a country brought under tribute and ſervitude; for they carried off wards and reliefs, and other emoluments of the land: And the grandees of the land, ſeeing this, conceived indignation; and, talking together, they ſaid, "What ſhall we do to theſe aliens, who thus oppreſs us? If we ſend them away, they will carry all away with them, and we ſhall be left with nothing. Let us, therefore, burſt their bonds, and caſt away their yoke from us; for, if we be ſilent, England will periſh, and we ſhall be the reproach of mankind, and the contempt of the people. And as Simon Machabeus aroſe for his brother Judah, that, for the people of God, and the law of his fathers, he might contend unto death, ſo Simon de Montfort arouſed himſelf for England, that for the laws and liberties thereof he might ſtrive even to the calamity of death."

"Having, therefore, conſulted together, the earls and barons went to the king, and ſaid to him, "Sir king, your affairs are very ill-managed by the aliens, in whoſe hands they are. For now all you have being conſumed, you are oppreſſed with debts, and give exchequer tallies even for your neceſſary food, and are become a bye-word among the people. Now, therefore, acquieſce to our ſound advice, and commit your houſe to the diſpoſal of your lieges, and we will pay your debts within a year out of our own ſubſtance; ſo, neverthleſs, that we may levy our loan within five years. Nor will we diminiſh your family, but augment it with many knights, and to you and to your realm we will apply all diligence and faithful guardianſhip. The king ſubmitted to them, and they appointed day and place, to wit, at Oxon, the fifteens of Eaſter, where all[3] ſhould come, to treat for the king's good, and that of the realm. So Walter Hemingford.

"After the Tueſday vulgarly called Hokeday, a parliament[4] was made at London. For the king was under great anxiety upon many accounts; to wit, about the affair of the kingdom of Apulia, which had been the object of maſter Arlot's[5] miſſion, who was now come to demand a categorical anſwer upon that buſineſs. The nuncio demanded an infinite quantity of money, which the pope had borrowed of the merchants of Italy, and which the king had undertaken to pay upon pain of perſonal excommunication and national interdict. The ſum was ſo great, that at the bare mention of it the auditory were confounded, and ſtruck with horror. The nobility[6] of the realm were exceedingly diſtreſſed, to ſee themſelves ſo entirely ruined by the abject ſtupidity of one man. Another thing at this time gave the king much uneaſineſs, viz. the hoſtility and threats of the Welſh, who boaſted, that they had ſeveral times repulſed the king with his whole army, and heavy loſs to the Engliſh, and had gotten the better of all the nobility of England in martial conflict. And, to give the finiſhing ſtroke to the king's indignation and chagrin, report was brought him, that, at the expiration of the truce, about the 19th of April in this year, they had ſpread ſlaughter, fire, and rapine, in the parts of Pembroke[7], and moſt inſolently treated ſuch as they had made priſoners; whereupon William of Valence complained vehemently to the king; to whom the latter made anſwer, "My dear brother, why do you not furniſh me out of your immenſe treaſures with the money that is wanting to enable me to chaſtiſe my enemies?" But William, with a volley of threats and reproaches, declared, that the preſent calamities all aroſe from the countenance ſecretly given to the Welſh by Engliſh traytors; and ſhortly afterwards ſpoke out, and ſpecified his charge to the diſgrace of certain nobles, upon which the earls of Glouceſter[8] and Leiceſter, being groſsly reflected upon, became highly enraged. But William of Valence, multiplying his abuſe and imputations againſt the earl of Leiceſter, dared, before the king and many of the grandees, to proteſt, that the earl of Leiceſter was an old traytor[9], and that he lied. The earl of Leiceſter, inflamed with rage, and full of ſtomach, retorted, "No, no, William; I am not the ſon of a traytor; nor am myſelf a traytor. Our fathers were men of very different characters." And the earl was proceeding to take inſtant vengeance for the provocation of William of Valence, and was actually falling upon him with that intention; and would have avenged himſelf, but for the king's throwing himſelf between them, and preventing his purpoſe[10]. For ſome days the king and his grandees were cloſely employed in taking meaſures for repreſſing

---

[1] Wykes ſays, that the grandees of England ſeeing Richard earl of Cornwall, "qui dum eſſet in Anglia regem & regni moderamina gubernaveret, ad cujus nutum univerſa regni negotia dependebant, credentes ipſum in Angliam non reverſurum, decernentes regem Angliæ regni ſui negotiis diſponendis inutilem & inſufficientem circa feſtum S. Barnabæ congregati ſunt, Oxon. &c.—de majoribus potentioribuſque regni eligerentur XXIV. &c."

[2] Hemingford, an. 1258.

[3] To wit, the whole univerſity, community, or, if you pleaſe, the commons of the realm in a general parliament.

[4] M. Paris, an. 1258.

As this aſſembly is called parliament, and yet had not in it the communitas populi; it is plain, that the word Parliament applied to a ſolemn conference of the king with his grandees, whether the communitas populi were preſent or no. The preſence of the latter only made the colloquium or parliament more auguſt and general.

[5] "In the year of grace 1258, a maſter Arlot by name, ſent by pope Alexander, came into England after Eaſter, invited by the king, as was thought, to ſkin it." M. Weſtm.

[6] That is, I conceive, the optimates, majores, primates, compoſing this council of grandees, whoſe advice the kings of England were by the conſtitution obliged to take in all matters of ſtate. The king himſelf, as well as the chief nobles of the realm, are by the hiſtorians of that age ſtyled nobiles viri. But the word nobiles was not applied excluſively to men of the firſt rank; it extended to the gentry or nobleſſe, called media nobilitas, alſo to eccleſiaſtical dignitaries. Convenerunt Londini omnes nobiles Angliæ tam viri eccleſiaſtici, quam ſeculares. Vir meant perſonage. Inſtances are numerous of citizens and burgeſſes being called nobiles of their reſpective towns. The ſame, however, contraſted to magnates regni, are debaſed by the appellations of ſervi and plebei.

[7] He was lord of the honour of Pembroke.

[8] The earl of Glouceſter, who had then a very fine fief, or terra, in Glouceſterſhire, and the borders of Wales, ſhewed at this time no ſort of reſentment at the depredations of the Welſh. So one of the chronicles, I forget which. The earl of Leiceſter had alſo a terra in thoſe parts.

[9] "Fidelitatis vinculum, quo vaſallus tenetur domino eſt adeo celebre apud omnes, ut etiam religione juramenti, qua vallari aſſolet, circumſcripta, ipſum per ſe vinculum, quaſi pro ſacro ubique terrarum & gentium habeatur, nec æſtimetur levem notam incurrere, quicunque illius extiterit violator. Unde qui veteres revolvere vult hiſtorias, inveniet multos pro illo ſervando inhumanis cibis urgente obſidionis anguſtia eſſe uſos, & illis quoque deficientibus elegiſſe potius fama deficere, quam ipſum fidelitatis vinculum violare." So pope Honorius III. argues with the Albigenſian nobles, who had revolted from their liege lord the king of England, and gone over to the king of France. Vide Rainaldi Pontif. Hiſtor. ad ann. 1226, ſect. 44.

[10] This affair ſeems to have made a great impreſſion on M. Paris; for we find it in the tranſactions of the year 1257, but with leſs diſcrimination of time and place. His former recital, however, has ſome circumſtances omitted in the latter.

"Diebus

ſing and chaſtiſing the Welſh. The whole milice of England was therefore ſummoned, that all who held of the lord king by military ſervice ſhould be ready to follow the king in his expedition to Wales, and attend him with horſe and arms at Cheſter on the Monday ſucceeding the Nativity of St. John Baptiſt. This mandate excited freſh murmur and complaint among the people, on the ground that the king ſo frequently impoveriſhed and fatigued his nobles without honour or advantage to himſelf, ſo often demanded eſcuage, and now demanded their devoir on the approach of harveſt, which required their whole attention, the nation being at this time in ſuch a dreadful ſtate of famine as had never been felt before. And ſo inconſiderate was king Henry, that, notwithſtanding the heavy preſſure of his debts, and the urgent call he had for money towards the war which he was about to wage againſt the Welſh, yet he beſtowed a thouſand marks upon Thomas of Savoy, the queen's uncle, and formerly count of Flanders, who was juſt come to England; and to a certain Poitevin[1], who uſed to carve for the king's table, he gave two hundred pounds. Thomas had no ſooner filled his budget with this caſh, and other that the queen laviſhed upon him, than he made off for Turin. William de Sancto Hermete ſtayed in England in hopes of more booty[2]."

"A little time before, Edward the king's eldeſt ſon made over the rich manor and fine eſtates that his royal father had lately ſurrended to him for his honourable maintenance to William de Valence his his uncle, whoſe wealth was prodigious[3]."

"About the ſame time a certain friar of the order of Minors, named Manſuetus, was ſent by the pope at the king's procuring, following the footſteps of maſter Arlot, and fortified with great powers, to ſuch an extent, according to report, that by exchange of vows he could abſolve all the royaliſts at his pleaſure, or even juſtify the excommunicated, and liars, and perjured people: whereupon many guilty perſons had the boldneſs to commit crimes; for facility of pardon generates an occaſion of ſinning, but wiſe and good people are ſhocked at ſuch abuſes[4]."

"At the ſame time[5], the grandees of the realm collectively, with ſpirit and firmneſs, anſwered the king, who in the ſaid parliament had importunately demanded an infinite ſum of money to be given him for expediting the buſineſs of Apulia, and many other arduous affairs, "that they could not by any means, without their irrecoverable ruin, laviſh their little fortunes now reduced almoſt to nothing in fruitleſs projects; and if the king had unadviſedly and indecently procured from the pope the realm of Apulia for the advantage of his ſon Edmund, he muſt impute it to his own raſhneſs and want of ſenſe, and look upon himſelf as a deſpiſer of deliberation and prudence, which was wont to forecaſt the iſſues of things; and therefore muſt abide the conſequences, and go on with it as he could; and in truth he ought to have been taught, as by example, from the wiſdom of his brother Richard king of Almaine, who rejected the proffered realm of Apulia tendered him by the pope through maſter Arlot, now preſent; eſpecially when ſo many unknown realms of various languages, ſo many ſtates, ſo many cities, made ſtrong by warriors and arms, ſea and mountains, and laborious diſtance of places, divided England from Apulia; and, what ſhould give greater and more juſt alarm, the cavillations of the Roman court, and the multiform villanies of the Apulians, who were wont to diſpatch their kinſmen and relations by poiſonous potions: but, that they might not ſeem to the lord pope, who on account of his office was exalted above all princes and prelates, and had in a friendly manner made choice of earl Edmund in preference to be king of Apulia, to be deficient in reſpect to him, they would write to his holineſs, ſignifying, that they would be willing to comply with his advice, if he would qualify the terms of the grant of Sicily by ſuch conditions as they ſhould deem reaſonable."

"[6] The altercation between the king and the grandees of the realm protracted this parliament to the Sunday next after the Aſcenſion; and every day produced freſh and heavier charges againſt the king, who was reproached for the breach of promiſes, contempt of the keys of the church, and of the tenor of the Great Charter, ſo often redeemed; alſo for exalting his uterine brothers to an intolerable degree againſt the right of the realm and the law, as if they were the naturals of this land, and for not ſuffering any writ of chancery to iſſue againſt them[7]. And, if the inſolence and preſumption of all thoſe brothers of the king were inſufferable, yet William of Valence ſurpaſſed them all in audacity. Whereupon the earl of Leiceſter made his earneſt ſuit, not to the king, but to the earls and barons collectively, demanding vehemently that juſtice ſhould be done him. Moreover, the king was reprehended for promoting aliens, and enriching them, and for deſpiſing and plundering his own people to the ſubverſion of the whole realm. And, nevertheleſs, he himſelf was ſo poor, while the others abounded, that, for want of treaſure, he could not recover the rights of the realm; nay, not propel the injuries done by the Welſh, thoſe ſhrimps of men. And, to be ſhort, it was agreed, that the exceſſes of the king demanded ſpecial meaſures. But the king returning to himſelf, as ſoon as he felt the truth of theſe remonſtrances, although he was tardy in doing it, yet at length humbled himſelf; affirming, that he had been too often faſcinated by bad counſel; and promiſed, under the obteſtation of a great oath upon the altar and ſhrine of St. Edward, that, correcting his former errors explicitly and fully, he would benignly yield to his natural people[8]. But his frequent tranſgreſſions in time paſt rendered him wholly unworthy of credit. And becauſe the grandees knew not yet[9] how they ſhould bind their Proteus, for the buſineſs was very arduous and difficult, the parliament was adjourned to the feaſt of St. Barnabas, then to be diligently celebrated at Oxford. In the mean while, the grandees of England, to wit, of Glouceſter, Leiceſter, and Hereford, the earl Mareſchal, and other diſtinguiſhed perſonages, being wary and provident for their ſafety, entered into a cloſe league; for, they feared very much the traps

---

"Diebus autem ſub eiſdem apud Londinum coram rege & multis magnatibus orta eſt diſcordia inter comitem Legiſceſtriæ Simonem & Willielmum de Valentia. Ipſe enim Willielmus, qui frater domini regis extitit uterinus in omnes vicinos ſuos irreverentur, maxime in religioſos damnoſe deſæviens cornua tyrannidis a domini regis ſumens fraternitate, ſicut fratris ſui, poſſeſſiones dicti comitis indecenter invaſerat, & prædas abegerat. Quas cum ſeneſchallus comitis deliberaſſet, orta iracundia, motus Willielmus injurias tam factis quam dictis in comitem cumulaverat. Quæ cum querelis coram rege recitarentur, jurgia exorta fere prælia ſuſcitarunt. Willielmus enim coram rege & magnatibus palam ut vulgariter loquar, dementiens, & notam ei irreverenter proditoris imponens (quod eſt militibus magnum offendiculum) commotus eſt comes vehementer, & volens, ut dicitur irruere in ipſum: (quia ira brevis furor eſt) vix eſt, rege compeſcente (qui ſe inter comitem ſororium ſuum & Willielmum fratrem ſuum attonitus ingeſſit) ne ipſum interemiſſet, feliciter retardatus. Nec poſtea inter eos potuit fex ſuſcepta inimicitiæ exinaniri." M. Paris, an. 1257.

[1] In that term an Engliſhman conceived every thing contained that was deteſtable. The ſame prejudice prevailed in the reign of Richard Cœur de Lion; who, therefore, bequeathed to the Poitevins ſtercus ſuum.

[2] M Paris.
[3] Ib.
[4] Ib.
[5] Ib.
[6] Ib.

[7] "Tempore quoque ſub eodem juſſit diſtincte rex, ne exire permitteretur a cancellaria regio ſigillo conſignatum fratri ſuo Richardo, comiti Glovcerniæ Richardo, Petro de Sabaudia vel alicui fratrum ſuorum nocivum vel damnoſum, pro quacunque cauſa aliquod breve; quod manifeſte patet eſſe omni juri & paci regni contradictorum." M. Paris, 1256.

[8] "Tandem domino rege ad ſuorum procerum obſervantiam ſtatutorum inclinato per quendam de ſuis militibus tactis ſacroſanctis evangeliis juramentum præſtante XXIV prudentium virorum nationis Anglicanæ quos ad regni gubernationem ſub eodem duxerint inter ſe eligendos conſilio ſe commendavit, & conſiderationi." M. Weſtm.

[9] This may prepare us a little for what is to come.

and ſnares of the aliens, and were aware of the ſecret machinations of the king; they came, therefore, well guarded with horſemen, and an eſcort of armed men, and a numerous ſuite."

"Before the parliament at Oxford, a ſolemn embaſſy, conſiſting of ſome ſelect earls and barons[1], was ſent to the king of France, that, receiving conſolation from him, they might at all events not be obſtructed by him in their purpoſe; for, they were extremely anxious to ordain and pacify the diſturbed realm of England, for the benefit both of England and all the neighbouring countries; for, the general happineſs had been overturned for a long time by the ſupine ſtupidity of the king."

About this time the earl of Leiceſter obtained letters patent under the great ſeal to ſtand to the judgement of twenty-four barons, who were to meet within a month after Whitſuntide for an aſſignation of certain lands to him, in ſatisfaction of his debt then due from the king, and for his annual fee[2].

The parliament continued to the 5th of May[3]. On the ſecond of that month the king iſſued the two following letters patent; whence we may learn the compromiſe he made with his great men:

"The king to all, &c.[4]

"Whereas, for our great affairs touching us and our realm, the noble men[5] and lieges of our realm we cauſed to be aſſembled before us at London, on the quindene of the Paſſover laſt paſt: and whereas we diligently conferred with them concerning our affairs aforeſaid, and moſt of all concerning the proſecution of the buſineſs of Sicily; and they made anſwer to us, that, if we thought good that the ſtate of our realm ſhould be rectified by the counſel of our lieges, and the lord pope would meliorate the conditions annexed to the grant of Sicily, whereby we might be able to proſecute that buſineſs with effect, they would faithfully uſe their beſt endeavours[6] with the community[7] of our realm, that a general aid be afforded to us for that purpoſe: we have granted to them, that, within the feaſt of our Lord's Nativity next coming, we will order our realm by the counſel of our good and liege men of our realm of England, together with the counſel of the legate of the lord pope (if he ſhould come to England in the mean time); and will firmly obſerve that ordination. And, for obſerving this faithfully, we ſubmit ourſelves to the coercion of the lord pope, that he may be empowered to compel us thereto by cenſure eccleſiaſtical as to him ſhall ſeem good: we proteſt alſo, that our eldeſt ſon Edward, his corporal oath being thereto given, by his letters has granted, that all the things abovementioned, as much as in him lies, he will faithfully and inviolably obſerve, and for ever procure to be obſerved. In teſtimony whereof, &c. theſe witneſſes being preſent:

Edward our eldeſt ſon,
Geoffry de Leſignan, } our brothers,
William de Valence, }
Peter of Savoy,
John de Pleſſy, earl of Warwick,
John Manſel, treaſurer of York,
Henry de Wingham, dean of St. Martin, London,
Peter de Rival,
Guy de Rochfort,
Robert Walerand,

and many other earls and barons of our realm. Dated at Weſtminſter, the ſecond day of May."

"The king to all, &c.

"Know that we have granted to the barons and great men of our realm, our oath being therefore taken by Robert Walerand for us, that by twelve lieges of our council already elected, and by other twelve of our lieges elected on the part of the barons (who ſhall meet at Oxford within one month after Whitſuntide next), ſhall be ordered, rectified, and reformed the ſtate of our realm, as to them ſhall ſeem good, for the honour of God, fealty towards us, and the profit of our realm. And, if by chance any of thoſe elected on our part ſhall be abſent, be it lawful for thoſe who ſhall be preſent to ſubſtitute others in the room of ſuch abſentees; and let the like be done on the part of our barons and liege men; and whatever by the twenty-four elected on both ſides, and hereunto ſworn, or the greater part thereof, ſhall be ordained in this behalf, we will inviolably obſerve; being willing, and firmly from henceforth commanding, that by all perſons their ordination ſhall be inviolably obſerved; and all kind of ſecurity which they, or the greater part of them, ſhall make and provide for the obſervance of this thing, we will, without any contradiction, fully make and cauſe to be made. We proteſt alſo, that our ſon Edward, [&c. as above.]

"Alſo, the aforeſaid counts and barons have promiſed, that the matters abovementioned being accompliſhed, they will ſincerely and truly uſe their beſt endeavours, to procure for us a general aid from the community of our realm. In teſtimony whereof," &c. The witneſſes as above. Dated as above.

From the printed records of Rymer, we find a commiſſion, bearing date the 8th of May, given to the earl of Leiceſter, Peter of Savoy, Geoffry and

---

[1] M. Paris.

[2] The word fee is vernacularly uſed for a ſtated reward for ſome ſort of ſervice or trouble. Feudum, or fief, had always ſomething of ſimilar meaning. It was ſtyled the gift of the former lord or owner, and created obligation; on which were founded homage or fealty, or both. By the earl's annual fee may be meant the third penny out of the iſſues of his county, which probably the king's exchequer had not paid him, or it might be an annual penſion in arrear.

[3] M. Paris.

[4] Rymer.

[5] Proceres & fideles are the words in the original. The ſame perſons are afterwards ſtyled barones and magnates; and again, barones only. Again, in another record on the ſubject of Sicily, the king tells the cardinal, to whom his letter was addreſſed, "Cum proceribus & majoribus totius regni noſtri tractatum habuimus diligentem;" again he calls them, "Proceres & majores concilii noſtri." Brady's Hiſt. vol. I. Append. 211, &c.

[6] Hence it is plain, that the grandees of this parliament were not competent to grant the aid which the king deſired.

[7] The king was now courting popularity in order to obtain an aid or ſubſidy from the ſeveral local communities of England; therefore we may be ſure that every ſtep he took at this time, by the advice and conſent of the grandees of this parliament, was ſtrictly conformable with Magna Charta, which he had but three years ago moſt ſolemnly pledged himſelf to the grandees and community of the people, as the record ſtates, (Brady's Hiſt. vol. I. p. 208.) moſt ſtrictly to obſerve. The community, therefore, which the grandees here allude to, muſt be all thoſe perſons who were concerned in giving of aids. And theſe are ſpecified in the Great Charter, confirmed by king Henry III. in 1224. "Pro hac autem conceſſione & donatione libertatum iſtarum, & aliarum contentarum in carta noſtra de foreſta archiepiſcopi, epiſcopi, abbates, priores, comites, barones, milites, libere tenentes, & omnes de regno noſtro dederunt nobis quintam decimam partem omnium bonorum ſuorum mobilium. Hemingford." Inſtead of Omnes de regno, in divers commiſſions for aſſeſſing of aids (wherein are ſpecified the claſſes of perſons who granted ſuch aids), after liberè tenentes is the word villani. Omnes de regno, therefore, are villani, i. e. townſmen, viz. citizens, burgeſſes, and the free men of chartered towns. Hemingford, p. 565. The above orders together conſtituted tout la commune de la terre, or the whole community of the land, as other records and chronicles deſcribe the whole body of the freemen of England, from the primate of all England, to a frank man of a frank town. Whence it is plain that the king alone, or the king jointly with the grandees of the realm, could not levy any national tax or contribution whatever upon any order of freemen, or the community at large, by his ſingle or their joint authority. Let it be remembered, however, that the greater part of the diffuſive people had no ſhare in this exemption. They continued in a ſtate of villanage to their ſeveral lords and were expoſed beſides to numerous hardſhips of a public kind, expreſſed by the word Angaria, for which conſult the gloſſaries. The right of the chief lord, whether the king, or any other lord, to levy talliage occaſionally on his tenants of certain orders, is diſcuſſed in other notes.

Guy de Luſignan, and Hugh Bigot, inveſting them with full power to prorogue and confirm the truce with France, from the firſt day of October 1258, to one, two, or three years.

"The latter end of May the king fell ill of a tertian fever, which afflicted him a long while, and of which the cauſe was trouble of mind [1]; the murders and ravages committed by the Welſh upon his feudatories near the borders, their late ſucceſſes againſt the Engliſh, and increaſing ſtrength and audacity, his apprehenſions of loſing Apulia, and all the money remitted thither, the late death of his infant daughter Catharine, and the queen's indiſpoſition, who was confined at Windſor by a pleuriſy, while the king was ſiezed with his diſorder at London, were too much for his ſpirits to ſuſtain."

"[2] The feaſt of St. Barnabas approaching, the grandees and nobles of the land haſtened to the parliament, which was to be held at Oxford, and they commanded all that owed them military ſervice, that they ſhould come prepared with them, as if about to defend their bodies againſt hoſtile attacks; which thing they did, palliating their coming in this manner with the pretence that they ſeemed about to march in force againſt the king's enemies the Welſh; for, they were in no ſmall apprehenſion leaſt the parties coming to no compromiſe ſhould commence a civil war; and leſt the king and his brethren of Poitou ſhould call over foreigners to their aid againſt the king's native Engliſh. The grandees, therefore, being full of diſtruſt, cauſed, for the ſake of caution, the ports of the ſea to be guarded. The parliament opening, the reſolution of the grandees was conſolidated, and their counſel fixed, by a ſtrong and firm demand that the lord king ſhould faithfully keep and maintain the charter of the liberties of England, which king John his father had made and granted, and which the ſame John ſwore to keep; and which the ſame king Henry had repeatedly granted, and ſworn to hold; who had alſo cauſed to be horribly excommunicated the violators thereof by all the biſhops of England, in the preſence of the king and the whole baronage; himſelf having been among thoſe who pronounced the excommunication. Moreover, they demanded that a juſticiar ſhould be made for them, who would do juſtice to the injured without partiality, whether rich or poor. Alſo, they made a demand of certain other things touching the realm for the common good of king and kingdom [3], and for peace and honeſty. To their counſels and neceſſary proviſions they plied the lord king reſolutely and reiterately to yield; ſwearing by their faith, and reciprocally exhibiting their right hands, that they would never leave purſuing their purpoſe for money, the loſs of their lands, or for the life or death of themſelves or their friends; all which the king being convinced of ſolemnly ſwore to comply with their counſels; and Edward his firſt-born ſon was bound by the ſame oath. But John earl of Warren recalcitrated, and the king's uterine brothers, to wit, ſir William of Valence, with the others. The ports of England are commanded to be more ſtrictly guarded, and the gates of London by night to be cloſely ſhut and bolted, the bars being made ſtronger than they were before; upon which one ſays,

> "Per noctem portæ clauduntur Londoniarum
> Mœnia, ne forte fraus frangat Francigenarum [4]."

And when they had ſpent many days in deliberation, concerning the meaſures they ſhould take in this moſt arduous buſineſs, to wit, how they ſhould patch up the torn realm of England, they held their meetings in the houſe of the Friers Minor, where, renewing and reviving their ſolemn confederation, and confirming the ſame with freſh oaths, they declared it to be their ultimate purpoſe, that they would not be brought for life or death, for tenements, for hate or love, to relax in the ſmalleſt degree; but they would purge the realm in which they and their progenitors were born with claims of high birth, from men of ignoble birth, and aliens of England; and would procure laudable laws: And if any of the men, whoſoever he were, lifted up his heel, he ſhould be forced, how much ſoever againſt his will, to adjoin himſelf to them. But although the lord king, and Edward his eldeſt ſon, had taken the ſame oath with them, nevertheleſs, Edward and John earl of Warrene began to gainſay as much as they could. And Henry, ſon of Richard king of Almaine, heſitating about the affair, ſaid, that he would by no means take ſuch oath without the licence and advice of his father. It was retorted inſtantly, that, if his father would not acquieſce to the baronage, he ſhould not obtain one furrow of land in England. Moreover, the aforeſaid brethren had ſworn poſitively upon the obteſtation of the death and wounds of Chriſt, that while they breathed the vital air, they would never reſign the caſtles, or rents, or wards, which the king their brother had gratuitouſly beſtowed upon them; although the earl of Leiceſter had conſented to ſurrender to the king his caſtles of Odiham and Kenilworth; both which had been then recently repaired at the earl's charge. But the others perſevering in their proteſtations, and backing them with reiterated oaths, the earl of Leiceſter made anſwer, addreſſing himſelf to William of Valence, who vapoured more than the reſt, "Know, for a certainty, and as a thing which admits of no doubt, that you ſhall either reſign the caſtles you hold of the king, or loſe your head." In which declaration the earls and barons heartily joined, and proteſted it ſhould be ſo. The Poitevins were therefore thrown into great conſternation, not knowing what to do; for, if they ſhould betake themſelves to any caſtle to lie concealed therein, being deſtitute of defence, and ſuſtaining a ſiege, they muſt die of hunger. For the popular univerſity [5], although the nobles forbore, would beſiege them, and deſtroy their caſtles to the very foundations. Whereupon, ſuddenly and clandeſtinely, while dinner was getting ready, they flee, and that they might not be thought to be diſpoſed to flee, they pretended to appear as if they were going to dinner. Making off as faſt as they could, they frequently looked behind them, and they made ſome of their retinue aſcend the higheſt towers to look whether the barons were purſuing them; nor did they ſtop from galloping till they reached Wincheſter, as if to take ſhelter under the wings of their brother the elect of Wincheſter, in whom they thought lay their ſole refuge. In the mean while, the nobles [6], more cloſely confederated, appointed for themſelves a high juſticiar, a native of England, and a gentleman of good birth, an illuſtrious knight, well verſed in the laws of England, viz. Hugh Bigot, brother of the earl mareſchal, who, in the ſtrenuous diſcharge of the high juſticeſhip, would never ſuffer the rights of the people of England to be ſhaken. And when the flight of the Poitevins became known to the grandees, they conceived an apprehenſion that by their getting near the ſea they meant to give the meeting to aliens, who had been invited to come over to their aid, namely, Poitevins and other foreigners. Seeing, therefore, the danger of delay, the grandees ſtraitly ordered all their military ſuite, and all their attendants, to fly inſtantly to horſes and arms. And thus ended the parliament at Oxford, without any regular diſſolution."

---

[1] M. Paris.

[2] Ib.

[3] See ſome, perhaps all, of them in Annals of Burton, edited by Gale, ſub anno 1250. The king was aſſailed about the ſame time by the Engliſh clergy, aſſembled in convocation for violation of eccleſiaſtical rights. See the articles of their complaints, alſo in the above Annaliſt.

[4] This looks as if the barons expected the king of France to invade England to avenge king Henry his brother-in-law.

[5] Viz. as I ſuppoſe, the whole body of the people of England.

[6] Magnates, or great men. M. Paris, cives magnates, in contraſt to plebei. Et quod magis tam plebeios, quam magnates perturbavit, anno 1258, p. 837. I ſuppoſe the plebei here meant are the ſame with the villani or ſervi, viz. citizens and burgeſſes, and free men of the communities of chartered towns. Other notes, in various parts of this memoir, will illuſtrate this expoſition.

"The ſame year [1], a little after Eaſter, one maſter Arlot came into England from the court of Rome with great power, aſking of the king infinite money, in which the king was bound to the lord pope, to wit, an hundred thouſand marks and more. And the lord king, after a conſultation with his grandees, anſwered, that he had not ſo much money, nor could he have it; and Arlot threatened, that he would excommunicate the king himſelf, and all his grandees. And he ſaid, that the lord king had bound the grandees and others of his whole land, for the ſaid money as well as himſelf; to which clergy and laity made anſwer, that they were free; for which reaſon the lord king could not bind them; and ſo, from the ſentence of the nuncio, they appealed to the lord pope, and ſent ſolemn nuncios to him."

"The ſame year [2], on the feaſt of St. Barnabas the Apoſtle, the lord king cauſed all the grandees of the realm [3] to be convened, to wit, clergy and laity. And, after a conſultation had with great deliberation, they enacted among them that the lord king ſhould have twelve of his council elected by the whole commune of England, and without them he ſhould do no great thing; which thing was done; and forthwith thoſe twelve, by conſent and free will of the lord king, choſe one principal juſticiar, who ſwore before them all that he would exhibit juſtice to all; and the lord king having touched the holy books, ſwore, that thenceforth he would obſerve the good and antient laws, and the Great Charter which he had conceded aforetime, and cauſe it to be obſerved; and all the grandees there preſent ſwore that they would obſerve, and cauſe the ſame things, which the lord king had promiſed to obſerve on his part towards them, to be obſerved with reſpect to their tenants [4]. This done, the brothers of the king were called, that they ſhould ſwear as the others did, which they abſolutely refuſed to do. The brothers of the king were Aymer, elect of Winton, William of Valence, Geoffry de Leſignan, and Guy de Leſignan. They and their bailiffs were ſo inſolent and oppreſſive, and ferocious to the Engliſh, that they waſted them and their chattels, and looked upon them as nothing at all. And, becauſe they refuſed to forbear from ſuch ferocity, they refuſed to ſwear. But the grandees had ſworn, that, if any one ſhould attempt to go againſt their ſacraments and ſtatutes, they would hold him for a capital enemy; which when it was made known to the brothers of the king, ſecretly, and by night, they ſtole away towards Winton; which being diſcovered, the grandees immediately purſued them with horſe and arms, and conducted them to the ſea, and made them ſwear that they would never hurt England by themſelves or others; but their lands and tenements were ſeized into the king's hands. The names of the grandees who did theſe things are theſe: Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, Richard earl of Glouceſter, Roger de Bigod, mareſchal of England, Humphry de Bohun, earl of Hereford, John de Pleſſey, earl of Warwick, Hugh Bigod, high juſticiar, James de Audley, William de Fortibus, earl of Albemarle, Hugh Deſpenſer, Richard de Grey, John Fitz Geoffry, and many others, whoſe names we know not. So writes the Annaliſt of Dunſtaple. Our next recital is from the Annaliſt of Burton.

"The lord king being at Wodeſtock, the grandees of the realm, major and minor, with horſes and arms, were convened at Oxford [5], together with the clergy, to make proviſion, and reformation, and ordination, of the realm: And under the oath of fidelity were exhibited the articles, which in the ſaid realm ſtood in need of correction [6]."

"The earls' and barons' [7] petition concerning ſucceſſions." [Here follows a long liſt of things which they wiſhed to have amended. Some of them concern various points of feudal law, which the Magna Charta had not ſufficiently provided for; ſome of them abuſes in the police of counties and hundreds; ſome for the immediate benefit of the earls and barons; ſome for the general orders of the community. In ſhort, the whole is ſuch a ſcheme of general melioration of the law and adminiſtration of the realm as, muſt be allowed to do honour to the perſons who took the lead in this arduous buſineſs.]

"In the ſame parliament at Oxford [8] twenty-four were elected, viz. twelve on the part of the lord king and as many on the part of the community[1], to whoſe ordinations and proviſions the lord king, and the lord Edward his ſon, as was ſaid before, ſubmitted themſelves, concerning their own eſtate, and the correction of the whole realm, and the melioration thereof. Many things were deviſed there and elſewhere, which are given below[2]."

---

[1] Annales de Dunſtaple, anno 1258.

[2] Ib.

[3] The commune, or, as we now ſay, the commons of England. The ſame aſſembly exiſted in the time of William I. Rex Willielmus convocat omnes proceres ad curiam ſuam. Order. In the Anglo-ſaxon age a peaſant, or villane, might riſe to the ſtate of a grandee, and have ſeat in the national aſſembly. If a peaſant acquired five hides of land in propriety, he became a thane, or noble; if he acquired forty hides of land, he became a parliamentary noble, or king's thane, or baron. Such barons were ſo ſolely by tenure. Villanes of this deſcription muſt be ſuppoſed to be men free by birth, but occupying lands by villane ſervices. The two claſſes are uſually confounded, but their condition was very different; the perſon of the pure villane was in bondage, he was the chattel of his lord, might be ſold, like a beaſt, and had nothing of his own, neither children, nor goods, nor land. The lord of the free villane had no claim over the latter, but what reſulted from contract. What we call the farming buſineſs was managed by villanes of either ſort. But the ſtock in the occupation of villanes ſeems moſtly to have been the property of the lord or proprietor.

[4] Their free men, that is, the knights and freeholders, who held lands and tenements of the grandees, and other tenants of the king in capite. This ſhews, that the baronage or community of the realm were the immediate tenants of the crown; holding their baronies of the king. It is prepoſterous to ſuppoſe this aſſembly could conſiſt of any other claſs of men.

[5] "Convocatis & convenientibus apud Oxoniam totius regni magnatibus cum equis & armis, majoribus & minoribus." Here we ſee the grandees of the realm conſtituting the univerſity or community of the baronage of England diſcriminated by majores & minores. The ſame diſtinction is found in ſome of the old ſtatutes about the time of Edward I. See particularly Statute of Marleburgh. That ſomewhat more was implied than proper earls and barons is plain, from equivalent expreſſions of recent introduction in the records of that time. Thus, in the ſolemn reſtitution and confirmation of Magna Charta in 1253 (37 Hen. III.), the legiſlative concurrents are called, Dominus rex, magnates & communitas populi; and the inſtrument alluded to cloſes thus, "In cujus rei memoriam, & in poſterum veritatis teſtimonium, tam dominus rex, quam predicti comites ad inſtantiam aliorum magnatum & populi preſenti ſcripto ſigilla ſua appoſuerunt. The term community, or commune, was now coming into familiar uſe. Thus, in a ſtatute of the parliament held in the month of January 1264, we find theſe expreſſions, "de unanimi aſſenſu noſtro & voluntate Edwardi filii noſtri primogeniti. prelatorum, comitum, baronum, & communitatis regni noſtri—concorditer fit proviſum, &c. Two or three lines after the ſame orders are implied with the omiſſion of communitatis—"De unanimi aſſenſu noſtro & voluntate Edwardi filii noſtri primogeniti prelatorum, comitum, baronum predictorum." Again, a few lines afterwards, we have community inſerted again. "Ad hoc de unanimi aſſenſu, & voluntate noſtra Edwardi filii noſtri, comitum baronum, ac communitatis regni noſtri concorditer proviſum eſt, &c." They then jointly enact the two antient charters of common liberties conceded long ago by the king to the community of his realm. See Ann. Waverl. an. 1264, apud Gale. This aſſembly, formed after the direction of the charter of king John, could conſiſt only of the magnates, or major barons, ſpecially ſummoned, and minor barons, or general body of the king's tenants in capite, generally ſummoned by the ſeveral ſhire-reeves of England, and here called minor grandees.

[6] Burton.

[7] That is, the earls, barons, and community of the realm, as the foregoing note and innumerable other paſſages demonſtrate. "The earls and barons, and all the grandees of England, aſſembled at Oxford to the parliament, where were formed the Oxford ſtatutes by the common council of the whole realm." MS. Chron. in Cott. Bibliot. Veſp. E. IV.

[8] Burton.

"A proviſion[3] made at Oxford.

"It is provided, that out of every county be choſen[4] four judicious and good knights[5], who, on every day when the county is held, are to meet to hear all plaints concerning all manner of treſpaſſes and injuries, brought on what perſons ſoever by ſhire-reeves, bailiffs, or any other whomſoever, and to make attachments which appertain to ſaid plaints, even to the firſt coming of the capital juſtice into thoſe parts, ſo that they take ſufficient pledges from the complainant for proſecuting, and likewiſe from him of whom complaint is made, for coming and obeying right before the aforeſaid juſtice in his firſt coming; and that the aforeſaid four knights cauſe to be inrolled all the aforeſaid plaints, with their attachments, regularly and in due order, to wit, of every hundred ſeparately, and by itſelf; ſo that the aforeſaid juſtice, on his firſt coming, may be able to oyer and terminate the aforeſaid plaints ſingly for each hundred. And let them cauſe to be made known to the ſhire-reeves, that they cauſe to come before the aforeſaid juſtice in his next advent at the days and places aforeſaid, which he cauſes them to know, all the hundredarians and their bailiffs; ſo that every hundredarian cauſe to come all plaintiffs and defendants of his bailiwic ſucceſſively, according to what the aforeſaid juſtice ſhall be induced to have pleaded concerning the aforeſaid hundred; and ſo many, and ſuch, as well knights as other good and frank men of his bailiwic, by whom the truth of the fact may be better evinced; ſo that all, together and at once, may not be harraſſed, but ſo many come as can be placitated and terminated in one day. Alſo, it is provided, that no knight of the aforeſaid counties, by pretext of any acquittance, that he be not put in jurates and aſſizes by charter of the lord king be allowed; and that he be not acquit as to that proviſion ſo made for the good of the realm[6]."

"The elected on the part of the lord king:
The lord biſhop of London,
The lord elect of Winton,
Sir Henry, ſon of the king of Almaine,
Sir John earl of Warenne,
Sir Guy de Leſignan,
Sir William de Valence,
Sir John earl of Warwick,
Sir John Manſel,
Friar John de Derlington,
The abbot of Weſtminſter,
Sir Hugh de Wengham,
[The twelfth is wanting.]

The elected on the part of the earls and barons:
The lord biſhop of Worceſter,
Sir Simon earl of Leiceſter,
Sir Richard earl of Glouceſter,
Sir Humphrey earl of Hereford,
Sir Roger Mareſchal,
Sir Roger de Mortimer,
Sir Geoffry Fitz-Geoffry,
Sir Hugh le Bigot,
Sir Richard de Grey,
Sir William Bardulf,
Sir Peter de Montfort,
Sir Hugh Diſpenſer[7]."

"And if it happen that any of theſe cannot, by neceſſity, be preſent, let the reſt of them elect whom they pleaſe, to wit, another neceſſary one in the place of the abſentee to proſecute that buſineſs[8]."

"This ſware the community of England at Oxenford[9]:

"We, ſuch and ſuch, cauſe to know all perſons, that we have ſworn upon the holy Evangeliſts, and are bound together by ſuch oath and promiſe in good faith, that each of us, and all together, will inter-aid us, and we and they us, againſt all men, doing right, and taking nothing, which we cannot, without miſdoing, ſaving the faith of the king and of the crown. And we promiſe, upon the ſame oath, that none of us will take any manner of thing, whether of land or moveable, whereby this oath can be diſturbed, or in any wiſe broken. And if any do contrary hereunto, we will hold him for a mortal enemy[10]."

"This is the oath of the twenty-four:

"Every one ſwore upon the holy Evangeliſts, that he, to the honour of God, to the faith of the king, and to the profit of the realm, would ordain, and treat with the aforeſaid ſworn men[11] upon the reformation and the amendment of the eſtate of the realm; and that he never would be wanting in his duty for gift, nor for promiſe, for love, nor for hate, nor for the power of any one, nor for gain, nor for loſs, but would do according to the tenor of the letter of the king given in this behalf, and upon faith likewiſe[12]."

"This ſware the high juſtice of England;

"He ſwears, that well and truly to his power he will cauſe, as appertaineth to his office, right to hold to all perſons to the profit of the king and realm, according to the purveance made, or to be made, by the twenty and four, and by the council of the king and the high men[13] of the land, who ſhall ſwear to aid and maintain theſe things[14].

---

[1] Here we ſee community comprehending the magnates; which ſhews that the grandees or higheſt nobles made a part of the commune of the realm; although, for the ſake of nicer deſcription, they are frequently mentioned ſeparately by magnates, or by magnates of two orders, viz. majores and minores.

[2] Burton.

[3] We ſhould ſay a ſtatute, or act of parliament.

[4] Q. By whom? by the ſheriffs, by the king, or his council, or both? or by certain perſons in each county? Not by the ſheriffs; for, ſuch would have been but ill qualified to name thoſe who were to be inquiſitors into their conduct: not by the king; for, that would not have anſwered the purpoſe of bringing his officers to juſtice. The council, who were to procure juſtice to the people, would hardly do ſo unpopular an act as to impoſe arbitrarily upon the counties perſons of their nomination. The four knights were therefore, we may preſume, choſen by their reſpective counties; and for ſuch elections the monthly court afforded a moſt convenient opportunity. But that theſe four knights were choſen by the counties themſelves is plain, from the following words, which we meet with in a writ for chuſing county knights about ſix years afterwards, and during the troubles we are relating (Rymer, I. 792) "Rex Adee de Novo Mercato," &c.——"Vobis mandamus quatenus quatuor de legalioribus & diſcretioribus militibus dicti comitatus, per aſſenſum ejuſdem comitatus ad hoc electos ad nos pro toto comitatu illo mittatis." After the turmoil between king John and his barons, it was ſtipulated in Magna Charta, ch. 56, that all evil cuſtoms concerning ſheriffs and their officers ſhall be enquired into in each county (that is, county court), by twelve ſworn knights of the ſaid county. "Qui debent (ſays the charter) eligi per probos homines ejuſdem comitatus." Probi homines; i. e. good men, or men of good quality, ſuch as knights and freeholders. Good in antient times was vulgarly uſed in this ſenſe.

[5] i. e. gentlemen of the beſt character and landed property in each county, who had received, or by their eſtates were qualified for, knighthood, being members of each county court, and elected to the preſent office by the knights and other freeholders of the county.

[6] Burton.

[7] Ib.

[8] Ib.

[9] In Burton—"Ceo jura le commun de Engletere a Oxenford." This annaliſt ſeems to have given us the very roll of parliament. See his Annals, pp. 413, 414, 415, 416.

[10] Burton.

[11] I ſuppoſe the commune, or community of England. See the concluſion of the oath of the high juſtice.

[12] Burton.

[13] The high men of the land, viz. the commune, or the major and minor grandees or magnates.

[14] Burton.

" This ſware the chancellor of England [1];

" That he will ſeal no brief, except brief of courſe, without the commandment of the king and of his counſel that ſhall be preſent; nor will he ſeal the gift of a great ward, nor of a great . . . . . nor of eſcheats, without the aſſent of the great council, or of the greater part; nor will he ſeal any thing that may be contrary to the ordinance which is made, and ſhall be made, by the twenty and four, or by the greater part; and that he will do nothing for hire in manner as is deviſed to others; and that [2] a companion ſhall be afforded him in the form that the council ſhall provide."

" This is the oath which the wardens of caſtles took:

" That they the caſtles of the king will truly and in good faith keep for the uſe of the king and of his heirs [3]."

" Theſe are they who are ſworn of the council of the king [4]:

The archbiſhop of Canterbury,
Biſhop of Worceſter,
Earl of Leiceſter,
Earl of Glouceſter,
Earl Mareſchal,
Peter of Savoy,
Earl of Albemarle,
Earl of Warwick,
Earl of Hereford,
John Manſel,
John Fitz-Geoffry,
Peter de Montfort,
Richard de Grey,
Roger de Mortimer,
Jacob D'Audley."

" The twelve on the part of the king elected two from the part of the commons:

The earl Roger the Mareſchal,
Hugh de Bigot.

" And the party for the commons elected two on the part of the king:

The earl of Warwick,
John Manſel.

---

[1] Henry de Wengham was the new chancellor.

[2] A companion, aſſociate, or coadjutor, viz. the keeper of the great ſeal.

[3] See below, note [4].

[4] The following documents appear among our printed records:

" The king to Richard earl of Glouceſter, greeting. Whereas we have lately granted to the nobles and grandees of our realm, by our oath taken upon our ſoul, that, by twelve of our lieges of our council already elected, of which you are one, and by other twelve elected on the part of the nobles, be made the reformation and ordination of the ſtate of our realm, to the honour of God, our fealty, and the profit of our realm, according to what they ſhall ſee moſt expedient; and we have, nevertheleſs, promiſed our aforeſaid nobles and grandees, that the ſaid reformation and ordination, by the aforeſaid twenty-four to be done, we will have rated and firm, and will cauſe the ſame to be held and inviolably obſerved; we command you, in the fealty and love whereby you are bound to us, and under the debt of the oath made to us, that you do not omit without delay to treat with the others, as you deſire to avoid for ever the indignation of ourſelves and our heirs; for, we firmly promiſe, for us and our heirs, that, if you ſhall proceed to the reformation and ordination aforeſaid, in nothing we or our heirs againſt you or yours will be moved; but we and our heirs aforeſaid in this behalf will keep you harmleſs. In teſtimony whereof, &c. Witneſs, the king at Oxon, the 22 day of June." Pat. 42 Hen. III. m. 6. Brady's Hiſtory of England, vol. I. in App. N° 192.

" The biſhop of London has ſimilar letters."

" Henry de Wengham, dean of St. Martin, London, has ſimilar letters."

" The king to John Manſel, treaſurer of York, greeting. Whereas, &c. (as above) to " reformation and ordination by the aforeſaid twenty-four, and them, or the greater part of them, to be done;" we will have rated and firm, even for ever; and whereas you, together with the earl of Warwick, Roger le Bigod, earl of Norfolk, and our mareſchal of England, and Hugh le Bigod, are elected, by the aforeſaid twenty-four, to nominate thoſe who ought to be of our council, and afterwards to preſent thoſe upon whom you four, or three of you, ſhall agree, to our other co-ordinators; that you altogether, or the major part of you, thoſe ſame to be deputed to our council, may confirm or infirm: We command you, firmly injoining in the fealty whereby you are held to us, that, together with the ſaid earls, and Hugh aforeſaid, to nominate our council, as is above expreſſed, do proceed without delay as the Lord ſhall inſpire you; as you would be willing to avoid our indignation, and that of our heirs, that, for the reformation and ordination aforeſaid, and for the nomination of our council, as is above expreſſed, you do proceed; in nothing we, &c. as above. Witneſs, &c. as above."

Like letters are directed to Roger le Bigod, earl of Norfolk, and mareſchal of England.

Like letters are directed to Hugh le Bigod, juſticiar of England.

Like letters are directed to John de Pleſſetis, earl of Warwick. Brady, ut ſupra.

" The form of the oath which the wardens of caſtles of England above written muſt take (Brady's Hiſt. Appendix, p. 217. Pat. 42 Hen. III.):

" They ſhall ſwear upon the Holy Evangeliſts, that they the caſtles of the king truly and in good faith will keep to the uſe of the king and his heirs, and that they will render them to the king or to his heirs, and to no other; and this by the council, and in no other manner, that is to ſay, by prode men of our land elected for his council, or by the greater part; and this form above written ſhall endure for twelve years, and thenceforward by this eſtabliſhment and this oath they ſhall not be reſtrained, but may frankly ſurrender any of them to the king, or to his heirs kings of England."

" The king to all to whom the preſent letters ſhall come, greeting. Know ye, that, by the counſel of our grandees, we have committed to our beloved and liege Richard de Gray, our caſtle of Dover, with the appurtenances, to keep in form, provided by us and the ſaid grandees. In witneſs, &c. Witneſs the king at Oxon, 22 day of June. And a warrant was ſent to Nicholas de Mel, that the ſaid caſtle he ſhould deliver to ſaid Richard to be warden thereof, together with the ſtores and arms of the ſaid caſtle, by indenture between ſaid Nicholas and Richard. In witneſs, &c. as above."

" In the ſame manner the caſtle of Northampton, with appurtenances, was committed to Ralph Baſſet, of Sapcote, to keep in form aforeſaid. In witneſs, &c. as above. And Hugh de Manly received command to deliver it, &c. as above.

" In like manner,

" The caſtle of Corf was committed to Stephen Lungeſpeye, in the room of Elias de Rabaine, ordered to quit;

" The caſtle of Scarborough to Gilbert de Gaunt, in the room of Robert de Nevil;

" The caſtle of Nottingham to William Bardulph, in the room of William de Gray;

" The caſtle of Hereford to John de Gray, in the room of Henry de Peneling;

" The caſtle of Exeter to Henry de Tracy, in the room of Robert de Paytenin;

" The caſtle of Sarum to Robert Walerant, in the room of John de Vernon;

" The tower of London to Hugh le Bigod, juſticiar, in the room of Imbert Pugeis;

" The caſtle of Hadleigh to Richard de Rokele, in the room of Ebulo de Geneur;

" The caſtle of Winton to William de Clare, in the room of Jacob le Savage. The ſaid William afterwards died; and on the Lord's day, after the feaſt of St. Peter ad vincula, came, on the part of the ſaid William John l'Eſtrange, jun. before the king and his council, and delivered to him the ſaid caſtle of Winton; and the king on that day, by his council, committed the ſaid caſtle, with the appurtenances, to Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, to keep in form aforeſaid; and mandate was ſent to Thomas de Don, conſtable of the ſaid caſtle, that he ſhould deliver to the ſaid earl that caſtle, to keep the ſame.

" In the ſame manner were committed to Richard de Gray the cinque ports of the lord king, in the form by the king and aforeſaid grandees provided. In witneſs, &c. the 23d day of June. And Nicholas de Molis ordered to quit.

" And the barons and prode men of the king of Sandwich, Hyth, Dover, Haſting, and Romney, by the king's warrant, were ordered to be attendant upon, and obſervant of, the ſaid Richard, as warden of the cinque ports aforeſaid, in all things which appertained to that wardenſhip.

" To Robert de Saundford was committed the caſtle of Porcheſter, in the room of William de Trublevill.

" To Peter de Montfort the caſtle of Bruges.

" To John Fitz-Bernard the caſtle of Oxford, in the room of William Giffard.

" To Stephen Lungeſpeye the caſtle of Shireburne, in the room of Walter Bruges." Brady's Hiſt. App. p. 219.

“ And theſe four to have power to elect the council of the king, and when they have elected ſhew them to the twenty-four, or where the greater part thereof is aſſembled [aſent & ſcit tenu[1].]”

“ Theſe are the twelve elected by the barons to treat at the three parliaments by the year with the council for the whole community of the land for common buſineſs[2] :

The biſhop of London,
Earl of Wincheſter,
Earl of Hereford,
Philip Baſſett,
John de Bailol,
John de Verdun,
John de Gray,
Roger de Sumery,
Roger de Montalto,
Hugh Diſpenſer,
Thomas de Greſley,
Ægidius de Argenten.”

“ Theſe are the twenty-four who are put by the community to treat of the aid of the king[3] :

The biſhop of Worceſter,
The biſhop of London,
The biſhop of Sarum,
The earl of Leiceſter,
The earl of Glouceſter,
The earl Mareſchal,
Peter of Savoy,
The earl of Hereford,
The earl of Albemarle,
The earl of Winton,
The earl of Oxon,
John Fitz-Geoffry,
John de Gray,
John de Bailol,
Roger de Mortimer,
Roger de Montalto,
Roger de Sumery,
Peter de Montfort,
Thomas de Greſley,
Fulk de Kerdeſton,
Ægidius de Argenton,
John Kyriel,
Philip Baſſet,
Ægidius de Erdington.

“ And if any of theſe cannot or will not be there, the others who ſhall be there ſhall have power to elect another in his room.”

“ Of the ſtate of holy church[4] :

“ Be it remembered, that the eſtate of holy church be amended by the twenty and four elected to reform the ſtate of England, when they ſhall have place and time, according to the power which they have ſo to do by the letter of the king of England.”

“ Of the high juſtice[5] :

“ Moreover, that a juſticiar be appointed, one or two; and that he be not for more than one year; alſo, that at the end of the year he anſwer before the king and his council for his time, and before him that ſhall be after him.”

“ Of the treaſurer, and of the exchequer[6] :

“ In like manner with reſpect to the treaſurer; but that he render account at the end of the year. And let other good men be placed at the exchequer, according to the ordinance of the aforeſaid twenty and four; and let be brought hither, and no where elſe, all the iſſues of the land; and let what they ſhall ſee wants amendment be amended.”

“ Of the chancellor[7] :

“ In like manner with reſpect to the chancellor; alſo, that at the end of the year he anſwer for his time; and that he ſeal nothing out of courſe by the ſole will of the king, but that he do it by the council that ſhall be about the king.”

“ Of the power of the juſticiar, and of the bailiffs[8] :

“ The high juſtice to have power to amend the torts done by all other juſtices, and bailiffs, and counts, and barons, and by all other people, according to the law and right of the land, and in due places; and that the juſtice take nothing except a preſent of bread or wine, or ſuch kind of thing, that is to ſay, eatables and drinkables, as have been accuſtomed to be brought to the tables of great men, and but for one day; and let this ſame thing be underſtood of all the counſellors of the king, and of all his bailiffs; and that no bailiff, by reaſon of his plea, or of his office, take any hire by his own hand, or by another, in any manner whatſoever; and if he be attainted thereof, that he be puniſhed, and alſo the giver; and let it be ſettled, that the king give to his juſtice, and to his people who ſerve him, that they may have no need to take any thing of any one.”

“ Of ſhire-reeves[9] :

“ Let the ſhire-reeves be provided, truſty perſons, and reſpectable men, and freeholders; alſo, that in every county, the ſheriff be a vavaſor[10] of property and conſequence in the county, who faithfully and honeſtly treats the people of the county, and according to right; and that he take no hire, and that he be not ſheriff more than one year together; and that in the year he render his accounts to the exchequer, and anſwer for his time; and that the king, at his own coſt, make him a ſuitable allowance to enable him to execute properly his office of cuſtos of the county; and that neither he nor his bailiffs take any hire, and, if they be attainted, that they be puniſhed.”

“ Be it remembered, that the ſame amendment be made in Guienne[11], and let the oath be kept by the warden of Guienne[12].”

“ Of eſcheators[13] :

“ Let good eſcheators be appointed; and that they take nothing from the goods of the deceaſed out of the lands which ought to be in the king's hands; but that the eſcheators have free adminiſtration of the goods till they ſhall have done the will of the king, if a debt is owing him, and this according to the form of the order of franchiſe[14]; and let enquiry be made of the torts done by the late eſcheators heretofore, and be it amended in every particle; let no talliage, or any thing elſe, be taken, except what ſhall be due according to the charter of franchiſe.”

“ Let the charter of franchiſe be kept firmly[15].”

“ Of the exchange of London[16] :

“ Be it remembered, concerning the exchange of London, to amend the ſame, and likewiſe that of all the other cities of the king, which have been brought to diſgrace and ruin by talliages and other extortions.”

“ Of the houſehold of the king and queen[17] :

“ Be it remembered to amend the houſehold of the king and queen.”

---

[1] The printed copy in Gale is to me unintelligible. Probably it is erroneouſly copied by ſome Engliſh ſcribe who did not underſtand the French. Some other paſſages I am obliged to leave in the ſame obſcurity.

[2] Burton. [3] Ib. [4] Ib. [5] Ib. [6] Ib. [7] Ib. [8] Ib.

[9] Ib. See Madox, Exch. p. 400.

[10] The French is, “ Iſſi ke en cheſcun cunte ſeit un vavaſur del cunte memes veſcunte.” By an ordinance of Ed. III. an. 46. a ſergeant [ſc. ſerviens ad arma, or an eſquire,] might be choſen. Chaucer ſeems to mean ſuch an one by Franklin.

[11] In other parliamentary documents it is aſſerted, that Ireland and Wales were appendages to the crown of England, that is, under the government, not of the king ſingly, but of the king, with the advice and conſent of the Engliſh common council.

[12] Burton. [13] Ib. [14] Magna Charta. [15] Burton. [16] Ib. [17] Ib.

"Of the parliaments, when they ſhall be held in the year, and how often[1]:

"Be it remembered, that the twenty-four have ordained that there be three parliaments in the year, the firſt upon the octaves of St. Michael; the ſecond, on the morrow of Candlemas; the third, on the firſt day of June, that is to ſay, three weeks before St. John. To theſe three parliaments ſhall come the counſellors elect of the king, though they be not commanded, to ſee the ſtate of the realm, and to manage the common buſineſs of the realm, when there ſhall be need, by the command of the king[2]."

"Be it remembered, that the community do chooſe twelve prode men, who ſhall go to the parliaments, and attend at other times when there ſhall be need, when the king or his council ſhall command, to manage the buſineſs of the king, and of the realm; and that the community ſhall hold for ſtable that which theſe twelve ſhould do; and this was to ſpare the coſt of the commons. Fifteen ſhall be named by theſe four, that is to ſay, by the earl mareſchal, the earl of Warwick, Hugh le Bigot, and John Manſel, who are elected by the twenty-four to name the aforeſaid fifteen, who ſhall be of council of the king; and they ſhall be confirmed by them, or by the greater part of them; and they ſhall have power from the king to give their counſel in good faith concerning the government of the realm, and all things belonging to the king and kingdom; and to amend and redreſs all things which they ſhall ſee want to be amended and redreſſed, and be over the high juſticiar, and over all other perſons; and if they cannot all be preſent, that which the greater part ſhall do ſhall be firm and ſtable[3]."

I ſhall next give Walter Hemingford's account of this parliament:

"The earls and barons having aſſembled at Oxon, fifteen days after Eaſter, as had been agreed[4], then and there to treat for the good of the king and the realm, they firſt of all required of the king, and the other grandees, an oath, that the things which ſhould be provided for the good of the king and the realm ſhould be kept totally and abſolutely without any gainſaying; and the king made oath that he would keep the ſtatutes, which ſhould be made to the honour of God, the good of his church, and the utility of the realm. The other grandees all, as it were, took the ſame oath. Moreover, nine biſhops, who had aſſembled, excommunicated all thoſe, ipſo facto, who ſhould oppoſe the preſent deed, the king himſelf holding a flaming taper; and they declared publickly, if by raſh attempt any ſhould contradict the ſaid ſtatute, they would riſe upon him as an hawk did upon a crow; for, they had come equipped in arms, that what they had determined upon ſhould be carried into immediate execution. But the brothers of the king, who were four, not willing to conſent in this behalf, went away clandeſtinely, taking the road to Winton. The enraged barons followed them with one heart and mind, like the roaring whelps of lions, leſt perchance they ſhould reach and garriſon that fortified town, And when they would compel them to appear, and found that they perſevered in their obſtinacy, they firſt of all enacted, that they ſhould paſs over the ſea to their own eſtates in foreign parts, and they put this ſtatute in force inſtantly, the king interceding for them, and ſupplicating for them with ardent intreaty, but he could not prevail. They enacted alſo, that all ſtrangers, of what condition or nation ſoever, ſhould immediately return to their own homes upon pain of members and life. They enacted, moreover, that if any one held of the king in part, and in like manner of other lords, for divers parts, if ſuch an one ſhould die, his heir being within lawful age, that the king ſhould have the heir with the land which he held of his demeſne; and other lords ſhould have the heir with the land of their fiefs, to the lawful age of the heir, and the eſcheats and reliefs, every one according to the part of his tenure. They likewiſe enacted, that the wool of England ſhould be manufactured in England, and not be ſold to foreigners; and that all perſons ſhould uſe woollen cloths manufactured within the country, and ſhould not ſeek garments too coſtly; alſo, that all perſons ſhould avoid expenſive pleaſures, and ſuch as were ſuperfluous. Other things were enacted and ordained, which are here omitted to avoid prolixity. And they ſtayed at Winton fifteen days, and many periſhed by poiſon. For the abbot of Weſtminſter, a perſonage truly noble and wiſe, and William[5], brother of the earl of Glouceſter, a perſonage of great worth and ſpirit, were both deſtroyed. The earl of Glouceſter himſelf alſo, who languiſhed under the effects of poiſon to the Aſſumption, did not but with extreme difficulty eſcape death, for the hairs fell from his head, and the nails from his fingers; but the Lord would not have England deprived of the preſence of ſuch a perſon in ſo great an article of neceſſity, and a ſeaſon of ſuch imminent danger. This villany was impoſed upon and imputed to a certain knight, Walter de Scotiney; and at the appeal of the counteſs de l'iſle he was ſeiſed, judged, and drawn. The grandees, therefore, ſeeing many dangers, and that it was improper at preſent to diſcloſe their counſel, cloſed the ordinances, and fortified them with the ſeals of all of them[6], appointing a certain day, viz. the quindenes of the feaſt of St. Michael, for their general meeting at London, and for their being there, prepared with arms, to finiſh what they had begun. The ſaid day arriving, they all met, and from day to day, for a full month, they perſiſted in councils and arms. At length all things were proclaimed, and put powerfully into execution." So writes Walter Hemingford.

Another thing done at Winton was the cancelling the grants made by the lord Edward of the iſle of Oleron to Guy de Luſignan, and of the ſeneſchalcy of Gaſcogne to Geoffry de Luſignan, and re-annexing both of them to the crown of England. Edward was obliged to revoke theſe grants, the baronage in council having pronounced them illegal. This happened about the 11th or 12th of July[7].

I return to M. Paris:

"The king's uterine brothers being baniſhed, as is deſcribed above, croſſed the channel about the middle of July, and were landed at Boulogne[8]. As ſoon as they arrived at that port they wrote to the king of France to deſire leave to return to their own country through his kingdom. Their requeſt was refuſed, at the inſtance of the queen of France, who was highly incenſed with them for defaming and ill-uſing her ſiſter the queen of England; adding, that they had been driven out of England with diſgrace for their bad behaviour. But ſoon after, the king of France relented, and granted them the paſſport they deſired."

---

[1] The reader is deſired to attend to this deſcription of a parliament, to ſatisfy him how little reſemblance it had to modern parliaments. The curious reader, by conſulting Favine's Theatre of Honour, ch. 12. will ſee how much the French parliaments reſembled ours. Alfred held his parliaments twice a year. See Carte's Hiſt. vol. I. p. 316.—In the latter time of the Saxons, and the early times of the Normans, the biſhops, earls, and barons, were uſed to be aſſembled, ex more, at Eaſter, Whitſuntide, and Chriſtmas. Sir R. Cotton's Remains.

[2] Burton.

[3] Ib.

[4] Chron. Walt. Hemingford.

[5] While the king and barons were at Winton, ſeveral Engliſh perſons of rank were poiſoned by the Poitevins. The earl of Glouceſter and his brother William de Clare, an amiable and popular nobleman, received into their bowels the deadly drug at the table of the lord Edward, king Henry's eldeſt ſon, during breakfaſt. The former with great difficulty, and merely by ſtrength of conſtitution, eſcaped deſtruction, with the loſs of his hair, nails, ſkin, and great injury of his teeth. But William de Clare was carried off, leaving a name in grateful odour with the whole kingdom. Theſe atrocious deeds ſtruck the people with horror. Leland's Collectanea.—In a letter ſent by the barons a year or two after to the holy ſee, wherein they juſtified their hatred and ſeverity againſt Aymar, or Almeric, the biſhop elect of Winton, they charge the latter with the murder of William de Clare. M. Paris, Auct. Additam.

[6] Seals, or ſignatures. See the quotation of Fabian below. In acts of ſtate done by the king in the court of his prelates and barons in his parliament aſſembled, the king frequently ſigned and ſealed concurrently with ſome or all the grandees preſent. In judicial matters, and, I believe, all others ſubmitted to the council of grandees, the king was concluded, although abſent from the deliberations, by the judgement of the court; and their acts were the king's acts by conſtruction of the law. Thus, in many inſtances we have, curia regis dijudicavit, barones dijudicaverunt, and the like. And in the execution of theſe acts by the king he acted miniſterially, ſtyling the acts of this court to be his acts. Curia is a noun of multitude, denoting judges or counſellors.

[7] Rymer, vol. I. p. 663.

[8] P. Daniel. M. Paris.

"They were purſued into France by Henry of Montfort, the eldeſt ſon of the earl of Leiceſter[1]; but whether with the knowledge of his father is uncertain. Henry's intention was to revenge the inſult lately offered his father by William de Valence. He found many friends abroad, who, from the reſpect and love they had for the earl of Leiceſter, were ready to aſſiſt him in avenging the affronts offered to his father; and the people beyond ſea were in amazement to hear, that William de Valence, a perſon ſo inferior in all reſpects to the earl of Leiceſter, ſhould dare to inſult a man of Simon de Montfort's birth and character, who was held in the higheſt eſtimation by all kinds of people both at home and abroad." But the brothers got away from Boulogne; and we hear no more of young Henry's revenge."

The king returned to London about the middle of July, in which month an affair happened that excited freſh alarm and uneaſineſs in the minds of the barons.

"The king's fickleneſs[2] and inſcrutable duplicity terrified them more than any thing; and a ſtrong ſymptom of his inſincerity appeared upon the following occaſion: as he was one day going down the river from his palace at Weſtminſter, there came on ſuddenly a very violent ſtorm, accompanied with thunder and lightning. The king, having a particular dread of ſuch phænomena, ordered himſelf to be ſet on ſhore as ſoon as poſſible. The barge happened to be oppoſite Durham-houſe, where the earl of Leiceſter then inned. As ſoon as he was informed of what happened, he ran to the king, and with an open and chearful countenance moſt reſpectfully ſaluted him; and, in order to comfort him, he ſaid, "Why are you ſo afraid? The ſtorm is over." To which the king, with a ſerious and ſevere countenance, replied, "I am exceſſively afraid of thunder and lightning; but, by the head of God, I am more afraid of thee than of all the thunder and lightning in the univerſe." The earl mildly returned, "It is very hard, and much aſtoniſhes me, my lord, that you ſhould have any fear of me, who have been always ſteady in my affection and fidelity to you and yours, and the whole realm of England. You ought rather to be afraid of thoſe enemies of yours that ſpeak evil againſt me." The king was ſuppoſed to uſe this ſtrange and harſh language, on account of the earl of Leiceſter's zeal and activity in obliging the king to abide by the councils of his barons, and making an entire riddance of the Poitevins."

Upon the return of the barons to London[3], they reſumed their deliberations at the New Temple, where they kept their councils and courts for the correction of abuſes, and removed many perſons belonging to the king's houſehold, and put in others whom they liked better.

"On the 22d of July, the earl mareſchal, the earl of Leiceſter, and ſeveral others, on the part of the univerſity, or community of England[4], came to Guildhall, where the barons or aldermen[5] of the city were aſſembled to receive them. The lords brought with them the inſtrument, to which hung many labels with ſeals, viz. the king's ſeal, that of ſir Edward his ſon, with many others, and aſked the mayor and aldermen if they would agree to ſupport the ſtatutes of the barons, and ſign the inſtrument prepared for that purpoſe; to which they all very chearfully and thankfully conſented, and ſet the city ſeal to the inſtrument. But the barons had not yet reſolved to publiſh their ſtatutes. The illneſs of the earl of Glouceſter from the poiſon threw them into confuſion, but ſome hope was now entertained of his recovery."

The barons thought it highly expedient to loſe no time in tranſmitting to the court of Rome a juſtification of their late proceedings, particularly thoſe which concerned the biſhop elect of Winton, who they knew would go inſtantly with his complaints to the pope, and, if not timely prevented, do their cauſe a great deal of injury[6]. To obviate theſe inconveniences, they diſpatched a ſolemn embaſſy to his holineſs, with an account of what they had done, and an urgent requeſt to the holy ſee not to conſecrate Athelmar, or any way encourage his return to England, which they tell his holineſs would never be endured by the community at large. The letter of the barons on this occaſion is a very remarkable compoſition, and worthy of a very attentive peruſal by ſuch as are curious to know the merits of the queſtion then agitated between the king and his people. It is inſerted in Brady's Appendix. The ambaſſadors whom the barons employed upon this important commiſſion were ordered to enter into no nice diſcuſſions at the court of Rome, to avoid all diſputes, but to be ſhort and explicit, and expedite their return as much as poſſible. And they were to tell the pope of the homicides, rapines, injuries, and oppreſſions, committed by the uterine brothers, and the king's refuſing to reſtrain them; and how Geoffry, who was one of them, roaſted the king's cook, and by elaborate cruelties tortured him to death. What little reſpect was paid by the pope to the apology and requeſt of the barons will appear hereafter.

On the 27th of July, the king, then at Weſtminſter[7], writes to the pope to tell him, that Arlot had ſuſpended the ſentences of interdict and excommunication to the firſt of September, and had declared that it was out of his power to prorogue them to a longer period; that on this account and others he was about to ſend, for himſelf and his great men, his agents to the pope's preſence; that in the mean time he intreated his holineſs kindly to put off the execution of the ſentences till his agents ſhould arrive. To the ſame purpoſe letters were ſent to the cardinals.

---

[1] M. Paris, p. 834.
[2] M. Paris.
[3] Ib.
[4] Fabian.

[5] It has cauſed ſurprize in many perſons to ſee the citizens of London ſo often called, in the old Engliſh chronicles, barons, and put upon a footing with the barons of the realm. Here we ſee Fabian explain barons of the city by aldermen; whence a ſuſpicion ariſes, that, when the citizens of London were ſtyled barons, not the whole body of citizens were meant, but the aldermen, or reeves, of the ſeveral wards, who were tenants of the king in capite for their ſeveral aldermanries. Lands within the city were held in burgage, either immediately of the king, or immediately of his tenants. The latter performed their burgage ſervices to the former, who anſwered for the whole of their burgage tenement, as well for what was in ſervice as for what was in demeſne to the king as his tenants in capite; but the citizens, who held of the king's immediate tenants by burgage, and participated in burgage privileges, derived their privilege from the grants of the king's immediate burgeſſes, called his burgeſſes in capite, between whom exiſted the tie of lord and tenant, on which the ſervice to the king was founded. Thus, although burgage ſervice was due to the king for all the ſervice attached to burgage tenement, yet he could demand it only of his immediate burgage tenant, called his tenant in capite, although the latter had alienated part, or even the whole of what he derived from the king's grant. I ſuſpect that in thoſe times the king's immediate tenants in burgage (not many in number compared with the diffuſive body of citizens who held burgages of the former) might, on account of their holding in capite of the king, partake of the title of baron, in common with other barons of the realm, ſo ſtyled on account of their tenure in capite; and that theſe were in fact the cives, honoured with the title of barons, being the people of chief conſequence within the city, and ſuch as the king more particularly had to do with, they holding of him immediately and in capite. An alderman was the reeve or provoſt of a diſtrict within a city, called a ward, wherein he exerciſed a magiſtracy or juriſdiction ſimilar in moſt reſpects to the bailiff of an hundred. Much of his office may be diſcovered in Madox's Firma Burgi, and Hiſtory of the Exchequer. The office of alderman was judicial, particularly in matters of police within his diſtrict, and ſeems antiently to have been hereditary, or de feodo. Probably he was alſo the king's tenant in capite, as well for the terra compoſing his diſtrict, as for his magiſtracy derived alſo from the crown. But let it be remembered, there was a wide difference between the two ſpecies of feudal tenancy. The city of London was undoubtedly an antient manor of the king, whereby he was dominus capitalis, like any other lord of a manor. His chief burgeſſes enjoyed his manerial rights by virtue of the manerial grant; to theſe were added ſaca, ſoca, toll, theme, &c. by regal grant, all theſe being the jura of the crown; therefore, the juriſdiction reſulting was the king's juriſdiction, and the tenant a bailiff of the king.

[6] M. Paris and Rymer.
[7] Rymer, vol. I. p. 665.

After the following form, mutatis mutandis, the king's letters were ſent to the four knights of each ſhire, choſen by the ſhires ſeverally for the purpoſes therein mentioned[1]:

"Henry, by the grace of God, &c. To his beloved and liege Robert de Ros, Alexander de Amandevil, Geoffrey de Childwic, and Henry de Horwell, of the county of Hertford, greeting. Whereas, lately, in our parliament held at Oxon, it was ordained by the community, that all exceſſes, treſpaſſes, and wrongs, done in our realm, ſhould be enquired into by four knights of the ſeveral counties, that, the truth being known thereupon, the ſame might be corrected; which four knights for the making the ſaid inquiſition faithfully were to take their corporal oath in full county-court, or before the ſhire-reeves and coroners, if the county-court were not then nearly holding, as we do enjoin our ſingular ſhire-reeves: We command you in the fealty whereby you are held to us, that the ſaid oath being performed as aforeſaid, by the oath of four reſpectable and good men of our county aforeſaid, through whom the truth of the fact may be thereon better known, ye do diligently make inquiſition through the aforeſaid county of all manner of exceſſes, treſpaſſes, and wrongs, in the ſaid county from times paſt, by whatſoever perſons brought on whatſoever perſons; and the ſame inquiſition to reach our juſticiars, ſhire-reeves, and our other bailiffs and officers whatſoever; and do ye take the inquiſitions thereupon made, under your ſeals, and the ſeals of them by whom they were made, to Weſtminſter, on the octaves of St. Michael, to deliver the ſame there in your proper perſons to our council. We command alſo our ſhire-reeve of the county aforeſaid, that the aforeſaid oath having been taken of you in manner aforeſaid, ſo many, and ſuch knights of the ſaid county, by whom the ſaid inquiſitions may be better made, he do cauſe to come before you at the days and places which ye ſhall aſſign him. We will not, nevertheleſs, that the ſhire-reeve of the ſaid county preſent be comprehended under this ſort of inquiſition, unleſs he has perchance been previouſly ſhire-reeve in the county aforeſaid, becauſe of that time we will, that inquiſition be made of him, as well as of others; nor do we will in the aforeſaid inquiſition that the treſpaſſes or wrongs be revolved, which otherwiſe before our juſticiars by juſt judgement of our court, and according to the law of the land, have been terminated, or by our writs attached. In teſtimony whereof, we ſend you theſe our letters patent. Witneſs myſelf, at Weſtminſter, 28 day of July, in the year of our reign 42."

"Henry, by the grace of God, king of England, &c. to all thoſe, &c.[2] Know ye, that for the profit of the realm, and at the requeſt of our high and prode men, and of the commune of our realm, we have aſſented, that twenty-four of our men have power that what they ſhall ordain[3] of the eſtate of our realm ſhould be firm and ſtable, and we have made to ſwear in our ſoul, and have given letters patent thereon; and this ſame ſwore Edward our eldeſt ſon, and thereon gave his letters patent; which twenty-four abovenamed elected four, to which four they gave their power to elect our council of prode men of our land; the which council we have promiſed, and do promiſe, to confide in for the redreſs and amendment of all the affairs which appertain to us and our realm; and we will, that the council aforeſaid, or the greater part thereof, elect a prode man or men, which may be in the place of him or them that be wanting; and we will have for firm and ſtable what the aforeſaid council, or the greater part thereof, ſhall do; and we command firmly, that all our lieges and our men be held, and firmly bound, to keep all the eſtabliſhments, which they make to the honour of God, of our fealty, and to the profit of our realm. And in witneſs of this thing we have cauſed to be put our ſeal to this preſent letter. This thing was done at London the Lord's day after the gule of Auguſt, in the year of our coronation forty-ſecond. This letter is double, and delivered to the earl mareſchal by the king and his council."

On the 4th of Auguſt, the earl of Leiceſter[4] was joined in a commiſſion with Peter of Savoy and ſir John Manſel, treaſurer of York, to reform the ſtate of Scotland to adjuſt the diſcords ſubſiſting in that kingdom, and ſettle the diſputes between it and England.

On the ſame 4th of Auguſt, the king's letters patent were ſent to the ſhire-reeves of each county, after the following form, mutatis mutandis:

"[5] The king to the ſhire-reeve of Dorſet, greeting. Whereas, lately, in our parliament held at Oxford, it was ordained, that all exceſſes, treſpaſſes, and wrongs, done in our realm, ſhould be enquired into by four knights of the ſeveral counties, that, the truth being known thereupon, the ſame might be corrected; which four knights for the making the ſaid inquiſition faithfully are required to take their corporal oath in full county-court, or before the ſhire-reeves and coroners, if the time of holding ſuch county-court ſhould not be near. We have commanded our beloved and liege Alured de Lincoln, Ivo de Rochford, John de Strada, and William de Kaynnes, of your county, that the aforeſaid oath being taken, as is aforeſaid, by the oath of men of good rank and reputation, by whom the truth of the thing may be beſt known, they do diligently enquire through the ſaid county of all exceſſes, treſpaſſes, and injuries, in the ſaid county, from times paſt, by whatſoever perſons brought on whomſoever; and this concerning juſticiars, ſhire-reeves, and other our bailiffs, and other perſons whatever, as in our ſaid letters directed to our ſaid lieges, is more fully contained; ſo that the inquiſitions made thereupon, under their ſeals, and the ſeals of thoſe by whom it ſhall be made, they carry to Weſtminſter on the octaves of St. Michael in their proper perſons to deliver to our council at the ſame place; and, therefore, we command you in the fealty wherein you are held to us, that, having received from the ſaid knights their corporal oath in manner aforeſaid, you do cauſe to come before them thoſe whom they ſhall name to you, and ſo many, and ſuch knights, and others, of the aforeſaid county, by whom the inquiſition aforeſaid may be beſt made at the days and places which they ſhall aſſign to you; and this, as you love your own body, and all things belonging to you, by no means omit; leſt, if for your default the ſaid inquiſition of the inquiſitors be retarded, or in any degree obſtructed, we be forced to attach your body, and lands, and chattels, grievouſly. Witneſs, the king at Weſtminſter, the 4th day of Auguſt. In form aforeſaid, letters patent were written to four knights underwritten of each county; and, in form aforeſaid, were letters written to the ſhire-reeves of England ſeverally. By the council of the king."

Then follow the names of the four knights of each county of England.

Under the four for Salop is this note: that they were not fit, as Peter de Montfort ſent word. And under the four for Devon, viz. Geoffrey Dinant, William de Bykele, Roger de Cokynton, William de Courteney, it is noted, that it was made appear to the king by the ſhire-reeve of Devon, that Geoffrey Dinant and Roger de Cokynton were not well; therefore order was given to the ſame ſhire-reeve, that he ſhould, in place of thoſe two, ſubſtitute other two to do, &c.

---

[1] M. Paris, inter addit. p. 1132.

[2] Anno 1258, 2 Aug. Brady, Appendix, p. 216.

[3] From the extract given above, from the chronicle of Walter Hemingford, it ſeems, as if the barons did not think it proper to publiſh their ordinances yet a while. But a great part of them were certainly made, and put in force before this time.

[4] Rymer.

[5] Pat. 42 Hen. III. Brady's Hiſt. App. No. 196.

"On the feaſt of the tranſlation of St. Edward, the grandees were all convened again at London[1]."

On the 18th of October, Philip Lovel[2], the king's treaſurer, who had been a great oppreſſor of the people, was depoſed from his office by the council of the baronage, and John de Crachale, archdeacon of Bedford, choſen treaſurer in his room. Lovel was alſo fined in a very large ſum of money. Together with his high poſt in the ſtate, he had long enjoyed the intimate friendſhip and confidence of the king; but he was now deprived of both. So ſuddenly precipitated from the pinnacle of power to the cavern of contempt and wretchedneſs, and not able to bear ſo diſagreeable a reverſe, he intreated the king not to caſt him entirely off, but to treat him at leaſt outwardly with ſome degree of kindneſs; to obtain which favour he offered him a large ſum. But this humiliation was of no avail; and Lovel, not able to ſupport his miſery, died the Chriſtmas following, as was ſuppoſed, of a broken heart. As ſoon as the king heard of his death, he ordered all his effects to be confiſcated towards making him ſatisfaction[3].

"At the ſame time[4] that Lovel, by the counſel of the baronage, particularly of the high juſticiar, was removed from the exchequer, a great many other perſons were ſuperſeded in that department, and others appointed in their room."

The barons took great pains to curb the abuſes incident to the ſheriff's office. At this parliament, held at Michaelmas, it was provided, as we are told by the annaliſt of Dunſtable, that a ſheriff ſhould be made every year by election, who, upon entering his office, ſhould ſwear, that he would take neither gold nor ſilver from any one, nor any gratuity, except ſome little thing to eat.

Alſo, by the counſel of the king, it was provided at this parliament[5], that every ſheriff ſhould have a copy of the Great Charter written in Engliſh, and ſigned with the king's great ſeal; and that it ſhould be read many times in county-court before the county, that the contents of it might be univerſally known.

All the people of England, whether of frank or ſervile condition, were made to ſwear to the obſervance of the Oxford proviſions[6].

One great object of the barons was to recruit the king's finances with as little burden as poſſible to the nation. A plan, therefore, of rigid œconomy was adopted; each article of revenue was to be appropriated to the public weal, and all the king's revenues were divided into two parts, whereof one moiety went towards the payment of his debts; the other to the ſupport of his houſehold[7].

Another new regulation, made by the barons, was an order given to the clergy, who farmed the Engliſh benefices of foreign non-reſident eccleſiaſtics, to pay the rents of ſuch benefices to perſons aſſigned by the barons or great men. "By this proviſion of the barons, England had reſpite from exactors till Simon Montfort's martyrdom[8]."

"In this forty-third year[9] of king Henry (ſo writes Fabian), the Friday following the feaſt of Simon and Jude, in the parliament[10] holden at Weſtminſter, were read in the preſence of all the lords and commonalty at ſundry times all the acts and ordinances before made in the parliament holden at Oxenford, with certain other articles by the aforeſaid twelve peers thereunto added. After reading of which articles, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, with divers other, to the number of nine biſhops, beſides abbots and others, denounced all them accurſed, that attempted in word or deed to break the ſaid acts, or any of them. In this parliament alſo was granted unto the king a ſcutage, that is to ſay, forty ſhillings of every knight's fee through England, the which extended to a great ſum of money."

The king, the earls, and above an hundred barons[11], ſwore to maintain the proviſions of Oxford. The biſhops took the ſame oath, and excommunicated all who ſhould contravene them[12]."

This meeting of the great men continued about a month; during which they ſat every day in conſultation, being well armed[13].

The earl of Leiceſter, Peter of Savoy, Guy and Geoffrey de Leſignan, and Hugh le Bigot, had been commiſſioned by the king with free and full powers to prorogue and confirm the truce with France for one, two, or three years, from the firſt day of October following[14]. What was done by theſe commiſſioners before the baniſhment of Guy and Geoffrey de Luſignan we are not informed; but there can be no doubt but that the negotiation with France was cloſely attended to. An accommodation with that realm was the only foundation, on which the king built his hopes of ſucceeding in the affair of the Sicilian crown, with a view ſolely to which he had probably yielded ſo much of his prerogative to the grandees and community of the realm. The pope, who was as eager to get the debts of the holy ſee diſcharged, and to deſtroy Manfroi, as the king of England was to ſee his ſon on the throne of Sicily, co-operated ſtrenuouſly with the king in procuring a final adjuſtment of all differences with the king of France. For this purpoſe the ſovereign pontiff diſpatched his confeſſor and chaplain frier Manſueto to St. Lewis, to ſolicit him on the part of his holineſs to yield to the pacific overtures of the king of England. One article ſtipulated in behalf of king Henry was, that king Lewis ſhould furniſh him with money ſufficient to pay one thouſand knights for one year, or with five hundred for two years, towards the Sicilian war, upon terms to be ſettled by the two kings. This was acceded to on the part of Lewis; and the plan of a ſolid compromiſe and firm friendſhip between the two royal houſes was ſettled by the firſt of Auguſt; and little ſeemed to be wanting, but the preſence of a cardinal legate, whom the king of England earneſtly deſired the pope to ſend without delay, to conclude and ratify the treaty. This was the ſituation of England with reſpect to France, when Simon de Montfort left England, in the beginning of November, to go over to France on the ſubject of the treaty of peace[1]. His companions and colleagues were the biſhops of Worceſter and Lincoln, and the earl mareſchal, and the earl of Glouceſter. The king remained at home by the counſel of the barons; but his commiſſioners could bring the treaty to no concluſion, the king of France not attending the parliament of his great men on account of the king of England's abſence.

---

[1] Annals of the Abbey of Hyde, MS. in Bodleian Library, No. 91.

[2] Philip Lovel, appointed treaſurer Aug. 27, 36 H. III. to hold quamdiu regi placuerit; and was diſplaced Nov. 2, 43 H. III. to make way for John de Crachale, archdeacon of Bedford, whom the king appointed de conſilio procerum de concilio ſuo. This was in conſequence of the Oxford ſtatutes. See Madox's Exchequer, 4to, vol. II. pp. 33, 36, 37.

[3] M. Paris.

[4] Ib.

[5] Chron. de Dunſtable.

[6] "Eodem anno proviſi duodecim conſiliarii, qui una cum rege ordinarent de regno Angliæ, qui multa ordinaverunt, & ad ea tenenda omnes de regno tam ſervi quam liberi juraverunt. Per hos ejecti ſunt fratres regis cum multis alienigenis de terra. Magna fames erat in terra." This is all which John abbot of Peterburg ſays of the Oxford proviſions under the year 1258. "Anno 1259, Omnes ad proviſiones Oxonienſes juraverunt." Chron. Joh. abb. I. Pet. de Burgo.

[7] MS. in Muſ. Brit. tit. Oxoniæ Proviſiones, inter Cotton MSS.

[8] Contin. M. Paris.

[9] The king's reign commenced Oct. 19.

[10] Fabian lived in the ſixteenth century. He uſes the words parliament, peers, lords, and commons, in the ſenſe of his own time, but not in that of the thirteenth century. The paſſage, however, is given entire, to avoid the confuſion of authorities. He was ſheriff of London, and well acquainted with that city. The county commiſſioners, or delegates, who were in this parliament, muſt have concurred in granting this ſcutage.

[11] M. Paris reports, that the king came to the monaſtery of St. Alban towards the concluſion of the year 1257, and, while he ſtayed there, had converſation with this hiſtorian about the number of Engliſh baronies, and he ſays the king reckoned up two hundred and fifty. We are not here, I truſt, to ſuppoſe the baronies enjoyed by the biſhops and abbots made part of the number; theſe might amount to near an hundred: many of the lay baronies were uſually in the king's own hands. The earl of Cornwall had eighteen in Devonſhire and Cornwall (ſee Th. Wykes, ad ann. 1265). The earls of Glouceſter and Derby had prodigious poſſeſſions, containing many baronies; ſo that the names of above one hundred, confirming the Oxford ſtatutes, may be ſuppoſed to be as many as were ever collected in ſupport of any act of that time.

[12] Annales Waverleienſes.

[13] Walter Hemingford, p. 580.

[14] Rymer.

"At the ſame time, by the common advice of the lord king, and of the community, the following charters of the lord king were made, and written in Latin, French, and Engliſh, and through the whole realm to all the counties tranſmitted; that, being read therein by the ſhire-reeves, and underſtood, they might by all perſons in future be kept inviolably:

"The charter of the king:

"Henry, by the grace of God, king of England, duke of Normandy, of Aquitain, and count of Anjou, to all his faithful and true people. Foraſmuch, as we deſire and will, that ſpeedy juſtice be done throughout our realm, as well to poor as rich, we will and command, that all the wrongs that have been done from our time in your county, whoſoever has done them, be ſhewn to the four knights[2], whom we have attorned hereunto, as ſoon as it is ſhewn to them. And we, as expeditiouſly as we can, will cauſe them to be amended and redreſſed; but, if we cannot ſo haſtily do this thing as we wiſh, and would be fitting both to you and to us, ye ought not to marvel, that a thing which has for ſo long a time gone on ſo badly for your damage and mine cannot be ſooner amended; but that ſpeedy amendments ſhall be made to the county where we have our juſtice and other prode men, ye may have certain expectation; and that every thing wrong ſhall be redreſſed for your benefit as ſoon as poſſible, know ye, that we have made to ſwear every one of our ſhire-reeves this oath, that he will ſerve us truly, and faithfully keep to his power that which is underwritten; that is to ſay, that he will do right in common to all perſons according to the power he has by his office; and this ſhall not be for love, nor for hate, nor for any perſons, nor for covetouſneſs; and that he will do haſty juſtice as well to the poor as the rich, and that he will take nothing by himſelf or others, in any manner, by art or engine, by reaſon of his bailiffſhip, excepting only eatables and drinkables, which are uſually carried to the tables of great perſons, and what are ſufficient for one day only; and that he will not have more than five horſes in the inn[3] where he ſojourns with the others by reaſon of his bailiffſhip, and that he do not ſojourn with any perſon who has leſs than forty pounds a year, nor in any houſe of religion which has leſs by the year than one hundred marks, either in demeſne or in rents, nor will lodge more than once in a year, or twice at moſt, in the ſaid inn; and this he ſhall not do but at their deſire, and by their good will; nor ſhall cuſtom be pleaded as any excuſe to the contrary. And, if he lodge by conſent, he ſhall take for preſents no more than twelve pence; and his attendant officers ſhall have no more than is ſufficient to maintain them decently in their offices, and no more than they are ſure they can juſtify; and that the country be not too much aggrieved on account of victual and drink; and, ſo long as they ſhall be in bailiffſhip, no man, clerk or layman, frank or villane, ſhall, of a houſe of religion, nor of a town, demand or take hay, garb, corn, or wool, or any other kind of movable or ſterlings, or any thing equivalent, as many have been uſed to do in paſt times; and this ſhall the ſhire-reeves cauſe them to ſwear, when he ſhall put them in bailiffſhip; and that counties, hundreds, wapentakes, or any other kind of bailiffſhips of our realm, be by no means ſet to firm to any one; and be the ſhire-reeves, and all ſorts of other bailiffs, careful that if any one is attainted of any kind of taking (as is above written) by reaſon of his bailiffſhip, that he be arraigned, as well the giver as receiver; for, we have provided by the counſel of our high men, that at all times may be done quick and full juſtice to all manner of perſons without any kind of hire or reward; and, therefore, we command and prohibit all kinds of perſons, that they to any of our bailiffs offer nothing, nor promiſe, nor give any thing to them, upon pain of being attainted; for, when the ſhire-reeves ſhall come at the end of the year upon his accompt, there ſhall be paid to him his reaſonable expences that he ſhall have made for to keep his bailiffſhip, and to pay him for his attendants; and for this we give them of our own, and do not allow that they have occaſion to take any thing of others; and we will that none of our bailiffs whom we put in our land, ſhire-reeve, or any other, remain in his bailiffſhip more than one year; and for this we cauſe him to know, that if hardſhips or wrongs be done by heretofore bailiffs we ſuperſede ſuch as are queſtionable, and will that their wrongs be pointed out. Witneſs ourſelf, at Weſtminſter, the 20th October, the year of our reign 42."

"The charter of the lord king:

"Henry, by the grace of God, &c. To all lieges, clerks, and laics, greeting. Know ye, that we will and conſent, that that which our council, or the greater part thereof, which is elected by us or by the commune of our realm, or the greater part of them, has done and ſhall do to the honour of God, and of our fealty, and for the profit of our realm, as it ſhall ordain, be firm and ſtable in all things to all days; and we command and admoniſh all and good people, in the fealty they owe to us, that they firmly hold and ſwear to keep and maintain the eſtabliſhments which are made, or are to be made, by the aforeſaid council, or by the greater part of them, in the manner which is aforeſaid; and that they do take upon them, by virtue of this oath, to meddle and make with all kinds of perſons concerned in this behalf; and that no one take aught of land or movable, by which this purveance may be diſturbed or defeated in any manner whatſoever; and, if any one or more go againſt this thing, we will and command our faithful and good people that they hold him for a mortal enemy; and, becauſe we will that this thing be firm and ſtable, we ſend about our letters patent, ſigned with our ſeal, into every county, to remain there in the treaſury. Witneſs ourſelf, at London, the 18th day of October, in the year of our reign 42. And this thing was done before

---

[1] This is not the firſt time of reinforcing the king's parliament with county delegates or repreſentatives; for, we have an example of it in the 15th of king John, which was a year or two before his Magna Charta. The record is printed by our learned Selden: "Rex vicecomiti Oxon, ſalutem. Præcipimus tibi quod omnes milites ballivæ tuæ, qui ſummoniti fuerunt eſſe apud Oxoniam ad nos a die Omnium Sanctorum in XV venire facias cum armis ſuis; corpora vero baronum ſine armis ſingulariter; & IV diſcretos milites de comitatu tuo illuc venire facias ad nos ad eundem terminum ad loquendum nobiſcum de negotiis regni noſtri. Teſte meipſo apud Wilton, die Novembris. Eodem modo ſcribitur omnibus vicecomitibus." Titles of Honour, MDCXXXI, p. 710. Selden calls this a ſtrange writ of ſummons, that, for aught he had ſeen, was without example. The authenticity of it I ſee no cauſe to queſtion. The milites ballivæ tuæ muſt have been the king's tenants in capite by knights ſervice; the ſame order, who in John's Magna Charta, made not long afterward, were to be ſummoned when extraordinary aids were to be treated of in common council, generally by the ſhire-reeve. The barons were, I ſuppoſe, the major barons ſummoned ſingly by the ſhire-reeve; and the four diſcreet knights were four of the ſuperior landed gentry of each county, choſen by the knights and freeholders thereof in their county-court. Their buſineſs with the king was to have parlance with him on the affairs of the realm; that is, to make part of his parliament. I have no queſtion but that their buſineſs was to make inquiſition concerning the loſſes and injuries ſuſtained by the church through John's arbitrary exceſſes, and report the ſame before the king in his parliament. See Brady's Hiſtory, 15 John, and Appendix. I find a writ very like that of the 15th John in the 38th Henry III. It ſhall be given in a future note.

[2] Ann. de Dunſtable. M. Paris.

[3] So were called places of occaſional and temporary habitation. It ſeems to ſignify the ſame as hotel of the French; in Latin, hoſpitium.

Boniface, archbiſhop of Canterbury,
Walter de Cantilupe, biſhop of Worceſter,
Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter,
Richard de Clare, earl of Glouceſter,
Peter de Savoy,
William de Fortibus, earl of Albemarle,
John Pleſſy, earl of Warwick,
Roger de Quency, earl of Winton,
John Fitz-Geoffry,
Peter de Montfort,
Richard de Grey,
Roger de Mortimer,
James de Aldithel,
Hugh Diſpenſer [1]."

On the 4th of November, that is, we may conclude, immediately after the diſſolution of this moſt famous parliament, which, we are told, held a month (which made it a very long one), and at which four knights, in quality of delegates or commiſſioners of the community of each county, had attended as a conſtituent part of the ſame, according to the writs iſſued from the king's chancery for their election and return, letters were ſent to the ſhire-reeves of England reſpectively, commanding them to pay reaſonable wages to ſuch knights delegate for their journey to the parliament upon the affairs touching the community of their ſeveral counties. This is the firſt known writ of the kind, and is of the ſame tenor with that of ſubſequent times, when it was become eſſential to a parliament to have in it the repreſentatives of counties, choſen by the knights and freeholders at leaſt, if not by tenants of the king in capite alſo, beneath major barons (the latter being ſpecially ſummoned) as procurators and attorneys for the community of each county [2].

And here we end the hiſtory of this remarkable year, which muſt for ever afford matter of copious reflection to the Engliſh philoſophical politician.

I ſhall ſubjoin two remarkable documents for general illuſtration.

A letter of ſome perſon of the king's court, concerning the parliament at Oxon.

"Health. Know, that in the parliament at Oxon was made juſtice of England ſir Hugh le Bigot, who ſwore to do juſtice to all complainants, and not to ſwerve from this conduct for the lord king, or for the queen, or for their children, or for any one living, or for any thing, nor for hate, or love, nor for intreaty, nor for price, nor will he receive any thing except eatables and drinkables, which are wont to be brought to the tables of the great. Afterwards, at the ſame place, were committed all the caſtles of the lord king to certain Engliſh perſons, which before were almoſt in the hands of aliens. The articles aforeſaid being adjuſted among the twenty-four ſworn men, it was agreed, that ſeeing the lord king was poor, ſo that were he or his realm perſecuted by ſome neighbouring prince, heavy danger would befal him and his realm, perhaps the ſubverſion of his whole kingdom; whereupon it was provided, that all the lands given away ſhould be reſtored to him [3], and all the tenements and caſtles alienated from the crown; which article his Poitevin brothers, and certain Engliſh who favoured them, to wit, Henry, ſon of the king of Almaine, and John de Warenne, oppoſed; and they all went off towards Winton, except the ſon of the king of Almaine, without licence of departure; but he, when the barons required his oath to ſtand by their proviſions, anſwered, that he had no land but at the will of his father, and therefore would not, as indeed he ought not, take any oath, as he was not their peer; and he then had a day for deliberating to conſult his father, viz. forty days. But, afterwards, all the barons, with horſes and arms, together with the king, repaired to Winton, prepared to beſiege the caſtle of the elect of Winton, viz. of Wlveſham, and afterwards his other caſtles, and the caſtles of William of Valence, and to purſue them to their utter extermination, unleſs they ſhould relax from their error committed againſt the community of the realm, concerning the Oxford proviſions; afterwards John de Warenne was reconciled with difficulty, and performed the oath purſuant to their will; afterwards the brothers of the king being at Wlveſham ſent their meſſengers to the barons, being willing to be reconciled, ſaying, they were prepared in all things to ſtand to their proviſions. To whom anſwer was returned, that, whereas they had ſworn from the outſet to provide together with them for the reformation and utility of the lord king, and of the realm, and ſo had receded from Oxon as ſeducers of the lord king, and the community, like men belying their faith by contradicting their articles and proviſions, no ſort of confidence could afterwards be repoſed in them; and that, therefore, it was neceſſary that they ſhould all go out of the kingdom with their ſuite until the eſtate of the realm ſhould be reformed, and afterwards the lord king, according to the advice that he ſhould have, ſhould give command about them. And when the lord king offered to give the caution of ſecurity for them, that they would prepare no impediment or trouble to the barons, nor would go againſt their proviſions, it was conceded and provided, that they ſhould, out of the two, elect and cauſe one; or that they ſhould go out of the realm, as was aforeſaid; or that two of them, to wit, Guy and Geoffrey de Lyſignan, ſhould go out of the kingdom finally, and the elect of Winton and William de Valence, who had lands in England, ſhould ſtay under ſafe and decent cuſtody to be provided by the barons until the eſtate of the realm ſhould be reformed. At laſt, they choſe all to go out of the realm, if ſo be that they might have the iſſue of their lands, which was not altogether acceded to; but that they ſhould have a ſuitable maintenance out of the iſſues of their lands by proviſion of the barons, and the reſidue ſhould remain in the country to their uſe, if it ſhould be found expedient to deliver it to them, which it is believed will never happen; and, when afterwards they petitioned that they might have their treaſure with them, there were allowed them only ſix thouſand marks; and the reſidue will remain in England, to make ſatiſfaction to all perſons preferring complaints againſt them and their bailiffs; and what ſhall be in overplus ſhall be kept for their uſe. Afterwards having requeſted and obtained letters of ſafe conduct [4], they all went off with the aforeſaid ſix thouſand marks, and no more; and, on the Lord's day next after the tranſlation of St. Thomas the Martyr, they embarked at Dover; and knights [5] were ſent to arreſt and ſeal up their treaſures in divers religious places."

"But at laſt the lord Edward, being brought to it with great difficulty, ſubmitted himſelf to the ordination and proviſion of the barons, who alſo appointed to him four counſellors, to wit, ſir John de Balliol, John de Gray, Stephen Lungſpee, and Roger de Mont-alt. In a ſhort time they will make proviſion about the ſtate of his houſehold, and of the houſehold of the lord king. But the king oftentimes deſired of them, that no one ſhould tarry with him unleſs he were an Engliſhman. And ſo it will be. Great and arduous things the barons have to make proviſion for, which cannot be ſpeedily and eaſily brought to a concluſion, and carried into effect. They will provide alſo, in a ſhort time, together with the lord king, at London, more things touching aliens, as well Romans as merchants, camſors, and others. To bring about the depoſition and privation of the elect of Winton, the barons propoſe to ſtrive vehemently, and they are now confederated with the monks of St. Swithin. The barons proceed with great ſpirit in the proſecution of their affairs. I wiſh them good ſucceſs[1]."

---

[1] Burton.

[2] See the writ in Brady's Appendix, in Hiſt. Eng. vol. I.

[3] Antiqua maneria, vel jura coronæ annexa regi non licebit alienare: ſed omnis rex coronæ ſuæ alienata revocare tenetur; nec obſtabit obligatio warrantiæ niſi per excambium vel aliter ad valentiam in dominico, vel in ſervitio, vel ſaltem ad commodum & honorem regis, ſicut baroniæ epiſcoporum & hujuſmodi fuerint conceſſa. Fleta, lib. I. c. 8. What would this author have ſaid, had he lived when the king of England had not a lordſhip in his realm on which he could appoint a game-keeper?

[4] Theſe may be ſeen in Rymer; they bear date July 5.

[5] Laymen of knightly quality, of the ſeveral counties, wherein the baniſhed had property.

The following extract, being part of a letter ſent by ſome great perſon, we may ſuppoſe one of the moſt eminent of Engliſh biſhops, to the pope about this time, is a curious ſample of the learning and politics of that age, and throws much light upon the preceding detail:

"I hear (ſays the learned writer[2]) that ſome people are in aſtoniſhment, that any remedies could be deviſed to prevent the ruin of the realm of England. Let him then that has not heard now hear; and let him that is ſurprized rejoice; for, this is the change of the right hand of the Moſt High; and, ſince we know that this was done by the Lord, it is not ſo much matter of ſurprize as of praiſe. It is truly a ſhame to ſpeak, and grief and diſgrace to diſcuſs the ſubject. But whereas, according to the philoſopher, a prince ſhould owe himſelf wholly to God, very much to his country, much to his relations and friends, and a little, perhaps, to ſome other things; certain brothers of our prince, who ought to ſuperintend the concerns of the wiſe and unwiſe, of the young and the old, preferring their private good to the public benefit, totally eſtranged him from the uſes of the republic; although the prince ought not to be his own, but rather a thing which belongeth to the ſubjects; for whereas, according to the laws and rights of his realm, he ought to manage the helm of government, according to the laws and rights of his realm, they damnably whiſpered in his ear, that a prince was not ſubject to the laws; and thus, as if a bill of divorce had been received, juſtice itſelf was baniſhed from the realm; for, the wicked devoured the righteous, the courtier the ruſtic, the oppreſſor the innocent, the fraudulent the plain man; and yet all theſe things remained unpuniſhed. Again, whereas it ſhould have been their care to make the king rich, and to have rich ſubjects; they, like offspring of the bloodſucker, were crying out, "Give! give!" and, like ſwarms of locuſts, when one ſwarm was gone, others ſucceeded, perniciouſly conſuming the little that was left; ſo that in them were fulfilled the words of the prophecy—"That which the palmer-worm hath left hath the locuſt eaten; and that which the locuſt has left hath the canker-worm eaten; and that which the canker-worm hath left hath the caterpillar eaten." Alſo, in divers ways oppreſſing the ſubjects, they heaped up money from the poverty of others, eſtabliſhing their own luxury in the calamity of the many; and why more? as if they had conſpired to be the death of the prince, they overturned the throne of royal majeſty, by denying juſtice to the ſubjects, by withdrawing wealth from the prince, by taking away from him the devotion of the people, whom they ought rather to have cauſed to be loved, inſtead of being hated by his ſubjects. And this plague had waxed ſo ſtrong, that the times of Rehoboam ſeemed to have fallen out, when the kingdom was divided; becauſe, ſetting at nought the councils of elders, he preferred thoſe of youth. But He, in whoſe hand are the hearts of kings, and who inclines them whitherſoever he will, mercifully breathed into the lord king the ſpirit of ſounder counſel; whereupon, reflecting that a kingdom is then in a ſtate of health when it is ruled by the counſel of wiſe men, he elected the older and more diſcreet men of the realm; willing, and promiſing, as well by writing as by oath, that the ordination which they or the greater part of them ſhould make about the reformation of the realm of England, which was now verging upon deſtruction, he would inviolably obſerve, and cauſe to be inviolably obſerved by his ſubjects. But they, namely, the elders, diligently weighing, that in the multitude of counſellors there was ſafety, named twelve; who know, are willing and able to forecaſt for the welfare of the land at large, and of the folks thereof; to teach the king to do juſtice, to obviate impending dangers, and reſtrain the malignant preſumption of all; to them gain admittance the cry of the poor, the tears of widows, the groans of orphans; for, they who were before aggrieved, and were not able to find comfort, are now heard in their juſt petitions: by theſe aged and diſcreet men the royal dignity is raiſed; for, now the king can command thoſe who before made him the object of contempt. It is firmly expected, that the eccleſiaſtical dignity, reduced by certain perſons to the diſgrace of ſervitude, will now ariſe into the luſtre of its former liberty. Peace is adminiſtered to the ſubjects; for, that they may acquire peace for others, they count toil as nothing, and lead ſleepleſs nights. Juſtice is freely exerciſed; for, before, the look of a man, and not election, made a judge; but now a juſtice is made by common council, who will not juſtify the impious for reward, but will judge the great as the ſmall, the weak as the powerful. There are alſo made other proviſions, whereby the king will abound in riches. And thus againſt two ſorts of wounds which they had inflicted, by thoſe perſons, namely, the twelve, two remedies are invented. The king, therefore, and his counſellors, that theſe affairs, ſo proſperous in their beginning, may ſtill be more proſperous in their iſſue, beg and crave that you would liberally grant them a legate, whom we now pray for in their name; that, by his wiſdom, thoſe things which are already enacted, and ſhall be enacted in future, may proceed to the praiſe of God, and the honour of the Roman church, without any ground for obloquy."

[3]"In the beginning of the year 1259, the barons were thrown under great difficulties, on account of the king of the Romans, who had ſignified to them his deſire of coming to England, to ſee his friends and attend his private affairs. It was ſuſpected, that Richard was coming to England through the ſecret inſtigation of king Henry, and that the latter, though he treated the barons with the appearance of reſpect, yet inwardly entertained ſiniſter intentions. And they apprehended that the two kings meant to unite to overthrow all that the barons had done, to take a ſevere revenge of them, and bring back the king's uterine brothers to England, who had been ſolemnly baniſhed the kingdom. After a great deal of anxious conſultation, they ſent a formal and reſpectful embaſſy to king Richard on the way, requeſting to know the cauſe of his coming to England, and what ſtay he meant to make here; they ſignified their deſire, and made it their demand, that he ſhould take the ſame oath that the king and all the great men had taken to ſupport the new regulations and late proviſions. It was matter of aſtoniſhment and concern to the nobles not to ſee the earl of Leiceſter in this council. A recent breach between him and the earl of Glouceſter had moved him to leave England abruptly, and in diſguſt. His abſence gave great grief to the whole nation, who did not know what kept him abroad, and feared that ſome accident might befall him; but it was more ſenſibly felt by the reforming barons, whoſe councils ſeemed to be rendered weak and abortive for want of the earl's preſence among them. The great perſons[4], ſent by the king and community of

---

[1] Burton. Chron. de Winton. MS. in Cotton Cod. [2] Ann. Burton, anno 1258, p. 424. [3] M. Paris and M. Weſtm.

[4] "Inhibuerunt etiam, quod nullus eum ſine licentia & conſenſu baronum navigio tranſduceret, comminatiſque nantis in portubus quod omnes, qui eum tranſnavigarent, capitis detruncatione punirentur. Habito igitur ibidem ſuper hoc tractatu continue per 11 dies, tandem ad hoc devenit, quod rex corporale præſtaret juramentum, quod quam cito veniſſet in Angliam rege ſibi injungente in præſentia parium ſuorum ſacramentum ipſum emittere in forma quam petebant; ſicque tranſfretare permiſſus eſt." T. Wykes.

England on this occaſion to king Richard, were the biſhop of Worceſter, the abbot of St. Edmund, Peter of Savoy, and John Manſel. The king of the Romans was come as far as Witſand, in Flanders, when he received the reſolution of the barons delivered to him by the ambaſſadors. He was accompanied by a numerous body of grandees, all armed and mounted, and was employed in collecting a great army, thinking to intimidate the barons, and force his way into England. As ſoon as he received their meſſage, he ſwore, by the throat of God, that he would neither take their oath, nor tell them what ſtay he intended to make in England. He added, that he had no peer in England, that he was ſon of the late king, brother of the preſent, and earl of Cornwall; and that, if the nobles of England wanted to reform the diſordered ſtate of the realm, they ought not to have been ſo precipitate, and preſumptuouſly ſet about it without his preſence or knowledge. One of the ambaſſadors who ſtood near him was juſt about to make the following reply, but was prevented by a ſecret check of one of his colleagues: 'We have often made you our leader for reforming the ſinking realm, but by the impulſe of avarice you have ſlyly and ſuddenly ſtudied to enſnare us, when contriving to amend the ſtate of the king and kingdom; by which means, the king, revolting from his good purpoſes, made afterwards all perſons within his power feel the effects of his reſentment.' To avoid farther altercation, the meſſengers embarked, and returned to England; and the great men on this ſide the water collected from the Cinque ports and other places all the ſhips and veſſels they could to hinder the king of the Romans from landing; and alſo muſtered a body of horſe and foot to engage him ſo ſoon as he ſhould diſembark on the Engliſh coaſt, if he got the better by ſea. Richard, ſeeing theſe ſerious preparations, was perſuaded to ſubmit to milder courſes, and therefore offered to take the oath as ſoon as he ſhould arrive in England, if king Henry ſhould command him ſo to do. Accordingly, the king iſſued his warrant for the purpoſe on the 23d of January. In it is found a clauſe, whereby Richard was required to ſwear not to bring his and the king's uterine brothers, or be acceſſary to their return, without the conſent of the king and his grandees. Hereupon Richard landed with a ſcanty and retrenched train, and took the oath required in Canterbury church in the preſence of the king and his nobles. It may be obſerved here, once for all, that while king Richard was on this viſit to England he lived very privately, with a view to recruiting his finances, which were much impaired by German expences, and the barons went on with their affairs without paying much attention to Richard [1]."

The zeal and diligence which had actuated the barons the former year continued in full vigour. They went on with their plan of making new ſtatutes for the exigence of the kingdom; but not without ſome obſtacles, that aroſe from a quarter whence they could hardly be expected. The powerful earl of Glouceſter betrayed ſtrong ſymptoms of inconſtancy, which firſt produced a rupture between him and the earl of Leiceſter, and ſubſequently the earl of Leiceſter's abrupt departure from England. "I do not like (ſaid he to the earl of Glouceſter) to be concerned with men who are fickle and deceitful. The matters under our management have been undertaken by joint and ſolemn conſent. We have ſworn to maintain them; and for you, my lord earl of Glouceſter, in the ſame degree that you are ſuperior to others in rank and opulence, you ought to be over and beyond others in promoting regulations which are manifeſtly wholeſome and good;" and ſoon after he left England in diſguſt. The earl of Hereford, and other nobles, his compeers, when they heard of the earl of Leiceſter's departure, were much offended with the earl of Glouceſter, who had been the cauſe of it; and demanded, that, as it was through him the earl of Leiceſter had withdrawn himſelf, they ſhould look to him as reſponſible for his return; and recommended to him to pacify the offended and injured earl by ſuitable apologies and conceſſions, and induce him to rejoin his colleagues in going on with the work, which was of ſuch general public importance. They inſiſted alſo, that the earl of Glouceſter ſhould faithfully maintain the things unto which he had been ſworn, and correct what needed correction throughout his own lands [2], or they would aſſail him as an enemy. The earl of Glouceſter, hearing this, began to be much alarmed, and diſpatched his ſeneſchal into all his lands [3], that right might be done according to the late ſtatutes. And thus the ſtorm blew over for the preſent; and the nobles conceived good hope of having the earl of Leiceſter ſoon among them again.

"On the day of the Purification of the bleſſed Mary, the two kings and their queens, and a multitude of the nobles of England, came to London."

On the octaves of the Purification [4], the nobles of England aſſembled in parliament purſuant to previous agreement; and in this council appeared the earl of Leiceſter, as did alſo the dean of Bourges, one of the king of France's ſpecial and privy counſellors, and recently ſent hither by that monarch. At this parliament the great affair of the kings of England and France underwent a long and cloſe inveſtigation, and report was made of what had been done in France on that ſubject. A ſhort time after the form of peace was made and ſettled, if the two kings ſhould ſtart no objection to the terms agreed to between their ſolemn and ſpecial nuncios [4]."

"The ſame year, and latter end of February, were apprehended at London Walter de Scoteney, the chief councellor of the earl of Glouceſter, and his ſeneſchal, being ſuſpected of having given the poiſonous potion to the earl, who was himſelf hardly ſaved from the gates of death, and to his brother William de Clare, who was really killed by it; alſo was taken William de Buſſey, whoſe villanies, if related, muſt excite horror and aſtoniſhment. He was the ſeneſchal and principal counſellor of William de Valence. Thoſe men, although they had been under the ſafe cuſtody of their ſureties, being now ſeized and brought before the judges, were committed to a viler priſon, and put in chains [5]."

There was a congregation of all the grandees of England at London on Hokeday, or quindenes of Eaſter [6].

"About the calends of April, by precept and council of the lord king of England and of the whole baronage of England, began their journey to foreign parts, to be at a great parliament of the king of France, the earls of Clare and Leiceſter, John Manſel, Peter of Savoy, and Robert Walerand, taking with them the charter of the lord king of England, about the reſignation of Normandy, and letters of credence for adjuſting all differences which had ariſen between England and France with the king of France and his council, according to the preliminaries previouſly adjuſted by their reſpective nuncios. The event, continues M. Paris, is not yet authenticated by any written account, by reaſon of the diſperſion of the nuncios." But the plenipotentiaries hardly left England quite ſo ſoon; as our public records ſeem to evince.

The preliminary [7] treaty offered by France was not acceded to and finally ſigned by the king of England till the 20th of May[1]. And on the ſame day the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, Peter of Savoy, John de Bailiol, and Robert Walerand, were appointed by the king's letters patent to carry it into complete execution. They were likewiſe authorized to ſettle the compoſition for the five hundred knights, and for the country d'Agenois, for which king Henry was to be paid a valuable conſideration.

---

[1] M. Paris.

[2] That is, throughout the ſeignories or fiefs, within which he had franchiſe or liberty, the king's ordinary juriſdiction being excluded therefrom.

[3] "On the octaves of the Purification, there was a great congregation of all the biſhops and abbots before the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the grandees of England, and the parliament held till Lent." Annals of Hyde, MS. in Bibl. Bodl.

[4] M. Paris. [5] M. Weſtm. [6] Ann. Hyde. [7] Rymer.

By the ſame preliminary treaty it was expreſsly ſtipulated that the renunciation of Normandy, Touraine, Anjou, and the other places ſpecified in the act of accord, ſhould be made by the counteſs of Leiceſter and her heirs, and the treaty of peace ſigned by them, in bar of any title which any of them might ſet up to the lands ceded to France for ever by the letter of the treaty[2].

We find by another inſtrument of the 20th of May, that the king of England undertakes for himſelf, and his heirs, to indemnify the king and his heirs, as to any claim which the counteſs of Leiceſter, or her heirs, might ſet up to the ceded lands[3].

On the 28th of July, the king joined the earl of Leiceſter, with Peter of Montfort, and maſter John Suthvil, in a commiſſion to go again to the king of France upon ſome confidential buſineſs, and certain things touching the ratification of the treaty of peace[4].

Hugh le Bigot[5], the high juſticiar, having taken for his aſſociates Roger de Turkelby and Gilbert de Preſton, began this ſummer to make the circuit of England, and to go from county to county, and from liberty to liberty, in order to diſpenſe juſtice to all men, according to their deſerts. Theſe men, well verſed in the Engliſh laws, and upright and accurate in all their deciſions, were appointed for this purpoſe by the community of the realm, as the fitteſt perſons for this employment. Steadily and manfully following up the inquiſitions lately made by the four knights, they took cognizance of various treſpaſſes and injuries of long ſtanding, and almoſt forgotten, without fear or affection of any perſons whatever. Coming to Wincheſter, they brought Walter de Scotenay[6], ſteward of the earl of Glouceſter, to his trial for poiſoning William de Clare, the preceding year. Scotenay was convicted, condemned, and executed[7].

"Not long after returned to England thoſe ſolemn commiſſioners of the king of England, namely, the earl of Clare, John Manſel, Peter of Savoy, and Robert Walerand, the earl of Leiceſter yet remaining beyond ſea. Theſe lords, being about to diſcloſe the reſult of their negotiation at the parliament of the king of France, convened for that purpoſe the grandees of England, in preſence of the king, at London; and in public preſented the anſwers and wiſhes of the French; and alſo ſeveral articles, for confirming which between the kings and their reſpective realms they had been ſent abroad; of which articles afterwards in their order they would ſpeak publicly. After a deliberate and profound diſcuſſion of theſe matters it was, by common conſent, immediately provided, that, as the ſucceſs of the treaty hung on king Henry's going in perſon to France, he ſhould, with certain of his grandees, and ſir Richard his brother, king of Almaine, croſs the ſea, and meet the king of France and his council. To this the commune of England conſented; and ſo this parliament ended: which being done, ſeeing that a little time before a ſummons had iſſued, commanding all perſons who owed the king military ſervice, that at the feaſt of St. Peter ad vincula next coming they ſhould be ready with horſe and arms to fight againſt the Welſh, and avenge, as faithful lieges, the injuries of the king and kingdom, yet, as the king and very many of his grandees would not be able, on account of the king's voyage to France, to take a ſhare in his Welſh expedition, it was thought adviſable to make a truce with the Welſh for one year; it ſeeming the better way that one thing ſhould remain undone, than the other be left unfiniſhed. On Wedneſday, within the octaves of the Aſſumption of the bleſſed Mary, came the lord king to St. Alban's; but he tarried there only the ſpace of one night, and on the morrow returned to London. In the morning, after hearing divine ſervice, he had the ſhrine drawn out which contained the body of the glorious martyr Alban, which was raiſed, and religiouſly placed before the great altar; then, when the convent was properly habited, the king, together with his nobles, approached, being about to make his addreſſes with particular ſolemnity to the martyr. After proſtration under the holy corpſe, was ſung ſolemnly a ſpecial canticle concerning the ſaint, with a ſuitable office, applicable to the king's voyage then approaching. A large crowd of people, together with the convent, ſtanding, and a ſpecial ſilence made, one of the brethren of the convent unfolded the cauſe of the king's coming. He told the auditory, that the great perſon now before them was the prince and head of the realm; and that, for expediting the buſineſs of the realm, he was about to croſs the ſea, in perfect ignorance of what might befal him, and uncertain with reſpect to his ever returning; and that, therefore, he came thither a devote, humbly craving from the glorious martyr licence and aid, and from the convent and the people preſent their prayers. Immediately the ſpecial and daily devotion of maſſes and prayers is granted to the king by all, ſeverally and together, till advice ſhould be brought of his ſafe return to England. The king and his ſuite returned their warmeſt thanks, and he again deſired the collects to be repeated for his ſafe voyage; and thus, having recruited his devotion, he departed with more chearful confidence. When he got back to London, he found certain impediments which obliged him to defer his journey to France. About the ſame time, Athelmar, biſhop elect of Winton, who had been judicially baniſhed from England, and had now tarried a long time at the court of Rome ſoliciting his reſtoration to the ſee of Winton, and his return to England, after having deceived the pope by the moſt artful ſtories in his own favour, and by making the moſt ſolemn proteſtations of his own innocence, and of the injurious treatment he had received, and by aſſuring his holineſs, that through the malice of three or four perſons only he had been deſpoiled of his wealth, and ejected from his biſhoprick, and violently expelled the kingdom, againſt the aſſent of the king and kingdom, and of the community of the land, who would all be glad to ſee him return; he obtained the papal letters for a plenary reſtitution of all his property in England. Whereupon a frier of the order of Minors, by name Walaſchus, with certain aſſociates, was ſent ſpecially from the pope, with precept and power to inſtate, by papal authority, the clerk aforeſaid in his ſee, and all other things which had been taken from him; and all gainſayers, and ſeizers, and detainers of his goods, to include in the ſentence of excommunication and interdict. As ſoon as Walaſchus arrived, and, amidſt the aſſembled grandees in preſence of the king, had made enquiry about the truth of what had been alleged, there was not a diſſenting voice upon the ſubject; the whole aſſembly adhered to their firſt purpoſe, verified all that their commiſſioners had ſtated at the court of Rome, and confuted every iota of what had been urged in contradiction, and convinced the papal nuncio that his holineſs had been moſt egregiouſly impoſed upon [1]. Whereupon it was proclaimed by all, together with the king, and an appeal reſolved upon the ground, that a man, proſcribed after this manner by deciſion of law, ſhould not be reſtored by his own knavery, and that the buſineſs concerning Athelmar ſhould be purſued no farther to the general detriment of the realm; which as ſoon as the nuncio heard, he went away of his own accord, and the elect was farther from his object than before. About the ſame time was made a general collection of money from all the clergy of England, as well exempt as non exempt; to wit, of a thirtieth of all their eccleſiaſtical revenues and arrearages of tithes, and other things contained in the writings of biſhops, to be paid on the quindenes of St. Michael following to three biſhops, namely, of Bath, Ely, and Rocheſter, who bound themſelves to the court of Rome in five thouſand and five hundred marks for the king, to prevent ſentence of excommunication from being pronounced againſt the perſon of the king, and the general interdict of the realm, for the great debt of the king not yet liquidated. After Walaſchus had withdrawn himſelf, a queſtion was moved, how he had contrived to get into England; and by whoſe authority he was allowed to come hither without the aſſent of the community. And, when it was found out that he was permitted by the king's letter, and that the great ſeal had been detained in the king's chamber, ſir Hugh Bigot, the juſtice, haſtened as faſt as poſſible to Dover, and thus addreſſed Richard de Grey, conſtable of Dover, and keeper of the port: "Since you, O Richard, received your appointment from the univerſity of the land, as a moſt faithful warden of the ports, and an examiner of all perſons going in and out, why did you permit ſuch a perſon (even if he were allowed by the king's licence) to enter without warning us of it, and thereby go againſt our common proviſion, and your own oath? We judge you to be depoſed from your office, and worthy to receive ſentence of condemnation for your treſpaſs, to the general danger of the realm." Richard being depoſed, the wardenſhip of the ports of England is taken into the hand of the ſaid Hugh the juſtice, together with the caſtle of Dover. About the feaſt of St. Michael, the biſhop of Bangor was ſent to the king of England on the part of Leoline prince of Wales, and of all the grandees of Wales, to reform the peace between them, and fully eſtabliſh it; adding, that they would, by common aſſent, willingly confer on the king of England, on the part of Leoline prince of Wales, ſixteen thouſand pounds of ſilver for peace between them and their realms, and that they might placitate at Cheſter as they were wont in old times, and might enjoy the laws of their anceſtors, and the cuſtoms of their country. In his way to London, the biſhop made a ſtop at the abbey of St. Alban; and, during his ſtay there, came the lady queen haſtening to London in order to be there on the feaſt of St. Edward. Coming to the abbey at the time of dinner, ſhe was met by the convent in ſolemn proceſſion, and they made her an offering of ſix palls. Although at her arrival ſhe was extremely ill, ſhe went forward for London the next day in very tempeſtuous weather. Soon after proviſion was made at London at a general parliament of the barons about juſtices, who were ſoon to commence their eyres, and who were to go into the ſeveral counties to publiſh and eſtabliſh the proviſions, and diſcuſs treſpaſſes in violation of theſe proviſions; ſo that before Eaſter next coming all England might be circuited, and full ſcrutiny be made of every article of which the juſtices were to take cognizance; which were ſpecified and communicated in the French tongue. About the feaſt of St. Martin, the lord king, with the queen and a large company of noblemen, ſet off for Dover, in their way to France, whither they were repairing for expediting the affairs between the kings of England and France, and their realms. The cuſtody of the realm was previouſly committed to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, to ſir Hugh Bigot, the juſtice, and others of the king's lieges. On Friday after the feaſt of St. Martin the king embarked at Dover, and had a proſperous voyage to Witſand." So writes Matthew of Weſtminſter.

---

[1] "King Henry, as he had not the heart to demand the lands that were loſt, nor money to pay for recovering them, and eſpecially as he ſaw his ſubjects of England preparing to riſe againſt him, accepted the terms of pacification, as it were, by compulſion." Contin. M. Paris. [2] Rymer. [3] Ibid. [4] Ibid. [5] M. Weſtm. and Annals of Hyde.

[6] Here M. Paris's hiſtory ends abruptly. We find it continued to the end of Henry III. by an author of no talents, in compariſon of M. Paris.

[7] "Eadem ſeptimana fuit Walterus de Scoteney, qui ſe in comitatu poſuerat, convictus de potione fratris comitis Gloverniæ porrecta. Unde judicialiter eſt ad patibulum per civitatem tractus, & Wintoniæ ſuſpenſus." M. Weſtm.

"Septimana vero eadem Walterus de Scoteney, quondam ſeneſcallus comitis Gloverniæ præcipuus de potione mortifera, ut prædictum eſt, diffamatus captus & diro carceri mancipatus in comitatibus tribus, ſed præcipue Wintoniæ ſe poſuit diſcutiendum. Sed quod lachrymoſum eſt & dicere & audire, a quo majorem liberationis ſperabat fiduciam ab eo celeriorem paſſus eſt veridicam damnationem. Requiſiti vero a judicibus, qualiter hoc verius ita judicialiter proferendo cognoſcerent reſponderunt, quoniam nunquam ſcivimus aut audivimus dictum Willielmum de Valentia, aut aliquem fratrum ſuorum eidem Waltero in aliquo debitorem fuiſſe, ſed bene & veraciter novimus eundem Walterum a prædicto Willielmo maximam nuper ſuſcepiſſe pecuniæ quantitatem. Hoc melius arbitrantes remunerari eidem ob potionem domino ſuo comiti, & Willielmo de Clare, fratri ejus multiſque aliis per eum, ut prædictum eſt, porrectam ad eorundem exulantium ultionem refundendam, quam ob aliquod aliud debitum inter eos præhabitum aut excogitatum. Et ob hoc verius, quod Willielmus de Clare ſentiens ſe intoxicatum, & mori proximum dixit in propatulo, quod ſcirent omnes ſine dubio ſe per Walterum de Scotiney mortis traditum voracitati. Quibus auditis de proditione hujuſmodi ita convictus judicialiter eſt Wintoniam tractus, & in patibulo horribiliter ſuſpenſus." M. Paris.

According to M. Weſtminſter, Scoteney put himſelf upon his trial in the county of Southampton, where the murder was committed. According to M. Paris, he put himſelf to be tried in three counties, particularly that of Winton. Requiſiti has no ſubſtantive in the text; probably juratores is the word wanting. It might denote the jury of freeholders; to ſuch the context ſeems plainly to point; and we find them giving their verdict againſt the culprit, according to their private knowledge and opinion. The judgement, we ſee, was entirely in them. Sir William Dugdale ſtyles Scoteney a baron of the realm. Were barons then ſubject to trial for felony by a county jury? But I do not think Scoteney was a baron or tenant of the king in capite, as of his crown, for lands and tenements holden therefrom by barony.

"But the projected peace between the two crowns[2], after all the negotiations that had been carried on by the miniſters of each ſovereign, when every thing ſeemed to promiſe a certain and ſpeedy concluſion, ſuſtained a ſudden check from the requiſitions of the counteſs of Leiceſter. It had been intended by king Henry, in his act of renunciation of Normandy, the principal object of the treaty, to comprehend that counteſs's ſhare of that dutchy, to which ſhe would not conſent; which refuſal gave great offence to the earl of Glouceſter, and induced him to treat the earl of Leiceſter with very indecent language; which being retorted by the latter, the altercation was growing very ſharp, and a bloody conteſt was apprehended. But, to avoid entertaining the French with a ſight of their quarrel, they were brought by the interpoſition of friends to deſiſt from farther conteſt. And they quitted France amidſt the jeers of the French, without putting the finiſhing hand to the treaty of peace."

---

[1] See the anſwer of the king to the pope in Brady's Anſwer to Petyt, p. 83. It is very curious; dated 23 Sept. 43 Hen. The perſons concurring with the king in rejecting the pope's petition were "the barons and nobles, being counſellors of the king, and the other univerſity of earls, barons, and proceres of the realm." Dr. Brady triumphed over the advocate of liberty, when he maintained, in oppoſition to Mr. Petyt, that univerſity in this place did not comprehend what they both called commoners. Nothing is more clear. But the advocate for ſlavery did not therefore eſtabliſh his point, that the commonalty had, at no time preceding, preſence in the king's parliament, or ſuffrage in granting aids out of their own money. The communa, or, as we may ſay at this day, the commons of no county in England, were ever bound to obey any ſtatute, or pay to any aid, in which their own aſſent was not either given or implied.

[2] "Comes autem Leiceſtriæ (ſo writes Th. Wykes) huic paci oppoſuit, proponens quod proceſſu temporis contingere poſſet, quod eædem terræ ſimul cum regno Angliæ ad filios ſuos vel heredes jure hereditario deſcendere poſſent. Ejus rei cauſâ pax ipſa non ſumſit effectum," &c. And he aſcribes the king's ſtay in France to this untowardneſs of the earl of Leiceſter. Probably both prince Edward and the earl of Leiceſter were againſt this peace. "I do not find," ſays Mr. Tyrrel, "that this great agreement was ever confirmed by the prince or his uncle Richard, as was at firſt inſiſted on; and then, if, according to the French maxim, kings could only renounce for themſelves, and not for their heirs, it could only oblige thoſe princes that made it. And the Annals of St. Auſtin farther tell us, that this agreement being chiefly made by the advice of Richard earl of Glouceſter, and without the conſent of the prince (who then remained in England), he was very much incenſed againſt the earl, and thoſe other counſellors of the king his father, who procured it." Tyrrel's Hiſt. vol. II. p. 997.

The annaliſt of Burton has preſerved a collection of circumſtances, which throws a great deal of light on the tranſactions of the Michaelmas parliament of this year. The greater part of this account is in the old Norman French; in which language the parliamentary proceedings ſeem to be then held. The tranſlation is as near and clear as I can make it. But I ſuſpect it is not always true.

"The feaſt of St. Edward the king and confeſſor, having been royally celebrated at Weſtminſter, on the quindenes of St. Michael, by the lord king, the community of the bachelery[1] of England ſignified to the lord Edward, ſon of the king, to the earl of Glouceſter, and others, ſworn of the council at Oxford, that the lord king had totally done and fulfilled all and each of the things which the barons had provided and impoſed upon him; and that the barons[2] themſelves had done nothing for the benefit of the common wealth, and according to their promiſe, but had minded their own intereſt only, and not the king's; and that, unleſs they altered their conduct, reformation ſhould be effected by other means. The lord Edward immediately anſwered for himſelf, that he had taken a certain oath at Oxon, which, however, although he had taken it againſt his will, he was diſpoſed ſpontaneouſly and fully to keep and obſerve, and to expoſe himſelf to death for the community of England, and for the good of the commonwealth, according to the nature of that oath; and he plainly made it known to the barons, who were ſworn of the council, that, unleſs they fulfilled their aforeſaid oath, he would ſtand by the community even unto death, and cauſe the promiſes they had made to be performed. At length the barons, ſeeing it was more expedient that what they had undertaken ſhould be done by themſelves rather than by others; they, therefore, cauſed the following proviſions to be publiſhed;

[Theſe proviſions were written in French; the matter of them very miſcellaneous; a conſiderable part contains regulations concerning ſuits of tenants at their lords courts, relaxations in favour of biſhops, abbots, priors, earls, and barons, religious, and women, with reſpect to their ſuite or attendance at the ſhire-reeve's turns, and ſome other points relating to police and courts of juſtice; all long ago either obliterated, or blended in the great maſs of Engliſh juriſprudence. Theſe proviſions were deemed, at that time, as very valuable acquiſitions on the ſide of liberty and public happineſs: but, for want of allowed legal validity, on account of the manner in which they were ſometimes made, they were enacted ſeveral times: finally and permanently they became eſtabliſhed in the 52d year of Henry III. after he had deſtroyed Montfort and his party, by the ſtatute which in our printed collection of acts of parliament is called the ſtatute of Marlborough.]

But the proviſions which compoſed the ſtatute of Marlborough were not all that were enacted at this time. The additional ones were theſe: "[3] Moreover, that juſtices be provided to go through the land; and let there be one of the twelve, or of others of the commune, to ſee that juſtice be done to complainants, and to all others; and let him ſee, that the eſtabliſhments which are or ſhall be made for the profit of the realm, be ſent to the county, that they may be put in force there; alſo, that the proviſions which are made ſince the commencement of theſe eſtabliſhments, be taken thither and maintained; moreover, let rolls of theſe eſtabliſhments be made and taken care of; and let the charters of franchiſe and of the foreſt be kept and maintained. It is provided alſo, that no one come to parliament with horſes and arms, nor armed, unleſs he be ſpecially ordered by the king, or by his council, or by writ, for common buſineſs of the land. Whereas juſtices errant lately itered, let there be attorned good men and ſage[4], to hear and order all plaints which can be terminated without writ, for the laſt ſeven years: yet ſo, that if any one's plaint of more than ſeven years ſtanding has not been redreſſed, it ſhall ſtill be redreſſed; and let them have power to make inqueſt concerning ſhire-reeves, and their bailiffs, how they have behaved to the country ſince the late eſtabliſhments; and let them aſk the rich men concering the bailiffs; and alſo let enquiry be made concerning the rich men themſelves; let juſtices in eyre have the ſame power in their eyre as ſhire-reeves, likewiſe their own power during their eyre. And let it be provided, that ſome perſons of the council, two or three, be conſtantly about the king from parliament to parliament, and at each of the parliaments be changed, and others put in; and let their acts be brought to every parliament. And let be amended, if any thing require amendment, by thoſe of the council; and if any great buſineſs ariſe between parliament and parliament, which cannot be determined by the aforeſaid two or three, or which cannot be well delayed to the next parliament, let all ſuch of the council be ſummoned by writ to determine ſuch matter, and be put in ſuch writ the occaſion of ſuch ſummons, if the matter be not ſecret; and ſome others of the council, or of the aforeſaid two or three, come to court by the mandate of the king, or for his proper buſineſs, that they be of the council of the king, ſo long as the matters ſhall continue, for which they were ſummoned; or which concern the king. Be it remembered, that two prode men[4] be provided to ſell the wards, which now in right are in the hand of the king; moreover, that two prode men be provided, to ordain alſo, together with the council of the exchequer, of viſcounts and of counts; moreover, be provided perſons to go with the king into France, and who ſhall remain in the land near the juſtice; and that anſwer be given to the meſſengers from Wales; and be it provided, that writs for purveance do iſſue out of chancery without delay; likewiſe of meſſengers who ſhall go to Rome; for ſelling wards at preſent be appointed the juſtice, the treaſurer, maſter Thomas Wimundham, ſir Roger de Torkelby, ſir Henry de Bath; and let theſe ſame ordain and provide in what articles the queen ought to have gold[5]. It is provided, that theſe ſame come to the exchequer, and ſee the ſums of all manner of talliage which have been put for the time of the king. And that it be alſo ſpecified how much each talliage amounts to; and let theſe ſame provide how much ſhould go in advance in pleas of cuſtoms or of ſervices; likewiſe provide how much ought to go in advanee in eſcheats and in wards. Be it provided, what perſon ought to go to amend the treſpaſſes and the torts done, which can be determined without writs; let the juſtice provide it with the others; and who ſhall be at the bank with the juſtices, and who ſhall be at the exchequer. It is provided, that four knights be put in every county to ſee the torts which the ſhire-reeves do; if it happen that they do torts, let them cauſe that theſe four do admoniſh the ſhire-reeves, that they cauſe them to be amended; and if they will not amend them, let them put the torts done in a roll, and ſhew them to the high juſtice at the head of the year, when he ſhall demand them; or before, if he requires them. If it be ſo, that the plaintiffs to whom the torts are done are willing to ſue; and that the aforeſaid four knights do not have the power to diſturb the ſhire-reeves in their office; let the high juſtice, the treaſurer, ſir Henry de Bath, ſir Roger de Turkelby, and the barons of the exchequer, provide this year immediately what prode men, and honeſt and wiſe, be ſhire-reeves this year; and let them be vavaſors of the ſame counties; and againſt the next year, at the next county-court before the feaſt of St. Michael, be elected, in full county-court, four prode men and honeſt, and who may be profitable to the king and to the county in ſuch office; and let them be at St. Michael at the exchequer; and let the barons take ſufficient care in this behalf; moreover be there elected, by the high juſtice and by the treaſurer, prode men in this advent, and in theſe days of feaſt, againſt the next parliament, who ſhall amend at the grand exchequer, and at the exchequer of Guienne; and by theſe ſame be provided reaſonable ſuſtenance to thoſe who ſhall be at one exchequer and at the other. It is provided, that ſir Thomas de Greſly, juſtice of the foreſt, take Nicholas de Ramſey, and three knights of every county, and enquire the eſtate of the foreſts, of vert and veniſon, and of ſales and deſtructions; and by whom they were made; and enquire of bad cuſtoms, of pleas of the foreſt, and from whom they are ariſen, and from what time; and when this ſhall have been done, let him make it known to the king and his council. The ſame thing be done with the foreſts of the Trent, that the high juſtice provide four knights, and enquire of all the foreſts of the Trent, in manner aboveſaid. The archbiſhops, and the biſhop of Worceſter, the earl mareſchal, the earl of Warwick, be with the juſtice at the great buſineſs of the realm, to treat, ſo long as the king ſhall be out of England; and all thoſe of the council, and the twelve on the part of the community, who remain in England, if there be need, be ſent for. Let ſir Philip Baſſet and ſir Roger de Mortimer be conſtantly with the juſtice. It is provided, that the juſtice provide that the chaſtelans have reaſonable ſuſtenance for the caſtles of the king to keep and ſuſtain them. It is provided, to put two prode men of the commune, or of the twelve who are on the part of the commune, or of others, with the juſtices of the bench; and that they ſee that right be done; and in ſame manner be put two prode men of the commune, or of the twelve who are on the part of the commune, or of others, at the exchequer. Theſe are the purveyances and the eſtabliſhments done at Weſtminſter, at the parliament at St. Michael, by the king, and by his council, and the twelve by the common council elected by the ſaid communance of England, which was then done at Weſtminſter, the year of the reign of Henry, ſon of king John, forty-third [1]."

---

[1] Communitas bacheleriæ Angliæ. The expreſſion, I conceive, denotes the ſame claſs of men, as about the time of Henry II. was frequently ſtyled milites and militia regni; the milice, or chivalry of England, viz. the young and active part of the gentry, or baronage, who were propenſe to arms, and feats of the tournament. The latter was a favourite ſport, and ſeems ſometimes to have brought together the whole flower of the Engliſh nobility. "Ipſo quoque tempore haſtiludium commiſſum eſt apud Brackele, ubi multi de militibus univerſitatis regni, qui ſe volunt bachelarios appellari, ſunt contriti. In ipſo etiam torneamento comes Gloverniæ Richardus, qui ſe alienigenis ſemper opponere, & partem favere indigenarum conſueverat, ipſis alienis conjunctus eſt, in enormem ſuæ famæ leſionem & honoris. Per hoc enim pars Anglorum eſt confuſa. In illo igitur conflictu cum prevaluiſſet Willielmus de Valentia, frater domini regis, juvante dicto comite, male tractavit Willielmum de Odingeſſeles militem ſtrenuum, qui bachelariis annumerabatur." M. Paris, 1249.—And Wykes, 1263, obſerves, that, in London and almoſt all the cities and burghs of England, were formed combinations of ribalds (the name of a bold and ſeditious rabble), qui ſe bachalarios publice proclamabant.

[2] Ann. Burton.

[3] Thoſe ſworn of the council, together with the delegates of the community of England, called communa in the roll.

[4] I ſuppoſe knights or freeholders of the county, men of good character, choſen by the county. Rich men and prode men I conceive to be the ſame. See Rici homines in Spelman's Gloſſary, and Madox, Exchequer, and Du Cange.

[5] Sc. Aurum reginæ. See Madox, Exch.

"This year peace and concord were made between the kings of France and England, concerning Normandy, and other tranſmarine lands of the king of England, at Paris, in the preſence of both kings, with their council; and the act of agreement was committed to writing, and ratified by reciprocal ſignatures. By this inſtrument it was ſpecified, that the king of France ſhould hold Normandy, and the words 'duke of Normandy' be for ever excluded from the ſtyle of the king of England [2]." This important ſurrender and agreement received their completion on the 15th of December, 1259 [3].

"About the purification of the bleſſed Virgin, 1260, iſſued a writ from the chancery of the king (then abſent abroad) to all the ſhire-reeves, in whoſe bailiwics travellers were wont to be expoſed to danger, that they ſhould cauſe all places favourable to robbers to be well examined, and the ſame to be made ſafe, either at the expence of the ſaid ſhire-reeves, or of the lords of ſuch places [4]. At that time ſir Simon earl of Leiceſter returned to England, which had been for too long a time deprived of his preſence; and on the day of the virgin Scholaſtica coming to St. Alban's, for the ſake of viſiting the martyr and convent, made an offering of a precious baldekin to the tomb, and early the next morning purſued his journey [5]."

I ſuppoſe it is of this return of the earl of Leiceſter to England that king Henry ſpeaks in the following letter, written early in the ſpring. It indicates ſtrong reſentments reciprocally about this time between king Henry and the earl:

"The king to the king of France, greeting. We intimate to your ſerenity, that we and the queen, and our children, arrived ſafe at Witſand on Wedneſday after the quindenes of the Paſſover, ready to croſs the ſea, as ſoon as the wind blew favourably for that purpoſe, with certain knights, whom we take with us from this ſide the ſea: ſignifying to your highneſs, that we have got certain information that our brothers of Poitou, together with the viſcount of Limoges, had collected a multitude of armed men to come into England, againſt our will; wherefore we intreat your excellency, with all poſſible earneſtneſs, that you would by letter make it your mandate to the duke of Bretagne, that, if they ſhould happen to paſs through his dominion, he would hinder and repel them with all his might. We have underſtood that certain grandees of your dominion give counſel and favour in this behalf to our enemies; whereupon, ſeeing, that, next to God, our chief confidence is in you, we hope that this their impetuous act will meet with a ſuitable check through you, and be fruſtrated. But the earl of Leiceſter has cauſed ſome deſtrers to paſs by the port of Wytſand, when we were yet in thoſe parts, on the pretext of certain letters of yours, of ſafe conduct, which were exhibited; whereby you will be able clearly to ſee the diſpoſition of that earl's mind with reſpect to us, in theſe days, concerning theſe and other things which may be injurious to us; with your leave we deſire you to be on a ſtrict guard; and we, when we are arrived in England, will certify you of our ſtate, and of our realm; being prepared to do whatever we know to be your will and pleaſure. Witneſs, &c. at Wytſand, 28 April, in the year, &c. 44 [6]."

Whether a difference in political opinion, a ſenſe of injury, or want of filial affection, were the cauſe of a freſh diſagreement, between king Henry and his eldeſt ſon, does not clearly appear. But that ſuch a diſagreement had really happened, and that it was carried to a high degree of mutual diſpleaſure about this time, is evinced both by chronicles and records. That the earl of Leiceſter was alſo at this time at ſharp variance with the king is plain as well from the letter ſent to the king of France on the 28th of April as from the incidents we are going to relate. The earl was unalterably attached to the late reform, to which we have ſeen prince Edward give a ſtrenuous ſupport at the Michaelmas parliament of the preceding year. This union of politics, and, as it ſhould ſeem, their joint objections to the treaty of peace then going on, was very likely to conciliate them in the politics of the time, diſſolutions of parties generally producing freſh combinations of the ſame ſort.

---

[1] Burton.

[2] Ib.

[3] Rymer.

[4] Certain diſtricts, compoſing franchiſes, were then exempt from the ordinary juriſdiction of the king, and ſubject to their particular lords. The liberty of Weſtminſter was a diſtrict of this ſort before the Conqueſt, and has retained a conſiderable portion of its immunities to the preſent day. The franchiſes of privileged or chartered towns were founded upon the ſame principle.

[5] M. Weſtm.

[6] Rymer.

Of the breach between the king and prince we have the following obſcure account in Matthew of Weſtminſter:

"About the ſame time, after the king had protracted his ſtay in Gaul for a great length of time, he was diſpoſed to return to England; when not a few things were inſtilled into his ear concerning his ſon Edward, and other nobles of the ſame way of thinking as himſelf; which things were (as is ſaid) deſtitute of truth, and for that reaſon I do not venture to name them. The king, however, having with great bitterneſs of mind heard theſe things, began to provide for his own ſafety, by ordering a very numerous quantity of hoſtile arms, and armed men; which when he had done, he was at length certified of the falſity of the report, and was not forward to give entire credit to it. Being in this uncertainty, he diſmiſſed part of his army; and taking at leaſt three hundred knights with him, with followers innumerable, about the feaſt of St. Mark the Evangeliſt, landed at Dover without diſmay."

If the hiſtorian was really inclined to believe what was reported, it might ſtill ſeem to him imprudent to inſert a thing of that ſort in his hiſtory.

Thomas Wykes, however, who lived in the next reign, was not quite ſo cautious. He has told us a little more of the matter:

"The king of England, about the Paſſover, 1260, having ſpent a long time in adjuſting with France the terms of peace, which after all was but a very imperfect buſineſs, propoſed to return to England, and with the queen was got to Abbevill in his way thither; when it was ſuggeſted to him, that ſir Edward, his eldeſt ſon, by council of the barons and nobles of England (of whom a great number had confederated among themſelves), from an ambition of reigning, had formed the deſign of depoſing his father: ſo that, if the latter ſhould come into England, Edward would get him ſeized, keep him a priſoner for life, and in the life-time of his father put the diadem on his own head. The whole ſuggeſtion was a falſehood. The king, however, was ſtruck with terror at the intimation of ſo black an affair, and thereupon deferred his return to England. His brother the king of Almaine did all he could to diſſipate Henry's fears. He collected all the grandees of the realm at London, and cauſed his letters to be made, to which, together with his own ſignet, he got the ſignets of the lord Edward, and of all the grandees aforeſaid, to be annexed, and ſent them to the king, aſſuring him, that he might boldly and confidently come into his realm; whereupon the king committed himſelf to the ſea, and about the feaſt of St. George arrived ſafely in England."

Although the two annaliſts ſeem to acquit the lord Edward of any ſhare in the rumoured conſpiracy, yet their verbal aſſertion neither diſproves the fact, or even their own internal diſbelief of it. Exceſs of candour might induce them to hope all things and believe all things. The truth of the caſe might alſo be unknown to them; and, if they really knew the contrary of what they aſſerted, fear, and other conſiderations, might juſtify them in their own ſight for profeſſing their diſbelief of a fact ſo weighty and tickliſh. Monks were very timid; and bold indeed muſt be a contemporary who ſhould lay treaſon and parricide to the door of the heir apparent while his father lived, or after that heir apparent had acquired poſſeſſion of the throne. Longſhanks was not a prince likely to forgive an offence of that ſort. Without pretending to form a certain judgement of this dark buſineſs, we may recollect how cloſely the prince was connected with the baronial party in October and November, how much he was likely to be diſpleaſed at ſeeing ſo many jewels torn from the imperial crown of England, as would be the conſequence of the treaty of Paris. If the earl of Leiceſter put in his proteſt againſt that proceeding on account of the injury that might thence enſue to his poſterity on the mere poſſibility of one of his deſcendants by Alianore coming to the throne of England, how much more was lord Edward like to take umbrage at a ſacrifice of that ſort, who expected to be king after his father[1].

The following very curious letter will throw ſome light upon the ſtate of public affairs at this time:

"The king to the bailiffs and barons of his cinque ports, greeting[2]. God, the creator of Heaven and earth, who diſpoſeth all things as he willeth, when heretofore there was a general war in England, we being yet in a minor age, was pleaſed that the diadem of the realm ſhould be put upon us, and on a ſudden thoſe, whom mortal enmity had ſeparated from each other, were by the gift of his grace brought back to unity and our peace, which God for our whole time has, by his favour, continued by happy auſpices; but now, which we cannot relate without trouble of mind, behold the realm moſt irrationally, and without cauſe, moved within itſelf, while troops of perſons of our realm, with horſes and arms, in diſturbance of our peace, and againſt our mandate, as if unmindful of our fealty, mean to ruſh to celebrate a colloquy in our city of London; whence it ſeemeth to thoſe who abound in ſagacity, that a mutiny of this kind looks more like an intention to draw the ſword than to ſow peace. And, be it that the intention of individuals be good, the mode is the worſt that can be deviſed, and a pernicious example to all the kings of the earth and kingdoms. And that the cauſe of our abſence from England ſo long, although we could wiſh it to be a ſecret locked up in our own breaſt, may be unfolded to you, know ye, that when we departed from our kingdom, we found certain ſparks of diſſention kindling, which we hoped by our, and certain other perſons, withdrawing for a ſhort ſeaſon, would have been extinguiſhed; but, now that we ſee thoſe ſparks riſe to torches, we can no longer be ſilent, but muſt wholeſomely provide to oppoſe the danger before the flame breaks out in full blaze; for, as we have heard, certain perſons of our realm have ſent for people with arms to foreign parts, without making us acquainted with it, when it was not their part to introduce an armed force into our realm to avenge themſelves one of another[3]; but it appertained to us, if it pleaſed God, and them, to appeaſe commotions of this ſort by the exhibition of juſtice, and, that it ſhould ſo be done, it was the duty of all, who were bound to us by fealty, to labour with continual and watchful care. And becauſe it is good to oppoſe evils in their commencement, and it behoves us eſpecially ſo to do, whoſe office it is, under God, to rule our realm; we, truſting in his mercy, and your help, and that of our faithful lieges, are now girding up our loins to re-enter our realm with certain knights; not becauſe we mean to hurt the community of our realm, which be far from us; but, on the contrary, that we may more vigorouſly, when there be occaſion, aſſiſt in the tranquillizing and defending our realm. Confide, therefore, in the Lord, and perſevere in the fealty due to us, as men of character ought to do, and firmly keep and maintain your fidelity, that by your works others may be animated to like good deeds; for which we may be bound to you and yours to beſtow honours and emoluments; wherefore we command you, beſeeching you, in the fealty and love by which you are held to us, that ye do pay reſpect to, and obey, our beloved and faithful Hugh de Bygod, our juſtice, even to our arrival in England, that we may be able to commend more and more your probity and good-will to us in this behalf. Witneſs, &c. at St. Omer's, 11 April, 44 of our reign.

---

[1] "The land (ſays M. Weſtminſter) which the king received for Normandy, in the name of an exchange, was as to a great part given to the count of Bretagne upon his marrying king Henry's daughter." This marriage had been made up while the king was abroad. The annaliſt of Waverley, ſpeaking of the peace of Paris, concluded towards the latter end of the year 1259, mentions the king of England's doing homage to the king of France for what was left him. He adds, "Henricus vero rex cum jam terras illas accepiſſet abſque conſenſu Edwardi primogeniti ſui cæterorumque magnatum in Anglia quaſdam vendendo, quaſdam donando ſtatim antequam rediret in Angliam ſe & ſuos eiſdem terris in perpetuum privavit." King Henry himſelf, in a letter to the pope, dated 1 Auguſt, 1258, ſpeaks in no approving language of this treaty of peace. "In qua forma (ſc. forma pacis) licet nonnullis articulis conditio noſtra gravari quodammodo videatur, tamen nobis acceptabile & gratum exiſtit, quicquid cœleſtis diſpenſatio ſuper hoc duxerit providendum." Rymer, vol. 1. p. 667.

[2] Clauſ. Franc. 44 Hen. III. See Prynne, on 4th Inſt. p. 154.

[3] He ſeems to allude to the diſcord between the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, and to intimate, that a private war between themſelves was in agitation. Such wars were not uncommon in that age; nor, as I believe, deemed rebellious.

In the ſame form, nearly, letters were written to the mayors and communities of London and York, and the archbiſhops of Canterbury and York.

We ſee here very plainly, that Henry was under apprehenſions from the intended parliament of the barons; and although he was relieved of ſome part of his fear, and thereupon retrenched part of his army, which he had been collecting in foreign parts to defend his perſon and right when he ſhould get back to England, yet ſtill he did not venture on the journey without a corps of 300 knights, and a numerous force beſides. But his return to England even then was not an act of choice, if there be truth in what we find in the annals of Dunſtaple.

"In the year of grace 1260 [1], Henry king of England, ſon of king John, having ratified a treaty of peace with the king of France, protracted his ſtay in that country, and did not ſeem to be under any concern about his return to England, till the biſhops and grandees ſent him word by letter, that he muſt haſten his return to England, which if he failed to do, he would not return thither at his pleaſure. Certain malicious perſons by falſe reports ſowed diſcord between the father and ſon, aſſerting, that Edward and his counſellors were agitating war againſt the king; which put the king in a great rage, and made him bring many knights from foreign parts: when he reached Southwark, he left theſe on the other ſide of the bridge in the parts of Surrey, and he himſelf made his entry into London, and there tarried for ſome time, ſhutting and bolting the gates as faſt as poſſible, and placing wardens at the gates, that no one might enter the city without leave. But the earl of Glouceſter and John Manſel, and certain others, who were of the king's council, had ingreſs and egreſs at their pleaſure; but the king iſſued a prohibition, that neither his ſon Edward, nor any one who had been of his council, ſhould appear before him; ſaying, "Let not my ſon approach me; for, if I ſhould happen to ſee him, I ſhould not be able to forbear kiſſing him [2]." At length, moved by paternal love, and overcome by the intreaties of the grandees, he received Edward to the kiſs of peace. His mother the queen did the ſame; who, as was reported, had been the author of all the miſchief. This being over, the lord king, miſled by falſe accuſers, relaxed the reins of his fury againſt earl Simon de Montfort, and was minded to pronounce ſentence of condemnation upon him on many charges. But that earl, ſupported by the aid of God, made ſuch ſtrong anſwers, and produced ſuch written evidence of his innocence, that all were in amazement, and his accuſers could not make out any one point againſt him." So the chronicle of Dunſtaple.

I ſhall ſubjoin what is written by M. Weſtminſter, on this remarkable incident:

"At that time deadly diſcord had been ſowed between ſome of the firſt people of the realm; to wit, between the king and Edward his ſon, as has been noted before; alſo, between the king and the earl of Leiceſter; between Edward and the earl of Glouceſter; and alſo between the aforeſaid earls, and many others. Whereupon the parties having taken meaſures of ſafety, and rallied their force, a dreadful battle was expected to commence immediately. The knights having met at Blie, with horſes and arms, according to appointment, in order to have a tournament there, were urgently called away to London. Sir Richard, king of Almaine, happening to be then on a viſit to England, exerted his utmoſt endeavours to preſerve peace; otherwiſe a dreadful claſh had enſued; but the king being expected to arrive in England, he ſoftened the parties at variance, and employed his beſt endeavours, that, their fury being aſſuaged, the king might find the realm in a ſtate of quiet on his arrival. Reaching London on the eve of the apoſtles Philip and James, he tarried about a fortnight at St. Paul's, in the houſe of the biſhop of London; for, the gates and ſtreets, and indeed the whole city, were ſo carefully guarded, on account of the deadly war then exiſting, that ſcarcely any one, although of high rank, could freely go out and in; nor could any, even of the grandees, as was reported, except the king, and a few others, have lodging within the walls; nor would the king go to his palace at Weſtminſter till he knew what turn things would take. But the diſcord ſtill prevailing, as often happens on ſuch perilous occaſions, the abbot and convent of Peterborough were accuſed to the king; for, that they had lately become bound in a great ſum of money for ſir Edward, to ſtrengthen his forces againſt the king, and overturning the power of his father. Whereupon the king was moved with indignation againſt the abbot, and having ſummoned him to come before him, he deſired, in a ſort of commanding manner, that he would compliment him with a ſimilar loan, or incur the royal diſpleaſure. The abbot made anſwer at once, that he durſt not do any thing of that ſort, and that his houſe was not ſufficient for it; adding, that ſir Edward had given good ſecurity for the loan, and this was no hurt to the king. The abbot, although theretofore much in the intimacy and good graces of the king, withdrew from his preſence in a great fright, and while the king continued in a great rage, vomiting dreadful threats both againſt the convent and the church, which afterwards felt the full effects of his threatenings. Afterwards the baronage being convoked in the preſence of the king at St. Paul's, and a diſcuſſion having taken place concerning the injuries done the king by ſir Edward, the latter was prepared to refute all the charges brought againſt him, and conſented to ſubmit his whole caſe to the judgement of his father and uncle; alleging, that all the earls and barons were not of right his peers, and could not exerciſe their diſcuſſions upon him; whereupon the truth being ſifted pro & contra, and the falſity of the ſtories about him being proved, the ſon became reconciled to his appeaſed father, to the great confuſion of his adverſaries. Sir Edward, therefore, having made up his difference with the king, and alſo with the queen and other friends, except the earl of Glouceſter and his partizans, ſoon afterwards followed the plaint againſt the earl of Leiceſter, Simon, concerning the many injuries done on either ſide the ſea againſt the king, as was reported. A day being therefore fixed for that earl to make his defence, and purge himſelf of the crimes imputed to him, the ſaid earl was ready at the day, although a ſhort one, to give ſatisfaction upon every point, and to ſubmit to the deciſion of all perſons, as well on one ſide the ſea as the other, upon the ſeveral matters of his impeachment; excepted five petty perſons, who had been buſy ſowers of diſcord as well in the lord Edward's caſe as his own; which being heard, the earl of Glouceſter, with his partizans, fearing for himſelf, from an apprehenſion that, after the earl of Leiceſter's acquittal, great plaints would be brought forwards againſt him, got the farther hearing of that earl's caſe prorogued to a future parliament; whereupon, the tumult being aſſuaged for the preſent, the king went with pleaſure to his own palace. The articles of the crimes imputed to the earl of Leiceſter bore very hard againſt him, if they were true; but, as they were altogether incredible, and ſupported by no ſort of truth, I forbear noting them in this page, that I be not a propagator of lies. Whoſoever has the deſire of going deeper into the ſubject, will only draw up lies from lies; but ſuch an one muſt ſeek ſome other, not me, to be his aſſiſtant. In the month of June, the earl of Albemarle, while he ſojourned abroad in a certain litigation, finiſhed his life at Amiens; whoſe body, being brought over to England, was there honourably interred in a certain monaſtery of his erecting; whoſe inheritance was afterwards given in cuſtody to the earl of Glouceſter, to remain with him for fifteen years, the heir wanting that ſpace of time to his coming of age. But inaſmuch as this act was againſt the proviſion of the realm, and the late oath, computation was made of the yearly value of the inheritance, that the king might be annually anſwered thereupon at his exchequer."

---

[1] Is not this a ſtrong intimation of a conſpiracy? Here we ſee who the perſons were who gave the king intelligence of it.

[2] That is, being reconciled to him. But let it be remembered, that the father all this time was obliged to ſojourn with the biſhop of London in the city, becauſe he dared not venture to go to his palace at Weſtminſter, where his ſon was all the time.

In the year 1259, the pope ſent his nuncio to England, to demand reſtitution of the temporalities of the ſee of Wincheſter to be given to Athelmar, upon pain of the pope's diſpleaſure. On the 23d of September, the ſame year, the king, by the advice of his great men, moſt humbly intreated the pope not to inſiſt on a compliance with his demands, which, they ſaid, their conſciences would not let them do[1]; they repreſented the legality of Athelmar's baniſhment, that they could not think of ſuffering him to return; and that, if they did, the whole nation would unite againſt it. But this remonſtrance was of no effect. About Midſummer, A. D. 1260, pope Alexander IV. ordained Athelmar prieſt, and then conſecrated him biſhop of Wincheſter; having previouſly annulled all the proceedings of the barons of England, and the monks of Wincheſter, concerning him. As ſoon as the news of this came to the barons, they renewed their importunities by a freſh letter to his holineſs, expreſſive of their aſtoniſhment at theſe proceedings, and again deſiring him to deſiſt from theſe meaſures[2]: but this likewiſe had no effect. The pope was determined to reinſtate Athelmar in the ſee of Wincheſter, and to ſend him to England with a grand retinue. For this purpoſe he diſpatched the archbiſhop of Tours beforehand, in the quality of apoſtolic legate, with full power to lay England under an interdict if any obſtruction was given to Athelmar in coming to England, and taking poſſeſſion of his ſee. Athelmar ſet out for England, and got to Paris, intending to throw England into a flame, as ſoon as he ſhould get there; but, very fortunately, he was taken ill at Paris, and died about Michaelmas, before he could carry his deſigns into execution.

Among the proceedings at Oxford, the Welſh war had come under the conſideration of the great men[3], and many precautions been taken to prevent future hoſtilities with that people. Prince Llewellin had attended the parliament at Oxford in perſon, by virtue of the king's letter of ſafe conduct. A truce was ſoon after agreed to for one year, and afterwards prolonged. But, before the expiration of the laſt truce, the partizans of Llewellin invaded the lands of the king of England, deſtroyed churches and monaſteries, ſacrilegiouſly plundered and murdered the eccleſiaſtics, and paid no kind of regard to the terms of amity agreed to at Oxford. The lord Edward had committed the charge of Buelt caſtle to the lord Roger Mortimer, from whom the Welſh took it, at the ſame time ſlaying the people, and doing all manner of miſchief. On the firſt of Auguſt, the king iſſued his ſummonſes to all who held of the king in capite, even to one knight's fee and over, and owed him military ſervice, to attend him on the 8th of September at Shrewſbury or Cheſter, with horſe and arms, ready to go with him upon his expedition againſt Llewellin and his adherents. The Welſh being a warlike people, and not fearful of death, the lord Simon earl of Leiceſter, reputed the braveſt and moſt expert military man in England, was made the general, and commander in chief[4]. If the armies had met, each party probably would have ſignalized their valour. But, difficulties ariſing, and the royal army not being ready, matters were compromiſed afreſh by a truce, applied for by the Engliſh.

On the 9th of March, king Henry had written to John duke of Bretagne from St. Omers, to deſire that duke to permit his ſon John, lately contracted to Beatrice, king Henry's ſecond daughter, to celebrate the feaſt of St. Edward[5] in the enſuing October at the court of England, and to receive the honour of knighthood from king Henry's own hand[6]. On this account the anniverſary of the royal ſaint of England was kept with uncommon magnificence, the great men on either ſide the water, and innumerable multitudes of others, flocking to this celebrity. Henry, ſon of the king of the Romans, was allowed by the king's letters patent, which were read and approved by lord Edward, the earls of Glouceſter and Oxford, Hugh le Bigot, high juſticiar, John Manſel, and Robert Walerand, and others, of the king's council, to act on the feaſt day, as the ſubſtitute of the earl of Leiceſter, in the office of ſeneſchal of England[7]. The king himſelf inveſted John de Dreux, his young ſon-in-law, with the military belt; after which lord Edward performed the ſame ceremony upon two[8] of the earl of Leiceſter's ſons[9]. Then the king knighted fourſcore others.

At this parliament the great men took under their conſideration the appointment of the juſticiar of England, and of the chancellor and treaſurer, who were to fill thoſe offices for the next year; for, Hugh le Bigot, the former juſticiar, then retired: Henry de Wengham, the former chancellor, had obtained the biſhoprick of London, and the lord John de Crachale, the treaſurer, had died in the beginning of September preceding. A great deal of deliberation was beſtowed upon this ſubject: at laſt, by unanimous voice, was conferred the great ſeal upon Nicholas archdeacon of Ely, the office of treaſurer upon the abbot of Bury, and the power of high juſticiar upon the lord Hugh Deſpenſer.

Towards the latter end of this year, 1260, the earl of Leiceſter's ſons, and the others who had received the honour of knighthood, together with the lord Edward, John of Bretagne, and Henry, ſon of the king of Almaine, went all beyond ſea as ſoon as they poſſibly could, to a tournament, that had been appointed, that each might diſplay his military proweſs after the faſhion of young knights[10].

Simon de Montfort had five ſons and one daughter[11]. Theſe were, Henry, Simon, Almeric, Guy, Richard, and Alianora. They had been educated under the direction of the learned Robert Great head, late biſhop of Lincoln. Henry was the god-ſon of king Henry, from whom he had his name, and bred up in the habits of intimate friendſhip and familiarity with the lord Edward.

From the time that the earl of Leiceſter entered into engagement with the barons to correct abuſes in the adminiſtration, and to new-model the government, he reſolved to adopt a new plan of reformation with reſpect to his own life[1]; and, having a kind of preſentiment of the fatal conſequences that would attend a ſteady adherence to his oath, which he had taken in common with the barons and the whole nation to maintain the new regulations, he prepared for his diſſolution by an invariable attention to devotion, and acts of the moſt rigid mortification. He abridged his ſleep to ſuch a degree, that he never failed to wake in the middle of the night, and to riſe, and employ himſelf till morning in meditation and prayer. And this was done ſo ſilently, that thoſe who ſlept with him never heard him riſe, nor ſuſpected it. Throughout the day he never cloſed his eyes, but continued conſtantly awake till the return of his hour of repoſe. His abſtemious regimen enabled him to bear theſe ſevere watchings. He ate nothing but bread, and a few olives, and ſparingly with his bread a few herbs. In his drinking he was equally moderate. By day and night he conſtantly wore a hair-cloth next his ſkin, and took great but ineffectual pains to keep this a ſecret, even from the officers of his bed-chamber. Among his domeſtics he was content with being cloathed in ruſſet; when among the great men of the nation he was ſometimes robed in ſcarlet, but more frequently arrayed in blue or burnet, to prevent any ſuſpicion of his wearing hair-cloth underneath; which he took much pains to keep unknown to the world. His piety was regular and orthodox, but he was a zealous champion for the rights of the Engliſh church againſt the encroachments either of the pope or the king[2]. The miniſters of religion he treated with profound reſpect, and its holy functions he conſtantly attended. He was ſtrict and guarded in his words, grave in his aſpect, and accuſtomed to converſe moſt intimately with men of the moſt rigid orders of religious: ſuch were the minor friers of that age; who, knowing more of his acts of piety than any other ſet of men, wrote the hiſtory of them after Simon de Montfort's deceaſe.

---

[1] Pat. 43 H. III. Brady's Anſwer to Petyt, p. 83.

[2] Auctar. addit. M. Paris, p. 1137.

[3] Rymer, vol. I. p. 708.

[4] M. Weſtm. p. 299.

[5] King Henry held St. Edward in veneration next to Jeſus Chriſt. Wykes.

[6] Rymer, vol. I. p. 698.

[7] Ib p. 715.

[8] Theſe, one would think, ſhould be Henry and Simon, the two eldeſt; but, according to the Chronicler of Dunſtable, Henry was knighted at Glouceſter in the beginning of the year 1264. But Th. Wykes ſeems to intimate that Simon was knighted at Oxford.

[9] M. Weſtm. Cont. M. Paris.

[10] Chron. de Dunſtable.

[11] Leland, Collect. vol. I. p. 284.

"Though by ſubmitting to the proviſions of the barons, and putting himſelf under their controul, the king had done only what was right and uſeful; yet he began now to think the reſtraint laid upon him to be very grievous, and determined to proceed with vigour and firmneſs in ſhaking it entirely off. For this purpoſe, calling the great men together, he addreſſed them in the following manner: "Ye have all of you, as ye pretend, united in one general deſign for the benefit and good of the community and the king, and for enlarging my treaſure, and diſcharging my debts. And ye have, by common conſent, come to certain reſolutions, and ſworn to obſerve them, and bound me and my ſon by the ſame oath. But now I find by experience, and am clearly perſuaded, that ye have not been actuatedb y a regard to the good of the king or kingdom, but to your own ſelfiſh purpoſes, and have altogether deviated from the compact between us; ye have made me your ward, and put me into a condition more like that of a ſervant than a maſter. Ye muſt not, therefore, be ſurprized, if I no longer yield to your counſel, but leave you entirely to yourſelves, and apply ſuch remedy in my own caſe as ſhall be agreeable to myſelf." Having made this declaration, and ſent his agents to Rome for a papal abſolution, he wrote ſpecial letters to the king of France, and to his ſon Edward, for furniſhing him with aſſiſtance. The French king promiſed him an infinite number of knights for ſeven years, to be ſupported, if it were neceſſary, at his own charge; and Edward, it was reported, exerted his moſt ſtrenuous efforts in getting them together; being ſolicitous to ſet free the aged king, and re-eſtabliſh him lord of the realm, according to the old faſhion. In the mean while the king, without paying the leaſt reſpect to the ſtatutes of the great men, and deceived by the advice of flatterers, ſhut himſelf up in the Tower of London, and broke open the doors of the treaſury to get the money therein depoſited, and to ſquander it away; and, taking workmen into his pay, he got the Tower well ſecured, and ordered the city of London to be fortified all round, and the gates to be well provided with bolts and bars. And, having called together all the people of the city, who were twelve years of age, and upwards, he made every individual take the oath of fealty to him; a herald proclaiming, that whoever would fight for the king ſhould come and receive his pay[4]."

"As ſoon as the great men heard of theſe things, they flocked together with their forces, taking up their lodgings without the city, being denied admiſſion to their hotels within the walls. And thus a deadly war was apprehended, and ſeemed to be nearer than ever."

On the 14th of March he iſſued the following maniſeſto, directed to the ſheriff of each county throughout England[5]:

"Whereas certain perſons ill-affected towards us have, as we are informed, imputed to us, that we intend to exact from the great men and community of the realm unuſual talliages, and undue cuſtoms, to excite diſcord between us and them, we command you, that with all haſte you cauſe it to be proclaimed throughout your bailiwick, that we ſincerely love the great men and community of our realm, and purpoſe to govern them in peace and tranquillity as great as we have done hitherto, and with greater if it be poſſible, and have no intention to exact or wreſt from them any talliages of this ſort, or any undue cuſtoms; and if you ſhall find any perſons reporting lies of this kind, you ſhall cauſe them to be arreſted, until they diſcover their authors, and you receive otherwiſe from us in command. Witneſs myſelf, at the Tower of London, 14th day of March."

About the ſame time, Edmund, the king's ſon, ſent letters to the nobles of Sicily, to aſſure them of his affection, and of his hearty intentions to avail himſelf of the papal grant and to deſire, that they would make every thing ready for his reception among them. To the ſame effect other letters were ſent to the pope; and even proctors appointed to take poſſeſſion of the united kingdom of Apulia and Sicily in the name of king Edmund[6].

"About Eaſter was obtained the papal[7] letter for abſolving the king and his ſon Edward from their late oath; which the king accepted, but Edward bound himſelf afreſh by the ſame engagements. The grandees, hearing thoſe things, and firmly maintaining their reſolution, ſent mediators to the king, and earneſtly requeſted, that the engagement, which all had made, might be kept inviolate, undertaking, that, if any thing gave umbrage to the king, it ſhould be altered upon his pointing it out. But he did not acquieſce, and, hardly ſuffering their entrance into his preſence, threatened them ſharply, and rudely told them, that, as they had not kept to the convention, no more ſhould he; and thenceforth every man might provide for his own ſafety. At length, however, certain ſenſible men, through their mediation, ſoftened him ſo far as to obtain his conſent, that two men ſhould be choſen, one on his part, and one on the other; and that theſe two ſhould take to them a third, and that theſe ſhould hear the king's complaints, and the anſwers of the other party, and make peace on both ſides. This was mutually acceded to, but agreed to be adjourned to the return of lord Edward. The latter, hearing that this diſcord would be put a ſtop to upon his return to England after carrying the prize at the tournament abroad, came back immediately to England, having with him his wiſe's brother John de Braines and William of Valence, lately ſent into exile. The latter gained admiſſion with difficulty, and not without binding himſelf on his arrival by oath to obey in all things the proviſion of the barons, and making anſwer to all the plaints which had been or ſhould be brought againſt him. But Edward, after full information concerning the king's vain counſel and counſellors, became enraged againſt the latter, and withdrew himſelf from his father's ſight, and faithfully accorded with the barons, as he had previouſly ſworn. Diligent inquiſition was therefore made for the abettors of the late conteſt; and, after they were diſcovered, all joined in an oath with Edward, that they would never in one thing conſent with the king until he had amoved certain perſons, not to be named, from his council [1]; adding, that, by the ſuggeſtions of ſuch diſturbers of the peace, the king was often deceived, and that, in the recent papal abſolution [2], the proviſion, good and wholeſome for the king and kingdom, was weakened and made ineffectual; and that, ſo long as the king liſtened to ſuch adviſers, he could not be brought to go hand in hand with his barons, as it became him to do. Being ſtruck with terror, Henry immediately ſhut himſelf and his confidents up in the Tower of London [3]. And Edward, remaining without the gates with the grandees, commenced certain motions, which had a very fearful aſpect. But the earls of Glouceſter and Leiceſter, whoſe diſcordance had lately produced ſome very acrimonious language, were then confederated between themſelves, and alſo with Edward, in a cloſe league of friendſhip; proteſting that the king ſhould remove certain obnoxious perſons from him, or they would commence war, and purſue it with the hazard of their lives. The king's counſellors were thrown into a panic at theſe formidable preparations, and began to ſecure themſelves as well as they could within the Tower. But about the feaſt of Eaſter the mediating offices of the queen [4] produced ſo good effect as to bring the oppoſite parties to freſh terms of union. After which the king ventured his perſon without the Tower; and, having contrived the eſcape of John Manſel, he journeyed immediately for Dover. Being arrived there, with a ſmall ſuite, he got free admiſſion into the caſtle, although the barons, conſidering it as the key of the realm, deputed it to a ſpecial charge." Hugh le Bigot, the high juſtice, had been appointed by the king and barons warden of this important fortreſs.

---

[1] Chron. de Mailros.

[2] Ib. and Contin. M. Paris.

[3] I think he came to Wytſand in Flanders about Michaelmas; and that he ſpent three months there in treating with the barons.

[4] M. Weſtm. p. 304. 44 H. III.

[5] Rymer, vol. I. p. 471.

[6] Rymer.

[7] The bulls for abſolving the king and great men were dated on the 28th of April, as appears from Rymer; and we find the king producing them at Winton the Whitſuntide following; that is, we may ſuppoſe, ſoon after their arrival. Many of theſe incidents, therefore, recited in M. Weſtminſter, happened later than he has placed them. Indeed, he has huddled all the events of the year with very little deſignation of time. According to Walter Hemingford, the king did not declare the Oxford acts annulled, and himſelf releaſed from his late oath till the arrival of the papal diſpenſation: "Miſſis ad papam nunciis, quo ad ſacramentum præſtitum abſolutionis beneficium conſecutus eſt, & quo ad ſe, & ſuos omnes. Abſolvit etiam papa indifferenter omnes ab eodem juramento, ut citius inter ſe in vinculo pacis unirentur. Statimque abſolutione obtenta reſilivit rex a promiſſis."

"He committed the wardenſhip of Dover caſtle to ſir Robert Walerand, and went preſently to Rocheſter caſtle, and every where found his caſtles affording him free egreſs and ingreſs. About the ſame time juſtices in eyre were ſent throughout England by the king's command, but contrary to the common proviſion, and againſt the conſent of the baronage. Theſe juſtices coming to Hereford, and willing to hold a ſeſſion on the Hokeday, the county having been convoked, immediately ſome of the baronial party ruſhed in, ſtraitly forbidding them to commit ſo great an act of preſumption; nor ſhould others make anſwer to any point whatſoever; as well becauſe regular ſummonſes ought to have been given forty days before the meeting, as becauſe, according to the late proviſions, the juſtices in eyre had no right to make their iters more than once in ſeven years. Their pleadings, therefore, being ſilently ſuſpended, they bye and bye deſired the king's anſwer on the ſubject, and, having received order to deſiſt, they made off with great expedition to Northampton [5]."

"About that time the juſtices in eyre ſat at Glouceſter; and, being diſpoſed to ſit at Worceſter on the octaves of St. John Baptiſt, they did not find perſons who would attend the meeting to hold pleas before them, or make anſwer to them, in quality of juſtices, becauſe they had made their eyre within the ſeventh year, contrary to the late proviſion made in that behalf. The compatriots [6] alſo objected to the ſhortneſs of the notice, as being neither ſufficient, nor full, according to law; according to what had been wholeſomely determined from remote time."

Among the printed public acts are two bulls of pope Alexander IV, on the ſubject of the king's releaſe from his late engagements to the barons and commune of England. The firſt of theſe inſtruments is dated on the 28th of April, and is directed to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhop of Norwich, and John Manſel, treaſurer of York, and the pope's chaplain [7]. It ſtates that it had reached the pope's ears, that certain prelates, great men, and others, as well of the clergy as laity, under a pretence of reforming the ſtate, had bound themſelves by their oath, and by a ſort of force impoſed the ſame on the king and queen and their children, for obſerving their ſtatutes and ordinances; that thereby the king ſuſtained a diminution of power and regal liberty; and as the religion of an oath (by which fidelity and truth ought to be confirmed) ought not to be made the baſis of perfidy and wickedneſs, his holineſs, from a deſire to provide for the king's honour, and the ſalvation of the others, and full confidence in the perſons to whom the bull is directed, commands them to abſolve themſelves, and all others, from the oaths they had taken in this behalf, and to diſſolve the whole league and combination that had been entered into; and he directs and commands, that all gainſayers be puniſhed by eccleſiaſtical cenſure, without appeal, as the archbiſhop, and the other two, ſhould judge expedient for the ſtate of the king and kingdom [8].

The other bull is dated on the 7th of May, directed to the ſame perſons: it enjoins them to admoniſh, and induce the barons and others to adhere faithfully to, and obey the king as their prince, to pay him the debt of fidelity, and behave like peaceable ſubjects, and not, under pretence of the late conſtitutions, ordinances, and combinations, to reſtrain him, in any inſtance, in the exerciſe of his plenary regal power; and commands, that all gainſayers be excommunicated without appeal, and their lands put under an interdict[1].

---

[1] John Manuel, probably, and Robert Walerand, and the biſhop of Hereford; but I ſuppoſe John Manſel was chiefly obnoxious.

[2] This is probably inaccurate; for, the bull of abſolution ſeems not to have been iſſued till the 28th of April; and therefore could hardly have reached England by this time. Perhaps, reports were gone about, that the pope had granted it from a full expectation that it would not be denied.

[3] "The ſame year (I now tranſlate the annaliſt of Dunſtaple), after the Nativity, the lord king entered the Tower of London, and ſtrongly fortified it. He barred the gate of the city; ſending his mandate to the grandees, that they ſhould come to the Tower to a parliament. And they refuſed, ſending word, that, if it pleaſed him, they would go to him to Weſtminſter, but no where elſe. This cauſed a great diſagreement."

[4] "The late proviſions had at firſt been very agreeable to the queen, who ſaw with pleaſure the foreigners, whom ſhe diſliked, driven out of the kingdom. But, when ſhe found that her own countrymen were to be treated in like manner, ſhe uſed all the influence ſhe had with the king to get the proviſions ſet at nought. The king too haſtily yielded to her advice. John Manſel, alſo a court clerk, was ſtudious to ſhew his devotion to the queen, and gained over many perſons to his way of thinking, who, by intreaty or money, conſented to this act of prevarication." Annales Waverleienſes.

Some authors of that time lay all the blame at the queen's door. The king ſeems to have been always an eaſy dupe to the people about him, and withal very uxorious. Alianora was meddling, graſping, and imperious, and exceedingly unpopular.

[5] M. Weſtm.

[6] I ſuppoſe the commune of the county, members of the comitatus, or county-court.

[7] Rymer.

[8] Ib.

Upon this bold act of papal diſpenſation many queſtions aroſe[2].

It became a matter of controverſy, whether ſolemn engagements, confirmed by the oaths of the parties, could be diſſolved by any power of the pope[3].

Others thought, that all engagements, by whomſoever confirmed, might be abrogated for the good of all parties, by their joint conſent.

Again, ſome were of opinion, that the late engagements could not bind at all, being founded in error and wickedneſs. Such held the pope's diſpenſation ſuperfluous. This act of the pope diſcouraged many from adhering to their late oath.

"About May[4], the lord king, being deſirous to ſtart back from the oath previouſly made, boldly made the circuit of the cities and caſtles, being willing to have full poſſeſſion of them, and the whole realm, as his demeſnes; encouraged to this by the great promiſes lately made him by the king of France and his grandees of copious and effectual aſſiſtance. Whereupon the count of St. Pol and Gerard of Rhodes came to his ſuccour with a numerous train of forces. The king, therefore, going to Winton[5], entered his caſtle there, as elſewhere, without obſtruction, and there he kept his feaſt of Pentecoſt; and after calling before him at that place the high juſtice and chancellor, lately made by the baronage, he ordered his ſeal to be given to him, and the rolls of the juſticiary to be reſtored. They making anſwer that they could not poſſibly do this without the aſſent and will of the barons, jointly with the king, the king grew very warm, and, without adviſing with the baronage, made ſir Walter Merton chancellor, and ſir Philip Baſſet his and the realm's high juſtice, by his own mere will and pleaſure. The grandees, hearing of this, and conſidering that this was contrary to their proviſions, and fearing leſt the king ſhould have the temerity to eradicate their conſtitutions, haſtened thither as faſt as poſſible, equipped with arms and forces. John Manſel, as ſoon as he learned this, having apprehenſions for the king, as well as for himſelf and his partizans, ſtole away to Winton, and ſecretly adviſed the king to return to London; whither Manſel having got back, the king ſtole out of the caſtle, and made the beſt of his way to London at the heels of Manſel."

"This year there was tumult and ſedition among the people[6] through the counties of England, on account of the ſheriffs to whom the counties had been committed before, by the barons and community of the land[7]. But the comprovincials[8] of the counties, animated and well ſupported by the help of certain grandees of the realm, and enlightened with great ſagacity, manfully repelled the new ſheriffs, and would neither pay them any reſpect, nor anſwer to them; which putting king king Henry into great perplexity, to excite the devotion, and catch the fealty of the vulgar ſort of people, he diſpatched to the ſeveral counties of England, letters full of kind and tender language to awaken their attachment, and recall their affection to his perſon and government. The enmity between the king and his barons growing every day more vehement, at length the grandees of the Angles met at London, and the parts adjacent, with an armed force, about the feaſt of All Saints; whoſe power, now become very formidable, the king was afraid to withſtand, and immdiately ſecured himſelf and his party in the Tower of London; whence he inſtantly iſſued his letters of ſummons, demanding the help of all who owed him military ſervice. When at length the partizans of each ſide were got together, the commotion, through the activity of certain go-betweens, was allayed, and ſome hope conceived of reſtoring peace without the claſh of arms; the chief matters in diſpute being left to the judgement of certain grandees, elected to the office of arbitrators. And thus, all the labour and zeal of the barons being undermined and baffled by the craftineſs of certain perſons, as was ſaid, they were fruſtrated for this turn, and quaſhed; for, when effectual preparations are made for any thing, delays in the execution have been always pernicious."

The following ſeems to be the identical circular letter which Henry ſent to the ſeveral counties of England, to conciliate their affection, and engage them in his ſupport. It gives us a great deal of information concerning his conduct, ſituation, and intentions, at this time:

[9]"The king, to all his lieges of the county of York, greeting. The king, to ſuch perſons, greeting. We are diſturbed with heavy bitterneſs of mind; and not without cauſe; that, as we have heard, certain malicious perſons, diſturbers of the tranquillity of our realm, and miniſters of iniquity, ſtrive to diminiſh the devotion of our lieges, and of our people, and to avert their hearts from our love and fealty, by ſuggeſtions altogether deceitful and falſe; eſpecially, whereas now, for forty and five years, God willing, and his grace aſſiſting, that we have held the helm of our kingdom, we have not remitted our ſtudy and labours concerning the tranquillity and peace of all and each perſon, but, with full deſire and our utmoſt ſtrength, have exerted the ſame; inſomuch that, bleſſed be God! that whereas, in times paſt, human power could not check the hearts of rebels, but by wars and hoſtilities the realm ſeemed in ſome ſort to be on the verge of extermination through frequent devaſtation; now, in our days, bleſſed be the Higheſt, by whoſe grace we are what we are, by whom all kings reign, who knoweth the diſpoſitions, and

---

[1] We find, from a certain bull of pope Urban the following year, that his predeceſſor Alexander had granted a diſpenſation to Henry perſonally, for abſolving him from his late oath from the barons. See Rymer. It may be ſuppoſed that the laſt was of the ſame date with one of theſe. Henry, therefore, was not releaſed till the latter end of April, or beginning of May.

[2] Knyghton, Chron. de Mailros.

[3] M. Weſtm.

[4] Ib.

[5] The king, on the feaſt of Pentecoſt, being at Winton, brought the letters of the lord pope, and publicly ſhewed them to the barons, that he was abſolved from the oath which he had taken for obſerving the proviſions of the barons, as if from a thing unlawful, as ſuppoſing that, without the conſent and will of the lord pope, and of the cardinals of the Roman church, whoſe vaſſal the king of England was known to be, he could not take an oath of this moment, as he was truly able to maintain. And he depoſed ſir Hugh Deſpenſer from the office of juſtice, and made ſir Philip Baſſet juſtice, and amoved all from his ſuite whom the barons had put there, and took away the ſeal from maſter Nicholas de Ely, and committed it to ſir Walter de Morton. After many altercations, about the feaſt of St. Michael, he ſecretly entered into the city of London, fearing the ſedition of the barons, becauſe they refuſed to parliament with him; at length, about the feaſt of St. Nicholas, the greater part of the barons held a meeting with the king; and ſome of them agreed in a form of peace, and ſome abſented themſelves." Wykes, anno 1261. M. Weſtm.

[6] In populo per comitatus Angliæ.—Populus, in the writings of that age, uſually denotes the better ſort, as oppoſed to plebs.

[7] "In the year of grace 1261. The grandees provided and conſtituted the ſhire-reeves and magiſtrates almoſt throughout England, againſt the power and will of the king. And the ſhire-reeves and bailiffs whom the lord king had appointed they turned out, and would not obey them in any thing." Dunſtaple.—Perhaps the king turned out the ſhire-reeves at Eaſter, and put in his own; who again were turned out about Michaelmas by the barons and people.

[8] The knights and freeholders of counties are diſtinguiſhed from the barons of counties, or thoſe great perſons who had franchiſes within the ſame. The comprovincials, I conceive, were the Engliſh gentry of landed property, who compoſed the county-court. For, freeholder at that time was an honourable appellation, and implied a kind of titled character. It frequently comprehended milites. Thus we read of certain perſons, ſtyled milites, and others, liberè tenentes. But the latter term frequently meant both. The preſent conteſt was between the king and the landed intereſt of the kingdom in general. He ſaid he would govern ex libitu ſuo voluntatis, by his own luſt of ſelf-will: they ſaid he ſhould govern by the counſel of the grandees and community of the realm, according to the laws and uſages of England. He ſaid he would not be obliged to have his liege Engliſh for his counſellors, but would have aliens of his own choice, if he liked them better. They ſaid, he ſhould not.

[9] Brady's Appendix, N° 202.

ſearches the hearts of each, neither in ſpirituals by general interdict or ſubtraction of ſacraments, nor in temporals by hoſtility or general war, has the kingdom of England been depreſſed, or impoveriſhed, or ſubverted; but every individual has been able peaceably to enjoy his poſſeſſions and things, and all obtain or retain their right, according as juſtice ought, and has uſed, to render to each man his own. Nor have we taken away from any one his right by violence, or our own ſelf-will, bleſſed be God! nor have we cauſed any one to be baniſhed unjuſtly: whence ye may and ought to obſerve, that, concerning ſuggeſtions of this ſort, and falſe and iniquitous words, ye ought not to give credit to thoſe who have long ſince impoſed upon you ſervitudes and oppreſſions, according to their own ſelf-will, when we are prepared, and are minded always to be ready, to afford you relief and defence. But our perſecutors and haters aforeſaid lay to our charge, as we have heared, that we want to overturn your rights, and thoſe of others of our realm, and alſo your cuſtoms, juſt, due and antient, and to burden you with undue exactions; and, moreover, that we do mean to depreſs the natives of our realm, and bring in aliens to the damage and oppreſſion of the native people, on account of our having, the year preceding, when we feared the diſturbance of our realm by reaſon of diſſenſions among our grandees, brought certain men with us from foreign parts, by advice of certain of our grandees of England; that, by the aſſiſtance of them and of others, we might coerce the diſturbers of our peace, and of your tranquillity, if we ſhould find any ſuch: but, by them, or through their coming to England, to no perſon of our realm has loſs or damage happened; nor have they injured or annoyed any perſon whatever; as ye yourſelves very well know, and as the iſſue of the thing has plainly ſhewed. Wherefore, do not now lend your ears to the words and ſuggeſtions of ſuch men; ſeeing ye ought rather to give credit to facts and works which demonſtrate the truth of the caſe. Nor let it ſeem grievous to you, or excite alarm, that we have put our caſtles and countries in the charge of certain perſons, who are of greater power than thoſe to whom they were committed before; becauſe we wiſh you to know that we have made this proviſion more with a view to your benefit than our own; to wit, that they, againſt the ſervitudes and oppreſſions which certain grandees had brought upon you, might exhibit juſtice and defence, where inferior people could not. And this ye may clearly underſtand from hence, that perſons retained by our pay may be expected to be greater, and to do more, than ſuch as are in the pay of inferior perſons; but more eſpecially for this reaſon, that we have put in the aforeſaid bailiwics thoſe who were of our party, and of whom we might be ſecure, that ye might be defended by them, and relieved; ſince thoſe who had held the ſaid bailiwics before were appointed by thoſe who brought burdens and grievances upon you, and by the ſufferance of the bailiffs aforeſaid, as we, by oath of ſome of you, have fully learnt, have ſeized many things appertaining to you, and forced yourſelves to ſuits not due, and other intolerable ſervitudes, to our diſhonour and yours, as ye know full well. Moreover, we will you to know, that, if the aforeſaid ſhire-reeves, to whom we have committed our counties, ſhall preſume to aggrieve or injure you, we will, as ſoon as ſuch things ſhall be made appear to us, without farther delay, amove ſuch from their offices aforeſaid, and cauſe full ſatisfaction to be made to you for all ſuch wrongs and grievances. We require, therefore, your devotion and fidelity; that ye do not give credit to ſuggeſtions of this ſort, or to the diſturbers of your minds, or have any diſtruſt of our good-will, or believe that we are about to do any thing againſt the juſt and antient laws and cuſtoms; but perſevere ſtedfaſtly in devotion and due fealty to us; becauſe we are prepared, and always will be ready, to exhibit to all of you, as well majors and minors, juſtice to the full, and to all of you, all your laws, rights, and cuſtoms, due, good, and accuſtomed, in all points fully to obſerve; and ourſelves, as well in our proper perſon, as in all things that are ours, to put to hazard for you and yours, and for defence and conſervation of your right. And, that ye may be ſecure concerning theſe things, we have cauſed theſe our letters, of our own mere will and free power, to be made patent. Witneſs myſelf, at Windſore, the 5th day of Auguſt, the 45th year of our reign."

"Like letters are directed throughout the ſeveral counties[1]."

The king ſeems to have gotten poſſeſſion of the cautionary caſtles, that had been intruſted to perſons appointed jointly by the king and barons, by means of the thunder of the Vatican. On the 8th of Auguſt, Boniface, the queen's uncle, and archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſent a copy of the pope's commiſſion, directed to him, and the biſhop of Norwich, and John Manſel, accompanied with one of the archbiſhop's own to John Manſel, whereby Manſel is ordered to go in perſon, and with witneſſes, to Hugh le Bigot, and command him to ſurrender freely and voluntarily the caſtles of Pickering and Scarborough, within fifteen days after the notice, to the lord king, upon pain of excommunication and interdict, by virtue of the apoſtolic mandate. The archbiſhop's order was carried into execution: but Bigot replied, that he had received thoſe caſtles by the will and command of the king, and of his ſworn great men, under his own corporal oath, faithfully to keep; and to ſurrender and deliver the ſame to no perſon whatever, without the expreſs will and command of the king and of the ſaid great men. But he profeſſed his readineſs to render them to the lord king, when the latter ſhould require it by the expreſs will and council of the ſaid great men, or of the greater part of them. This report was returned to the archbiſhop by John Manſel's letter of the 28th of Auguſt[2].

"Amidſt theſe things, the earl of Glouceſter, apoſtatizing as it were, receded from the council of the earl of Leiceſter, and of the other grandees, to whom he had made the oath of confederation for preſerving the good laws of the land; abandoning theſe altogether, he conſented with the king in all things; which when Simon de Montefort heard of, he left England, ſaying he would ſooner die without an inch of land, than recede from the truth by perjury[3]."

The public acts furniſh us with the following curious information[4].

"The king to all, &c. We make known to you by theſe preſents, that, concerning all plaints and demands, which we have, or can have, on any account whatever, towards Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, and Alianora, counteſs of Leiceſter, our ſiſter, and concerning all plaints and demands, which the aforeſaid earl and counteſs have, or can have, towards us, from what cauſe ſoever, even to the octaves of the Nativity of the bleſſed John Baptiſt, we ſubmit ourſelves to the award of our moſt beloved lady Margaret, illuſtrious queen of France; promiſing, that we will firmly and faithfully keep thoſe things which the ſaid queen, before the feaſt of St. John Baptiſt, A. D. 1262, ſhall decree in the premiſes. But ſhe may, if ſhe pleaſe, concerning theſe matters, conſult with the noble perſons, the duke of Burgundy, and Peter Camerarius, or either of them, and any good men ſhe ſhall chuſe. Let it be in the power of the ſaid queen to provide full ſecurity, that her decree be obſerved by the parties. In teſtimony of which, &c. Witneſs the king, at the Tower of London, 20th day of July."

"To the magnificent prince his lord and moſt dear couſin Lewis, by the grace of God, illuſtrious king of France, the king of England, &c. greeting, and the continual increaſe of ſincere affection. The duke of Burgundy, and Peter Camerarius, your liege-men, coming to us on your part, for the matter touching us and our barons, and ſpecially Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, and Alianora, counteſs of Leiceſter, our ſiſter; we being willing that the truth of our cauſe ſhould be laid open to all perſons, leſt reaſon ſhould ſeem to be ſacrificed to inclination in this behalf, were diſpoſed to transfer the buſineſs which was between us, and the ſaid earl and counteſs, to two perſons on our part, and alſo to other two perſons on the part of the ſaid earl and counteſs, as mediators to the aforeſaid duke and Peter; that what they, or the greater part of them, concerning all contentions on either ſide, might reſolve and decree, ſhould be held firm by both parties, and be fully obſerved without gainſaying as well by us as them. But, becauſe the aforeſaid duke and Peter, who were appointed on our part, for ſome reaſons which they aſſigned, would not take upon them this buſineſs, we, out of reſpect to you, put it wholly into the hands of our moſt ſerene lady, and moſt beloved ſiſter, your conſort; that what ſhe ſhall decree and order in the premiſes be fully obſerved on either ſide, as in our letters patent made in that behalf is more fully contained: provided, nevertheleſs, the ſaid earl bind himſelf likewiſe to the ſame thing in this behalf. Moreover, adhering to your kind advice, we are now engaged in a treaty with our barons as to the affair between us and them; which, unleſs it be their fault, will take a peaceable and amicable turn; as Henry, biſhop of London, and Ebulo de Montibus, will be able more fully to inform you."

---

[1] Brady's Appendix.

[2] Rymer.

[3] Ann. Dunſtable, anno 1261.

[4] Rymer.

"To the magnificent prince, his lord and moſt dear couſin Lewis, illuſtrious king of France, &c. [as before[1].]

"We have heared, by relation of ſome of our lieges, that Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, is gone into the parts of France; but, for what cauſe, this being done without our privity, we are utterly ignorant: we therefore intreat your ſerenity, with all the earneſtneſs and reſpect that is in our power, that, at his ſuggeſtion, or the ſuggeſtion of any other, ye would not permit any thing to be done, in the parts aforeſaid, in the affair between us and our barons, that may turn to our prejudice or impediment. Nor let your mind be ſwayed by any thing, which he or other ſhall report to you, until by our own meſſengers, which we ſhall ſhortly ſend over to you, we have cauſed our affairs and the ſtate of the aforeſaid buſineſs to be fully laid before you. Witneſs ourſelf at Windſor, the ſecond day of September, in the year of our reign 45."

"The king to the ſheriff of Norfolk and Suffolk, greeting[2]. Whereas, on the part of the biſhop of Worceſter, and the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, and ſome others of the great men of our realm, were called three knights[3] from each of our counties, that they be before them at St. Alban's, on the approaching feaſt of St. Matthew the Apoſtle, with them to treat concerning the common affairs of our realm; and we, and our aforeſaid great men, were to meet on the ſame day at Windſor, to treat of peace between us and them; we command you, that you firmly injoin thoſe knights of your bailiwick on our part, that, all lett or impediment poſtponed, they come to us at Windſor on the day aforeſaid, and that you do ſtrictly forbid them, on the ſaid day, to go any where but to us, but cauſe them, by all means, to come before us on the aforeſaid day, to hold conference with us upon the premiſes, that they by the effect of the work may ſee and underſtand, that we do not propoſe to attempt any thing but what we ſhall know to be for the honour and common utility of our realm. Witneſs the king at Weſtminſter, 11 September[4]."

The moſt cordial intercourſe ſubſiſted at this time between the kings of France and England, and their queens. King Henry writes to him in the beginning of November, to intreat him to promote and ſupport in the court of Rome his ſon Edmund's right to Sicily. To the ſame purpoſe, he writes to the queens of Navarre and France: he tells the latter, that, preſuming upon her conſtant goodneſs towards him, he earneſtly begs of her, that ſhe would effectually ſolicit her lord to forward his ſon's pretenſions to Sicily, and, if ſhe pleaſed, would be ſo good as to write herſelf to the lord pope and cardinals upon the ſubject, and uſe her influence with her niece, the queen of Navarre, to the ſame end, the queen of Navarre having a great deal of intereſt with the pope and ſacred college[1].

---

[1] Rymer. [2] Brady's Appendix, ex recordis.

[3] In a former note, among the tranſactions of the year 258, we remarked the election of knights commiſſioners of ſhires, and their incorporation with the barons and commune of the realm in the Michaelmas parliament of that year. We have here another inſtance of the ſame ſort. As I conceive theſe returns of knights commiſſioners to be the foundation of ſome farther obſervations on the ſubject. At the grand Oxford parliament a proviſion was made, that the commune (that is, the preſent county-repreſentation, about which writers have been ſo much puzzled and divided, I wiſh to make the earls, barons, knights, and nobles, holding fiefs immediately of the king in capite,) ſhould elect twelve prode men, who ſhould go to the parliaments, when the king or his council ſhould order them, to treat upon the buſineſs of the king and the kingdom: and that the commune would hold that for ſtable which theſe twelve ſhould do. And this was done to ſpare the charge of the commune. From the Oxford parliament, anno 1258, to the demiſe of king Henry, anno 1272, we read no inſtance of any ſuch copious and tumultuous meeting as that at Oxford was. But throughout this period we continually read of the commune of England concurring with the grandees of the king's council in all the affairs of ſtate. This commune could, therefore, be only a delegation of the general baronage, or orders above-recited, made according to one of the Oxford proviſions. It did not include the knights commiſſioners of ſhires; for they were not choſen till after the parliament at Oxford; and they were diſmiſſed at the diſſolution of the Michaelmas parliament of the ſame year, and had the king's writ for the payment of their wages for their journey and attendance in that parliament. The next intimation we have of the election of county-knights is in the preſent inſtrument: upon which light will be thrown by reciting a record of the 38th year of this king: wherein very particular directions are given for the election of knights of ſhires, for ſervice in parliament.

"Rex vic. Bed. & Bucks, ſalutem. Cùm comites, & barones, & cæteri magnates noſtri, nobis firmiter promiſerunt, quòd erunt Londini à die Paſchæ proximè futuro in tres ſeptimanas, cum equis & armis parati, & benè muniti ad tendendum, ſine ullâ dilatione, versùs Portſmouth, & transfretandum ad nos in Vaſconiam contrà regem caſtellæ, qui terram noſtram Vaſconiæ in manu forti in æſtate proximè futurâ hoſtilitèr eſt ingreſſurus."

"Et tibi præcipimus, quòd omnes illos, qui tenent 20 libratas terræ de nobis in capite, vel de aliis qui ſunt infra ætatem & in cuſtodiâ noſtrâ, ad idem diſtringas. Tibi diſtinctè præcipimus, quòd præter omnes prædictos venire facias coram concilio noſtro apud Weſtmonaſterium, in quindenâ Paſchæ proximè futurâ, quatuor legales & diſcretos milites de comitatibus prædictis, quos iidem comitatus ad hoc elegerint vice omnium & ſingulorum eorundem viz. duos de uno comitatu, & duos de alio ad providendum, unà cum militibus aliorum comitatuum, quos ad eundem diem vocari fecimus, quale auxilium nobis in tantâ neceſſitate impendere voluerint. Et tu ipſe militibus, & aliis de comitatu prædicto, neceſſitatem prædictam & tam urgens negotium noſtrum diligentèr exponas, & ad competens auxilium nobis ad præſens impendendum efficacitèr inducas. Ita quòd præfati quatuor milites præfato concilio noſtro ad predictum terminum Paſchæ reſpondere poſſint ſuper prædicto auxilio pro ſingulis comitatibus prædictorum." Rot. Clauſ. 38 Hen. III. Brady's Anſwer to Jani Anglorum facies nova, p. 212. It is teſted, 11 Feb. at Windſor, by queen Alianora, and Richard earl of Cornwal, then regents, king Henry being in parts beyond ſea. On the 22 June, 1253, the great ſeal was delivered to the queen, the king going into Gaſcony. Similar writs were ſent to all other ſhire-reeves. In the former part of this writ, the king, who was preparing for his expedition into Gaſcogue, ſummonſes all his vaſſals, who held of him, as of his crown, by knight-ſervice, to be equipped with their military array, horſes, and arms, according to what was due from their barony, in three weeks after the ſummons, to embark with him for Gaſcogne, or Guienne. He likewiſe orders all others, who held twenty librates, that is, a knight's fee, of him in capite, or a military fief of that amount of any of his vaſſals, who were wards of the king, by reaſon of nonage, ſhould do the ſame. Of theſe two claſſes, we ſee, he required perſonal ſervice, on account of their military tenure in capite. The writ then proceeds to direct how the general body of knights and freeholders, within the ſeveral counties, were to be dealt with, and orders that the ſhire-reeve ſhould cauſe to come before his great council of nobles or barons (for ſo I underſtand it) at Weſtminſter, at the quindenes of Eaſter, when the king was to convene his great council in parliament, four reſpectable and intelligent knights, that is, freeholders of knightly eſtate, whom the knights and freeholders of the ſeveral counties ſhould chuſe in their county-courts reſpectively, in the ſtead of them all, and ſeverally; the ſame two knights, thus being elected, being to determine, together with the knights commiſſioners of other counties, who were to be before the ſaid council at the ſamet ime, what ſort of aid or ſubſidy they would will to beſtow upon the king, in his ſo great neceſſity. Farther, the ſhire-reeve was to lay before the freeholders the kings urgent want at this time, and preſs for a ſuitable aid; ſo that the two knights commiſſioners might anſwer before the ſaid council concerning ſuch aid. Although, at that time no ſuch aſſembly as that we now call an houſe of commons (by the bye, an ungrammatical and abſurd phraſe) was in being, yet it is hence very clear, that the contribution to the king, called an aid or ſubſidy, was the free gift of the freeholders, compoſing the communities of counties. If it be aſked, who theſe were; I anſwer, they were ſuch as held military fief, as alſo the reſidue of the antient tenants in thanage, whoſe frank tenement had not been yet amoved into tenure by knight's ſervice; in ſhort, the freeholders of the county being members of the county court.

[4] Brady's Appendix, p. 231.

Pope Alexander IV. died on the 25th of May, A. D. 1261, and his ſucceſſor, Urban IV. ſucceeded him in the pontifical chair, on the 29th of Auguſt following. Pope Alexander's bulls of abſolution had been dated on the 28th of April, and the 7th of May. His dying ſo ſoon after the date of his bulls, and before they could take effect, made it proper for Henry to apply afreſh to the holy ſee for a renewal of theſe acts of pontifical favor. His letter to the new pope, on this ſubject, is teſted the firſt day of January, A. D. 1262: he therein, among other things, intreats his holineſs upon no account whatever to ſhew any kind of regard to the petitions of the barons, who had ſolicited for confirmation of the Oxford proviſions; he begs him to give a gracious reception to maſter John de Hemingford, and maſter Roger Levull, clerks, whom he appoints his proctors at the holy ſee, in the room of thoſe who had been ſent by the barons, while the king's ſeal was in their hands; and declares that the proctors, choſen by the barons, were not approved by him, and ſtudied his hurt more than his benefit[2].

To ſtrengthen this application, he writes likewiſe to the whole college of cardinals, particularly to Ottobon.

By other letters of the ſame date, the king intreats his holineſs not to give any ſort of credit to thoſe bad perſons who defamed John Manſel, treaſurer of York, at the court of Rome; as if he had been the fomenter of diſcord between the king and his nobles; whereas the ſaid John, he ſays, had never done any ill offices of that ſort, or ſunk any man in his opinion by bad reports; that the ſaid John he had known from his youth, and was convinced of his good diſpoſition; and that John had done no more than his duty, in ſtanding faithfully by him, and ſupporting, upon all occaſions, the rights of his crown and dignity. He intreats the pope, therefore, not only to think well of his miniſter, but to give him a good place in his affections.

In the late turmoil between the king and barons, concerning the appointment of ſhire-reeves[3], ſome counties had conſented to obey ſuch as were appointed by the king, of his own independent will; others turned out thoſe who were ſo appointed, as being unlawfully commiſſioned.

---

[1] Rymer, tom. I. p. 731. [2] Ib. p. 737.

[3] In the Anglo-Saxon as well as Anglo-Norman times, each Engliſh county was a ſort of diſtinct principality, competent to the adminiſtration of juſtice both civil and criminal. Some of the Anglo-Saxon laws forbid legal queſtions to be removed out of, or carried beyond, the provincial tribunals. "Omnis cauſa (ſays a law of Athelſtan) terminetur, aut in comitatu, aut in hundredo, aut in halimotâ ſocam habentium." An earl or ealderman was the prefect of a county. He had uſually his ſubſtitute, called his vice-comes. The office of earl was either temporary, or de feodo, that is, perpetual or hereditary; ſome of the latter had great prerogatives, and were afterwards called Counts Palatine; and of this ſort were the earls of Cheſter, Hereford, Shrewſbury, and, I ſuppoſe, ſome others, made by William I. Theſe earls had within their ſeveral counties jura regalia, that is, ſuch rights as belonged in general to the king or prince. Within theſe earldoms the king's writ did not run. And theſe earls made ſtatutes, with the concurrence of their barons, knights, and freeholders, called collectively the commune, or communities, of their counties, for the behoof and government thereof, as the king made ſtatutes, with the concurrence of the community of the realm, for the nation at large. And each county had its peculiar laws, cuſtoms, and ſtatutes. Before the Conqueſt, counties ſeem to have been, for the moſt part, in the charge of their reſpective earls. Thus Godwin and his ſons engroſſed moſt of the earldoms of England in the reign of Edward the Confeſſor; whether as feoffees, or temporary earls, I do not know: but it ſeems there were ſome of each ſort. After the Conqueſt, the firſt William ſeems to have retrenched the number of earls, and multiplied that of ſhire-reeves; that is, he appointed but few earls, and committed the counties in general to ſhire-reeves of his own making, whereby the counties were brought to a nearer connexion with the perſon of the king, and more immediately under his own government. The Anglo-Norman ſhire-reeves were ſometimes leſſees, or firmarii, holding the king's profits or iſſues at a certain rent, for a time ſpecified—ſometimes de feodo; but uſually held at the will of the king, and anſwered at the Exchequer for the iſſues of their office. Great part of the king's revenue aroſe from the pleas (ſo were the law proceedings called) of the county; which tempted greedy men to bid very high for the firm of the ſhire-reevewick, which ſuch men hoped to render productive by extortion. Nor was the crown itſelf free from the ſame ſort of diſpoſition; for, it looked out for ſuch men as were likely to conſult the king's coffers more than the people's pockets. The ſhire-reeve's accounts were attended to with extreme rigour. They were not often changed; it being a kind of maxim, that the ſame perſon ſhould continue in office till he did ſomething for which he ought to be ſuperſeded. The place was uſually filled by perſons of very high rank, either lay, or clerical, as it happened. Lord Edward, eldeſt ſon of Henry III, was ſhire-reeve of Bucks and Bedford in the 52d and 53d years of that king. In the Anglo-Norman age, our kings had a very large landed property, conſiſting of demeſnes, antient demeſnes, and lands in their ſervice. Of the firſt ſort were manors, and caſual portions of land, which by any means belonged to the crown, and made its patrimony. The antient demeſnes were manors or towns, particularly cities, and fortified towns of leſs magnitude, called burgs, and certain open towns, being chartered; which ſerfs had been pure demeſne, but were now held by grantees of divers deſcriptions in fee-firm, or by other ſervice, as might happen; all, however, accountable for the ſervices reſerved in their ſeveral grants. Again, many perſons, whether earls, barons, knights, or ſimple freeholders, were ſeiſed of crown lands in demeſne, as of their fee or fief reſpectively, who yet owed to the crown, for the ſame, aid, which term particularly attached to pure military fief, and to military fief for which the tenant paid to his lord a fixed ſum of money in lieu of his ſervices; ſuch was called tenure by ſocage. The king's manors were ſuperintended by the ſhire-reeve, who ſaw that the manerial reeve or provoſt did his duty, in preſerving the proper number of vilanes, and ſerfs regardant to the manor, and all manner of live and dead ſtock belonging thereto. The ſhire-reeve alſo levied the poſſe comitatus, ſummoned all ſuch to the king's expedition as were bound to attend him in perſon on account of military fief, and collected the ſcutage of thoſe who compounded for perſonal ſervice by pecuniary rate. He had, indeed, the ordering of every thing in the county relative to the military levy of the county. He was alſo bound to ſee the king's caſtles within his county to be well furniſhed with victual and other neceſſaries. The ſhire-reeve was alſo the king's high bailiff, in keeping the peace of the county, and ſeeing its juſtice duly adminiſtered, and carrying the deciſions of its courts into execution: he ſeems to have been ſent to act as high juſtice of the county till that power was retrenched in the reign of Henry II, and ſtill more cloſely paſſed by the Magna Charta of King John. In ſmall cauſes, however, he ſat as judge, but in more was miniſterial. He arranged the ceremonial in wagers of battle concerning freeholds—as likewiſe, in the combats between felons and their approvers. In trials by grand aſſize (a noble inſtitution of Henry II.) he convened the recognitors, who were to make the aſſize, and had to ſee their judgement executed. In other trials, leſs important, where the ſuitors of the county court had the judicial power veſted in them, he convened the ſuitors, and put every thing in a train for a legal deciſion. When the commune were ſummoned by the king to recruit his parliament with county repreſentatives, choſen in the county-court, and in the name of the commune of the county grant aid, or ſubſidy, the ſhire reeve was charged with carrying the king's writ of election and ſummons into effect; as alſo with getting the wages of the county delegates or proctors paid at the county expence, for their parliamentary attendance. There was another very great branch of the ſhire-reeve's duty, which affected all perſons of the county in an eſpecial manner, that is, his half yearly circuit of the county, through the ſeveral hundreds thereof, when he held what was called his turn. To this turn came the reeve and four men (which might be either franc tenants, or tenants in villenage) from each villate of the hundred. The reeve and four men of every villate were anſwerable for the good behaviour of their ſeveral villates, and were to prevent all miſdemeanors within their villates, in conſequence of which, the accuſed were apprehended, or bailed, or ſet at large, as might happen. In ſtrictneſs of police, it ſhould ſeem that all perſons were bound to attend the ſhire-reeve's turn, except the clergy, and all ſuch as lived within franchiſes, where the franchiſe itſelf had a local juriſdiction, ſimilar to the turn. At the turn, all perſons were, or ought to be, ſworn to their fealty to the king. We find

To prevent in future diſputes about making of ſhire-reeves, that is, whether they ſhould be made by the king's ſole and abſolute will, or by the king, with the advice of the grandees of his council, the king and the barons agreed to leave the queſtion to the deciſion of ſix referees, whereof three were to be choſen by the king, and three by the barons. And by an additional article of the compromiſe it was ſtipulated, that the ultimate judgement ſhould be veſted in Richard, earl of Cornwall, king of the Romans, brother of king Henry, if the ſix referees could not come to an agreement about it. And this happened to be the caſe; whereupon, about the latter end of Jan. A. D. 1262, Richard took upon himſelf this important arbitration. The king's referees were Philip Baſſet, juſticiary of England, Robert Walerand, knight, and William de Merton. Thoſe for the barons[1] were John de la Haye, Richard Folyot, and Richard de Middleton. The thing to be determined was the mode of election from the Michaelmas following: whereby it ſhould ſeem, that in the interval the appointments ſhould reſt as they were. It is noted by Thomas Wykes, that the ſhire-reeves of the preſent year were nominated by earl Richard: perhaps, in ſome caſes, the king and the barons left them to his nomination. The king's referees alleged that, conſidering the eſtate of the king and of his predeceſſors, he ſhould appoint the ſhire-reeves freely, juſt as he ſaw good, in the ſeveral counties, according to his own mere will, as he and his anceſtors had been wont to do. The referees on the part of the barons held it as their firm opinion, that, for the king's own good, and towards conciliating the hearts of his lieges and people to recal them to their ſpecial affection, and confirming their devotions to him, he ſhould put ſhire-reeves fit and ſufficient through the counties ſeverally, by his council (provided that ſaid ſhire-reeves were of the very counties), and might retain them in their office, if he ſaw good, or amove them, and put others in their place. Farther, that this mode ſhould endure for ten years, and the king not bound by it after that time, except it were by his own choice; and to this opinion they declared their firm adherence, as ſuch a meaſure would not operate to the diſheriſon of the king or his family, nor to the prejudice or diminution of his ſovereignty. Definitive judgement being left with earl Richard, he obſerves in his award, that adverting how the king and his predeceſſors, concerning the putting of ſhire-reeves and bailiffs, had always acted according to their own pleaſure, and that no diſparagement ought to accrue to king Henry or his heirs in this behalf, therefore he defined, that the king and his heirs, from the feaſt of St. Michael next coming, concerning the ſhire-reeves of England, in regard of making, putting, and amoving them, freely and without impediment, ſhould do and diſpoſe, as to themſelves ſhould ſeem meet, and as it ſhould pleaſe the good pleaſure of their own will[2].

The public acts furniſh us with the following circumſtances relative to the diſpute between the king and the earl of Leiceſter[3].

To their moſt excellent lord the lord Henry, by the grace of God, illuſtrious king of England, lord of Ireland and duke of Aquitaine, his devoted and faithful John de Cleyſhall, and John de Montferrant, greeting, and continually faithful obedience.—By find the king's order for ſwearing men both of free and ſervile condition at the turn. But whether vilanes of the loweſt order, who were the property, as to their perſons, iſſue, goods and chattels, of their ſeveral lords, were comprehended, I do not know. Farther, as it ſeems to me, all men, who were free by birth, as perſons not regardant to any manor, or to any lord, whom no one could claim as his vilane, muſt take the oath of fealty at the turn, or he was liable to be ſeized as a vagabond, and be out of the king's protection in all caſes whatever. Such an one alſo, to have this laſt privilege, muſt be a member of ſome decenna or tything. Whether villates were divided into tythings, or implied them, I cannot ſay: but every man who would have the right of freedom muſt be of a decenna or tything; which ſeems to me to mean no more than that wherever he dwelt, if he was free, and had no ſubſtance, the villate was anſwerable for his good behaviour, and therefore would not ſuffer him to ſojourn among them, but upon good ſecurity.

---

Both in the Anglo-Saxon and Anglo-Norman ages, the ſhire-reeves and their ſubordinate bailiffs were wont to be the opprobrium of government, and the ſcourge of the nation. They were ſo before, and in, the time of Alfred. Among his excellences, therefore, we ſee ſpecially recorded his ſolicitous attention to correct this abuſe of power.—Permaximam pretereà curam agebat, (ſo writes Aſſerius,) ne à vicecomitibus & miniſtris pauperes opprimerentur. On the contrary, the government of the firſt Norman is ſeverely girded for a contrary policy.—In Angliâ verò thelonea injuſta & peſſimæ conſuetudines his temporibus pullulârunt. Principes omnes auri & argenti cupiditate cæcati adeò erant, ut illud de eis verè dici poſſit—"Unde habeat nemo quærit, ſed oportet habere: quantò magis loquebantur de recto, tantò major fiebat injuria. Qui juſticiarii vocabantur caput erant omnis injuſticiæ. Vicecomites & præpoſiti, quorum erat officium juſticia & judicium, furibus & raptoribus atrociores erant, & omnibus ſæviſſimis ſæviores. Rex ipſe cùm ad firmam terras ſuas, quantò cariùs poterat, dediſſet: alii magis offerenti, & deindè alii, ſemper negligens pactum, & ad majora ſtudens, dabat: nec erat cura, quanta injuria pauperibus à præpoſitis fieret."

Some of our beſt Antiquaries aſſert, that the ſhire-reeve of each county was, before the Conqueſt, choſen, as knights repreſentatives were afterwards, by the commune of their county, in their county-court. After the Conqueſt, however, there are but few, if any, traces of ſuch mode of election. They ſeem to be appointed ſolely by the crown, excepting the counties wherein the office was de feodo. From the time of the Conqueſt to that of king Henry's ſtruggle with his barons, it was probably a thing much wiſhed for, by the commune of every county, to elect its own ſhire-reeve, or, at leaſt, to have a ſhire-reeve appointed out of ſome of the beſt landed gentry of their county. Hence, we find it one of the chief liberties of the city of London, to elect its own ſhire-reeve. They conſented to pay a large annual rent in perpetuity, for this valuable immunity; with which was joined that of chuſing their own high-juſtice, or port-reeve, dignified ſome time afterwards with the French title of mayor. In the 7th year of king John, the men, that is, the commune of the counties of Dorſet and Somerſet, ſubmitted to pay to the king a large ſum, if he would appoint for them a ſhire-reeve from among themſelves; ſuch an one as ſhould reſide in the county, except it were William Briewerre and his party: ſo that he, whom the king ſhould appoint, ſhould be ſhire-reeve as long as the king pleaſed, and ſhould be well ſerved; and when the king had a mind to amove him, he might appoint another. In the 4th year of king John, the men of Cornwall fined in a large ſum to the king, that they might have a ſhire-reeve from among themſelves, and chuſe from among the better ſort of the county certain men, and preſent them to the king, who ſhould chuſe, from among the perſons preſented to him whom he would; and that ſuch perſon ſhould be ſhire-reeve as long as he ſerved well; and, if he did not ſerve well, he ſhould be amoved, and another, choſen by the king, put in his place, being of the ſame county, if a fit perſon could be found in the county; and, if a fit perſon could not be found in the county, the king ſhould make a ſhire-reeve elſewhere, ſuch an one as he liked, and would ſerve him well. In 14 Hen. III. the men of Devon were in debt to the king for having a ſhire-reeve from among themſelves. In 22 Hen. III. the men of Somerſet and Dorſet were in the ſame predicament, on the ſame account. Edward I, in the 28th year of his reign, allowed the men of each county to elect their own ſhire-reeve, except where the office was held de feodo. But this power was taken away in the following reign.

[1] One ſhould think, that the nominees of the barons ſhould themſelves be barons. But none of theſe ſeem to be ſo; if by barons we underſtand a ſuperior and diſtinct order of nobles, entitled by birth and tenure to a ſpecial parliamentary ſummons, and ſeat in the great council of the nation. By the tenor of king John's charter, c. 17, 18. which ſeems to have been ſtrictly adhered to in forming the Oxford parliament, although theſe chapters were expunged from all the ſubſequent charters, ratified by Henry III. the majores barones and the inferior tenants of the king in capite made one promiſcuous maſs of parliamentary nobles. Theſe three, therefore, were, I ſuppoſe, ſome of the tenants in capite, which ſeem to have been very numerous. —"Illos quoque, qui ex parte baronum affuerunt, qui innumerabiles fuere, non eſt neceſſe numerare, cùm tota Angliæ nobilitas in unum collecta, quaſi ſub numero cadebat." M. Paris. This great multitude of nobleſſe could not be wholly majores barones. The Annaliſt of Waverley notes it as an extraordinary thing, that at the Oxford parliament there were as many as an hundred of them. On no occaſion, after that period to the end of the reign of Henry III, do we find above twenty or thirty of theſe ſuperior barons, called magnates, collected in any aſſembly.

[2] Rymer. [3] Ib.

theſe preſents we ſignify to your royal ſerenity, that on the morrow of the Purification of the bleſſed Virgin we came ſafely to Paris with your treaſure, where we found your ſon, the lord Edward, ſafe and well; and we imparted to him the buſineſs which brought us hither. On the Sunday following, we went to the lady queen of France, at St. German in Laya, and laid our buſineſs before her, as we were ordered. She adviſed, and ſtraitly charged, that we ſhould by no means preſent ourſelves to the lord king of France before her arrival at court, viz. on the Lord's day before Aſh-Wedneſday, that ſhe might afford her advice and aſſiſtance in favour of your affair. On the Sunday mentioned, we laid before the lord king, in preſence of maſter H. de Mortimer, and the lord prior de Mamſo, whom you deſired by your letters to be aſſiſting to us, in all the ſeveral matters, in exact form, juſt as we were commanded. After he had heard and conſidered what had been offered, the king appointed another day, that, in the mean time, he might confer with the earl of Leiceſter upon the premiſes. On the Tueſday following, in the preſence of the ſaid H. and prior, the lord king recited all the articles and matters of our petitions, very regularly and correctly, juſt as we had ſtated them, and informed us, that he had conferred with the earl of Leiceſter, and that the lord earl told him, that, as to yourſelf, you were perfectly well inclined; but that ſome perſons of your council had no great concern about peace, and would not willingly promote it. The king added, that the earl was of opinion, that a reconciliation could not be brought about at this time to his honour, and therefore deſired him to give himſelf no farther trouble about it. The reaſons given for the earl's thinking ſo ſhall be explained by ourſelves, on our return. Upon receiving this anſwer, we began immediately to prepare for our departure. But, the next day, coming to court, we were ſtopped by John de Valence, by order of the lord king and queen of France, who intended to talk more fully to the lord earl. What may be the iſſue, we cannot tell; but, as ſoon as we know it, we will haſten back to England. The lord king of France and the lady queen, together with their children, are ſafe and well, and wiſh for your health and proſperity as much as for their own. Farewel your royal excellency for many years. Paris, Aſh-Thurſday."

"Lewis, by the grace of God, king of France, to the egregious prince, his moſt dear couſin Henry, by the ſame grace, illuſtrious king of England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitain, his liege, greeting, and ſincere affection.

"We have heard, and well underſtand, the things which your agents have laid before us concerning what we adviſed you relating to our beloved the earl of Leiceſter's reſtoration to your peace and grace; and, after hearing your agents, we cauſed what they offered to be laid before the earl. But we cannot at preſent hold out any means of reconciliation; which is a great grief to us. Paris, the firſt Sunday in Lent."

Upon the 23d of February, pope Urban renewed the bulls of abſolution, purſuant to the king's requeſt, on the firſt of January preceding. Theſe bulls arrived here before the 2d of May; for, on that day, we find the king's writs directed to all the ſhire-reeves reſpectively, declaring that he held himſelf no longer bound to obſerve the Oxford proviſions[1]; that he had been releaſed from his oath; that he meant freely to exerciſe his royal power; that he meant to keep the two charters, and ſhew juſtice and mercy to all his people, from the higheſt to the loweſt. And he directs the ſhire-reeve of each county to cauſe to be arreſted, and kept in cuſtody, till he ſhould receive orders in that behalf, all perſons whatſoever who ſhould adhere to the late combinations, do any thing againſt his royal power, hinder him in the execution of his office, perſuade the people to any ſteps of this ſort, or attempt any thing againſt the king and his honour.

King Henry had for ſome time wiſhed to go over to France, to enjoy the converſation of king Lewis, and to ſettle ſome private buſineſs with him. The Welſh had juſt entered into a freſh truce, and given proofs of a peaceable inclination by a quiet behaviour in the late broils. Theſe were ſubſided for the preſent; and the king and queen ventured upon this journey to Paris in the beginning of July[2].

The king of Spain had offered king Henry aſſiſtance towards quelling the tumults in England. Henry thanked him for this inſtance of his kindneſs, but thought ſuch aſſiſtance unneceſſary at preſent[3].

A cloſe friendſhip ſubſiſted at this time between the queens of France and England. The count of Anjou, brother of the French king, whoſe wife was the youngeſt of the four daughters of the late count de Provence, and at length her father's heir, was, on account of the earldom of Provence, at variance with the queen of France, who claimed her father's earldom[4].

A negociation was opened this year between the holy ſee and the houſe of France, for making the count of Anjou king of Sicily. This ſoon after took effect to the utter ruin of king Henry's claims upon that kingdom; in the fond hope of which he had ſubmitted to the moſt painful humiliations, and involved himſelf in all his difficulties. The earls of Anjou and Leiceſter were united in the bonds of a ſworn friendſhip[5].

About the middle of July, died Richard de Clare, earl of Glouceſter—poiſoned, as was ſaid, at the table of the queen's uncle, Peter of Savoy.

Here is his epitaph:

"Hic pudor Hippoliti, Paridis gena, ſenſus Ulyſſis, Æneæ pietas, Hectoris ira, jacet[6]."

He was ſucceeded in his honours by his ſon Gilbert de Clare, a youth about eighteen years of age; To whom earl Richard gave great charge, that he ſhould maintain the Oxford ordinances[7].

While king Henry was in France, the earl of Leiceſter came privately to England, about the beginning of October. He had left France without being reconciled to the king. As ſoon as he reached London, he appeared at a great council, which Philip Baſſett then held as high juſtice of England. At this council the earl produced a brief or letter of the pope, wherein he confirmed the proviſions of Oxford, and recalled the king's abolition, declaring that he had been deceived in granting it. This brief was publicly read in council, contrary to the will of the high juſtice. As ſoon as the earl had publiſhed it, he returned to France[8]. King Henry did not return to England till the 20th of December. He arrived in

---

[1] It ſeems, however, that about this time, when the king had diſcharged the council of grandees appointed according to the Oxford proviſion, and acted by a council of his own choice, he was willing to ratify the conſtitutions, which in ſubſtance were the ſame as made the ſtatute of Marleburgh. This is the preamble to his ratification of thoſe conſtitutions: "Novæ conſtitutiones regiæ poſt parliamentum Oxon. A. D. 1262, regni autem domini regis, filii regis Joannis, 47, de merâ ac liberâ voluntate ipſius domini regis, in plenâ & liberâ poteſtate ipſius, interveniente conſilio fidelium ſuorum, editæ ſunt per ipſum dominum regem conſtitutiones ſubſcriptæ ad reformationem & meliorationem regni ſui, & per ipſum publicatæ ac obſervationi auctoritate ſuâ gratialitèr demandatæ."—Then follow the ſame conſtitutions in ſubſtance as compoſe the ſtatute of Marleburgh. See Tyrrhel's Hiſt. Vol. II. p. 1006, an. 1262. I ſuppoſe the following paſſage in the Flores Hiſtoriarum, called Matthew of Weſtminſter, alludes to the ſame conceſſion; otherwiſe, I cannot reconcile it with the whole current of the king's conduct during this year.—"At dominus rex, ſuorum fidelium ſalubri conſilio interveniente, ad pacem magnatum ſuorum & regni meliorationem, conſtitutiones Oxoniæ dudum editas, de merâ ac liberâ voluntate ſuâ inviolabilitèr obſervari præcepit, eaſdem cuilibet dirigendo comitatui. Sed necdum per hoc pacificatum eſt regnum." Did the articles of the ſtatute of Marleburgh make the eſſence of the Oxford ſtatutes?

[2] Rymer. [3] Ib. [4] Ib. [5] Leland, Collect. M. Weſtm. [6] M. Weſtm.

[7] Ib. Dugdale's Baronage. Fabian. Chron. de Dunſtable. [8] Tyrrhel, from MS Chron. of St. Auguſtin, Cant.

London about ten days afterwards, having kept his Chriſtmas at Canterbury. Abroad he had ſtruggled with a long and dangerous illneſs, and came home not recovered, though mending daily[1]. The queen accompanied him to England; but lord Edward continued in foreign parts, though he had promiſed the king to be with him in England on Chriſtmas-day. He ſeems now to be reconciled to the king, and diſpoſed to ſupport his authority in oppoſition to the barons; whoſe proceedings, probably, he thought, tended to leſſen the regal power, by which he, as the king's heir expectant, would be affected in his turn. As ſoon as the king reached Dover, he found at that port letters and meſſengers, acquainting him with ſuch riſings in Wales as had not been ſeen before in his time. The whole march was in rebellion. Lewellin, and ſome of the Engliſh lords of the marches, taking advantage of lord Edward's abſence, to whom the king had aſſigned all that he held in Wales, had confederated and entered the land committed by lord Edward to the charge of lord Roger de Mortimer, and taken the caſtles of Knockla and Kenenches. The king was exceedingly afflicted with this intelligence, and very ſharply reproved his ſon for ſtaying abroad; himſelf not being able to make a journey into Wales, and not knowing whom to truſt with the defence of thoſe parts[2]. Here we cloſe the occurrences of the year 1262.

1263. Before the end of the year 1262, Henry's diſpute with the baronage of the realm had taken a turn which ſeemed to prognoſticate final ſucceſs to the king. The counſellors, who had been appointed for him by the common univerſity of the realm, were divided among themſelves, and diſcouraged by variety of circumſtances. Lord Edward was in cloſe union with his royal father, and a young prince of great activity and talents, ſtrenuous in maintaining all the prerogatives of the crown, and not likely to be ſcrupulous about the means of preſerving them. The baronial party ſaw the whole power of the pope, who claimed obedience to his mandates in the double capacity of ſupreme head of the church, and of ſovereign temporal lord of the kingdom of England, levelled fully and vehemently againſt them. The king of France, although in many reſpects an excellent prince, could not be expected to approve of the conduct of the community of England towards their king, whoſe queen was ſiſter to the royal conſort of France, and between whom at this time there was a cloſe union. Lewis was diſpoſed to be very obſequious to his queen, and therefore liable, on the preſent occaſion, to yield to her influence in behalf of the queen of England; but his devotion to the ſee of Rome was as implicit as the holy father himſelf could deſire. The recent deaths of John Fitz Geoffry, and of Richard earl of Glouceſter, two main pillars of the popular party, had greatly enervated the baronial faction. And, about this time, Peter of Savoy, uncle of the queen, who had been enriched, through the queen's intereſt, with the princely earldom of Richmond, and the fair honour of Aigle in Suſſex, and alſo the caſtle of Pevenſey, and had enjoyed the king's chief confidence as his firſt counſellor or miniſter, was recently returned to England; to give all the ſupport he could to the royaliſts. Add to theſe diſcouragements on the ſide of the barons the alarming defections among themſelves; inſomuch that, when the earl of Leiceſter departed for France, in the latter part of the former year, all the members of the council of grandees, who had been appointed according to the Oxford proviſions, had gone over to the ſame ſide, except the venerable biſhop of Worceſter, the earl of Leiceſter, the young earl of Glouceſter, Hugh Deſpencer, and Peter of Montfort, a diſtinguiſhed baron, but whether related in blood to our Simon de Montfort I do not diſcover. The earl of Leiceſter, diſheartened at the unpromiſing aſpect of things, and thinking all farther effort uſeleſs, had withdrawn from England, and ſeemed to have totally abandoned the cauſe. On a ſudden, however, the ſpirit of his party revived, in conſequence of the offence given by lord Edward, as well to his friends as to the nation in general, by a conduct which ſhall be related preſently.

Soon after the king's arrival in England, he received advice from the biſhop of Hereford of the inſurrection of the Welſh, and diſtraction of the marches there[3].—What follows is the main part of the biſhop's letter: "Let your excellence know, that the whole march is diſturbed, as it has never been before in our time. For, many knights of the march here held many parliaments, ſold their corn and ſtock, and ſome of them, as is ſaid, have alienated their lands, and ſome have left their houſes quite empty. The names of theſe are not unknown to your excellence. But Lewellin, prince of Wales, has lately entered the land of ſir Roger de Mortimer, with 300 armed cavalry, and 30,000 infantry, and has beſieged and taken ſir Roger's caſtle at Knoklas; and the ſame lord's caſtle at Kenenchles was ſurrendered to him, from which ſir Roger, together with his whole family, without hurt or encounter, departed. And, although we believe that all your men[4] are loyally diſpoſed towards you, yet, if we ſpeak of the country in general, the caſe is otherwiſe: there every thing teems with fraud and evil deſign; whereby the whole march is ſo alarmed, that all the men of my dioceſe have fled to the church with their goods; and there they do not think themſelves ſafe. But the Welſh have burnt the lands of the march about Webyl, Enderſley, and the wall of Wigmore, and plundered them. On theſe accounts, we have fortified our caſtle of Hereford with men and victuals as well as we could, and have ſolicited your citizens to behave faithfully; and we were got as far as Glouceſter on our journey to you, but were not able to proceed by reaſon of a certain diſorder which afflicts us. We therefore beſeech your excellence to ſend with all haſte to the caſtle at Hereford 40 horſemen armed, good and able; as ye love the march, and would wiſh to ſave it. We will expect them all at Glouceſter, and with them repair to Hereford; or we will come to you, and give them ſuch counſel and aid as we can: alſo giving in command to the citizens of Hereford, that to the conſtable, whom you ſhall ſet over the ſaid armed men, they deliver the keys of the city, and ſubmit to his orders. Know moreover, that, although we were well, we could not ſafely go to you at preſent, becauſe certain men evil-minded to you thirſt for our blood, who look upon us as a ſpy, and ſay, we reveal to you every thing that paſſes in the march. Farewel your excellence[5]."

This letter of the biſhop ſeems in ſome meaſure to have been the cauſe of the following one of the king to lord Edward. The date has not been preſerved, but it was manifeſtly written about this time[6].

"The king to his eldeſt ſon health and paternal benediction. Whereas, on the vigil of St. Thomas the Apoſtle, we and our queen with our ſuite happily landed at Dover, and, when we had proceeded to Canterbury, as well by meſſengers as by letters of divers of our lieges which we ſend to you incloſed in theſe preſents, we heard that the whole march of Wales was every where diſturbed by the moſt grievous perils, and at this moment is expoſed to deſtruction, if ſuccour be not afforded with provident counſel and inſtant applications: And, ſince Lewelin, ſon of Griffin, and his accomplices, aſſert, that they are willing to obſerve the truces made between us and them, whereas their actions belie their aſſertion, and they have wholly bid adieu to the truces in the parts of

---

[1] Rymer. Th. Wykes. M. Weſtm.

[2] The confederates in the marches ſent a letter to the king, under the ſeal of ſir Roger Clifford, beſeeching him to have in remembrance his oath and repeated promiſes to obſerve the Oxford ſtatutes, and deſiring him to act againſt all ſuch perſons as were againſt the ſaid ſtatutes, except the queen and her children.

[3] Flores Hiſtoriarum, anno 1265.

[4] Homines veſtri; your vaſſals, or liege-men.

[5] Rymer.

[6] Ib.

Cheſter between them and your men, to your diſgrace and manifeſt contempt; you ought at this time vigorouſly and powerfully to be defending your land, and did lately promiſe us, that you would come to us in England within the 20th day after Chriſtmas; and, moreover, we are detained with ſuch bodily weakneſs, that we cannot be perſonally in thoſe parts, and could find but few who, without our or your preſence, could make an expedition for the defence of them: we do command you that, as you value your own honour and mine, and as you would ſave your caſtles and lands, and preſerve the indemnity and peace of your people, which, for want of defence, are now attaching themſelves to Lewelin to your diſheriſon, which you ought no longer to put up with, you do come to us into England, without the coſt of delay, in order to afford expeditious and effectual counſel upon the premiſes; eſpecially, as what has been here ſtated to you ought to excite the keeneſt anxiety in you, and leaves no room for inattention or delay, you ought not by any means to omit, upon the pretext of relaxation and puerile gratifications. For, it is baſe and ſhameful to you, that the ſaid Lewelin, when ourſelves are oppreſſed with old age, and you in the bloom of life, deſpiſes to obſerve thoſe truces which he promiſes by word to maintain. But his preſumption and attempts are the conſequence of the counſel and ſuggeſtions he receives from certain perſons of our realm[1]. Witneſs," &c.

While the earl of Leiceſter was abſent, lord Edward brought into England a formidable body of foreign troops[2]; of whom ſome were levied in France, picked men, the ſtouteſt and boldeſt to be found in that kingdom; and beſides theſe were Burgundians, French, and Campanians, whom the Oxford proviſions had exiled; theſe men Edward preferred in places of honour and profit to Engliſhmen of his own ſuite and houſehold; to theſe aliens he committed the cuſtody of his caſtles; to them he delegated the chief offices of his houſehold. Certain high-ſpirited knights, lately in his ſervice, took indignation at proceedings ſo unjuſt and provoking, and immediately declared for the party who had been lately adverſe to the king. They joined in their invitation to the earl of Leiceſter, to come back to England, and become their leader in their farther operations. The Welſh rebellion was made the pretence for bringing the foreign forces into England; but the real cauſe was, to be furniſhed with ſufficient means finally and completely to cruſh the baronial party[3].

"In[4] the year of Grace 1263, Edward, ſon of king Henry, came after Eaſter into England with a ſtrong multitude of knights, as well alien whom he brought with him from Gaul, being the ſtrongeſt and braveſt men to be found in that country, as of Engliſh. And, marching towards Snowdon, he moved a ſtrong expedition againſt the Welſh: but they withdrawing themſelves and our people on account of the inequality of the ground, thickneſs of the woods, and darkneſs of the deep fens, not daring to engage them, it may be ſuppoſed that the rebellion of the Welſh gained additional ſtrength, and the valour of Edward and his men was obſtructed. Edward hereupon came back into England by the call of his father. He did not, however, leave thoſe parts, till he had well ſupplied the ſtrong holds there with garriſons and proviſions."

From the following letter we ſee that lord Edward was at Shrewſbury on the 15th of April[5].

"To the moſt excellent prince, his lord and reverend father, lord Henry, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitaine, Edward his eldeſt ſon greeting with all reverence and honour. We ſtrongly requeſt your excellence, that by your letters you would give it in command to the lord biſhop of Hereford, that he would ſojourn in his caſtle of Ledeſbury North, for the greater defence and ſecurity of the march of Wales in his parts. The ſame thing, if it pleaſe you, give in command to William de Evereus, that in his caſtle of Le Hales he would tarry, and manfully defend thoſe parts. Given at Salop, 15th day of April, in the year of your reign 47."

"About the feaſt of St. Mark the Evangeliſt[6], came Simon de Montfort into England; and at a parliament held at Oxon, without the privity of the king or his council, appeared Richard, king of the Romans, Simon de Montfort, and very many other of the barons; when it was provided, that all who went againſt the Oxford ſtatutes ſhould be held as capital enemies according to what had been provided at Oxford by the lord king and the barons, and confirmed by their writings[7]."

They ſent a letter to the king, beſeeching him to have reſpect to the oath he had himſelf taken, and which they had taken by his poſitive command, and upon pain of his diſpleaſure, and the repeated promiſes he had made to obſerve the Oxford ſtatutes, and petitioning him to oppoſe and avoid all perſons who were againſt the ſaid ſtatutes. But to this petition of the earl of Leiceſter and his aſſociates the king would pay no kind of regard, and declared his reſolution not to agree to their proviſion; nay, he was ſo far from agreeing to their demands, that about the ſame time he iſſued his writs throughout England, expreſſly forbidding the Oxford ſtatutes or proviſions to be any more obſerved[8].

Then the earl of Leiceſter aſſembled an innumerable army; and among the great perſons who thought and acted with him were the following; viz. lord Henry, ſon of the king of the Romans: Hugh Deſpenſer, Henry de Haſtings, Roger de Clifford, John Fitz-John, Roger de Leiburne, Gilbert de Clare, Hamon de Leſtrange, Nicholas de Segrave, John de Vaux, John Gifford, Gilbert de Luci; beſides others without number. All thoſe who appeared in this cauſe were ſhorn by direction of the earl, in token of their fighting for righteouſneſs[9].

"Almoſt all the firſt people of the kingdom flocked together on a ſudden; ſome from an opinion (ſays Wykes) that the work was a pious one; ſome for fear of loſing their property, and expoſing their perſons to danger; and ſome from the hope of enriching themſelves by plunder.

"About the feaſt of St. Auſtin, the Apoſtle of Angels[10], the king together with the queen went to the Tower of London, lord Edward making his abode at the hoſpital of Clerkenwell. All the three being deſtitute of money, and nobody found in London to lend them any, lord Edward having a deſire to diſgrace himſelf, on the feaſt of the Apoſtles Peter and Paul[11], taking to his aſſiſtance Robert Walerand and many others, went to the New Temple, whoſe doors he found ſhut; and when at his demand the keys of the treaſury were delivered up to him, he ſaid he wanted to ſee his mother's jewels; and, ſending for the keeper of the treaſury, he, together with his people, ſurreptitiouſly got admittance. Thoſe who were with him took with them iron mallets, with which they broke open the cheſts of money which belonged to the nobles and merchants[12] of the city, and ordered the money to be taken away, to the amount of one thouſand pounds[13]; and he carried it to Windſor caſtle, where he ſtaid ſome time with his foreign mercenaries. This villainous action being over, the citizens of London roſe againſt him, and others of the council of the king who had their abode in the city; inſomuch that the hotel of John de Grey, without Ludgate, was attacked, and thirty-two of his horſes, and all other things which were found there, were carried off; John himſelf having with difficulty been able to effect his flight to the other ſide of Fleetditch. They treated the houſes and goods of Simon Paſſelawe in the ſame manner."

---

[1] I ſuppoſe he glances chiefly at the earl of Leiceſter.

[2] Flores Hiſtoriarum, an. 1265.

[3] By this phraſe we may now underſtand the whole body of Engliſh freeholders, and all the franchiſed or chartered communities.

[4] M. Weſtm.

[5] Rymer.

[6] 25 Apr.

[7] Annales Dunſtaple.

[8] Tyrrhel, ex libro MS. de Antiq. Legibus, London.

[9] Wykes. An. Dunſtaple.

[10] 26 May, an. Dunſtaple.

[11] 29 June.

[12] Nobles of the city, that is, I ſuppoſe, the ſame claſs of men, who in the chronicles of thoſe times are ſtyled barones, primates, magnates, majores natu, of the city.

[13] Others ſay, ten thouſand pounds.

"In the congregation of the grandees, which was made at London on the feaſt of Pentecoſt, the earl of Leiceſter and many others vented their murmurs againſt the king of England, the lady queen, and the lord Edward, ſaying they were perjured, unleſs they kept the Oxford ſtatutes[1]."

On the 15th of June, the king ſent his mandate to the barons of his port of Dover,[2] acquainting them that his eldeſt ſon Edward was come to them, that he might receive from them[3] the oath of fealty, as the king's eldeſt ſon and heir, in like manner as he had received the ſame by the king's command from all his other barons and grandees[4].

A letter of the ſame tenor was ſent to each of the other cinque-ports. "The barons of all theſe ports complied with the order, but with great difficulty and heſitation[5]."

One of the firſt things done by the earl of Leiceſter, after his coming into England, was making a cloſe alliance with Lewelin, prince of Wales. And about this time, probably, the Welſh prince was affianced to the earl's only daughter. In conſequence of which, ſome years afterwards, a marriage took place between the parties contracted. In all the operations of the ſpring and ſummer of this year, 1263, Lewelin ſeems to have been in cloſe alliance with the barons[6].

The barons drawing near to London about Midſummer, ſent a letter to the mayor and aldermen, under the ſeal of the earl of Leiceſter, wherein they deſired to know whether they would obſerve the Oxford ſtatutes; and aſſured them, that, if any thing contained in thoſe ſtatutes could be amended for the good of the nation, the ſame ſhould be done by diſcreet perſons of the realm. This letter was carried to the king for his advice, who deſired the citizens to declare their inclinations on the ſubject. They told him, that, as they had ſworn by his ſpecial order to keep thoſe ſtatutes, they intended, with his licence and favour, to keep them; and deſired his permiſſion to turn all foreigners out of the city, that no cauſe of quarrel between the citizens and the barons might ariſe[7].

The king of the Romans ſpared no pains to reconcile the two contending parties before matters were carried to extremity. On the 28th of June, he wrote a letter from Ilford to king Henry, to tell him that he was ſet out that day for Chippenham, and intended to go immediately to Wallingford, where he expected to find the barons.—That he had ſtrong hopes of effecting a happy compromiſe with them.—That he would acquaint the king with the reſult as ſoon as poſſible; and therefore begs and importunes him to give it in ſtrict charge to lord Edward, to make no aſſault upon the barons, till the iſſue of the treaty was known; and tells him, that he had laid the ſame injunction upon the barons[8].

The next day, the following letter was ſent by the biſhop of Worceſter to Walter de Merton.

"To the diſcreet perſonage and his moſt dear friend the lord Walter de Merton, chancellor of the king, Walter, by divine mercy, the humble miniſter of the church of Worceſter, health, and all poſſible reſpect and friendſhip[9].

"Whereas we are bound to exert our utmoſt pains and attention to promote the peace and tranquillity of the realm, and the biſhops of Lincoln, London, and Coventry, with a certain form of peace, are ſent to the lord king and lord Edward; from our ſtrong and ardent wiſh for peace, we are obliged to requeſt of you, that, ſeeing the form propoſed is fit and becoming, both with reſpect to the king's honour and the realm's tranquillity, you would labour, with all your diligence, that the king and lord Edward, for avoiding the impending and dreadful danger, accede to this form of peace without difficulty. Farewel. Dated the day of the Apoſtles Peter and Paul, 1263." But this negociation ſeems to have totally miſcarried.

"The principal people of the nation (ſo writes M. Weſtminſter), ſupported by the counſel and effectual aid of the moſt noble Simon de Montfort, the greateſt military man in the realm, were now in haſte to carry into execution what they had long wiſhed for. But, before they proceeded to acts of violence, they ſent the king a letter or declaration, ſealed by the lord Roger Clifford, in the name of the reſt, in which they firſt petitioned his excellence to obſerve the Oxford proviſions, and defied all thoſe that oppoſed them, the king, queen, and their children, excepted. And now began the inſurrection. They firſt fell upon the foreigners, for whom the king and queen and lord Edward had entertained ſo fond a regard. Attack and depredation ſoon became general throughout England; and many, who thought themſelves in no ſort of danger, were on a ſudden convinced of their miſtake. The ſtorm fell chiefly on the king's counſellors, and all thoſe who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves as his party. All ſuch were treated as public enemies. Their manors, demeſnes, and ſtrong places, were aſſailed, and taken, and ravaged; their goods and chattels were conſidered as fair ſpoil, and deſtroyed or carried away by the inſurgents. No diſtinction was made between eccleſiaſtical and temporal property. But no damage or affront was offered to any perſons whatever, except ſuch as were againſt the Oxford proviſions, or had refuſed to attend the ſummons of the barons. Such were branded with the name of felons and perjured men, and deprived of all their goods whereſoever found."

Among the firſt who felt the vengeance of the baronials was the biſhop of Hereford, who was arreſted in his cathedral, and his lands conſigned to deſolation[10]. After his copious treaſure had been reviſed, and a diviſion made of it before his face, he was ſent priſoner to Erdeley caſtle. To the ſame place of confinement were ſent the biſhop's countrymen, the canons ſecular of his church, whom he had put in it. G. de Langley, whom the lord Edward had made his ſeneſchal in Wales, and whom the Welſh deteſted with peculiar acrimony for his oppreſſive adminiſtration, ſuſtained the plunder and ravage of his manors by the ſame people who had ſo roughly handled the biſhop of Hereford. They were a detachment of the baronial army, and had marched from the interior parts of England into the marches of Wales, by order, as was ſaid, of the earl of Leiceſter. Thence the baronial army marched to Glouceſter, and beſieged the caſtle there for four days; in which was a Frenchman, Matthew de Beſil, whom the king had made ſhire-reeve of the county, and warden of the caſtle[11].

Beſil maintained himſelf in it, poſitively refuſing to ſurrender himſelf to the beſieging army, till the firſt gate towards the city was burnt: then, by the treachery of certain priſoners, who had been releaſed in hope of having their help, the back gate having been opened to let in the enemy, the barons entered on a ſudden: Matthew was forced to flee into the Tower, which was fortified by a triple gate of iron, and maſſy bars of great ſtrength. But this paſſage was broken through with iron mallets and hatchets, and the beſiegers entered and made Matthew priſoner, who, however, could not through fear of death, or by any threats, be perſuaded to ſurrender; which made even his enemies applaud his ſpirit. He was then led to the ſame place with the biſhop, and conſigned to the ſame lot; and the barons appointed an Engliſhman, Oliver de Tracy, keeper of the caſtle and ſhire-reeve of Glouceſterſhire[1].

---

[1] Wikes. [2] Rymer.

[3] Them; viz. the barons of Dover. They and the barons of the other cinque-ports are ſometimes called cives, and ſometimes liberi homines, or libres homes, of the cinque-ports. They are ſtyled alſo the king's barons; and in this inſtrument they are put upon the ſame footing with the other barons of the realm. Which ſhews, that baron was not excluſively a tenant of the king in capite, in barony. [4] Rymer. [5] Tyrrhel. [6] M. Weſtm. an. 1265.

[7] Fabian. [8] Rymer, tom. I. p. 768. [9] Ib.

[10] "All the king's counſellors and bailiffs going againſt the Oxford proviſions, and the aliens, likewiſe eccleſiaſtics and ſeculars, prædæ patuerunt. Peter de Egleblanch being taken, and John Manſel and Boniface, archbiſhop of Cant. and Peter of Savoy, through great fear lying hid in foreign parts, Edward, under pretence of going againſt the Welſh, brought in foreigners, whom the proceres, finding out the iniquity of their coming, at the inſtigation of Simon de Montfort, beſieged at the caſtle of Windſor, and obliged to return home, having made them ſwear to do nothing againſt the peace of the realm." Annals of Hyde, MS.—"The Univerſity [ſcil. of Oxford] was diſperſed by the king's order, upon pain of impriſonment. He did this, becauſe he wanted to parliament there, who, after his parliament, went to Northampton with a great army, and beſieged it, and took it on the 8 ides of April." Ib.—The Wintonians riſe upon the monks of Swithin, and kill ſome of them, and commit great ravages at Winton. Ib.—The Londoners guard the ſtreets with chains. Ib.—The Jews ſlaughtered. Ib. [11] M. Weſtm. Dunſtaple, & alia Chron.

Then the army went to Worceſter, and took it without oppoſition, though the citizens had received the king's orders to keep ſafely both town and city. Having taken the oath of fealty from the inhabitants of Worceſter, they went to Bridgenorth, and took that noble fortreſs, which the citizens nobly defended the firſt day, and kept out the barons; but the next day they ſurrendered to them by agreement, for fear that the Welſh, who were extremely numerous, and aſſailed the town on the other ſide, ſhould force an entrance. The baronials then marched to the Southern parts of the realm, having taken the earl of Leiceſter[2] for their general, by whom they were governed. The earl's army received reinforcements every day; for, all who excelled in ſtrength, or were illuſtrious in reſpect of nobility, flocked to his ſtandard. Before them was borne the banner of the king's arms. And then, through the ſeveral counties, dreadful work was made with the foreigners. Even thoſe who hated them, and had a ſpark of pity left within them, could not forbear feeling for them: for, every one who could not ſpeak Engliſh was ſet at nought by the vulgar, and cruelly handled.

Perſons of foreign extraction, as well religious as others, were eager to effect a clandeſtine eſcape out of England, hoping thereby to avoid death, or an expenſive and ruinous impriſonment. The queen had, ſome how or other, incurred popular odium; whatever, therefore, was found belonging to her was carried off, or deſtroyed. The other principal objects of the popular rage were the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhop of Norwich, and John Manſel. Theſe were particularly obnoxious, being the perſons to whom the pope had committed the power of abſolving the king and all other perſons from their late oaths, and of excommunicating all ſuch as would not accept of the papal abſolution. Theſe three eccleſiaſtics were plundered of all their movables, and threatened with death, if they could be found. Whereupon the archbiſhop obtained the king's licence for leaving England, and ſet off for Rome[3].

About the ſame time, leagues were forming in favour of the barons, both in the North and Weſt of England, and preparations making in both extremes to attack the king's caſtles, and join the barons in the central parts. The conſervators[4] of the king's peace, ſtationed in the parts moſt expoſed, applied to him for military aſſiſtance, and intimated their fears of not being able to ſtop the progreſs of the inſurgents.

John Manſel, the king's chief miniſter, and on whom his maſter had heaped preferment to the amount of five or ſix thouſand pounds a-year, whereby this clerc had a revenue beyond almoſt any earl of the kingdom, fled with precipitation out of the Tower of London, where he had left the king and queen, and had the good fortune to get over to France. He was purſued in his flight by Henry, ſon of the king of Almaine, and nephew of king Henry: but, when Henry landed at Boulogne he was ſuddenly arreſted by management, as was ſuppoſed, of the queen of England. The earl of Leiceſter, who had for ſome time carried all before him about London, felt ſo much anxiety about the capture of ſir Henry of Almaine[5], that he marched into Kent, to procure his deliverance. While he was ſo employed, lord Edward went to Briſtol, which had lately ſubmitted to the baronials, who had attacked and taken the biſhop of Hereford. The caſtle of Briſtol, which as well as the city belonged to lord Edward, had, however, held out. While Edward was in thoſe parts, he took the caſtles of Haye and Brecknock, and ſome other places. While he lay at the caſtle of Briſtol, a quarrel aroſe between his knights and the citizens; and the citizens, who were properly his ſubjects, he being their feudal lord, prepared to beſiege him in the caſtle, which they were ſure of taking. Seeing every thing go againſt him, and the whole kingdom his foe, and all the favourers of foreigners, and all opponents of the barons, fiercely aſſaulted, he burnt with rage and indignation. But, having no alternative, he deſired Walter, biſhop of Worceſter, who was of the baronial party, to come to him, and promiſed, deceitfully, to make peace with the barons. The biſhop took ſecurity from him for the performance of his engagements; but, when Edward was on the road to the court, to fulfil his promiſes, he ſuddenly threw himſelf with his foreigners into the caſtle of Windſor.

The king, ſhut up all this time in the Tower of London, ſeeing himſelf ſurrounded and hemmed in by his enemies, and probably diſappointed of the aſſiſtance he expected from lord Edward, on whom, ſome hiſtorians ſay, he depended for his deliverance, acquieſced at length to the terms of peace which were offered, through the mediation of certain biſhops, by the barons, and again ſubmitted to acknowledge the Oxford ſtatutes. But the queen, ſwelling with female rage, would by no means hear of ſuch diſgraceful conceſſions. She, therefore, left the Tower of London on the 13th of July, in order to go by water to Windſor, where lord Edward had one of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes in Europe, well-garriſoned with his foreign troops. As ſhe approached London-bridge, a prodigious quantity of people upon the bridge ſtopped her paſſage: they called her whore and adultereſs, and aſſailed her with ſhowers of ſtones, rotten eggs, and all kinds of filth. The mayor of London did what he could to ſave her, but was barely able to do it. She was compelled to make back for the Tower, which the king would not permit her to enter. The mayor of London, therefore, took her to St. Paul's, and procured her an aſylum in the houſe of the biſhop of London. Stung with theſe affronts, and afraid for her life, the queen got abroad as ſoon as ſhe could[6].

The terms of peace, demanded on the part of the barons, were, that the lord king and queen ſhould releaſe the lord Henry, ſon of the king of the Romans, taken abroad; that the caſtle of Dover ſhould be ſurrendered to them with the caſtles of the king; that the ſtatutes of Oxford ſhould be kept, full ſecurity being given in that behalf; that the realm ſhould be entirely purged of foreigners, and that none of them ſhould return, except ſuch as were permittted to ſtay by the unanimous conſent of the king's lieges; and that, in future, the nation ſhould be governed by natives, good men, and loyal to the king. The king was not in a condition to reſiſt, and therefore conſented to theſe terms of accord.

---

[1] Robert of Glouceſter.

[2] Some authors report, that the earl of Leiceſter was perſonally preſent at theſe commotions on the borders of Wales; but it ſeems a miſtake.

[3] T. Wykes.

[4] Theſe ſeem to be a new ſpecies of officers, made by the king alone upon the ſpur of the occaſion. Probably, the baronage or community of the ſeveral counties having checked the royal prerogative in the making of ſhire-reeves, the king might find it neceſſary to appoint theſe conſervators of the peace, to ſupply the loſs of his power by the new modification of the ſhire-reeve's office.

[5] The Annaliſt of Dunſtable relates Henry of Almaine's capture differently:—"Eodem tempore Joannes Manſel egreſſus de turri Londoniarum in Tamiſiam cum comitiſſâ de Inſulâ & aliis feminis tranſmarinis navigio devenit apud Witſaund. Qui dominum Henricum, filium regis Alemanniæ, pro quibuſdam transfretantem ibidem, per dominum Ingelramum de Feines fecit capi & detineri, qui poſtea per regem Franciæ deliberatus in Angliam rediit." Ann. Dunſtaple.

[6] T. Wykes. M. Weſtm Ann. Dunſtaple.

On the 21ſt of July, the king's letter to the mayor and citizens of London was read in the Guildhall, ſetting forth, that the difference between the king and the barons was now made up; and therefore he commanded, that his peace ſhould be kept; and, if any one broke it, he ſhould be arreſted, and his goods alſo ſeized and kept ſafe till the king's farther order concerning them ſhould be known[1].

The Annaliſt of Dunſtaple, after deſcribing the queen's meditated flight, and rough ſtoppage at London-bridge, goes on thus:—

"But the biſhops of Lincoln, London, and Cheſter, in the mean while, who were buſy in conducting a treaty of amity between the king at the Tower and the barons at Dover, were informed by the earl of Leiceſter and the barons, that they would not liſten to any terms of peace, unleſs the lord king and the queen would releaſe ſir Henry, who had been taken in foreign parts, and would give up to them the caſtle of Dover, with the other caſtles in their hands, and would entirely purge England of the foreigners, and would cauſe the Oxford ſtatutes under good ſecurity to be more fully obſerved; all which was complied with by the king, who was in a ſtrait. The earl and barons, hearing of the king's readineſs to yield to their demands, went from Dover to London, where the earl was moſt joyouſly and honourably received by the citizens. And going to the Tower, and ſaluting the king, the earl aſked him, whether he had granted the aforeſaid articles, and would keep them? The king anſwered, he would; and thereupon made his charter. So that by certain perſons, elected for the purpoſe, the ſtatutes of Oxford by their decrees ſhould be augmented, or diminiſhed, as moſt for the good of the king and kingdom. After this, order was given by the king, by his letters, that the caſtle of Dover, with the other caſtles, ſhould be delivered up to the wardenſhip of the barons."

The king was now, in appearance, perfectly reconciled to the barons, and acquieſced in all their meaſures. On the firſt of Auguſt, they marched towards Windſor, to beſiege it, having the king with them, who gave his ſanction to the proceeding. Lord Edward, therefore, left that caſtle, and went forward to meet his father and the barons, in order to compromiſe the diſputes that were between them. He met them at Kingſton, and, having amicably adjuſted the ſeveral matters that had cauſed the late diſorders, he was about to return to Windſor, but was hindered by the earl of Leiceſter and the biſhop of Worceſter, who ſuſpected his ſincerity, and were too circumſpect to let him get into Windſor again. That noble caſtle, therefore, was ſurrendered to the king and barons; but, upon this condition, that thoſe, who were within, ſaving to them their horſes and arms, ſhould go ſafely out of the kingdom, having firſt taken an oath not to return without the order of the community. Accordingly, ſome of the barons conducted them to the ſeaſide[2].

That the aſſent of the community might be aſked concerning the conditions of peace, to which the king had lately agreed, and the earl of Leiceſter with his aſſociates, all the biſhops, earls, barons, abbots, and priors, were ſummoned to meet on the 9th of September. The meeting on this occaſion was uncommonly numerous, and held in the church of St. Paul, London. In this parliament was read the late charter of the king, wherein he promulged and ratified the Oxford ſtatutes, and ordered the ſame to be univerſally and fully obſerved. To which the preſent aſſembly gave their aſſent; as did lord Edward. Robert de Ferrers had taken three caſtles from lord Edward in the march of Wales: and others, who were of lord Edward's party, had been deſpoiled of their property in like manner, and were all bent upon avenging themſelves, and riſing upon the deſpoilers. But by the council of the grandees it was provided, that the lord king ſhould, by himſelf and his juſticiars, openly commiſſioned by him, do full juſtice to all who had been deſpoiled, and would prefer their plaints againſt the deſpoilers. The depredations and rapines, ſuſtained as well by eccleſiaſtical dignitaries as by certain grandees, were ordered to be atoned for by competent ſatisfaction. This ſeemed to many perſons a thing of too much difficulty to be prudently attempted, and likely to cauſe infinite diſcord. Among other things, order was given for the liberation of Peter, biſhop of Hereford, Matthias de Beſille, and certain others who had been lately taken and impriſoned, as adherents of the king[3].

While theſe things were going on, the lord king and the queen clandeſtinely managed matters ſo with the king and queen of France, that king Henry, with lord Edward and the earl of Leiceſter and certain others, were ſummoned to appear before Lewis at Boulogne, on the octaves of St. Michael next coming, to have the queſtion more nicely examined—"Who was really in fault towards the other[4]?"

About the feaſt of St. Michael, the king, queen, the earl, and many nobles, paſſed the ſea, to be at the colloquy of the king of France, which he then held at Boulogne, on account of the diſturbances in England. The queen was at the bottom of this affair, who was full of indignation at the rough uſage ſhe had lately received from the people of London.

When the king and queen of England, and lord Edward, earl Simon, and the other nobles, made their appearance before the king of France in his council, they depoſed bitter complaints againſt earl Simon, concerning injuries, impriſonments, ſeizing of caſtles, and deſpoiling of churches. To all which charges the earl made ſuch complete anſwers, that the king of France was fully ſatisfied with his exculpation, and gave him his letter of licence to return to England, where the earl wiſhed to be on the quindenes of St. Michael, that he might be preſent at the parliament to be then holden for making the intended ſtatutes[5].

At this great council at Boulogne appeared Boniface, archbiſhop of Canterbury, John Manſel, and thoſe foreigners who had been driven by ſentence of the barons and the king's conſent out of England. They all complained vehemently of the ill uſage they had received, and the tyranny and injuſtice of the oppoſite party, and craved of the king of France protection for redreſs, and liberty to return to England. To theſe various charges the earl of Leiceſter and his colleagues replied, that they were not obliged to give an account of what had been done in England in the court of the king of France, but only in that of their own prince; and that only by judgement of their peers: the Engliſh barons thus refuſing to comply with any of thoſe things that were propoſed to them on their king's behalf, the aſſembly broke up. So this affair is repreſented according to Mr. Tyrrhel, in the MS Annals of St Auguſtin at Canterbury. But French hiſtorians (continues Mr. Tyrrhel) give it thus: "That Simon Montfort being ſummoned by king Lewis to come to his council, he earneſtly intreated him to comply with king Henry's deſires, and not to preſs him too far, leſt, while he ſet himſelf up for a patron of the laws, he raiſed an inveterate civil war, in which he might ruin both himſelf and the public: but this earl, alleging the defence of the laws which he was bound by oath to obſerve, would by no means hearken to king Lewis's propoſal; who, finding the earl could by no means be prevailed upon, diſmiſſed him. Whereupon the earl and his aſſociates returned preſently home; nor did king Henry ſtay long behind them; but, leaving the queen of England, who did not care to come back to England in ſuch troubleſome times, with her ſiſter the queen of France, he returned into England ſoon after Michaelmas, to keep the feaſt of St. Edward the Confeſſor, to whom he always paid ſingular devotion[6].

---

[1] T. Wykes. M. Weſtm. Ann. Dunſtaple.

[2] M. Weſtm.

[3] Dunſtaple.

[4] Ib. 1263.

[5] M. Weſtm.

[6] Tyrrhel, p. 1014.

Here the public acts will throw light upon the preſent tranſactions[1].

Letter of king Henry to Lewis king of France.

“To the king of France the king of England greeting, and conſtant increaſe of ſincere affection. Your excellency has ſignified to us, that ourſelf, our beloved conſort, and our ſons, ſhould come to you in our proper perſons, at a certain time and place, that you might impart to us your counſel and aid for the bettering of our condition, and that we might have a little conference with you. We and our then council, deſirous to oblige your magnitude to the beſt of our power, with reſpect and inclination, wiſhed to comply with your propoſal. But, ſeeing our barons, for certain cauſes, require that a ſecurity be given them for our ſpeedy return to England; with humility and devotion we intreat your highneſs, that you would be pleaſed to give ſuch ſecurity in this behalf, as the venerable father John de Henton, the Templar, whom we ſend to your preſence for this purpoſe, ſhall require. But we cannot exhibit our preſence on the day mentioned by your highneſs for the cauſes above-given, which our meſſengers will more fully explain, and to whom ye may give full credit concerning our coming to you. Witneſs the king, 16th of Auguſt.”

Letter to the king of France.

“To the king of France the king of England, greeting, and conſtant increaſe of ſincere affection. Whereas, in obedience to your commands, we propoſe to come perſonally to you by advice of our barons, and to return to England within the octaves of St. Michael next-coming, as we have promiſed to our great men in good faith; we will and require that, if we go againſt this promiſe and engagement, or ſhould not return, ye would compel us to fulfil our promiſe. Witneſs, as before.”

Upon the 22d of Auguſt, the king by his letters patent appoints the biſhops of Worceſter and Coventry, Henry, ſon of the king of the Romans, Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, and John de Warren; whom he ſends into Wales, with full and free power to treat of his peace between the king, his ſon Edward, and his men, on the one part, and Lewellin, ſon of Griffin, and his adherents and friends, on the other; and to confirm the ſaid peace on the king's part, as to them ſhall ſeem meet, in manner as if the king were preſent.

From another record of the 18th of September following, we find, that the biſhop of Coventry, Henry of Almain, John earl of Warren, and ſome others, deputed on the part of the king, had made a truce with Lewellin, to continue to the feaſt of St. Martin[2].

The earl of Leiceſter's name does not occur among thoſe who fabricated this truce. Probably he had no hand in it. It was confirmed by the king.

The king to all perſons, &c.

“Whereas our lord the king of France, by his letters and meſſengers, has aſked us to be at his parliament at Boulogne ſur-mer, on the quindenes of the Nativity of the bleſſed Virgin inſtant; and the great men of our realm, adverting to the debility of our body, and conſidering the ſtate of divers affairs touching us and our realm, fear our too long ſtay in the parts beyond ſea: we, wiſhing to gratify their petition and inclination, have promiſed them in good faith (our oath being thereunto given by Geoffry Gatelin, a knight of ours, upon our ſoul, by our command), that if we happen to go to the ſaid king, as we propoſe, we will return into England before the octaves of St. Michael next, unleſs hindered by ſickneſs. And that, while we are in thoſe parts, we will do nothing in concert with the ſaid king, or any other perſons, nor procure any thing to be done, inconſiſtent with our profit and that of our heirs, and the honour of our realm. In witneſs whereof, &c. Witneſs the king at Weſtminſter, 15 Sept.”

On the ſame day were granted by the king letters of ſafe conduct to the agents of Lewellin for their coming to the king at the parliament three weeks after Michaelmas; the ſame to be in force till the 11th of November[3].

On the ſame 18th of September, the king left London, and began his journey to France. While he was gone, the cuſtody of the great ſeal remained with Nicholas, archdeacon of Ely, who, while the king was abroad, ſealed only writs of courſe, which were teſted by H. le Deſpenſer, juſtice of England.

While Boniface remained at Boulogne, he iſſued ſentence of excommunication againſt Henry and Simon, ſons of the earl of Leiceſter, Humphrey de Bohun the younger, ſon of the earl of Hereford, Roger de Leibourne, Roger de Clifford, John Giffard, Hamo Leſtrange, John de Vaux, Joceline de Badeline, Simon de Tracy, William Marmion jun. Henry de Horne, John and Edmund Baſſett, Robert de Turbevill, Henry de Valentin, Thomas de Turtair, knight, Walter de Workvill, Grimbauld Pauncefort h, H. Malmaines, H. de Haſtinges, Nicholas de Segrave, John de Gyron. The lord Simon, earl of Leiceſter, gave the above perſons (it is obſerved by the Annaliſt[4]) authority and aſſent to do what they did, which he mentions with bitterneſs of heart. I do not find, that the earl himſelf was at this time among the excommunicated. The crimes alleged againſt the above perſons, in the act of ſentence, were the laying violent hands on prelates and churchmen, and ſpoiling and robbing of churches, notwithſtanding their privileges. The earl and army about his perſon had remained quietly at Iſleworth the greater part of the ſummer, and ſeem to have had no ſhare in the late acts of violence[5].

On the quindenes of St. Michael, king Henry held his parliament at Weſtminſter, and ſhewed an inclination to adjuſt matters upon what ſome hiſtorians, partial to his perſon and cauſe, call reaſonable conditions. The meeting was more numerous than had been ſeen for a long time. But the parties at variance could be brought to no terms of compromiſe. Lord Edward, thinking that by ſacrificing the prerogatives of the crown he ſhould be materially injured after his father's deceaſe, refuſed his compliance to the terms inſiſted upon by the earl of Leiceſter, and determined to bring down the ſpirit of that preſumptuous lord. And Edward was now more haughty and intractable than before, in conſequence of having gained over to his cauſe ſome of the leading men of the Montford party: among theſe, were, Roger de Leiburne, John de Vaux, Ralph Baſſet, Hamo L'Eſtrange, and John Giffard. They engaged by written articles to befriend lord Edward, during his whole life, againſt all perſons, and to give ſuch ſecurity for their fidelity as the earl of Warren and lord Henry of Almaine ſhould demand, ſaving the common oath, that it were to the honour of God, fealty of the king, and profit of the realm. They were blinded by bribes, and particularly by large grants out of the lord Edward's demeſne manors, to this flagrant act of perfidy, very prejudicial, it muſt be acknowledged, to the baronial intereſt. Lord Henry of Almaine was the leader of this revolt; and he attempted to palliate his conduct by the following addreſs to earl Simon:—“Sir Earl, I cannot longer bear arms againſt my father the king of Almaine, my uncle the king of England, and my other relations: with your permiſſion, therefore, I recede from you: but I will never bear arms againſt you.” With great good humour the earl replied:—“Lord Henry, I am not at all concerned on account of your arms, but on account of your unſteadineſs. Go, therefore, and return with your arms; for, I am not at all afraid of them[6].”

The late parliament at Weſtminſter had only ſerved to widen the breach between the parties at variance.

---

[1] Rymer.

[2] 11 Nov.

[3] “In this colloquy the ſtatutes of Oxford were publicly promulged, and ordered to be ſtrictly kept throughout England.” M. Weſtm. p. 317.

[4] Annals of Hyde MS. in Bibl Bodlei. 91, & Tyrrhel's Hiſtory.

[5] Wykes.

[6] M. Weſtm.

After the diſſolution of this council, the king and lord Edward took the road to Windſor, and probably took poſſeſſion of it; but I do not find it poſitively aſſerted that they did. The earl of Leiceſter with his partizans repaired to the Tower of London; of which Hugh le Deſpenſer, the baronial high juſticiar, had been lately made warden. John earl of Warren, Hugh le Bigot, and others of the king's party, being turned out of the city, the gates were kept ſhut. And, ſoon after, the earl of Leiceſter went to Kenilworth, probably to ſtrengthen the works of that famous caſtle, which king Henry had formerly given to his ſiſter the counteſs of Leiceſter.

Shortly after, the king ſummoned another general council of the grandees to meet him in a parliament at Redinge. It is taken notice of by the MS Annaliſt of Canterbury; but by no other that I can recollect. Probably it was not attended. This Author obſerves, that the earl of Leiceſter would not go to it, from a perſuaſion that, if he did, his perſon would be ſeized.

Matters were now coming to iſſue between the king and barons. Dover caſtle was called the key of the realm. It had lately been ſurrendered by the king's mandate to himſelf and the barons, and entruſted to an adherent of the latter, to hold it in defence of the Oxford ſtatutes, and the party who eſpouſed them. Lord Edward thought nothing gained, while his father and he were not maſters of that fortreſs. King Henry, therefore, having held a conſultation with his brother Richard, king of Almaine, the earl Mareſchal, and lord Edward, and thoſe whom the latter had lately attracted to his party, marched with a copious army to Dover, thinking they ſhould eaſily get poſſeſſion of the caſtle there. On their arrival, they marched up to the gates, and demanded admiſſion; which was refuſed, purſuant to an expreſs order of the earl of Leiceſter, who, upon hearing of the king and lord Edward's march to Dover, ſent a letter to the warden, wherein he told him he was not to give even the king himſelf admiſſion into the caſtle, unleſs he would be content to go into it with no more than nine or ten perſons in his ſuite—a requiſition with which the king would not comply. The king and lord Edward were exceedingly incenſed at this diſappointment; and, after having made the tour of the Cinque-ports, and required the barons thereof to renew their oath of fealty, proceeded towards London.

As ſoon as the earl heard the king was gone to Dover, he left Kenilworth, and ſet forward towards London; and, paſſing through Northampton, took the oath of fealty from the burgeſſes, and ſo went on to Dunſtaple. And when Simon prior of Dunſtaple had met him, and they had exchanged ſalutations, the earl deſired to be of the fraternity of the houſe, and the prior conſented and received him: and ſo the earl went to London, wiſhing to give the king the meeting at Dover with his people. Not ſucceeding in his object at Dover, the king returned in great wrath towards Weſtminſter. In the mean while he ſent ſome private letters to certain perſons within the city of London, deſiring that, if the earl or baronials ſhould come to the gates of the city, entrance might be denied them. The citizens of the king's party promiſed the king faithfully, that earl Simon ſhould not obtain admiſſion. This had nearly put the earl in a moſt critical ſituation. When the king and lord Edward received this advice, they were highly pleaſed, thinking the earl as good as taken. When the latter reached London, he tarried in Southwark without the city wall, having with him a very ſmall company, in compariſon of the army which was with the king. The earl was in no expectation of ſuch an event; when the king drew nigh, and marſhalled his men to ſurround the earl. Perceiving his danger, he immediately made an attempt to get into the city; but the gates were ſhut, and he found himſelf excluded. He was called upon to ſurrender, and anſwered, that he would never do this to perjured men and apoſtates. And, well weighing his deſperate ſituation, he cauſed himſelf and his men to arm, and in the name of the Lord he got himſelf and them croſſed behind and before; and then, confeſſing his ſins, they all took the body of Chriſt, and prepared to wait the arrival of their enemies, and fight againſt them for Truth. But, when it became noiſed in the city that the earl was ſhut out, the community broke the chains inſtantly, and opened the gates, and made a furious ſally, and reſcued the earl, and ſecured him within the city. When the king was told of this ſpirited exertion in favour of the earl, and ſaw the zeal of the Londoners in behalf of Simon de Montfort and the baronial party, he judged it prudent to retire, and try the effect of negotiation. While theſe things were going on, the king gave to Roger de Mortimer three of the earl of Leiceſter's towns in the marches of Wales; which Mortimer deſtroyed: he alſo took the earl's bailiff, and confined him till he ſhould pay an hundred marcs for his ranſom. But the earl, having made a cloſe alliance with Lewellin prince of Wales, ſent a fine army into the lands of Roger de Mortimer, which in return burned and deſtroyed them [1].

Among the printed records we find the following inſtrument, dated 20 Dec. 1263; which, as it contains ſome curious matter, I here preſent to the reader in a cloſe tranſlation.

"The king to the archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, priors, earls, barons, knights, freemen, and all others of the counties of Warwick and Leiceſter, greeting. We wonder very much, and are moved, that certain perſons, to the diſturbance of the peace and tranquillity of our realm, to you and other our lieges, do proclaim every where, and wrongfully ſuggeſt, that we, to your diſheriſon and that of our other lieges, and to the ſubverſion of the ſtate of our realm, bring aliens into our kingdom, that ſo they may draw away your hearts from our fealty, and that for this reaſon we have lately directed our ſteps towards Dover; which was never our intention or deſire, as the event has ſhewed. But, becauſe certain talliages unaccuſtomed, without aſſent and will, ours and yours, as we have heard, lately in the counties aforeſaid, have been made, to find neceſſaries for four or five men of every villate, to march towards the ſea againſt ſuch aliens; we ſignify to your univerſity, that we have not invited any ſuch aliens, nor will we invite them, nor do we want their aid: inaſmuch as, bleſſed be the Moſt High! all the nobles and grandees of our realm, a few only, if any, excepted, do conſtantly adhere to our fealty, and hitherto aſſiſt us; that by their help we hope, through God's aſſiſtance, powerfully to repreſs the reſiſtents of this ſort, when it ſhall be needful. Wherefore we command your univerſity, firmly injoining that to aſſertions and ſuggeſtions of the above ſort ye give no credit, nor ſuch undue and unaccuſtomed talliages, to your own great hurt, and againſt your liege lord, pay on any account; nor, by reaſon of any ſummons or threats, without our ſpecial mandate, do ye on any account go out of your counties, but obey our ſhire-reeve, as uſed to be done in former times. But we are prepared, and always will be, the oath made at Oxford, to the honour of God, your fealty, and the good of our realm, firmly to obſerve, and you, in your rights and liberties, as our lieges and good men, againſt all perſons to defend and maintain: Witneſs the king at Windſor, the 20th of December, in the year of our reign 48 [2]."

Like letters patent are directed through the ſeveral counties of England, &c.

And command was given to the ſhire-reeve of Leiceſter and Warwick, that the aforeſaid letters patent, which the bringer of them ſhould deliver to him by precept of the king, in his full county-court, hundreds, and the ſeveral good towns of the counties aforeſaid, he ſhould cauſe to be read, and the firm peace of the king to be proclaimed and held. Witneſs as above.

In the ſame manner, it was given in command to all the ſhire-reeves of England [3].

---

[1] Ann. Dunſtaple.

[2] Pat. 48 Hen. III, 20 Dec. anno 1263. Brady.

[3] Pat. 48 Hen. III. Brady's Hiſt. Vol. I. Appendix, Nº 216.

The pope, throughout this conteſt between king Henry and his barons, warmly eſpouſed the ſide of the monarch. In the month of July he had ſignified to the king, that he had recalled the grant of Sicily, made in favour of Edmund, king Henry's ſecond ſon, and meant to beſtow that kingdom upon another. This young lord had by virtue of that grant worn the badges of royalty for nine or ten years; and the chief cauſe of the king's quarrel with his barons was his acceptance of the papal grant upon diſadvantageous terms, clandeſtinely adjuſted with the court of Rome, and his obſtinate attachment to that vain and expenſive project. In the year 1262, the crown of Sicily was offered to Charles count of Anjou, the earl of Leiceſter's ſworn friend, and brother of the king of France, who at length conſented that the count of Anjou ſhould cloſe with the pope's offer. The pope, having ſettled this matter to his own mind, ſent a cardinal over to England, to reconcile the mind of king Henry to ſo ſevere a ſhock as this was like to prove. He excuſed this proceeding upon the ſcore of neceſſity; and intreated the king not to obſtruct the ſettlement of Sicily, by enforcing his claim to it. His apologies were accompanied with the warmeſt expreſſions of regard, and followed by a very extraordinary zeal for the king's ſervice in his war with his own people. On the 15th of September he wrote a very ſharp letter to Richard, king of the Romans, for countenancing the proceedings of the barons, and acting with them contrary to the ties of duty and natural affection againſt his ſovereign and brother. Nor did the pontiff ſpare any pains to terrify and reclaim the earl of Leiceſter, whom he conſidered as the mover of all the troubles of England, and againſt whom he was particularly incenſed for the late treatment of the biſhop of Hereford, and the impriſonment and deſpoliation of the eccleſiaſtics. He ſeverely reprimanded him by his letters for his behaviour, and cancelled all that he had done with the other barons. To quiet the commotions here, he diſpatched his chaplain William, archdeacon of Paris, with powers deemed ſufficient for the purpoſe. And, finding the tumult too great for this nuncio to manage, he had recourſe to a Cardinal legate, and inveſted Guy, biſhop of Sabine (who was ſhortly after pope Clement IV), with that character; furniſhing him at the ſame time with the moſt extenſive powers, ſuitable to the difficulty of his undertaking. This legate was authoriſed to pluck up and deſtroy, to diſſipate and ſcatter, to build and plant, in England, Wales, and Ireland, without any rule but that of his own diſcretion. His ſtrength and ſpirit were deemed by the pope and holy college adequate to this arduous function. Guy was a famous theologian, and perfectly verſed in the policy of the court of Rome; and his ſkill and prudence in the management of buſineſs were held to be ſuperior to thoſe of any member of the conclave. Pope Urban lamented, that he could not go in perſon to repreſs the audacity of king Henry's barons; and therefore conſented to part with the biſhop of Sabine for that purpoſe, whoſe abſence he could ill ſpare. He directed the legate, if milder courſes were found inſufficient, to publiſh a croiſade againſt the mutinous barons, and, by his diploma of the 21ſt of November, directed to the prelates of England, he orders them to reſpect his legate, as became them. He likewiſe ſignified his inclinations to the king of France, and deſired him to aſſiſt in extinguiſhing the rebellion in England; and exhorted the queen of France to incite her huſband to the ſame work. St. Lewis obeyed the mandate of the Apoſtolic father, and ſtood forth as the friend of the incapable, perjured, and tyrannical, deſpot of England[1].

Such as were anxious to prevent more miſchief ſpared no pains to bring the parties at variance to ſome terms of agreement. At length, about Chriſtmas, their laudable endeavours were crowned with ſucceſs; the king and his partizans, the earl alſo, with all his coherents, the king of the Romans, lord Edward, the earls, barons, knights, in a word, the whole body of the clergy and laity, agreed, with one conſent, that the king of France ſhould arbitrate between the king and his barons (that is, the whole community of England) concerning all the proviſions, ordinances, ſtatutes, and obligations, made at Oxford, and concerning all the contentions and diſcords that had enſued thereupon from the beginning of the ſame to the 1ſt day of November, A. D. 1263. The inſtrument of arbitration was ſigned, on the 13th of December, by the following earls and barons, on the part of the barons[2]:

Henry biſhop of London,
Walter biſhop of Worceſter,
Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, and ſeneſchal of England,
Hugh le Deſpenſer, juſticiar of England,
Humphrey de Bohun, the younger,
Henry de Montfort,
Simon de Montfort, the younger,
Adam of New-Market,
Peter de Montfort,
Ralph Baſſet of Sapecot,
Baldwin Wake,
Robert de Ros,
William le Blond,
William Mareſchal,
Walter de Colville,
Richard de Grey,
William Bardolf,
Richard de Tanny,
Henry de Haſtengs,
John Fitz-John,
Robert de Vipont,
John de Veſcy,
Nicholas de Segrave,
Geoffry de Lucy.

Theſe firmly promiſed and ſwore, upon the holy Evangeliſts, that what the ſaid king of France, concerning all the aforeſaid things, or any part of them de alto & baſſo, did ordain and decree, ſhould be by them obſerved in good faith; provided, nevertheleſs, the ſaid king of France ſhould make his award before the Whitſuntide following.

On the Sunday following, the king of England put his ſeal to a ſeparate inſtrument of the like tenor; as did likewiſe the following perſons:

Edward eldeſt ſon of the lord king,
Henry ſon of Richard, king of Almaine,
Roger le Bigot, earl of Norfolk, and mareſchal of England,
John de Warrenn,
William of Valence,
Humphry de Bohun, earl of Hereford and Eſſex,
Hugh le Bigott,
Philip Baſſett,
John Fitz-Alain,
Robert de Brus,
Roger de Mortimer,
John de Verdun,
William de Breus,
John de Baillol,
Henry de Percy,
Reginald Fitz-peter,
James d'Audley,
Alan le Zuche,
Roger de Clifford,
Hamo l' Eſtrange,
John de Grey,
Philip Marmion,
Robert de Neville,
John de Vaux,
John de Muſcegros,
Warin de Baſſingbourne,
Adam de Geremuth,
Roger de Somery,
Richard Foliot,
Roger de Leyburn,
William le Latimer.

---

[1] Rymer. Raynald.

[2] Rymer, tom. I. p. 776.

It was likewiſe agreed, that the award ſhould extend to all diſputes previous to the 13th of December, A. D. 1263.

The parties were ſummoned to appear before the king of France at Amiens.

The lords Edward and Henry and ſome others croſſed the Channel on the Sunday before Chriſtmas-day. The king, being deſirous of keeping his Chriſtmas in England, poſtponed his embarkation till about the 28th or 29th of December[1].

The earl of Leiceſter and moſt of the barons alleged, that they were not able to leave England at this time, on account of the war that Roger de Mortimer waged againſt the earl of Leiceſter's lands in Wales. So reports the Annaliſt of St. Auguſtin, Canterbury[2].

The earl of Leiceſter (according to the Chronicler of the priory of Dunſtable) ſet off from Kenilworth, and was on his journey for France, to be preſent at the king of France's making his decree, when his horſe fell down with him near Cateby, and broke his leg; and the earl was obliged to go back to Kenilworth. But he and the barons ſent a few wiſe men, both of the clergy and laity, in the name of them all. Of this number were the lord Adam of Newmarket, the lord William de Blund, Peter de Montfort, and maſter Thomas de Cantelupe[3].

The king of France being in haſte to pronounce his decree (ſays [4] Wykes), that he might ſend the parties home as ſoon as poſſible, with leſs wiſdom perhaps and propriety than became him, on the 20th day after Chriſtmas, by an unexpected ebullition, precipitated his award; and, following ſtrictly the footſteps of the pope, reſtored the king of England by his judgement to his priſtine authority. In the inſtrument of his award, dated the morrow of St. Vincent[5], he ſets forth, that, having heard the allegations of either ſide, and fully weighed the merits of the caſe, and obſerving, that, by the proviſions, ordinances, ſtatutes, and obligations, of Oxford, judging of them by the effects they had produced, the king's rights and honour were diminiſhed, the kingdom turmoiled, the church depreſſed and robbed, and great loſſes ſuſtained by eccleſiaſtics and ſeculars, by natives and aliens, and that more evils might be apprehended to ariſe from the ſame cauſes; therefore, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt, he cancels and annuls all the aforeſaid proviſions, ordinances, ſtatutes, and obligations, and whatever followed, or was grounded thereupon; and eſpecially as it appeared that the ſame had been cancelled and annulled by the Apoſtolic father; and ordains that the king and his barons, and all others concurring in his arbitration, be entirely diſcharged and releaſed from the ſame, in what manner ſoever they have bound themſelves thereto. He decrees that, by virtue of the ſaid proviſions, or obligations, or ordinances, or of any power granted thereupon by the king, no perſon whatever make new ſtatutes, or hold and obſerve thoſe already made; and that no perſon ſhould be held a capital, or any otherwiſe an enemy, or incur any puniſhment, for the non-obſervance of the ſame. He decrees, that all the letters, made concerning the aforeſaid proviſions, and by reaſon thereof, be null and void, and be reſtored and ſurrendered to the king of England; and that all the caſtles, which had been delivered to be kept for ſecurity, or on account of the things aforeſaid, and yet detained, ſhould be freely delivered up to the king by the barons, to be held by him, as he held the ſame before the time of the ſaid proviſions. Alſo he decrees and ordains, that the king ſhall be at full liberty to appoint, ſuperſede, and amove, his high juſticiar, chancellor, treaſurer, counſellors, the inferior officers of juſtice, the ſhirereeves, and other officials whatſoever, and the miniſterials of his realm and houſehold, according to his own free will and inclination, as he did, and could do, before the time of the aforeſaid proviſions. He likewiſe retracts and cancels the ſtatute, whereby the kingdom of England was in future to be governed by natives, and the aliens were to quit the realm, without returning, thoſe only excepted, whoſe ſtay the feudatories[6] of the realm ſhould by common conſent allow of. He ordains by his decree, that it be lawful for aliens to remain in England without being moleſted; and that the king ſhall be at liberty to call as well aliens as natives ſafely to his council, as he ſhall judge uſeful and faithful to him, as he could do before the time aforeſaid. Alſo he decrees and ordains, that the king have full power and free regimen in his realm, and its appurtenances; and be in that ſtate, and in that full power, in and concerning all things whatever, as he was before the aforeſaid time. But he does not will nor mean, by his preſent ordinance, to derogate, in any degree, from the royal privileges, charters, liberties, ſtatutes, and laudable cuſtoms, of the realm of England, which exiſted before the time of the aforeſaid proviſions. Moreover he ordains, that the king pardon and remit to the barons all ill will which he had to them; and that the barons do the ſame by the king; and that the one do not aggrieve or injure the other, by himſelf or any other, concerning any of the matters contained in this compromiſe.

"The king of France, at the inſtance of his wife, and of her ſiſter the queen of England (as was ſaid), regardleſs of his own honour, and exceeding the limits of his commiſſion, without fear of God or regard to truth, pronounced againſt the barons in the ſtatutes, and all other things not pertaining thereto[7]."

"The king of France in his decree declared, that the ancient charters of king John, granted to the community of England, he did not mean in any reſpect to impair. This exception forced the earl of Leiceſter, and others who were ſagacious, to maintain with firmneſs the ſtatutes of Oxford, which were founded upon thoſe charters[8]."

"The great men received this award with indignation, and would not abide by it, becauſe he gave every thing for the king[9]."

The barons ſaid, they could not break their oath[10].

The earl of Leiceſter's abſence, when the king of France took cognizance of the diſpute between king Henry and his barons, rendered the king of France's award of no effect[11].

Henry was as much elated, as the barons were grieved and confounded, at the decree of king Lewis. Hearing that the barons were making preparations for war, he followed their example; and toward the beginning of February haſtened back to England, bringing with him the award of the king of France, and many foreigners and French men[12]. He ſtayed ſome time at Wytſand, whence he ſent over meſſengers to Dover, to demand admittance into that caſtle, in purſuance of the king of France's award. But they could receive no other anſwer from thoſe that kept it, than that they could not do it without the conſent of Richard de Grey, the keeper thereof[13]. The king, however, having paſſed over, was honourably received in the priory; whence he again ſent to demand the delivery of the caſtle into his hands; but being ſtill denied in his demand, he forthwith repaired to Canterbury; and, about the beginning of March, made his appearance at Oxford; whither his grandees and other military tenants in capite had been ſummoned to meet him, and parliament with him, on the preſent criſis of affairs[1]. But his lieges diſobeyed his ſummons; and, purſuant to the ſummons of the barons, entered Northampton, and held it againſt the king, diſplaying the banner of St. Peter with the keys, and other banners of earls and barons all round the walls[2]. On the king's arrival at Oxford, he found the univerſity of the clergy there not well affected to his cauſe, and therefore obliged them to evacuate the place for a time: whereupon they removed to Northampton, being invited thither by the baronials[3]. On the 13th of March, the king appointed the biſhop of Lichfield and Coventry, and maſter Nicholas de Plumpton, archdeacon of Norfolk, his envoys and proctors for requiring the earl of Leiceſter, and the other barons adhering to him, to treat, in the preſence of John of Valence, knight, and envoy of the king of France, concerning certain points and affairs, which he had injoined theſaid biſhop and archdeacon to communicate in perſon: and promiſes to confirm and ratify whatever they ſhould do in the premiſes. Witneſs the king at Oxford, 13th of March[3].

---

[1] Tyrrhel, from Annals of St. Auguſtin. MS. in Muſ. Britan.
[2] Ib.
[3] Ib. and Wykes. An. Dunſtaple.

[4] Wykes's words are theſe—"Porrò rex Francorum, impiger ad prolationem arbitrii, ut partes celeritèr remitteret expeditas, viceſimo die natalis, fortè minùs ſapientèr & inutilitèr quàm deceret, eructatione ſiquidem improviſâ ſuum precipitavit arbitrium, ipſumque autoritate apoſtolicâ roboravit." Yet Wykes was an advocate for paſſive obedience—a ſingularity in that age.

[5] Rymer. Morrow of St. Vincent, i. e. 22 Jan.

[6] Fideles—i. e. the community of the realm, conſiſting of the king's lieges or feudatories aſſembled in parliament; as we ſhould ſay now, the lords and commons of England.

[7] Chron. de Dunſtable.
[8] Continuat. Mat. Pariſii, p. 850.
[9] Walt. Hemingford.
[10] Rainald. Walſingham.
[11] Tyrrhel. Knyghton.
[12] He was there 7 Feb. See Rymer.
[13] Tyrrhel, from An. St. Auguſt. MS. & Th. Wykes.

By other letters patent, dated at Oxford on the 20th of March, he gives the ſame perſons full and free power to treat at Brackley, in the preſence of the ſame John de Valence, for himſelf, his great men, and barons, on one ſide, and Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, and his adherents, on the other, upon the ſecurity, tranquillity, and firm peace of the realm; undertaking to confirm and ratify whatever ſhould be done in the premiſes by the ſaid biſhop and archdeacon with the counſel and aſſent of the ſaid John de Valence[3]. Theſe negociations do not appear to have had any effect.

The king, holding a conſultation with his friends at Oxford as ſoon as he got there, cauſed all thoſe who were for the Oxford ſtatutes, and all thoſe who had committed depredations in holy places, or who had plundered the clergy of their goods, to be excommunicated by three biſhops and twenty four preſbyters who were preſent[4].

In the mean while, Roger de Mortimer laid waſte the demeſne lands of the earl of Leiceſter in the March. The earl, therefore, ſent his two ſons, Henry and Simon, into thoſe parts, with a large army, to avenge the injuries done to their father; and, having made a friend of Lewellin prince of Wales, they deſtroyed the lands of Roger de Mortimer, and took the caſtle of Radnor, and burnt it. The earl himſelf, hovering about London, adjoined to him as many as he could, and gained over to his party the young earl of Glouceſter, who, by the perſuaſions of his mother and of the earl of Leiceſter, forſook the king to whom he had been devoted, and became ſo cloſely united to Montfort by party and affection, that they were equally zealous in the ſame public cauſe, and ſeemed to have but one heart and ſoul between them[5].

Richard king of the Romans, after having eſpouſed the cauſe of the barons, and greatly contributed, by the weight of his perſonal character, rank, and fortune, to the preſent commotions, had been drawn off from the baronial league by the papal remonſtrances and command, was now warmly engaged on the royal ſide. His inconſtancy expoſed him to the vengeance of the Londoners, notwithſtanding the good offices he had formerly done them in interceding for them with the king, when the latter was diſpoſed to ſhew them no mercy[6]. The people of London, ſallying out in immenſe numbers, and rendered deſperate by rage, proceeded rapidly to Thiſleworth, a manſion of the king of the Romans, girt with a paliſado and a ditch. They broke through both, rifled the houſe of all its movables, and then burnt it to the ground. Adjoining was a fiſh-pond, which Richard had made at a great expence. They demoliſhed the pond-head, and let out all the water and fiſh. Then, returning, they went to Weſtminſter, and pulled down king Richard's houſe there, and levelled it with the ground, not leaving one ſtone upon another. This inſurrection began on [7] the firſt Monday in Lent. And the Londoners were headed by Hugh le Deſpencer, whom the barons called the high juſticiar, and who was warden of the Tower of London. After the ſame manner were treated the houſes of other perſons, who adhered to the king againſt the Oxford proviſions. But their fury was particularly levelled at the foreigners, of which ſort they reckoned William de Valence, the king's uterine brother[8]. The lord Walter de Merton, whom the king had made his chancellor in oppoſition to the barons, had a manor near London, belonging to his prebend of St. Paul's. The circumſtance of his being chancellor under ſuch an appointment was judged to be a ſufficient reaſon for attacking this manor, and laying it waſte. But, as the rioters were eager in pulling down the chapel, ſome of the beams ſuddenly gave way, and cruſhed four of them to death. The property of the lord Philip Baſſett, whom the king had made his high juſticiar, ſhared the ſame fate. And the king's clerks and barons of Exchequer and juſtices of the king's bench were taken and impriſoned[9].

The lords Edward and Henry of Almaine arrived in England about the end of February, and went off with what forces they had from Dover towards the Marches, hoping to relieve Radnor, and give ſupport to Roger de Mortimer, Robert de Clifford, Thomas Corbet, and the other barons of the king's party in that quarter. Having reached Hereford, Edward there received intelligence, that Henry de Montfort and his brother were coming againſt him with a powerful army of Engliſh and Welſh; and, being apprehenſive that he was not ſtrong enough to encounter them, he fortified himſelf as well as he could in the caſtle of that town[10].

Though the lord Edward and the barons did not come nigh enough together to engage, yet he beſieged and took the caſtles of Hay and Huntingdon, belonging to Humphrey de Bohun the younger, and obliged the caſtle of Brecknock to ſurrender. At this time Robert de Ferrers, earl of Derby, came with a great army to Worceſter, where he was bravely reſiſted by the citizens, who well watched the walls and gates of the city; but on a ſudden the earl gained an entrance by the old caſtle, and deſtroyed the town, and particularly that part of it which was appropriated to the Jews[11].

The two ſons of Simon de Montfort and the barons returning from Wales, marched to Glouceſter, which they entered by ſubtilty, without ſiege or forces[12]. The cuſtody of the caſtle was entruſted to Humphrey de Bohun, earl of Hereford; and in it were the wives of Robert de Clifford and R. de Leiburne, and of ſome others. The barons laid ſiege to the caſtle, and great part of the army went away to the neighbouring places to refreſh themſelves. Lord Edward, by a great ſtroke of courage, appeared ſuddenly at their back; and paſſing through the middle of the army, croſſed the Severn (the bridge, which the barons had burnt, being haſtily repaired), and got into the caſtle, in ſight of the barons. Seeing their army very moderate, he ſignified his intention to them of fighting the next day. But the barons, being afraid on account of the ſmallneſs of their army, ſent for the earl of Ferrers, and others who were near, and came to them with all the haſte they could[13]. Henry, and John Fitz-John, and ſome others of the great men, who were not knights, chuſing rather to die knights than eſquires, received the belt of knighthood in the field, being ready to fight. Lord Edward, therefore, ſeeing an unexpected multitude advancing, and exceedingly terrified, went out to the barons unarmed, with Henry ſon of the king of Almaine, and others. The biſhop of Worceſter was with the barons, in whoſe preſence Edward offered terms of peace, and ſought a truce till the 24th of April, that he might obtain from his father, in the mean time, his concurrence in eſtabliſhing a perfect peace with the barons, and completely gratifying their wiſhes; for which ſir Henry of Almaine pledged his faith, and became his ſurety. The biſhop of Worceſter interceded for Edward; and Henry of Montfort very imprudently, and againſt the will and advice of the barons, who ſaw the opportunity of time and place, which now offered, for taking and confounding their enemies, complied with Edward's propoſitions. Security therefore being given on both ſides, the army withdrew, and returned towards Kenilworth. Edward, having now both the city and caſtle of Glouceſter at his mercy, contrary to the whole treaty he had made with the barons, ſeized the burgeſſes, put them in priſon, and ſtripped them of all their effects, unmercifully demanding the ſum of fifty thouſand pounds, as the price for ranſoming the town. And ſo he departed for Oxford to meet his father, diſpatching William of Valence and others to plunder the adjacent country, and particularly his adverſaries[1].

---

[1] Wykes. M. Weſtm. Chron. de Dunſtable.

[2] Walt. de Wythleſey.

[3] Rymer.

[4] Chron. de Dunſtaple.

[5] T. Wykes. Chron. de Waverl. ſive de Winton. MS. in Cotton. Biblioth.

[6] Wykes.

[7] Eaſter-day, 20 April. This happened then on 4 March.

[8] Wykes.

[9] Wykes.

[10] Tyrrhel, from Ann. Sancti Auguſtini MS. & Th. Wykes.

[11] M. Weſtm.

[12] Ib. & Chron. de Dunſtable.

[13] According to Mat. Weſtm. two ſons of the earl of Leiceſter had been knighted by lord Edward.

The earl of Leiceſter was much vexed and aſhamed, that lord Edward had been ſo fooliſhly releaſed; and he reprimanded Henry of Montfort very ſharply for what he had done. But, as lord Edward did not perform his engagement by the time appointed, the barons, concerned at it, collected a great army about London, and conſulted with the citizens what meaſures were to be purſued[2].

He had ordered his ſon Simon de Montfort to take poſſeſſion of Northampton and its caſtle, and hold a conſultation there with the barons of his party, and to keep that place for the preſent againſt the royaliſts, or, when he had gotten all his forces together, march towards London to join the earl of Leiceſter, the baronial general[3]. Young Montfort thought the king's force to be but very inconſiderable, and that he ſhould be able, without much difficulty, to maintain his poſt. The king being joined by his ſon Edward, and ſupported by Richard king of the Romans, and other barons of his party, unfolded the royal banner, and marched out of Oxford on Thurſday, about the 3d of April, at the head of a very numerous and well-appointed army, and accompanied by king Richard, lord Edward, and the famous knights John Comyn (who had brought a good body of men out of Scotland), John de Baillol, lord of Galloway, Robert de Brues, lord of the vale of Anandale, Roger de Clifford, Philip Marmion, John de Vaux, Roger de Leyburn, Henry de Percy, Philip Baſſett, Roger de Mortimer, William de Valence, the king's uterine brother, and many others[4]. In the van was borne the enſign of the dragon. Well informed of the ſeizure of Northampton, and the baronial rendezvous at that place, he directed his march to that town, to ſee who would dare to deny him entrance. The barons having poſſeſſion of the town entruſted the charge of the caſtle to lord Roger de Walton[5]. Within the town were the lord Simon de Montfort junior, Peter of Montfort, Ralph Pirot, Hugh Gubion, Oſbert Giffard, Simon de Pateſhulle, and many others. On the next day the king's party reached the town, and demanded admiſſion: and the king told the barons, that they ſhould immediately ſurrender the town, and deliver hoſtages, or he would ruſh upon them, and put them to death. Young Simon de Montfort and the reſt of the barons (for neither the earl of Leiceſter or Glouceſter was yet arrived) anſwered boldly and unanimouſly, that they would not comply with the king's command; and that, if there were a neceſſity for it, they would defend themſelves and the city at the expence of their lives[6]. The royaliſts, hearing this, ſent to them again, deſiring that they would come to the walls, and ſpeak to the king thence, that, if poſſible, ſome means of accommodation might be deviſed. The barons, ſuſpecting no deceit, agreed to this propoſal, and leaving their ſtations went to the wall next the meadow, where the king was, and the bulk of his army. But, while the king and barons were cloſely engaged with each other in various ſchemes of accommodation, lord Philip Baſſet, who had been entruſted with this act of treachery, was buſy in undermining the wall adjoining to the monaſtery of St. Andrew, and in the garden of it. The wall being thus undermined fell down, and an opening was made all at once, big enough for forty horſemen to enter abreaſt. The prior had pointed out to the king this method of making a breach; and the monks, who were foreigners, lent their aſſiſtance in the execution of it. A dreadful wailing and clamour of the people ſoon reached the ears of the barons, who haſtened to make the beſt reſiſtance they could. Young Simon de Montfort acquired immortal fame by his valour on this trying occaſion. He bravely repulſed the aſſailants once; and, when they were reinforced by John de Baillol, and brought again to the attack, he drove them back. And, when he was determined to do the ſame a third time, and had puſhed into the middle of them, his horſe fell with him juſt without the breach of the wall, and caſt him into the ditch; whence he was taken up, very little hurt, by the royaliſts, who preſented him to lord Edward, who ſtrongly oppoſed his being killed. After this the beſieged, thinking but very little either of their own defence or that of the town, were ſo alarmed and ſtupified, that they were very careleſs about making farther reſiſtance. The king, therefore, entered the town in great ſtate, and ordered all the perſons of quality found therein to be bound with thongs.

Upon the king's entering into the town, he ſwore that all the clergy of the Univerſity of Oxford, who had aſſiſted the barons in keeping the king out, ſhould be hanged. The clergy hearing this, ſome of them ſhaved their heads, and as many as were able fled as faſt as they could. The king entered the town, as if it had been an enemy's. Some people, therefore, abandoned their houſes and arms, and ran into the church[7]. There were but few killed, and thoſe only of the common people; for, all this happened very ſuddenly. Lord Peter of Montfort and a few others got into the caſtle, where they thought they ſhould be able to defend themſelves againſt the ſuperior number of the royaliſts; but they were ſo hardly beſieged, that the next day but one they were compelled to ſubmit to the king's will[8]. The barons of the royal party, having gained a complete victory, loaded and enriched themſelves with the plunder and ſpoils of their captives; and, to glut their avarice, they paid no regard whatever to holy places or orders; but, ſnatching whatever they could find either in or out of the churches, applied it to their own uſes, diſhonouring theſe commencements of their wars by the indelible blot of ſacrilege; being about to loſe, in a ſhort time, by a reverſe of fortune, their ill-gotten goods; and deſerving to loſe them; for, from being a moſt flouriſhing town, they reduced it to a condition moſt miſerable and deſtitute.

The burgeſſes were deſpoiled of their property to the laſt farthing[9].

As ſoon as the confuſion was over, the king ordered the clergy to be executed, according to his oath. But this was objected to. He was reminded, that the ſons of his great men and of other people of his realm had come thither with the univerſity, whom if he ſhould order to be hanged or maimed, even thoſe would riſe up againſt him, who were now with him, and would certainly hinder him, to the utmoſt of their power, from ſpilling the blood of their children and friends. This pacified the king. The lands of the captives were beſtowed upon the conquerors.

---

[1] There is no queſtion but that this is the ſame incident which ſome Chronicles place a year earlier.

[2] Chron. de Dunſtable. [3] T. Wykes. M. Weſtm. Walt. Hemingford. [4] Knyghton. Hemingford.

[5] Wykes. Chron. Dunſtable.

[6] The clergy of the Univerſity of Oxford, who had been transferred to Northampton by order of the barons, did more injury to the beſiegers by their ſlings, bows, and balliſts, than the barons; for, they had a banner of their own, erected aloft againſt the king. Knyghton. Walt. Hemingford.

[7] Knyghton, p. 2247. Hemingford, p. 581. [8] T. Wykes. [9] Dunſtaple.

In the town of Northampton the king took fifteen knights banneret, to wit, Simon the younger, William [1] de Ferrars, Peter de Montfort, Baldwin Wake, the moſt famous lord Adam of Newmarket, Roger Bertram, Simon de Montfort the younger, "a bold knight, who firſt lifted the ſtandard againſt the king," Berengarius de Waterville, Hugh Gebion, Thomas Maunſel, Roger Botevilayn, Nicholas Wake, Robert de Newinton, Philip de Drieby, and Grimbauld de Pauncevolt: the number of knights taken amounted to more than an hundred, beſides an infinite number of noble perſons who had not yet received the military cincture. Some of the priſoners were committed to Northampton caſtle, it being previouſly well fortified. Some of them the king took away with him; ſome he ſent to other caſtles. Young Simon de Montfort was lodged in Windſor caſtle. From Northampton the king marched to Leiceſter, and then to Nottingham, burning and deſolating the manors of the barons and his other enemies. He entered the town and caſtle of Nottingham without oppoſition; and there he kept his Eaſter, and reinforced his army with many barons, and many thouſands of warriors, who came to his aid from the Northern parts [2].

The king ſent his ſon Edward into Derbyſhire and Staffordſhire with a very fine army, which ravaged and burnt the lands and manors of Robert de Ferrars, earl of Derby, and, by their acts of violence, and by laying flat the caſtle of Tutbury, wrought ſhocking deſtruction. Wherever the army of the king and of Edward came, it was accompanied by the aſſociated ſiſters, Depredation, Conflagration, and Slaughter. The country all around trembled at its approach, and ſhrunk and fell before it like reeds ſtricken by the Weſtern winds. There was no peace or order throughout the kingdom. Every thing was overturned and ruined by ſlaughters, burnings, rapines, and deſpoilings; and howling, lamentation, and horror, prevailed in every quarter.

About this time John Giffard, a remarkably bold and good knight, and ſome others, who had the cuſtody of Kenilworth caſtle, which the earl of Leiceſter had repaired, and fortified by new works and contrivances of ſurpriſing ſtrength and ingenuity, took the caſtle of Warwick by ſtratagem, and brought the earl of that honour, William Mauduit, whom they ſuſpected of having lately gone over to the king, a priſoner to Kenilworth, with his wife and children, and overturned the caſtle of Warwick, that the royaliſts might not make it a place of refuge [3].

When advice was brought to the earl of Leiceſter at London of the ſiege of Northampton, he ſet out from London with a great army, intending to march thither to its relief. He was got as far as St. Alban's, when intelligence was brought him, that the Jews had conſpired to raiſe a ſedition in the city. This obliged him to return to London, where he found Greek fire among the Jews, with which they intended to ſet the city on fire on Palm-Sunday [4]. They had got likewiſe falſe keys to each of the city gates, and, as was ſaid, had made ſubterraneous paſſages to them. They were convicted of a deſign to betray the barons and the citizens [5]. This being diſcovered and proved, the earl cauſed them all to be ſlain, from the loweſt to the higheſt, except ſome of the old men, concerning whom he wiſhed to get more perfect inquiry to be made, and ſuch of them as conſented to be baptized. Not leſs than four hundred Jews were ſuppoſed to fall in this maſſacre [6]. John Fitz-John, a diſtinguiſhed baron, was among the moſt active in this horrid work of butchery. He ſlew the richeſt Jew of the city with his own hand, and ſeized upon his prodigious treaſure, but was obliged afterwards to refund a conſiderable part of it to the earl of Leiceſter. This killing and deſpoiling of the Jews, in the opinion of many, was a great public loſs, as they were wont to recruit the king's exchequer by talliages, benevolences, pleas, eſcheats, and other contributions. Gilbert de Clare, earl of Glouceſter, ſerved the Jews of Canterbury in the ſame manner [7].

When the earl of Leiceſter received advice of the miſhap at Northampton and the captivity of his ſon, he ſuſtained the ſhock with great firmneſs of mind, and loſt no time in requiting his enemies in their own way. The earl of Warren, Henry ſon of the king of the Romans, the earl of Arundel, Roger de Leiburne, Reginald Fitz-peter, and ſome others, were ſhut up in Rocheſter caſtle. It was their intention, when the city of London ſhould be on fire, to enter it, to ſeize it, and to deſtroy it. And the king, when he held his parliament at Oxford about the middle of Lent, had entruſted to them the charge of Rocheſter caſtle, and of that part of the realm. The earl of Leiceſter, without regarding the holineſs of the ſeaſon (for it was Paſſion-week), took a body of Londoners with him, and went and laid ſiege to Rocheſter. When he arrived before the place, the bridge was broken down by the burgeſſes, who likewiſe defended the extreme part on their ſide. But the earl very dextrouſly burnt a work at the bridge, and entered the town with his forces, having firſt ſlain four or five of the burgeſſes. And, proceeding to beſiege the caſtle, he took the outer work the firſt day, by the help of his machines and baliſts, and ſtraitened the beſieged very much, who were now confined to the narrow precincts of the Tower. But the Tower was deemed impregnable; and thoſe within it reſiſted the aſſailants with alacrity, expecting the king to come ſpeedily to their aſſiſtance. As ſoon as he heard at Nottingham of the condition of Rocheſter, he flew to its relief, and reached that place in five days with a copious army, having hardly allowed himſelf any time for ſleep the whole time. In the mean time, the earl of Leiceſter was informed, that, if he did not go inſtantly to London, the city would be delivered up, by ſome diſaffected perſons, to lord Edward. Hearing this, he made the beſt of his way to London, leaving at Rocheſter a ſmall body of foot, to continue the ſiege. Theſe the garriſon attacked the next morning; and, having got the better, cut off their hands and feet [8].

The earl of Leiceſter, upon his return to London [9], found the report, that had been ſent to him, to be true; and therefore he took hoſtages from the party who were adverſe to him, that thenceforth they would be faithful to the barons. The king, in his road to Rocheſter, went out of his way, and took the caſtle of Kingſton, which belonged to the earl of Glouceſter. Having relieved Rocheſter, he marched towards the ſea-coaſts, plundering and burning on all ſides whatever belonged to the barons or their partizans.

From Rocheſter [10] he went on to Tunbridge, of which the town and caſtle were delivered up to him. He there took the counteſs of Glouceſter, and ſet her at liberty. It was generally ſaid, that the earl of Glouceſter would ſoon be at Tunbridge, to recover it. The king, therefore, left a great part of his army, viz. above twenty choſen bannerets (vexillarios), to keep that town and caſtle; and then went on to Winchelſea, where he received the mariners of the ports to his peace, and came to full accord with them. Some of the Cinque-ports ſubmitted to him; but others did not. His chief object, with reſpect to them, was to induce them, either from love or fear, to attack the Londoners with a piratical fleet; or, at leaſt, prevent the proviſions, neceſſary to ſupport ſuch a vaſt multitude, from paſſing to them by water. But the royal army could not freely paſs through the mountainous provinces of Surrey and Kent, while Welſh archers boldly obſtructed them in the ſtraits of the ſea with their arrows ſhot at a great diſtance; but the unarmed archers, while they attacked the king's Gens d'armes, were ſeized by the king's forces, and beheaded[1]. The king's prodigious army, not being able to find ſubſiſtence in that barren region, began to ſuffer the miſery of famine; and the beaſts of burden bellowed for their food, and every where failed for want of it. The earl of Leiceſter thought this a favourable opportunity for marching towards the king and lord Edward, who were now got to Lewes, in Suſſex. Aſſembling the barons of his party and their dependants, and muſtering a body of the raw youth of London, to the amount of about fifteen thouſand men, he haſtened towards Lewes, and fixed his camp at Flexinge, within ſeven or eight miles of the king's[2]. While the latter lay at Lewes, the earl ſent overtures to him for peace by a delegation, firſt, of knights; ſecondly, and thirdly, of the biſhops of London and Worceſter[3]. He alſo implored, by his agents and meſſengers, the king of the Romans to perſuade the king to condeſcend to accede to the overtures of pacification, which that king had himſelf framed for his royal brother; and he undertook to procure the payment of fifty thouſand marcs for the damages done by the baronials, if the ſtatutes of Oxford were eſtabliſhed[4]. But the king of the Romans, highly reſenting that the baronials had riſen againſt him, and plundered and deſtroyed his manors, was now averſe to a peace, and prevented it[5]. And king Henry, whoſe army was infinitely better appointed than the earl's, and four times as numerous, thought the latter durſt attempt nothing againſt him, and held it in deriſion.

---

[1] Contin. M. Paris. The younger brother of Robert de Ferrers, earl of Derby, was named William. See Dugdale's Baronage. The Continuator ſeems to have mentioned Simon de Montfort, ſon of the earl of Leiceſter, twice. Wykes reports the name of William de Furnival among the moſt eminent priſoners.

[2] M. Weſtm.

[3] Ib.

[4] Dunſtable.

[5] Ib. & M. Weſtm.

[6] Wykes.

[7] Dunſtable.

[8] Dunſtable, Wykes, and Hemingford.

[9] On the 11th of May, the city of London was treacherouſly ſet on fire, and much the greater part of it burnt down. Chron. Dunſtable, p. 582.

[10] Wykes.

Upon the 11th of May, the barons ſent the following letter to the king:—The letter is found in Riſhanger, the Continuator of M. Paris, and in M. Weſtm.

"To their moſt excellent lord Henry, by the grace of God, &c. the barons and his other lieges[6], deſirous to obſerve their oaths, and the fidelity due to God and to the king, greeting and obedience, accompanied with all manner of reſpect and honour. Whereas it appears by numerous proofs, that certain perſons about you have ſuggeſted to your Lordſhip a great many lies concerning us, working as much ill as they could, not only to you, but to us and your realm; may your excellence know, that we are deſirous to maintain the welfare and ſecurity of your perſon, and the fealty we owe you, to the utmoſt of our abilities, propoſing to annoy not only our enemies, but yours too, and thoſe of the whole realm. May it pleaſe you to entertain no other opinion of us; for, we ſhall be always found to be faithful to you. And we, Simon de Montfort, Gilbert de Clare, at the requeſt of the reſt, have put our ſeals to theſe preſents. Dated, &c."

The king treated this letter with contempt; and, being eager for battle, returned the following anſwer of [7] defiance:

"Henry, by the grace of God, king of England, &c. to Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, Gilbert de Clare, and their accomplices. Seeing by the war and general diſturbance in our realm of your creating, and by the burnings and other enormous miſchiefs, it appears manifeſtly, that ye do not obſerve that fidelity which is due to us, and that ye have no manner of concern for the ſafety of our perſon; inaſmuch as ye have enormouſly aggrieved the great men, and other our lieges, uniformly adhering to their allegiance, and do propoſe, as much as in you lies, ſtill to aggrieve them, as ye have ſignified by your letters to us: we eſteem the grievances done to them as done to us, and we repute their enemies to be ours; eſpecially, ſeeing the ſaid lieges, in maintenance of their allegiance to us, aſſiſt us bravely againſt your breach of fidelity. We have no concern about your welfare, or love for us; but ſend this defiance to you, as the enemies of us and our lieges. Witneſs ourſelf at Lewes, 12th of May, the 48th year of our reign."

At the ſame time, king Richard and lord Edward ſent the barons the following letter.

"Richard, by the grace of God, king of the Romans, always auguſt, and Edward, the eldeſt ſon of the illuſtrious king of England, and all the other barons and nobles, ſtedfaſtly adhering to the aforeſaid king by the works of ſincere fidelity and devotion, to Simon de Montfort, Gilbert de Clare, and all and each of the accomplices of their perfidy. From your letters, which ye have tranſmitted to the illuſtrious king of England, our moſt dear lord, we find we are defied by you; though this defiance was already fully evinced before, by your acts of hoſtility in burning our houſes, and deſpoiling us of our goods: We, therefore, will ye to know, that ye are defied by all and each of us, as public enemies, by enemies who will henceforth be inſtant in doing to your perſons and properties all the poſſible miſchief we can. But, as to the imputation which ye falſely bring againſt us, that we do not give good and faithful counſel to our lord the king, ye do not ſpeak truth. And if ye, lord Simon de Montfort, or Gilbert de Clare, have a mind to aſſert this in the court of the lord king, we are ready to procure you a ſafe conduct to the ſaid court, and to prove our innocence, and the falſehood of lying and perfidious traitors, by any other our peer in nobility and birth. We are all content with the ſeals of the aforeſaid lords, namely, of the king of the Romans, and of the lord Edward."

As ſoon as the meſſengers returned to the barons with the final anſwer of the king, that the terms of peace offered by the barons would not be complied with, the earl of Leiceſter, having God and juſtice before his eyes, followed the advice of the biſhops and other religious perſons, and determined rather to die than violate his oath. He devoted the whole night of the 13th of May to religious exerciſes, and exhorted all his friends and partizans to make a full and ſolemn confeſſion of their ſins to their ghoſtly fathers. William de Cantelupe, the aged and pious biſhop of Worceſter, exchanged his mitre for an helmet, and his epiſcopal attire for a coat of mail. He abſolved them all from all their ſins, and exhorted them, as they expected their iniquities to be forgiven, to fight manfully in the cauſe of Truth, and promiſed the kingdom of Heaven to all thoſe who ſhould die in its defence[8].

The baronials, united by the double ties of affection and conſcience, breathed all the ſame ardour of patriotiſm and Chriſtian reſignation. The earl directed, that before the engagement they ſhould get white croſſes ſewed over their armour upon their necks and breaſts, to diſtinguiſh them from the enemy, and ſhew that they were fighting for righteouſneſs.

The greater part of the baronial army ſpent the night in the town of Flexinge. Very early in the morning, and before ſun-riſe, they began their march towards Lewes, and came within two miles of that town. In their way they met with a party of the royaliſts, who were out foraging; theſe they immediately attacked, and a great many of them were killed. The earl's deſign was to ſurprize the king's army before they were out of their beds. For which purpoſe, he marched ſecretly amidſt the cover of the woods, and reached, at length, the top of an hill, which was about two miles from Lewes, where the king was. He was coming down the hill into the plain, when his march was diſcovered by ſome of the watch belonging to the royal army. The latter were immediately called to arms; and each ſide formed in order of battle. The king's army was divided into three parts. Lord Edward, having with him the earl of Warrenne and William de Valence, and the flower of the royal army, commanded the firſt; the king of the Romans, accompanied by his ſon lord Henry, was at the head of the ſecond; and the king himſelf, ſupported by his great men, took his ſtation in the third; the king did not conſtitute a fourth diviſion, becauſe he had left a great number of his bannerets behind him at the caſtle of Tunbridge, where was a great part of the youth of his army; for, he did not think the barons were ſo near him. In the van of his army was borne the dragon, denoting that deſtruction awaited the adverſe party.

---

[1] Wykes, p. 61. [2] M. Weſtm. & MS. in Muſ. Brit. [3] Dunſtable. [4] Wykes.

[5] Contin. Mat. Pariſii. [6] Fideles—in old French, leudes; i. e. vaſſals tied to their lords by fealty.

[7] Before the battle of Lewes, the king and his ſon, and the king of the Romans, defied Simon de Montfort and his adherents, and promulged them public enemies in writing. The next day, the earl and his partizans ſurrendered their homages——homagia ſua reddiderunt. Annals of Hyde, in anno 1264.

This was a ſolemn annullation of the connexion between the lord and his vaſſal. See the defiance of the Earl Mareſchal in M. Paris, p. 330, anno 1233. The barons defied king John in form. The feudal maxim was: "Sicut ſubditus domino, ita dominus ſubdito tenetur." M. Paris, p. 482. Vide Spelmanni Gloſſ. in Voc. Fidelitas, p. 271. Ex Cujacio. & Coke on Littleton, p. 65. Chron. de Dunſtable. Walſingham's Ypodigma, p. 461.

[8] Contin. M. Paris. Dunſtable.

The earl of Leiceſter diſtributed his forces into four parts. Over the firſt were placed Henry de Montfort, his eldeſt ſon, and his brother Guy, lord John de Burg the younger, and lord Humphry de Bohun. At the head of the ſecond was Gilbert de Clare, earl of Glouceſter, lord John Fitz-John, and lord William de Montenſy. The Londoners were the third body, commanded, at their particular requeſt, by Nicholas de Segrave, who deſired to commence the attack, and ſuſtain the firſt brunt of the battle. The earl of Leiceſter commanded the fourth body, attended by lord Thomas de Pelveſton; and he placed his own diviſion aſide, to be ready to act according to circumſtances, intending to direct his principal onſet againſt the two kings, the chiefs of the royal army[1].

While he was at London, the earl of Leiceſter had got made a kind of chariot, cloſe on all ſides, and ſtrengthened with plates of iron. He took this chariot with him, and juſt before the battle of Lewes he caged up in it, by way of precaution, two citizens of London, who a little before had been concerned in a plot to betray him to the royaliſts, and whom he did not think it prudent to leave behind him, for fear they ſhould get the city of London delivered to the king's party during the abſence of the earl and the Londoners who accompanied him. He placed this carriage, with a guard about it, in the middle of the baggage and ſumpter-horſes, upon the hill, and raiſed upon it his own banner, as if he were ſick, and not able to take a ſhare in the action; though he was, at the ſame time, very well, and able to atchieve great things[2].

The earl of Leiceſter knighted Gilbert earl of Glouceſter, Robert de Vere, and many others, upon the field of battle, and decorated them with their military enſigns; and animated his army, by a perſuaſive ſpeech, to make a ſacrifice of their lives for their country. The trumpets on each ſide ſounding with tremendous clangor to the attack, each party ruſhed upon the other, looking grimly at each other, and dealing their ſtrokes with horrible noiſe. Great numbers of the infantry gave way almoſt immediately, and the horſemen engaged in cloſe encounter. Lord Edward, a youth of moſt daring ſpirit, a valiant knight, and his battalion, were oppoſed to the Londoners, raw young men, ſtrangers to war and military diſcipline, and aſſailed them with ſuch impetuoſity, that the foremoſt fell back; which alarming thoſe behind, many of the latter made a precipitate flight, and the whole body ſoon gave way, leaving the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, John Fitz-John, and a few others, with their people, in the field[3]. Henry de Haſtinges was one of the firſt who felt the panic; and he, and Geoffry de Lucy, and Humphrey de Bohun the younger, were among the fugitives. The Londoners were purſued by Edward, who was incenſed againſt them for their rebellion againſt his father, and their late ill treatment of his mother. Being eager to take vengeance of them, he and his troops purſued with great acrimony, and made a dreadful carnage, continuing his purſuit for three or four miles, and killing four thouſand of them. In the mean while, the ſecond and third diviſions of the royal army were weakened, and expoſed to the full fury of the forces remaining with the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter. They drove on with irreſiſtible fury, allowing themſelves no reſpite, and ſtriking, beating down, and killing, four thouſand of them. In the very heat of the action the moſt noble perſonages of thoſe who were armed cap-à-pié, both knights and eſquires, loſt their courage, and fled as faſt as they could to the caſtle of Pevenſey. Theſe were John earl of Warenne, William of Valence, Guy de Leſignan, both brothers of the king, Hugh Bigot, and many others. The ſecond diviſion was overpowered, the greater part of it deſtroyed, and the king of the Romans, together with Robert de Breus and John Cumyn, whoſe numerous corps of Scots infantry were almoſt all killed, was taken priſoner[4]. The king's own diviſion was penetrated, and his horſe killed under him. The earl of Leiceſter had made it his principal object, from the beginning of the action, to direct the chief attack againſt the quarter where the two kings were; and, if poſſible, to take king Henry alive. And this he accompliſhed; the king, abandoned by thoſe in whom he confided, and deſtitute of the means of farther reſiſtance, ſurrendered himſelf to the earl of Leiceſter; and was immediately lodged in the abbey, and a ſtrong guard placed at the gates. The barons, having obtained the victory, went into the town, where it could hardly be known, for a good while, from the baronials, who were royaliſts, and who baronials[5].

While theſe things were doing, Edward and his men, returning from the chace of the Londoners, ſaw the earl of Leiceſter's chariot ſtanding in the plain without charioteer or attendant, and tore it to pieces inſtantly, and ſlew the captive citizens within, not knowing that they were the king's friends. Coming to the place where the ſlain lay in great multitude, his people were ſtruck with horror: Edward endeavoured to awaken their courage, and incite them afreſh to the conflict. And, according to ſome authors, the battle was renewed with great ardour[6]. But others report, that moſt of Edward's leading men betook themſelves to flight, and left him almoſt alone in the field of battle. He was therefore reduced to the neceſſity of deferring his revenge to ſome other opportunity, and ſubmitted to take ſhelter in the priory of Lewes, where his father and uncle Richard were already lodged. At night, a ſort of outline of general pacification was framed and acceded to. The earl of Leiceſter diſpatched certain Frier-Minors, an order of men uſually recurred to for the purpoſes of peace and amity among contending nations, both to the king and to his ſon, aſſuring them of his affection and fidelity, and expreſſing his earneſt deſire of peace and reconciliation, to prevent the farther effuſion of human blood, and offering to leave the ſeveral matters in diſpute to the judgement of perſons nominated by the king. Edward, ſeeing no proſpect of farther ſupport, and exhauſted with the toils of the day, ſubmitted to certain articles, which were put into the form of an inſtrument, and obtained the name of the Miſe of Lewes. Edward's chief dependence was upon the barons of the Welſh frontier, called Lords Marchers. Such of theſe, as were taken priſoners, were to be releaſed; Roger Mortimer, therefore, John Baylol, R. de Clifford, Roger de Leiburne, Hamo l' Eſtrange, were ſet at liberty; both lord Edward and lord Henry of Almaine undertaking for their perſonal appearance when they ſhould be ſummoned to parliament, to abide the judgement of their peers. To provide effectually for the general peace of the nation, Edward was required to ſurrender his perſon to the victorious party, as an hoſtage for the quiet of the realm. Sir Henry of Almaine ſubmitted to a like ſacrifice of his perſonal liberty on the ſame ground. This act of ſurrender was declared, in charters drawn for the purpoſe, to be with their own free conſent, and with the aſſent of the king, prelates, and grandees of the realm; and the perſons of theſe two young lords were to remain in the charge of Henry de Montfort, eldeſt ſon of the earl of Leiceſter. This perſonal reſtraint was to terminate, when the plan of pacification was completed; and it was mutually agreed that the two parties, late at variance, ſhould calmly conſider, which of the proviſions and ſtatutes ſhould be kept, and which rejected, upon good cauſe, and the captives on either ſide ſhould freely, that is, without ranſom, be ſet free[1].

---

[1] Wykes.
[2] Chron. de Mailros, & M. Weſtm.
[3] Annales de Winton. MS. in Muſæo Britannico.
[4] M. Weſtm.
[5] Hemyngford. Knyghton. M. Weſtm.
[6] M. Weſtm. Dunſtable.

According to other accounts, the ſubſtance of the miſe of Lewes was, that the proviſions of Oxford ſhould be again obſerved; yet ſo, that, if there were any thing in them that needed amendment, it ſhould be corrected by four of the great men of England, either biſhops or barons, to be choſen by the community thereof; and, if any difference ſhould ariſe between them concerning thoſe amendments, they were to ſtand to the arbitration of Charles count of Anjou, brother of the king of France, with four of the great men of that kingdom there named; and that, in the mean while, the lords Edward and Henry ſhould remain as hoſtages in the cuſtody of the barons till all theſe things ſhould be ſettled; and, for this end, a parliament ſhould be ſummoned at the Whitſuntide following. Theſe articles, being put into an inſtrument or charter, were ſealed with the king's ſeal, and the ſeals of all the earls and chief barons[2].

Thomas Wykes only ſays of this miſe of Lewes, that Edward and Henry were to remain as hoſtages until, by five nobles of France expreſſly named, and by ſuch as theſe ſhould chuſe as coadjutors, the ſtate of the realm ſhould be ordered.

M. Weſtm. in his ſecond account of the barons' war, ſays that, by the form of peace agreed upon by both parties at Lewes, it was ſtipulated mutually, that the king and his adherents on one part, and the earls of Glouceſter and Leiceſter on the other, and their partizans, ſhould procure, through the illuſtrious king of France, three prelates and three noblemen of France to be named and convened by the king of France; which ſix ſhould chuſe two perſons, who, coming into England, ſhould there chuſe and aſſociate to them a third perſon, who ſhould be of England; and that what theſe three, as well for reſtoring as abridging the king's power, as for ſettling all controverſies whatever, and for ordering the ſtate of England, ſhould determine, ſhould remain firm and ſtable; the corporal oath being thereunto given by the parties reſpectively, and an inſtrument thereunto made, ſigned with the ſeal of the king, and of all the parties, the eldeſt ſon of the king, and the eldeſt ſon of the king of the Romans, being given as hoſtages on the part of the ſaid king.

On the Saturday following, the king iſſued his writ, whereby he ordered all thoſe who had followed him to go quickly home; accordingly moſt of them, as well thoſe who were of his family or immediate ſuite, as thoſe of his caſtles, did ſo. And, by advice of his ſon Edward and the earl of Leiceſter, he wrote to thoſe who kept the caſtle of Tunbridge for him, to repair to their reſpective homes, and offer no injury to any of the baronial party. But, notwithſtanding this command, they marched away in force; and, when they heard that ſome of the London fugitives had taken ſhelter at Croydon, they haſtened thither, and killed a great many of them, and plundered them: and thence they went down to Briſtol, where they remained till lord Edward ſurreptitiouſly got his liberty, and renewed the war.

Beſides the priſoners already mentioned, there were of that number Humphry de Bohun, earl of Hereford, William Bardulf, Robert de Tatteſhull, Roger de Sumery, Henry de Percy, and Philip Baſſet; which laſt gained great glory, among thoſe who were with the king, for his courage both in giving and receiving ſtrokes. And beſides theſe there were many others of the prime nobility; moſt of whom were either made priſoners, or had fled. On the king's ſide periſhed, among others, William de Wilton, a knight and a juſticiar of the king, and Fulk Fitz-Warin, a baron; the one was killed with the ſword, the other drowned. On the baronial party, Ralph Heringander, a baron, and William Blund, the earl of Leiceſter's ſtandard-bearer[3].

Lord Edward and Henry of Almaine were ſent to Dover-caſtle, there to remain as ſecurities for the public peace. The king of the Romans was ſent to the Tower of London, and the cuſtody of his vaſt eſtate committed to the earl of Leiceſter. The king was much abridged in his power, and from the time of his captivity ſeems to have done juſt as the earl of Leiceſter and the barons ordered. But it does not appear, that any reſtraint was laid upon his perſon; or that he was treated but with the reſpect due to his high ſtation.

The earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, and the others who were with them, departing from Lewes, went to Canterbury with the king[4].

On the 17th of May, the king, by his letters patent dated at Battle, directs Drogo de Barenton, his conſtable of Windſor, to ſet at large Simon de Montfort the younger, Peter of Montfort, and his two ſons Peter and Robert, who had been taken at Northampton, and committed to Windſor-caſtle by lord Edward[5]. The reaſon aſſigned by the king for the enlargement of theſe perſons is, that, by the form of peace made and confirmed between him and his barons, he was bound to releaſe them. On the 28th of May, he appoints Henry of Montford, ſon of the earl of Leiceſter, keeper of the caſtle of Dover and of the Cinque-ports, and his chamberlain of Sandwich, to hold them during pleaſure, and to anſwer for the iſſues and profits in the Exchequer; and Richard de Grey is ordered to deliver them up to him, with all their ſtores and furniture.

The king's patents at this time are qualified with the clauſe de conſilio & aſſenſu baronum noſtrorum[6]; and they ſet forth, that, by the concurrence of God's grace, peace was made and confirmed between him and his barons[1].

---

[1] Tyrrhel.
[2] Ib.
[3] MS Annales de Hyde. M. Weſtm. p. 324.
[4] Chron. Dunſtable. Lelandi Coll.
[5] Rymer.
[6] De aſſenſu & conſilio baronum noſtrorum.—After the paſſing of the Oxford ſtatutes, the king's acts were ſanctioned by the approbation of the grandees of his council in this form—de conſilio magnatum, de conſilio noſtro. Theſe ſtatutes were now revived, and theſe forms may be ſuppoſed to have the ſame meaning. It was part of the antient conſtitution of England, before the Conqueſt, and not altered by it, that all the king's acts of ſtate ſhould have the ſanction of more or leſs of his lieges. The general name of this claſs of men was barons, and, collectively, the baronage of England. And the Chronicles and Records of that time by barons mean the libres hommes, or freemen of the nation, who, either perſonally, or by their procurators, had a right to adviſe the king in affairs of government. On common occaſions, it was deemed ſufficient, if the king acted with the advice of ſome of the chief nobility, called major barons, being of his council by right; on more ſolemn occaſions he took the advice of a larger number of theſe freemen; and his council, in the plenitude thereof, conſiſted of all the libres hommes of the realm, whether of the ſacred or lay orders. In this council the members were all upon a footing in their public capacity; each being returned to give the king advice, and aſſent to ſtatutes, to grant aid, and the like.

A like mandate was ſent to Roger de Mortuo Mari, that he ſhould bring with him John le Deſpencer, Adam le Deſpencer, Roger de la Hyde, Humphrey de Baſſingburn, and all other priſoners of like ſort.

A like mandate was ſent to Roger de Clifford, that he ſhould bring with him William de Eyvil, Henry de Penbreg, Baldwin de Drayton.

Similar mandates were ſent to certain others; and in all of them the king forbade all perſons from carrying arms in the realm, for the more certain preſervation of the peace now generally eſtabliſhed.

By other letters of the ſame date, by advice and aſſent of his barons, he provides certain perſons, to whom reſpectively letters of appointment are addreſſed, whereby they are made, pro tempore, conſervators of the peace. Brady ex Recordis.

Hence it appears plainly, that knights commiſſioners of ſhires were an integral part of the national council.

On the 4th of June, the king, by a ſpecial writ directed to James d'Audley, ſignified to him, that, for keeping the peace between the king and his barons inviolable, a ſtatute was made by the counſel and aſſent of his barons, that no perſon, upon pain of his lands and tenements, and even of life and limbs, ſhould in future carry arms in the realm, without the king's ſpecial licence and command; and it commands farther, that all the priſoners lately taken at Northampton be brought to London to the king; and, as the king had ſpecial affairs touching himſelf and his realm, which he muſt communicate to the ſaid J. Audley, which could not be tranſacted without the preſence of the ſaid James, he therefore requires of him, in the faith and homage that he owed him, that he come to him in his proper perſon, bringing with him Robert de Sutton, Robert Fitz-Walter, Philip de Covel, John de Wiavil, and all other priſoners; that concerning ſuch priſoners, and concerning priſoners lately taken at Lewes, exchange ſhould be made, if it ſhould ſo happen, viz. priſoner for priſoner; or that the ſaid priſoners ſhould be releaſed, by ſufficient manucaption, from among the chief people of each county[2].

For the ſecurity and quiet of the realm, the king appointed, by his letters patent of the 4th of June, a conſervator of the peace in every county; who was inveſted with large powers for preventing murders, burnings, robberies, and all other breaches of the king's peace, and to hinder all perſons whatever from bearing arms, except ſuch as had the king's licence for it. And, as the king muſt needs treat with his prelates, great men, and others his lieges, in the approaching parliament, concerning his own and the nation's affairs, each conſervator was ordered to ſend to the king, for the whole county, four from among the more reſpectable and ſenſible knights, choſen for this purpoſe by the aſſent of the ſaid county; ſo that they were with him at London on the [3] octaves of the inſtant feaſt of the holy Trinity, to treat with him, his prelates, great men, and the others in parliament, at fartheſt. And this the conſervators were enjoined to do, as they feared the king's diſpleaſure[4].

The parliament was holden on the 23d of June; when "a certain form of peace was ſettled, and approved univerſally and unanimouſly by the king, lord Edward, all the prelates and barons, and the whole community of the realm of England[5]." This ordinance provides for preſerving the peace of the realm, till the plan of peace, called the miſe of Lewes, ſhould be completed; and it was to remain till then firm, ſtable, and unſhaken, and of full force, during the whole life of the king, and alſo during the time of lord Edward after he ſhould be king, even to ſuch time as ſhould afterwards be agreed upon. By this ordinance three wiſe and reſpectable men of the realm were to be choſen and named, on the part of the community of the realm, for the reformation of the ſtate of the realm, who ſhould have authority and power from the lord king of chuſing or naming, in the ſtead of the lord king, nine counſellors[6]; of which nine three at leaſt alternately, or by turns, ſhould always be preſent in the court; and the lord king, by the counſel of thoſe nine, ſhould order and diſpoſe about the wardenſhips of the caſtles, and all other affairs of the realm. Alſo, by the counſel of theſe nine, he was to appoint the high juſticiar, chancellor, treaſurer, and other officials, ſuperior and inferior, in ſuch matters as appertained to the regimen of the court and the realm. The firſt electors or nominators were to ſwear, that, according to their conſcience, they would chuſe or nominate ſuch counſellors as they believed would be to the honour of God, and uſeful and faithful to the church, to the king, and to the realm. The counſellors alſo, and all the officials ſuperior and inferior, in their creation, were to ſwear faithfully to execute their offices to their utmoſt, to the honour of God and of the church, and the profit of the king and kingdom, without gift, except ſuch eatables and drinkables as were uſually preſented to the tables of the great. But, if the ſaid counſellors, or any one or more of them, in the adminiſtration committed to him, ſhould miſbehave, or on any account be to be changed, the lord king, by counſel of the three firſt electors or nominators, ſhould amove ſuch as he ſaw fit to amove, and, in the place of ſuch, appoint and ſubſtitute other faithful and fit perſons. But, if the officials ſuperior or inferior ſhould miſbehave in their offices, the lord king, by counſel of the nine aforeſaid, ſhould remove them, and ſubſtitute others, without delay, in their place, by counſel of the aforeſaid. But, if the three firſt electors or nominators, in the election or nomination of the counſellors, or perhaps of a ſingle counſellor, in the creation of officials, or in managing other affairs of the lord king and of the realm, ſhould diſagree, then that which ſhould be agreed to and ordered by two parts ſhould be firmly obſerved; provided that, of the two parties, one be a prelate of the church in affairs touching the church. And, if it ſhould happen that two parts of the aforeſaid nine in any affair ſhould not be concordant, concerning ſuch diſcordancy it ſhould be abided by the ordinance of the firſt three electors, or nominators, or the greater part thereof. And, if it ſeemed good to the community of prelates and barons to join together in opinion that any one or more ſhould be ſubſtituted in the place of one or more of the three firſt electors or nominators, the lord king, by the counſel of the community of the prelates and barons, ſhould ſubſtitute one other or more. All the things aforeſaid the lord king was to do by the counſel of the aforeſaid nine in form aforeſaid; or they, in the ſtead and by the authority of the lord king: the preſent ordinance to endure until the miſe made at Lewes, and afterwards ſigned by the parties, ſhould be generally agreed to, or ſome other form provided, which the parties ſhould agree to adopt. This ordinance was made at London, by the conſent, will, and command, of the lord king, and alſo of the community there preſent. In teſtimony of which, the lords R. of Lincoln, and Hugh of Ely, biſhops, R. earl of Norfolk and mareſchal of England, R. de Vere earl of Oxford, Humphrey de Bohun, Will. de Monte Caniſio the mayor of London[7], put their ſeals to this writing. It was done in the parliament at London, in the month of June[8], A. D. 1264."

---

[1] See Rymer. [2] Ib.

[3] Eaſter-day this year was on the 20th of April; the octaves of Trinity, therefore, was the 23d of June.

[4] Rymer, p. 793. [5] Tyrrhel, and Brady's Appendix, N° 210.

[6] The three primary counſellors, elected on the part of the community, made this corps of counſellors twelve in number.

[7] The mayor of London put his ſeal. This, I think, could be no other than the city ſeal; for, in his private capacity, he probably had no ſeal, and was no more than a private perſon. He may, therefore, be conſidered as repreſenting the city of London in the common council of the realm. His name appears at the head of the baronage of England in the Magna Charta of king John. The freemen of the Cinque-ports elected ſome of their order to repreſent them in the common council. Theſe delegates had likewiſe voice in that aſſembly, and were called barons. According to the commiſſion given by the king to the conſervators of the peace of each county the perſons the king wanted to treat with; that is, conſult, in the enſuing parliament, were his prelates, great men, and others his lieges, concerning his own and the nation's affairs. The parliaments met accordingly; and the ſtatutes there made were approved unanimouſly by the king, lord Edward, all the prelates and barons, and the whole community of England. The ſame form nearly expreſſed the concurrence of the lords and commons in the reign of Edward I. and following times, when the lords and commons were ſummoned as they are now. Can there be a doubt then, but that burgeſſes were a part of the community or common council of the realm? I grant, however, they were not ſummoned about things that did not concern them, or univerſally, or adequately; nor ever have been ſo to the preſent day.

[8] The day of the month is wanting in the Record; but it muſt have been on the 22d or 23d of June. The great men met on the 23d; and on the ſame day is dated the king's writ for chuſing the three counſellors. The author, therefore, quoted by Tyrrhel, is wrong, who ſays, the ordinance was made on the vigil of St. Peter and Paul, i. e. June 29. See Tyrrhel's Hiſt. p. 1028.

Item, it was ordained, that the ſtate of the Engliſh church ſhould be reformed into a due ſtate.

Item, it was ordained, that the aforeſaid three electors and counſellors, of which was made mention in the aforeſaid ordinance, and the wardens of the caſtles, and other the bailiffs of the king, ſhall always be natives of England; but foreigners might peaceably come, tarry, and return. And as well laymen in their poſſeſſions, as clercs willing to reſide upon their benefices, merchants alſo, and all others, for the management of their affairs, might freely come, and peaceably remain: provided nevertheleſs, that they come peaceably, without arms and a ſuſpected multitude; and that none of them be taken into any office or bailiwick in the realm or the king's houſehold. The charters of general liberties and of the foreſt, a good while ago granted to the natives by the lord king, and the ſtatutes for removing of grievances concerning the ſheriff's turn, ſuits of court, and other ſuits, which the lord king had, the year preceding, in each county, by his letters patent, cauſed to be publiſhed, together with the laudable and long-approved cuſtoms of the realm, were to be obſerved for ever, and proviſion made for their better and more entire obſervance.

Item, it was provided, that the lord king and lord Edward, and thoſe who were on their ſide, ſhould remit all injury and rancour, ſo as that they ſhould not, on account of the late diſturbance, aggrieve them, or ſuffer them to be aggrieved by their retainers; and ſhould make all their bailiffs, upon aſſuming their offices, ſwear, that they would not aggrieve any one on account of the aforeſaid diſturbance, but diſpenſe equal juſtice to all. And good ſecurity was to be provided for the firm obſervance of all things.

On the 23d of June, the king appointed, by his letters patent, Stephen biſhop of Chicheſter, Simon de Montfort earl of Leiceſter, and Gilbert de Clare earl of Glouceſter, to be the three nominators of the council of nine[1]. The writ ran thus:—"The king to all, &c. Know ye, that we have given power to the venerable father, Stephen biſhop of Chicheſter, and to our beloved and faithful Simon de Montfort earl of Leiceſter, and Gilbert de Clare earl of Glouceſter and Hertford, of nominating for us nine out of the more faithful, experienced, and uſeful, as well prelates as others, by whoſe counſel we will rule the affairs of our realm, until the miſe, by us and our barons at Lewes lately made, or ſome other form, if any better can be provided, be completed. In teſtimony of which, &c. Witneſs the king at St. Paul's, June 23."

Theſe proceedings of the parliament, juſt deſcribed, are thus related and cenſured by an anonymous author, a ſtaunch royaliſt, in the Flores Hiſtoriarum, commonly called the Chronicle of M. Weſtminſter: "After theſe things, the prelates, earls, and barons, of the party adverſe to the king, which now ſeditiouſly held the king in captivity, forgetful of the compromiſe of Lewes and of their own oath, nay, of their own ſalvation, having appointed a meeting of their own ſet, were aſſiduous in deviſing new ordinances for the kingdom; among other things enacting, that two earls and one biſhop, the three being elected on the part of the community of the realm, ſhould chuſe nine perſons, of which three ſhould aſſiſt the king; and by the counſel of thoſe three and nine, as well in the royal houſehold as in the realm, all things ſhould proceed; and that nothing ſhould be done by the king without the advice of them, at leaſt of three of them. And thus the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, and the biſhop of Chicheſter (who had abſolved thoſe, who were about to fight againſt their lord king, of all their ſins), were appointed the chief directors and counſellors of the whole realm; a threat having been iſſued, that another king ſhould be elected, and the eldeſt ſon of the king be kept in perpetual impriſonment, if they withheld their aſſent. To this requiſition, therefore, the king and his ſon were forced to yield, all the biſhops, earls, and barons[2], conſenting to the preſent act, and ſetting their ſeals to the inſtrument made upon the occaſion. And letters were ſent to the lords, the biſhop of Salino, cardinal, then legate of the Apoſtolic ſee, and the illuſtrious king of France, for the total revocation of the miſe of Lewes, and for the making a new peace by the amicable conſent of the parties. And when, by the biſhops of London, Winton, and Worceſter, and ſome other biſhops of the province of Canterbury, inſtant entreaty was made to the lord legate to approve and ſanction the ſaid act, he, ſharply reprehending the ſaid biſhops for conſenting to ſuch a depreſſion of the royal power by public edicts exhibited at Boulogne (for, the Engliſh had not allowed the legate to ſet his foot in England), got them cited to appear before him at Boulogne within three days, to treat with him on the affairs of England. But they being expected and waited for in vain, to and beyond the term preſcribed, the legate ſuperſeded them from the celebration of divine offices. But upon the aforeſaid earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter and their accomplices, the City of London, and the Cinque-ports, who had hindered his paſſage into England, he promulged the ſentences of excommunication and interdict. But the aforeſaid biſhops, earls, and barons, and the others, conceiving that they were very unjuſtly treated, made their appeal to the holy ſee, and even, if it were neceſſary, to a general council, and paid no regard to theſe ſpiritual ſentences, but continued to partake of the divine offices as uſual."

The marchers of Wales, namely, Roger de Mortimer, James de Audley, Roger de Clifford, Roger de Leyburne, Hamo l'Eſtrange, John de Trublevill ſenior, and Robert and Hugh de Trublevill, who had got off after the battle of Lewes, and for whom the lords Edward and Henry were left in the hands of the barons as hoſtages, and many others, having collected a force, made war in the marches againſt the barons. The earl of Leiceſter, having for his faithful ally Lewellin prince of Wales, went againſt the marchers with a numerous army, and entered the caſtles of Hay and Hereford, committing in his way, every where, the lands and demeſne lordſhips of Roger de Mortimer to fire and depredation. Hugh de Mortimer was obliged to ſurrender himſelf and his caſtle of Richar to the barons; his other poſſeſſions were put in wardſhip, and entruſted to John Fitz-John, and the caſtle of Ludlow was given up. The Engliſh and Welſh army then went on to Montgomery, where Roger de Mortimer and James d'Audley, and the other marchers, entered into terms of peace with the barons; and hoſtages were given on both ſides for the obſervance of them. But the marchers meant treacherouſly in all their proceedings[3].

The earl of Leiceſter haſtened to the Southern parts of England, to defend them from a moſt formidable invaſion.

About Midſummer the barons received advice, that the queen, whom the king had left in France with their ſon Edmund towards the latter end of the preceding year, was marching towards the ſea-coaſt, having been able, by her intereſt with the king of France, Peter earl of Savoy, late earl of Richmond, and many other potentates, and by the means of immenſe loans which her credit had enabled her to procure, and large pay which ſhe gave her mercenaries, to collect a prodigious army, conſiſting of Germans, Brabantines, Flandrians, Normans, Poitevins, Walloons, Gauls, and Burgundians, whom ſhe intended to bring over hither, under her own command and that of Peter of Savoy her uncle, for the deſtruction of the Engliſh. To reſiſt this formidable invaſion, the whole ſtrength of the kingdom was called for by the king's edict, addreſſed to every city, town, and townſhip, and marched down to Canterbury and the maritime parts[4].

---

[1] Brady's Appendix, p. 238.

[2] He might have added, knights commiſſioners of ſhires, and burgeſs delegates; for, the mayor of London was certainly in that parliament; and why not other delegates of burgs? I am ſure they had the ſame right.

[3] M. Weſt. Chron. de Dunſtable. Lelandi Collectanea.

[4] Chron. Dunſtable. M. Weſtm. T. Wykes.

Towards defraying the expence of this great armament, and for the general good of the church and realm, the prelates granted the king the tenth of all eccleſiaſtical revenues; the ſame to be collected, not by the king's bailiffs, but by eccleſiaſtical perſons. The money granted by the clergy to be paid before Michaelmas following[1].

On the 6th of July, the king iſſued the following writ; and ſent a copy of it to every ſhire-reeve of England:

"The king[2] to the archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, priors, earls, barons, ſheriffs, knights, freemen, and to the univerſal community of the county of - - - - -, greeting. Whereas it is manifeſt to us, that a great multitude of foreigners (a fleet having been for that purpoſe collected) are preparing to enter our kingdom with armed force, to the confuſion and diſheriſon of us and of every perſon of our realm, unleſs we find a way by a ſtrong force to oppoſe them; we command you, in that faith whereby you are bound to us, firmly commanding that[3] you, all knights and free tenants, who are able to do ſo, do powerfully and manfully equip yourſelves with horſes and arms; ſo that ye be with us at London, with your whole poſſe, on the Lord's day after the feaſt of St. Peter ad vincula, for the defence of us and yourſelves and of the whole realm, to proceed thence with us againſt the ſaid foreigners. And you the ſheriffs, taking to you the conſervator of the peace of the ſaid county, the aforeſaid archbiſhops, biſhops, barons, and all others who owe ſervice to us, charge and ſtraitly command on our part, in the faith and homage whereby they are bound to us, and as they love themſelves, their lands and tenements, that not only with the ſervice wherein they are bound to us, but that every one manfully and to the beſt of his power come, or ſend at the ſame day horſes, arms, and choſen foot, ſuch as he can have; that with their general aſſiſtance we may be able to reſiſt the impending danger. Nor let any, on account of the ſhortneſs of time, as if it did not contain a reaſonable time of ſummons, make excuſe; ſeeing the urgent neceſſity did not admit the time to be farther prolonged: nor do we intend or will that this be hereafter, on other occaſions, drawn into a cuſtom, to their prejudice in future. Moreover, from each townſhip, at the ſame day, ye are to cauſe to come eight, or ſix, or four at leaſt, according to the magnitude of the townſhip, of the better and more reſpectable foot, well armed with competent arms, viz. lances, bows, arrows, ſwords, baliſts, and hatchets, with which ye are to cauſe them to be provided, at the expence of the community, out of the forty days' allowance. Out of cities alſo, caſtles, and boroughs, where there is the greater number of men, according to the magnitude of each and their ability, you are not to omit to ſend, in the manner aforeſaid, men as well foot as horſe, as you ſhall judge expedient, well weighing the nature of the buſineſs. Nor let any one allege the approaching time of harveſt, or any other domeſtic employment; ſeeing it is better and ſafer to be a little hurt in goods, with the ſecurity of perſon, than with the total loſs of lands and goods by the impious hands of thoſe who thirſt for our blood, and who, if they prevail, will ſpare neither age nor ſex, to be conſigned to the puniſhment of a cruel death. This, therefore, our command you are to cauſe to be publiſhed throughout your country, and in form aforeſaid to charge each perſon, that, as they love our honour and that of our country, and their own lives, and as they would avoid the perpetual diſheriſon of themſelves and their heirs, they would haſten to equip themſelves as bravely and ably as they can; ſo that, all excuſe being omitted, they come, at the lateſt, on the Lord's day aforeſaid, to us at the place aforeſaid; being to know, that, if we ſhall find any deſpiſers of our commands, or negligent therein, we ſhall bear heavily againſt the perſons and goods of ſuch, as of perſons who have no concern to prevent us and our realm from being delivered up to confuſion and perpetual diſheriſon. Witneſs the king at St. Paul's the ſixth day of July."

Moreover, on the 9th of July, the king, by his writ to the good and reſpectable men of Len, Yarmouth, Donwich, Orford, Ipſwich, and all other cities, boroughs, and towns, upon the coaſts of Suffolk, wills them to be obedient to the directions of Hugh le Deſpencer, the juſticiar, in ſecuring the coaſts of thoſe countries, whom he had ſent to them for that purpoſe[4].

The king, who ſome time before had, by the counſel of his barons, forbidden every perſon, upon pain of life and limbs, from bearing arms, or going about the country with horſe and arms[5], without his ſpecial licence, did on the 6th of July relax that order, by his letters patent, with reſpect to the earl of Leiceſter, on account of the great number of hoſtages and priſoners which the earl had about him[6].

"On the 9th of Auguſt, the king wrote to the ſeveral ſhire-reeves, to make proclamation in their counties, that all, who were commanded to be at London on the Sunday after the feaſt of St. Peter ad vincula with their horſe and arms and other force, ſhould march thither in all haſte both by night and day, under pain of loſing all their lands, tenements, and goods, and danger of life and limb. And if, within three or four days after proclamation made, they did not march, then he was to take and detain them in priſon until farther orders, and out of the profits of their lands, tenements, and goods, to ſend as many armed men as they would maintain[7]."

Theſe vigorous preparations ſeem to have fully anſwered the purpoſe of thoſe who were charged with the ſafety of the nation.

"Such a prodigious force, conſtituted of horſe and foot, was then exhibited upon Barham-down, that the whole kingdom was not thought able to furniſh it. The king, by the counſel of his barons, iſſued his commands by his letters patent throughout all the counties of England, that all the ſea-coaſts of England ſhould be defended by a copious army againſt the enemies coming from foreign parts. The queen's prodigious army, having in it many dukes and counts, rendezvouſed at Bruges in Flanders, near which, in the port of Dam, ſhe had likewiſe provided a very numerous and ſtrong fleet for conveying them acroſs the Channel. Theſe foreigners threatened every day to come over, and boaſted of what they would do, as if very eager for battle. The Engliſh on this ſide the water panted for their approach; and the people of the Cinque-ports, whom the earl of Leiceſter had gained over to his ſide, conſtructed a multitude of ſhips of war, and went to ſea in them, that they might engage the enemy in the briny deep. At length this great army of mercenaries, willing to lay hold of ſome good pretence for eſcaping the dangers of battle, and ſeeing the queen's finances entirely exhauſted, at the queen's deſire diſperſed, and went to their reſpective homes; and the queen herſelf, with great ſorrow and confuſion, was induced to go back again into France. If her army had once got a footing in England, it was doubted by many people, whether they would not have ſubdued the whole kingdom; and the nation conſidered it as a ſignal inſtance of divine favour, that ſuch a formidable project came to nothing[1]."

---

[1] Rymer, p. 796.

[2] Brady's Appendix, N° 217.

[3] Such armies of requiſition were agreeable to the Anglo-Saxon conſtitution. The pureſt ſpecies of freehold then known was thane-land or land in alodio. And this was liable to the trinoda neceſſitas—"Thaini lex eſt, ut ſit dignus rectitudine teſtamenti ſui, & ut tria faciat pro terrâ ſuâ, viz. expeditionem, burgbotam, & brugbotam." Leges Athelſtani. Nor were the lands given for ever to pious and charitable uſes meant to be excuſed. M. Paris, ſpeaking of the Anglo-Saxon kings upon their converſion to Chriſtianity, writes thus:—"Nec adeò libertati dederunt hujuſmodi, quin tria ſibi reſervarent ſemper propter publicam regni utilitatem, viz. expeditionem, pontis & arcis reparationem, ut per ea reſiſterent hoſtium incurſionibus." M. Paris, anno 1244. The military ſervice, annexed to thane-land, has been unaccountably confounded with the ſervice of military tenure, a politic inſtitution of William I, but of a nature quite different from the military ſervice of thane-land. "Quia verò non erant adhuc tempore regis Willielmi milites in Angliâ, ſed Threnges, præcepit rex, ut de iis milites fierent ad terram defendendam. Fecit autem Lanfrancus Threngos ſuos milites; monachi verò non fecerunt, ſed de portione ſuâ, (that is, out of the lands appropriate to the prior and monks), decem libratas terræ [i. e. a landed eſtate of 200l. per ann.] dederunt archiepiſcopo, ut per milites ſuos [ſc. feoffatos] terras eorum defenderet, & ut omnia negotia eorum apud curiam Romanam ſuis expenſis expediret. Unde adhuc in totâ terrâ monachorum nullus miles eſt, ſed in terrâ archiepiſcopi." Epiſt. Ganmeri in Appendix Somneri on Gavelkind. King John licenſed Hubert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, to convert the uſe of the gavelkind-land, belonging to the ſee of Canterbury, into military fief. See Lambarde's Perambulation of Kent.

[4] Brady, ex Archivis.

[5] That is, equipped for fighting. Theſe muſt have been liberi homines; or men of landed eſtate; for, no others were ſo arrayed.

[6] Rymer.

[7] Brady.

On the 15th of March, Urban IV. had confirmed by his apoſtolical authority the award of St. Lewis[2].

On the 19th of the ſame month, by his bull directed to the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the abbot of St. Denys in France, he abrogates and annuls all the Oxford proviſions, diſſolves all engagements and confederacies for keeping them, and directs that all impugners of his injunctions be puniſhed by eccleſiaſtical cenſure without appeal.

The biſhop of Sabino, cardinal legate, whom the pope had ordered to England at the deſire of the queen of England, and in concert with the king and queen of France, was empowered to cancel the Oxford ſtatutes, to annul the peace lately made between the king and the barons, to depoſe the biſhops who refuſed to excommunicate the barons, and to diſherit thirty of the latter[3]. He arrived at Boulogne in great pomp, and intended to croſs the ſea. But the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter and Norfolk, Hugh Deſpencer, and others of the great men of England, would not ſuffer him to ſet his foot in England, or interfere in the affairs of this kingdom[4]. Whereupon the legate publicly, in the church of St. Mary of Boulogne ſur mer, on the 17th of Auguſt, admoniſhed and commanded, that they opened a free paſſage for the legate to and from England by the 1ſt of September, upon pain of excommunication and interdict; and, as they had given him manifold cauſe of ſuſpicion, they were injoined to appoint a ſufficient ſecurity for his perſonal ſafety in the execution of his commiſſion. The barons were alſo required by the legate to ſet at liberty the lords Edward and Henry of Almaine, who, he ſtates, were detained under the colour of a certain reference to ſix arbitrators, but not accepted by theſe arbitrators, and by three of them expreſſly, by their letters patent, refuſed. He required the barons likewiſe, by his legatine authority, to abjure the Oxford ſtatutes, and all others whatever which gave ſtrength to them, by the time mentioned, in the place aſſigned for that purpoſe at Gravelinge, before the legate or his ſubſtitute[5].

It ought to be obſerved, in honour of the earl of Leiceſter, that he ſtudied, by all poſſible means, to obtain a permanent reconciliation, if it could be effected with ſafety to the rights of the people and the general good. The plan of agreement, which the community of the realm had, with the aſſent of the king and lord Edward, unanimouſly approved in the late parliament of London, ſeems not to give the content that was expected. Another plan, therefore, was adopted before the end of the ſummer, as appears from the following inſtrument:

"The king of England, Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, Gilbert de Clare, earl of Glouceſter and Hertford, John Fitz-John, John de Burgh ſenior, William de Monte Caniſio, Henry de Haſtinges, Gilbert de Gaunt, and the other barons and great men of England, to all the faithful of Chriſt, greeting in the Lord[6]. Whereas, upon the late perils of war in England, a certain ordinance or form of peace, with our will and aſſent, and the unanimous will and aſſent of the prelates and whole community of the realm, was commenced by deliberate advice; which form of peace we have cauſed to be preſented to the lord king of France, and which, we believe, will be ſeaſonable and convenient to us and our realm of England; and ſome men, as we have underſtood, not fully underſtanding the exact ſtate of the caſe, alleging the ſaid ordinance or form of peace to be inſufficient, were not ſatisfied concerning ſome of the articles therein contained; we, being willing to ſubmit to any trouble and pain for promoting, as we are in duty bound, the peace and tranquillity of the ſaid realm, to the end that our juſtice and the truth of the caſe may be made known and fully underſtood by every perſon, do give the full power to the venerable father, Henry biſhop of London, and the noble man Hugh le Deſpenſer, juſticiar of England, and the noblemen Charles count of Anjou, brother of the king of France, and to the abbot of Bec, of inſpecting and examining the form of the ordinance or of the peace aforeſaid, of adding thereto or taking therefrom, and of amending, (if they judge any thing to need amendment, addition or ſubtraction,) and of providing all manner of ſecurity which to them ſhall ſeem good, and of obſerving firmly all thoſe things which they ſhall think fit to order and eſtabliſh. And we all and ſingular the things, which they, for the emendation and obſervation of the ſaid peace, ſhall ordain, will have for ratified and accepted, by ſubjecting ourſelves to the juriſdiction and coercion of the venerable father, Guy biſhop of Sabino, legate of the apoſtolic ſee; that he, by ſentence of excommunication and all kind of eccleſiaſtical cenſure, us all and each may compel, if perchance we ſhall be found to gainſay the aforeſaid ordinance in any thing. And, if the aforeſaid count of Anjou ſhall not be preſent, or will not take upon himſelf that buſineſs, we will that the lord Simon de Claremont, the lord de Neel, or the lord Peter de Chamberleng, in the place of the ſaid count be ſubſtituted. But, if the aforeſaid four in any article of the peace aforeſaid be diſcordant, let it be determined by the judgement of the greater part of them. And, if equal numbers be diſcordant, we will, that the venerable father, archbiſhop of Rouen, be aſſociated to them, and what, by the greater part of them, ſhall be agreed to and ordained be firmly obſerved. But we will not that it be lawful for them any thing to ſay, ordain, or eſtabliſh, concerning the emendation of the ordinance or of the peace aforeſaid, whereby the kingdom of England may be ruled, except by the natives thereof; nor the cuſtody of the caſtles, or any bailiwic, in the aforeſaid kingdom, may be committed to any but natives and perſons of approved fidelity. We will alſo by all manner of means, that the peace between us, the king of England and the aforeſaid earl of Leiceſter, concerning perſonal and ſpecial complaints, queſtions, and diſputes, (which we have againſt the ſaid earl, and he againſt us, and concerning which we have referred ourſelves to the king of France,) be done and aſſured, before the aforeſaid peace or ordinance be finally completed. In teſtimony whereof, to this writing we, the king of England, the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, John William Henry, and Egidius, for us, and the barons and the community of the kingdom of England, have put our ſeals[7]. Dated at Canterbury on Thurſday after the feaſt of the Nativity of the bleſſed Virgin, A. D. 1264."

---

[1] M. Weſtm. [2] Rymer. [3] Dunſtable. [4] Wykes. Rymer. Dunſtable. M. Weſtm.

[5] Th. Wykes mentions only the biſhops of London, Wincheſter, Worceſter, and Chicheſter, who, he ſays, were the foremoſt friends of the barons. [6] Rymer, p. 796.

[7] For us and the barons and the community of the kingdom of England have put our ſeals. To the famous letter ſent to the pope A. D. 1258, about Athelmar biſhop of Winton, by the community of England, ten of the grandees ſubſcribe their names and put their ſeals vice totius communitatis Angliæ. The tota communitas Angliæ were the earls, barons, grandees, and others of the realm of England, as the letter itſelf ſtates. See M. Paris. Let the reader obſerve, that, on theſe occaſions, theſe ſignatures were not in teſtimonium, but as parties. And ſo neceſſary were they deemed, that, if a grandee could not attend the parliament, he was ſometimes deſired to ſend his ſeal to confirm the acts done therein. Thus Warin de Monte Caniſio (i. e. Munchenſey), being one of the diſcontented barons then at variance with the king, received notice (ſee Clauſ. 46 Hen. III), that, in caſe he did not perſonally repair to court (as divers others then did), to ratify the accord then made between that king and them, he might ſend his ſeal for the better confirmation thereof. Dugdale's Baronage, p 561.

Of the ſame date we have two following inſtruments:

" The king of England to all, &c.

Know your univerſity, that we ordain and conſtitute the venerable fathers W. of Worceſter and John of Winton, biſhops, and the noble man Peter de Montfort, our ſolemn proctors and meſſengers, giving to them the power of treating in the preſence of the magnificent prince lord Lewis, by the grace of God the illuſtrious king of France, and the venerable father Guy, biſhop of Sabino, legate of the apoſtolic ſee, or one of them, concerning the reformation of the ſtate of England, and what in this behalf ſhall be provided of accepting and confirming, or of referring hereupon to certain perſons, if they ſhall ſee good, and of making all manner of ſecurity which the quality of the buſineſs requires, and which they ſhall think convenient for us or our ſaid kingdom; giving moreover to the ſaid Peter the power of ſwearing upon our ſoul, that we, whatſoever thoſe three ſhall ſee good to be done in our name in the premiſes, will have for ratified and accepted, by ſubjecting ourſelves to the juriſdiction and coercion of the aforeſaid legate; that he, by the ſentence of excommunication and all kind of eccleſiaſtical cenſure, may compel us to the obſervance of the premiſſes. In teſtimony, &c. Dated at Canterbury on Thurſday aforeſaid, the year aforeſaid."

Another inſtrument of the ſame tenor is ſubjoined, except that it has the name of Richard de Mepham, archdeacon of Oxford, among the king's proctors and meſſengers, after the name of Peter de Montfort.

Like letters of the ſame date were iſſued in the name of the counts and barons for themſelves and the community aforeſaid; to which they fixed their ſeals. Likewiſe the form of peace above written was ſigned with the king's ſeal, and delivered to the meſſengers aforeſaid.

" The king to Guido biſhop of Sabino, legate of the apoſtolic ſee: Seeing our beloved and faithful Peter de Montfort, one of our counſellors, a zealot of truth, peace, and tranquillity, we diſpatch to your preſence for certain affairs of ours, touching the reformation of peace and of the tranquillity of the realm, to be laid before you vivâ voce, to whom concerning theſe things ye may give full belief; we requeſt your fraternity, that you would tranſmit your letters with all haſte to Dover, for ſafe and ſecure conduct in coming to you, tarrying with you, and going elſewhere. Witneſs the king at Canterbury, the 24th of September."

I do not find, that theſe commiſſions and negotiations produced any effect; nor does it ſeem clear, that any thing was done in conſequence thereof.

The barons refuſing to give the legate the free paſſage or ſecurity he required, he publicly pronounced a ſecond time, on the 19th of October, the ſentences of excommunication and interdict, including expreſſly the earls of Leiceſter, Glouceſter, and Norfolk, the citizens of London, and the inhabitants of the Cinque-ports[1].

When the legate found he could not get into England, he cited the biſhops of London, Lincoln, Worceſter, Saliſbury, Cheſter, Chicheſter, and the Bath, and ſome other elects of inferior degree, to appear before him at Boulogne[2]. As ſoon as the rumour of theſe citations reached their ears, they uſed their beſt endeavours to obey them[3].

The ſeveral parties, whoſe perſons were excommunicated and their lands interdicted by the legate, maintained that theſe ſentences were contrary to juſtice, and therefore, upon ſtrong and good grounds, made a ſolemn appeal to the pope, to a general council, to the Supreme Judge of heaven and earth.

The whole clergy of England, aſſembled in council on the 19th of October, joined in this appeal[4].

While the biſhops were at Boulogne, ſome diſtinguiſhed envoys, as well of the king of France as of the king of England, particularly Peter Cameratius, a nobleman of France, and H. of Almaine, landed at that town, where they were handled very roughly by the townſmen, and nine Engliſhmen killed; nor was any reſpect paid to the Frenchmen, on account of their coming under the guidance of the others.

And now all the maritime country, and all Gaul even to the Alps, at the inſtigation of the king of France and of Peter count of Savoy, and his brothers Boniface, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the biſhop elect of Lyons, and the other noble relations of the queen of England and the other part of Europe, viz. Bretagne, Gaſcogne, and Spain, were inflamed with rage and indignation againſt the barons for their oppoſition to king Henry[5]. The noble count Charles of Anjou, however, between whom and the earl of Leiceſter there was a ſworn friendſhip, continued firm to his engagements[6].

The marchers, again breaking the peace, recommenced hoſtilities towards the decline of the year, according to cuſtom. They now traverſed the country on each ſide the Severn with their army, accuſtomed to the practices of plunder and rapine, terrifying the natives wherever they came to ſuch a degree, that, to preſerve their perſons and properties, they were obliged to fly to the churches, and erect dwellings in the burial-places. The marchers and their partizans eſtabliſhed themſelves throughout the country from Briſtol to Cheſter and elſewhere, and kept what they acquired in the name of the king and lord Edward. And Robert de Walerand and Warin de Baſſinbourne, the keepers of Briſtol, reaching Walinford caſtle with an armed band early in the morning, made an attack upon it, hoping to deliver Richard king of the Romans and lord Edward from their confinement in that place; but their attempt proved abortive; for, the Caſtellans, being ſoon alarmed, gave them a repulſe. Robert de Walerand and Warin de Baſſinbourne had depended upon the help of the marchers, who were advancing towards them, but returned upon hearing at Perſhore of the diſappointment at Walingford. The earl of Leiceſter, incenſed at their rebellion and repeated breaches of faith, took the king with him to Oxford, where a great council was held upon the courſe to be taken to put an end to theſe commotions. He had before ſummoned the marchers to come to parliament at Oxford, and ſtand by the judgement of their peers; but they were afraid to go, and diſobeyed the ſummons. The king was at this time all compliance with the earl of Leiceſter's advice; and the latter treated Henry, who was little more than an honourable captive, with every outward mark of reſpect and deference.

---

[1] Rymer.

[2] M. Weſtm. Chron. Dunſtable.

[3] According to Thomas Wykes, the biſhops themſelves ſo managed with the barons, that the latter gratified them by not allowing them to attend the legate. He adds, that the biſhops of Lincoln, London, and Winton, thinking better of it, did go over about the 8th of September with the juſticiar and a few barons, and that they were charged by the legate to execute the ſentences of excommunication and interdict on their return to England; and that they imbarked with the legatine inſtruments, but were ſtopped in the Channel by the people of the Cinque-ports; and that the latter tore the reſcripts to pieces, and threw them into the ſea, and threatened all with death that ſhould dare to publiſh them. Mat. Weſtm. reports, that the biſhops did attend the legate, and made the appeal before their return, but brought over the interdict againſt their wills; but that, upon their landing at Dover, they were ſearched according to cuſtom; when the interdict being diſcovered, it was ſeized, torn in pieces by the citizens, and thrown into the ſea. In another narrative of theſe affairs, given by M. Weſtm. under the year 1265, the biſhops are reported not to have attended the legate.

[4] Dunſtable.

[5] M. Weſtm. p. 327.

[6] Ib. & Lelandi Collect. This Charles of Anjou ſoon afterwards received the papal grant of the two Sicilies. On the 20th of June, anno 1264, that is, about five or ſix weeks after the battle of Lewes, and when the king was a ſort of captive to the earl of Leiceſter and the barons, he made a formal ſurrender of it. Charles of Anjou took an army into Apulia the next year, beat Manfroi, and eſtabliſhed himſelf in the throne, which has been enjoyed by his poſterity under that grant to the preſent time.

The lord king, hearing of the outrages and conqueſts of the marchers, by the advice of the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter and of the other barons, ſent his ſummonitory letters throughout all the counties of England, that all, who owed him military ſervice, ſhould be prepared with horſe and arms at Northampton on the fifteens after the feaſt of St. Martin, to go with him whereſoever he ſhould have occaſion for them.

About the ſame time Robert de Ferrers[1], earl of Derby, taking with him horſe and foot to the amount of twenty thouſand men, marched towards Cheſter. William le Zouche, David the brother of Lewellin, James d'Audley, and many others, met him; but, not daring to engage with the earl, fled. The latter purſued them with his men, and had only one man of his own wounded.

The marchers having declined to attend the parliament held at Oxford, the king, with the earl and the other barons, by common conſent ſet out on their journey towards the Marche, with a prodigious army of knights and other warriors, in order to fight againſt the marchers, as the public enemies of the realm[2]. But, though the king was externally with the barons, yet he and his particular friends about him were ſecretly well-wiſhers to the marchers, whom he conſidered as having kindled the preſent war in behalf of himſelf, who was, as it were, in ward, and of his ſon Edward yet detained in hoſtage; and the battle of Lewes had created the moſt deſperate and rancorous hatred between the royaliſts and baronials. The marchers, though much fewer now than their opponents, broke the bridge, and ſunk boats and other craft acroſs the Severn at Worceſter, and determined to maintain their ground with ſpirit, if the earl of Leiceſter ſhould attempt the paſſage. But theſe meaſures were futile and inſufficient againſt ſo many nobles as were in the baronial army, and particularly againſt the intrepidity and ability of the earl of Leiceſter. Moreover, the marchers had Lewellin in their rear, who was coming forward to attack them. Intimidated by ſo many adverſe circumſtances, they were compelled to accede to terms of peace.

In the mean time, lord Edward was impatient of confinement; and, as he ſaw no other way of putting an end to it but by treating with the barons and making peace with them, he ſubmitted, by neceſſity, to the hard terms that were preſcribed him. It was, therefore, adjudged in parliament, that Roger Mortimer, R. de Clifford, R. de Leiburne, and their accomplices, ſhould evacuate the Iſland of Britain for one year, upon obligation to do no hurt, in the mean time, to the realm or to the barons, upon pain of loſing their reſpective inheritances. And, to make their engagements ſafe and certain, they delivered up to the earl of Leiceſter, to be held in cuſtody, almoſt all the caſtles which were along the Marche, from Briſtol to Cheſter; and this, which was a palatine earldom, by an exchange of lands between lord Edward and the earl, was conferred upon the latter[3].

"It was farther enacted at this parliament of Oxford, that a parliament ſhould be held at London; where they ſhould treat, by common council, about the deliverance of the lord Edward, and for obſerving the ſtatutes, and for ſending juſtices about England to make inqueſt of robberies, and for other things, whereby the ſtate of the realm might be meliorated[4]." The Annaliſt of Dunſtable does not name the place where this parliament was held; but our Records and ſeveral circumſtances ſhew it was at Worceſter.

This war between the king and his barons was attended by an innumerable train of evils. While each perſon was buſied in defending his caſtle, he committed depredations in his neighbourhood, laying waſte the fields, and taking the cattle for the ſupport of his caſtle. Nor was reſpect paid to churches or depoſitories of the dead. Even the houſes of the pooreſt ruſtics were rummaged and ſtripped to the taking away of their very bedding. And, although the earl of Leiceſter commanded, under pain of decapitation, that no one ſhould preſume to enter holy church or any cemetery to rob the ſame, his care was attended with very little effect; nor could the biſhops and abbots or any religious go from one townſhip to another, but they were plundered by theſe banditti[5].

The inhabitants[6] of the Cinque ports committed great outrages in the Channel, plundering and ſometimes murdering ſuch as fell in their way. Theſe violences hindered merchants from bringing goods, as uſual, to England. And the price of imported commodities was prodigiouſly enhanced, and a great ſcarcity enſued. The wine, which uſually fetched forty ſhillings, was now ſold for ten marcs; in like manner the wax, which might be bought before for the ſame ſum of forty ſhillings, was ſold for eight marcs; and a pound of pepper, which uſed to be purchaſed at ſixpence, was now ſold for three ſhillings; ſalt, iron, ſteel, cloths, and almoſt all ſaleable goods, were very ſcarce and much wanted; nor could the inhabitants of the realm tranſport their own wares. From the joint operation of theſe cauſes the land muſt be ſoon deſtitute of money and commodities. The earl of Leiceſter endeavoured to ſooth the minds of the people, by telling them they could live upon the commodities of England without the aſſiſtance of foreign countries. Many, therefore, out of complaiſance to the earl, that they might ſeem contented with the productions of England, contented themſelves with white clothing, and diſdained to wear coloured garments[7].

About the feaſt of St. Simon and Jude, it was provided by the council of great men, that three biſhops ſhould be choſen, who ſhould have full power to aſſeſs the damages, and make ſatisfaction for all loſſes, received by eccleſiaſtics during the late troubles; and that, if any refuſed to ſtand to their judgement, they were to be excommunicated: theſe biſhops were likewiſe to keep in their hands, and receive the profits of, all benefices of ſuch foreigners as had been baniſhed the kingdom, and were to keep the ſame till the ſettlement of a more firm peace could be made.

---

[1] Robert de Ferrers earl of Derby, ſon of William de Ferrers earl of Derby by his ſecond wife Margaret, daughter and coheir of Roger de Quinci earl of Wincheſter. The firſt wife of this William earl of Derby was Sybilla, one of the daughters and coheirs of William Mareſchal earl of Pembroke, by whom he had ſeven daughters, who all married men of rank. Robert de Ferrers was born about the year 1240, and loſt his father A. D. 1254. When he was nine years old, he had betrothed, at Weſtminſter, Mary, aged ſeven years, niece of king Henry III. and daughter of the latter's uterine brother, the count of Engouleſme and la Marche. Being in his minority at the time of his father's deceaſe, the queen and Peter of Savoy gave ſix thouſand marcs for the cuſtody of his lands until he ſhould come of full age. In the year 1260, he performed his homage to king Henry, and received the ſeiſin of his land, which amounted to 3000l. per annum. The fine caſtle of Tutbury and Needwood foreſt were parts of his poſſeſſions, and his chief reſidence; and he had moſt of the land forming South Lancaſhire, called in Domeſday the land between Ribble and Merſey, which he governed by his own officers. He ſided with the barons firſt, and then with the king; but was ſteady to neither. Lord Edward and this young earl of Derby made devaſtations upon each other's lands with particular acrimony, as if there was ſome perſonal hoſtility between them. There was no perſon in the kingdom of whom Edward was ſo much afraid as of this young earl. Chron. Rob. de Glouceſt. Dugdale. Ann. Mon. Burton.

[2] M. Weſtm.

[3] Ib. I do not find, however, that theſe ceſſions were ever actually made.

[4] Dunſtable.

[5] Contin. M. Pariſii.

[6] Wykes.

[7] This ſhews, that the art of dying wool was not then known in England. Walter Hemingford, and Henry de Knyghton who tranſcribes the former in this paſſage, reports the following as one of the Oxford ſtatutes:—"Statuerunt inſuper, quòd lanæ terræ operarentur in Angliâ, nec alienigenis venderentur; & quòd omnes uterentur pannis laneis infra limites terræ operatis, nec nimis pretioſas veſtes quærerent." Th. Wykes, a violent declaimer againſt the Montforts and the barons, among the tranſactions of the year 1264 ſubſequent to the battle of Lewes, relates, that Henry de Montfort ſeized all the wool that was taken by Engliſh and foreign merchants to Engliſh ports, in order to be exported, and applied it to his own uſe, to gratify his covetouſneſs. No author but Wykes mentions this fact. If an ordinance was made againſt the exportation of Engliſh wool, as Walter Hemingford affirms, Henry de Montfort, who was warden of the Cinque-ports, might lawfully ſeize ſuch as was brought for exportation, and perhaps have a right to it by virtue of his office. But we do not know enough of the diſpoſition of Henry de Montfort to tell, whether he was likely to diſgrace his knightly character by ſuch an act of rapacity, or not.

Among the things done at this parliament at Worceſter was a freſh ratification of the ſtatute of Marlborough, which we may ſuppoſe had been lately either cancelled or diſregarded. It ſeems to have been a ſtatute of great utility to the middling order of landed gentry; and, probably from a regard to their intereſt, the earl of Leiceſter was ſolicitous for its preſervation. That no perſon thenceforward might affect ignorance of its contents, or deem the conſtitutions and proviſions of it only verbal, and that theſe conſtitutions and proviſions might all and each be fully executed, the king, by the advice of his prelates and great men, firmly injoined by his letters patent, that the ſaid proviſions and conſtitutions ſhould be publiſhed every month in the counties, hundreds, wapentaks, and even in the courts of the barons, and that they ſhould thenceforth be firmly obſerved for the utility of the whole community of England. And, if any perſons ſhould preſume to go againſt theſe proviſions and conſtitutions, the king willed, that they ſhould by his ſheriffs, as the deſpiſers of his command and as tranſgreſſors of the ſaid proviſions and conſtitutions, be grievouſly puniſhed. And that, if the ſheriffs were not ſufficient for this, the names of the impugners were to be returned to the king, as well as thoſe of ſuch ſheriffs as were negligent therein, that to both might be done according to law. It was witneſſed by the king at Worceſter, the 13th of December, the 49th year of his reign[1].

But the moſt remarkable incident of this parliament of Worceſter was the improved mode then adopted, and which was admired as a pattern for ſucceeding times of forming the common council of the realm. It had been always the maxim of Simon de Montfort, to confine the executive power within the limits of the law, and oblige the king in all his acts of ſtate to have the ſanction of his lieges, in greater or leſs number, according to the occaſion. The preſent emergence was great; and, if the meaſure in queſtion originated with him, as may be reaſonably ſuppoſed, it is a fair inference from his principles and general conduct, that his intention in this ample ſummons to the common council was to take the ſenſe of all the libres hommes of the kingdom on the critical ſtate of public affairs. So large a common council ſeems never to have been convened before. And yet, in the formation of this, no violence was offered to the conſtitution, but every thing done in ſtrict conformity to it. All baronies held of the king in capite as of his crown, whether lay or eccleſiaſtic, rendered the proprietors or frank tenants thereof obliged to give the king, in quality of chief lord, counſel and aid, when duly called for. Of this deſcription were not only the temporalties of the biſhops, but alſo of inferior church dignitaries; ſome of whom had conſequently been ſummoned to councils on other occaſions. Of this there can be no doubt; but, whether all or ſo many any of them had ever been ſummoned before ſeems a doubt. And the preſumption is, that few only had on former occaſions been ſelected. The communities of counties, we find, had ſent their delegates to common councils on ſeveral occaſions; and their right to be an integral part thereof admits of no queſtion. No ſubſidy, no ſtatute, no act of government implying innovation, could bind them without their own concurrence; and they had always been a conſtituent and allowed part of the regnum. If any thing hindered their being conſulted on affairs of government in the early Anglo-Norman age, it was, that theſe aids were ſeldom required, the old cuſtoms of England being ſeldom infringed by ſtatute law; and probably the expence and inconvenience of convening delegates from all the communities of counties throughout England might be conſidered as a ſtrong objection to ſuch an aſſemblage of delegates, and make it more convenient for the communities of counties to receive new ſtatutes, and allow them at their ſeveral county courts. But, be that as it will, the ſummoning of county delegates to the common council was no more than a politic regulation to render the mode of exerciſing an eſtabliſhed right more convenient for all parties.

On the 14th of December, the king iſſued the following writ, directed to the archbiſhop of York, and the biſhops of Durham and Carliſle, likewiſe to ten abbots, nine priors, and the dean of York[2]:

"Henry, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitain, to - - - - - -, greeting.

"Whereas, after the grievous dangers of the late commotions in our realm, our moſt beloved ſon Edward, our firſt-born, for aſſuring peace in our realm and confirming the ſame, was delivered as an hoſtage; and now, bleſſed God! the aforeſaid commotion being appeaſed, for providing wholeſomly for the delivering of the ſame, and for confirming and totally completing the full ſafety and tranquillity of peace, to the honour of God and the utility of our realm, which we, without your advice and that of our prelates and great men, will not to diſpatch, ſeeing it behoves us to confer with the ſame:

"We command you, beſeeching in the faith and love whereby ye are bound to us, that, all excuſe laid aſide, and other affairs put by, ye be with us at London on the octaves of St. Hilary next coming; together with us and our aforeſaid prelates and great men, whom we have cauſed to be ſummoned to the ſame place, concerning the premiſſes about to treat and give counſel. And this ye muſt on no account omit, as ye love us and our honour, and yours and the common tranquillity of our realm."

In like manner precepts were directed to ten biſhops and four deans.

In form aforeſaid, on the 24th of December, the king then at Wodeſtock iſſued mandates to 64 abbots, 36 priors, and to the maſter of the milice of the Temple in England[3].

---

[1] Tyrrhel's App. p. 33.

[2] Rymer.

[3] If a perſon was infeoffed of lands and tenements by grant of the crown, he ſtood obliged to perform the ſervice incident to the grant (and in all grants of this kind ſomething was reſerved under the name of ſervice; for, the king could not alienate the patrimony of the crown without the pretext, at leaſt, of equivalent ſervices). Deaneries, abbeys, and priories of royal foundation, having been endowed out of the royal demeſne, were conſidered as held of the king in capite, that is, as the perſon from whom their ſeveral tenements were derived, and to whom the ſervices charged upon them were due. The moſt honourable ſervices of this ſort were an obligation, on the part of the grantees, to give their lord the king advice in his parliament and common council of the realm, upon legal ſummons, and afford him pecuniary aſſiſtance in his neceſſities, if they judged the occaſion fitting. This was called the ſervice of barony. It followed, that, if a perſon held nothing of the king in capite, no ſuch ſervice was due. According to theſe principles, it was for the intereſt of the king to multiply, as much as poſſible, his tenants by barony. And accordingly it was not uncommon to cite perſons to parliament on pretence of their holding by barony, when they did not. In ſuch caſes they were to make out that they held their eſtates by no ſuch tenure. And it ſeems to be an allowed maxim—"Si nihil teneat de rege in capite" (meaning, I ſuppoſe, by barony; for, there were innumerable inferior tenants in capite, who could not be ſuppoſed to have any ſeat in the parliament), "non citandus ad parliamentum." See Selden's Titles, p. 723, & ſeq. It is a remarkable circumſtance in theſe numerous ſummonſes, that all the abbots and priors there cited do not ſeem to have held of the king in capite nor by barony. In this number we ſometimes find the abbot of Leiceſter, whoſe chief lord, in quality of founder of his abbey, was the earl of Leiceſter, and who, therefore, ought not to have been ſummoned. The citation, therefore, of the abbot of Leiceſter I conceive to be an overſight; and it may be imputed to the blunder of clercs who made theſe liſts, or to the hurry and confuſion of the time. In conſequence, however, partly at leaſt, of this precedent, certain abbots of Leiceſter were afterwards ſummoned in like manner to parliament, on the ground of their holding of the king in capite by barony. In the 26th year of Edward III, the then abbot, being cited, ſhewed the hardſhip and illegality of the ſummons, and obtained a patent of perpetual exemption on the ground of his holding nothing of the king in capite. In the patent, notice is taken of theſe famous ſummonſes of the 49th of Henry III. in the following words: "Nec aliquis predeceſſorum ſuorum [ſc. abbatum Leiceſtriæ] ante quadrageſimum nonum annum dicti proavi noſtri, poſt foriſfacturam

Item, in form aforeſaid, command was given by the king at Wodeſtock, on the 24th of December, to the earls and others underwritten, viz.

To the earl of Leiceſter,
Glouceſter,
Norfolk and mareſchal of England,
Oxford,
Derby;
To Ralph de Camoys,
Roger de St. John,
Hugh le Deſpencer, juſticiar of England,
John Fitz John,
William de Munchenſy,
Nicholas de Segrave,
John de Veſcy,
Ralph Baſſett de Drayton,
Henry de Haſtings,
Geoffry de Lucy,
Robert de Ros,
John de Eyvill,
Adam of Newmarket,
Walter de Colvill,
William de Marmyun,
Roger Bertram,
Ralph Baſſet of Sapcot,
Gilbert de Gaunt [1].

Item, it was commanded to each ſheriff throughout England, that they cauſed to come to the king at London, on the octaves aforeſaid, in form aforeſaid, TWO KNIGHTS out of the more reſpectable and ſage knights of each county.

Item, in form aforeſaid, it was written to the citizens of York, to the citizens of London, and to the other boroughs of England, that they ſhould ſend, in form aforeſaid, two out of the more reſpectable and ſage of their reſpective citizens and burgeſſes [2].

Item,

---

foriſfacturam prædicti Simonis de Monteforti (quo anno omnes abbates & priores regni noſtri Angliæ ad parliamentum ejuſdem proavi noſtri hinc tentum voluntariè ſummoniti fuerunt)." Voluntarius is ſometimes uſed by authors of thoſe times in a good ſenſe; thus, "Voluntariè & liberalitèr dedit ſubſidium regi." Thorpe's Regiſtrum Roffenſe, p. 73. But oftener in a bad one: "Leges autem Dei voluntariis conſuetudinibus obrui videbam." Eadmeri Hiſt. fol. 43. Again: "Non tam ſimplex rectitudo, quàm voluntariæ conſuetudines obtendebantur." Ib. "Voluntariâ interpretatione reſtringentes." Rymeri Fœdera, tom. I, p. 471. "Stimulatus igitur & voluntarius." M. Paris, p. 701. It ſeems in the Record to denote, that this common council was called by Simon de Montfort after the earl's delinquency and the condemnation of all his acts, through his own perverſe will and obſtinacy. The deſcendants of Henry III. had no moderate hatred towards Simon de Montfort.

[1] It has been ſaid by a party-writer, but without authority, that Montfort ſent ſummonſes only to a few barons who were of his own faction. It has been noticed as an extraordinary thing, that at the Oxford parliament, A. D. 1258, there were above an hundred barons. But we never find the barons in any other parliament very numerous. Dugdale's Summonitiones Parliamentariæ will ſhew how few they were in the reign of Edward I. and reigns ſubſequent. See alſo Brady on Burgs, in Appendix, N° 13. It ſeems to have been the cuſtom of that age not to ſummon any barons, who were not in a ſituation to attend, from diſtance, infirmity, or any other incapacity. But probably one cauſe, why ſo few earls and barons were ſummoned to this council, was the captivity, delinquency, and hoſtility, of a very large number of them. One thing, that rendered perſonal attendance leſs neceſſary, was the power every one had of appointing his procurator.

[2] This is ſaid by many of our diplomatic writers to be the firſt inſtance of the delegates of burgs being ſummoned as a conſtituent part of the common councils of England. Surely they are wrong. If there was any thing new in the thing, it is a wonder it ſhould come from Simon de Montfort, ſo ſtaunch a conſtitutionaliſt and ſo ſtrong an advocate for the Magna Carta. It is alſo no leſs a wonder that, if there were any thing new and ſingular in the caſe, no coeval writer or record ſhould have remarked the innovation; for, this common council is deſcribed in the ordinary language of ſuch meetings. That cities and certain burgs enjoyed great liberties, by preſcriptive rights, before the Conqueſt, probably ſome of them from the domination of the Romans in Britain, ſeems unqueſtionable. The chief part of theſe rights was, that ſuch city or burg was allowed to hold of the king in capite, to pay an annual and fixed tribute to the king in quality of its lord, to be exempt for ever from all taxation (which was a badge of ſervitude), and to be governed by its own cuſtoms, and have its magiſtrates choſen out of its community by the freemen thereof. In Anglo-Saxon language burg only tranſlated civitas; and each denoted a town of privilege, with ſome ſort of fortification about it for its defence. By degrees burgs of this deſcription multiplied, and ſome towns obtained charters of freedom; the lords of ſuch places, whether the king or any inferior perſon, finding that by granting the privilege of burgage to his tenants within ſuch his town or manor, in conſideration of a fee-firm or perpetual rent, in lieu of all his rights within the ſame, was better for him than keeping it in his own hands. Burgs of this ſort had ſtill, however, a farther ſtep to take, before they could conſider themſelves as fully emancipated; that was, to obtain a charter from the king, confirming and enlarging their privileges, and engaging him to warrant their franchiſes, by admitting the burg to be held of him in capite. Then ſuch burgs partook of the liberties of antient cities. Both the lord thereof and the king had warranted the burgage rights, and could not, therefore, infringe them but by tyranny. Uſually however it was towns of which the king was lord that roſe to burgs, and tenure of the king in capite. As all free burgs (in which term I comprehend cities) enjoyed the ſame eſſential privileges, one had as much right to ſend its delegates to the common council as another. And, if all were not alike ſummoned, the reaſon muſt be either a criminal omiſſion on the part of thoſe who ſhould have ſummoned them, or a neglect of ſuch burgs to ſend their delegates, to ſave expence; which ſeems to have ſet very heavy upon poor burgs; as I believe it would now, were all the burgs of England to elect and ſend ſome of their co-burgeſſes to act for them as their proctors or delegates, or, if you like it better, their repreſentatives. And yet ſuch expence would be unavoidable, upon the favourite idea of ſome people, in favour of a fair and complete repreſentation. Whether all the burgs of England ſent delegates to the common council by virtue of this ſummons does not appear; but I ſuſpect that then, as in after-times, ſuch were excuſed as choſe rather to involve their fortune promiſcuouſly with the reſt of the nation than be at the expence and trouble of chuſing and paying delegates. Although this might be the firſt inſtance of a formal ſummons of all the burgs of England to ſend delegates to the common council; yet that long before this time the order of burgeſſes was a part of the common council is evident from many circumſtances. No ſtatute, made by what authority ſoever, could operate within any burg, unleſs ſuch burg conſented to it; the privileges of the burg, guaranteed by law and charter, not allowing any power whatever to meddle with its cuſtoms or liberties. In lieu of all ſervices whatever, it ſtood obliged to pay its fee-firm; it was, therefore, exempt from all farther demands. Statutes, therefore, to be binding, muſt have the concurrence of the burgs, wherein they were to be valid, either by the votes of delegates in common council, or by aſſent of the community of ſuch burgs given in the burgs themſelves. And this I do not find to have been the caſe; and therefore I infer that, although but few of them might be ſummoned to common councils, yet virtually their whole body was preſent, and, in ſtrictneſs of law, all had the ſame right to be ſummoned, all burgs participating of equal privileges. Let the intelligent reader duly weigh the following fact: In a parliament of the 8th of Edward II. a petition was preferred by the burgeſſes of St. Albans, of which the Records give this account.—"Ad petitionem burgenſium villæ de Sancto Albano ſuggerentium regi, quòd licèt ipſi teneant prædictam villam de rege in capite, & ipſi, ſicut cæteri burgenſes regni, ad parliamenta regis, cùm ea ſummoniri contigerit, per duos comburgenſes ſuos venire debeant, prout totis retroactis temporibus venire conſueverunt, pro omnibus ſerviciis regi faciendis *, quæ quidem ſervicia iidem burgenſes & anteceſſores ſui burgenſes villæ prædictæ tam tempore regis Edwardi, nuper regis Angliæ, patris regis & progenitorum ſuorum, quàm tempore regis nunc, ſemper ante inſtans parliamentum, ut præmittitur, præſtiterunt. Nomina quoque burgenſium, ſic pro dictâ villâ ad parliamenta regis venientium, in rotulis cancellariæ ſemper irrotulata fuerunt. Nihilominùs vicecomes regis comitatûs Hertfordiæ, ad procurationem & favorem abbatis de Sancto Albano & ejus conſilium, burgenſes prædictos præmunire, ſeu nomina eorum, prout ad ipſum pertinuit, retornare, ut ipſi ſervitium ſuum prædictum facere poſſent, penitus recuſavit, in contemptum regis & burgenſium prædictorum præjudicium & exheredationis periculum manifeſtum. Super quo petunt remedium opportunum.—Reſponſum eſt per conſilium,

* Pro omnibus ſervitiis regi faciendis. That is, if I can underſtand it, in full diſcharge of all ſervices due to the king for the burgage-franchiſe of St. Alban. Moſt burgs held of their lords by fee-firm. But St. Albans owed no other ſervice to its lord but ſending two of its burgeſſes to the king's parliaments, when they happened to be ſummoned. Could ſuch language as that of the petition have been uſed, if burgs had never before ſent delegates to the parliaments? Mr. Madox aſſerts, and he has been incautiouſly followed by Mr. Hume, (ſee his Hiſtory in Edw. I.) that there was no ſuch tenure in England as that of holding by attendance in parliament inſtead of all other ſervice. But were not all the great fiefs of the crown held by this ſervice? Nothing was ſo common as for tenants to hold by the ſervice of ſuit at their lord's court, in lieu of all ſervices. Why might not the burgeſſes of St. Albans then hold of their lord by the ſervice of ſuit of court in the king's court of parliament? How otherwiſe could they be concerned in the acts of ſuch parliaments? Upon any other ſuppoſition, where was the freedom of the burg?

Item, in form aforeſaid, it was commanded to the barons and good men of the Cinque-ports.

Theſe things being finiſhed, the king went to his fine palace at Wodeſtock to celebrate his Chriſtmas; and the earl of Leiceſter, for the ſame purpoſe, repaired to his caſtle of Kenilworth. Every thing now had a favourable appearance for the earl of Leiceſter. He was ſaid to have in his own ſuite at leaſt an hundred and forty ſtipendiary knights, beſides an innumerable multitude of others, who belonged to his army, and were devoted to his ſervice. And now all England, except the remote parts of the North which yet conſpired againſt him at the inſtigation of the king of Scotland and John de Bailliol, adhered and ſubmitted to him. All things were ordered by the earl of Leiceſter; all the king's caſtles put under his charge, as were the extenſive lands of the king of the Romans in Cornwall and Devonſhire. The king was now little more than a ſhadow, though in the 50th year of his reign[1].

In the midſt however of this apparent greatneſs, it is obvious that the earl of Leiceſter's ſituation was by no means enviable. It is true, he had the king, as it were, an honourable priſoner, and pliant in doing whatever Montfort required. But, as all he did in his preſent ſituation might ſeem to be the effect of force put upon his will, it might be queſtioned whether he would think himſelf bound to perform any of his engagements, or whether any of his friends would hold any thing he did for valid. The ſame obſervation is in a great degree applicable to lord Edward. The earl, therefore, muſt have had the mortification to think that, when they got their liberty, they would cancel all their engagements, and take adequate revenge upon him. At the ſame time, what could the earl do with ſuch priſoners? To depoſe the king ſeems to have made no part of his ſcheme. Probably his gratitude and conſcience revolted at the idea. And, if he had depoſed him, the expedient might have been perilous and even unſucceſsful. But, if ſucceſsful, Edward had received the fealty of the nation in quality of the king's heir apparent. To ſet him aſide would be a dangerous experiment. And even then would be left Edmund, king Henry's ſecond ſon, as likewiſe Richard king of the Romans, and Henry of Almaine. On the other ſide, if he releaſed his priſoners gratuitouſly, all the barriers he had erected againſt deſpotiſm, and the miſchievous abuſe of power, would be deſtroyed; and probably himſelf and family be exterminated by the malice of thoſe whom he had oppoſed. In ſuch a criſis, one can ſcarcely conceive any expedient ſo honourable to himſelf, and ſo beneficial to his country, as to collect the free orders of the nation, in the faireſt and fulleſt manner, according to the ſpirit of the conſtitution, and leave to them the conſideration of what could be done moſt effectually for the good of the ſtate in its preſent alarming criſis.

On the 21ſt of January, A. D. 1265, the king held his colloquy or parliament with his great men, purſuant to the late ſummonſes[2].

On the 15th of February the king's writs were iſſued, directing that the two knights, returned by each county, ſhould be paid by the community of each county their reaſonable expences for going to the ſaid parliament, and ſtaying there to treat with the king and his council about the delivery of lord Edward, and taking ſecurity for the ſame, and other arduous affairs of the realm[3].

On Monday, the 16th of February, the king iſſued the following letters patent:

"The king to his beloved and faithful Simon de Montfort earl of Leiceſter, Gilbert de Clare earl of Glouceſter, Robert de Veer earl of Oxford, Hugh le Deſpenſer juſticiar of England, Thomas de Clare, Peter de Montfort, Humphrey de Bohun, Simon de Montfort ſon of the earl of Leiceſter, John de Veſcy, Henry de Haſtengs, William de Monte Caniſio, Ralph Baſſet of Drayton, John de Eynil, Nicholas de Segrave, John Giffard, Geoffry de Lucy, Robert de Munteny, and the other knights, and others, about to meet, on this Tueſday inſtant, in carnis-privio at Dunſtable, to tournament there.

"We command you, in the faith and homage and love whereby ye are bound to us, ſtraitly forbidding, upon the forfeiture of all the lands and tenements which ye hold in our realm, ye by no means preſume to tourney without our ſpecial licence. And, becauſe on Thurſday[4] next, on the morrow of Aſh-Wedneſday, concerning the ſetting free of our eldeſt ſon Edward, we will have a final treaty, we again command you, firmly injoining that, all other affairs laid aſide, ye be with us on the Thurſday aforeſaid, about to treat together with us, and impart your counſel, leſt the retardation of the ſetting him free, by your delay and abſence, ought or may be deſervedly imputed to you; which ye ought not to be willing to be. And this, as ye love us and our honour and your own, and the common tranquillity of our realm, and the deliverance of our ſaid ſon, ye will by no means omit[4]."

On the 7th of March the mayor and aldermen of London renewed their oath of fealty to the king in perſon; and on the Sunday following all the males within the city, of twelve years old, took the ſame oath before the aldermen of their ſeveral wards[5].

In the parliament juſt mentioned ſtatutes were made for ſetting lord Edward at liberty upon certain conditions, for pardoning and protecting the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter and all their partizans for all that they had done in the late tumults againſt the king and lord Edward; for the better ſupport of the two charters, the ſtatute of Marleborough, and ſuch parts of the Oxford proviſions as had not been repealed; for maintaining order and peace and legal government through the dominions of and belonging to England. The greateſt difficulty was with lord Edward. He ſolemnly, however, ſwore to ſupport the things required and enacted. And the ſame were put into the form of a charter, and made known throughout the realm by the king's letters patent. This inſtrument bears date the 8th of March, and is in old French. This is the ſubſtance of it:

"As lord Edward, eldeſt ſon of our lord the king of England, and lord Henry, ſon of the king of Almaine, by the will of our lord the king and their own, were made hoſtages until the peace of England ſhould be well affirmed and aſſured; it is agreed, for maintaining the peace of the land, and for the deliverance

---

'Scrutentur rotuli, &c. de cancellariâ, ſi temporibus progenitorum regis burgenſes prædicti ſolebant venire, vel non.' Et hinc fiat eis ſuper eis juſticia, vocatis evocandis, ſi neceſſe fuerit." Rot. Parl. 8 Edw. II. n. 233. See Madox Eſch. vol. I. p. 359.

This Record is a complete confutation of their aſſertion, who maintain that the communities of burgs had no delegates in the common councils of the nation, till Simon de Montfort was pleaſed factiouſly and illegally to beſtow that honour. Probably many burgs loſt their delegation in the common council through machinations ſimilar to thoſe of the abbot of St. Albans. In Domeſday we find the burg of St. Albans among the temporalities of the abbot of that place. And Hiſtory ſhews it was the property of that abbey long before the Conqueſt. It ſeems, nevertheleſs, to have been a Britiſh city from very antient times, and to have had the king for its lord, and to have firſt held of him in capite, and then been aſſigned to the abbot. But this aſſignment did not leſſen its privileges, which the king could not diminiſh by any grant. The abbot, therefore, could only take to himſelf the ſervices reſerved to the king. See this ſubject learnedly and largely inveſtigated in Thorpe's Regiſtrum Roffenſe, beginning at p. 70. The Record is extremely curious.

[1] M. Weſtm.

[2] Clauſ. Rot. 49 Hen. III. m. 10. dorſo, in Brady's Introduction, p. 140.

[3] As the knights of ſhires, and, as may be inferred, the commiſſioners of privileged towns, who were in this parliament according to the late writs of ſummons, ſeem to have been diſmiſſed from their attendance on the 15th of February, it muſt be ſuppoſed, that they had already done their part in the various matters for which they were convened, or appointed proctors to act for them. The great expence, incurred by the communities of counties and burgs by the attendance of their delegates in parliaments, ſeems to be the only reaſon why ſuch delegates were ſo ſeldom ſummoned and ſo ſoon releaſed. And hence we may account for many poor burgs ſending no delegates at all; which was undoubtedly the caſe.

[4] Rymer, tom. I. p. 806.

[5] Tyrrel, from City Annals, in MS.

of the aforeſaid lord Edward, and of lord Henry, between our lord the king and the barons of the land[1], that the ordinance, which was provided at London by common accord of the prelates and great men of the land who were there [about the feaſt of St. John] in the month of June, in the 48th year of the reign of our lord the king, be firmly kept and maintained in the form that was provided, which is this—' For the reformation,' &c. [as before].

“ And, that this ordinance be better guarded, our lord the king is bound in duty to command, and lord Edward to conſent, and by their letters patent to require of the great men and of the community of the land, the ſame letters patent to remain in every county[2], that they firmly hold this ordinance.

“ Moreover, it is agreed, that neither our lord the king nor lord Edward do let or aggrieve the earl of Leiceſter or the earl of Glouceſter, or any of their friends, or the people of London or of the Cinque-ports, or any that belong to either in any place where they may be, on account of the things which any of them has done in time of the late troubles, nor do them any damage, nor procure or cauſe it to be done by their bailiffs. And if our lord the king or lord Edward ſhould will to go againſt the peace and the ordinance aforeſaid, or the earls of Leiceſter or Glouceſter or any of their party ſhould aggrieve by reaſon of the things aforeſaid, that the great men and community of the land be againſt them, to aggrieve them to the utmoſt of their power, nor be obedient to them in any thing, but do to them in all reſpects as if they were not bound to them, until the things be amended and redreſſed, as is aboveſaid, according to the form of the ordinance and peace aforeſaid. Neverthleſs that, when the things ſhall be ſo amended and redreſſed, as above ſaid, that all of them ſhall be obedient to them and bound, as before. And our lord the king and lord Edward have ſworn upon the holy Evangeliſts, and the great men and the community of the realm ſhall ſwear, by command of our lord the king, and with the aſſent and deſire of lord Edward, and by their letters patent, to keep and do the things as aforeſaid. And if it ſhould be that any one ſhall go againſt the ſame, or aid the king or lord Edward or any other, contrary to the things above-written, and ſhall be of the ſame attainted, by award of the counſel of our lord the king and of the great men of the land, he ſhall be taken or baniſhed from the realm of England, and be diſinherited, he and his heirs in remainder; and concerning their lands, be it done according to the laws and uſages of the country, as of the lands of thoſe who are attainted of felony. And this thing is firmly eſtabliſhed by the king and lord Edward, and by the community of the land; and concerning this let there be the letters patent of all thoſe who have been ſuſpected to be againſt this buſineſs, that they conſent that it be ſo done, if they go contrary hereunto in any point whatſoever.

“ And, beſides this, the great charters of the common franchiſes and of the foreſts ſhall be duly kept and obſerved, and all thoſe excommunicated who ſhall gainſay the ſame; and the articles, which were on that behalf provided by accord of our lord the king and of the great men of the land, which the king lately, when he was at Worceſter, ſent throughout all the counties under his ſeal, be firmly kept; and hereunto have ſworn the king and lord Edward; and all the juſtices, ſheriffs, bailiffs, of the land, and the bailiffs of our lord the king and of lord Edward, and all others, to whomſoever they ſhall belong, ſhall take the ſame oath; ſo that none ſhall be bound to obey them before they have taken it. And, if any one go contrary thereto, let him be grievouſly puniſhed by award of the king, ſaving the privileges that may belong to the clergy. And, for as much as our lord the king before the battle of Lewes had defied many of the good people of his land, and put them out of his fealty, and they, by their good will, were deſirous to acknowledge him as their lord; it is agreed, that all ſuch as were his homagers and were defied do their homage to him anew, according to the uſage of the country; ſaved this and expreſſly excepted, that, if he is willed to go againſt the things aboveſaid, they be not bound to him by this homage, until the things be amended and redreſſed, as above ſaid. And thoſe, who were bound to their fealty, and were defied before the battle aboveſaid, ſhall alſo do their fealty afreſh to him in like manner as is ſaid of the homages.

“ Moreover, lord Edward ſhall have his houſehold and his counſellors of the people of the country, who are not ſuſpected, and this by agreement of the aforeſaid council of our lord the king; and, if he do contrary hereunto, that he incur the penalty aforeſaid——that all the people of the kingdom be againſt him, to annoy and grieve him to the utmoſt of their power, as is ſaid above in the articles aboveſaid. And if any ſhould tarry in his ſervice without their conſent, let him be grievouſly puniſhed by award of the ſaid council of our lord the king.

“ Moreover, that our lord the king and lord Edward do not upon any account bring foreigners into the kingdom, unleſs it be by conſent of the council of the king and of other great men of the land.

“ Moreover, that lord Edward, for better maintaining the peace of the realm, abide in England, to wit, where the writ of the king runs, without going out therefrom before Eaſter, three years, unleſs it be by conſent of the prelates and of the great men of the land. And if any ſtrangers from this time forward come into the land without the conſent of the aforeſaid council of our lord the king and of the other great men of the land, that then he would do his utmoſt to ſubdue them[3]; and if he would not do ſo, or if he ſhould go out of the kingdom, or where the king's writ did not run in England, without conſent of the council and of the great men aboveſaid, that all his lands, ſeigniories, dignities, and honours, which he had or could have in the name of heritage or in any other manner, be [4] barred, and he and his heirs diſinherited of the things aforeſaid for evermore; ſo that neither in theſe lands, nor in the other things aboveſaid, he be able to challenge any manner of right from the time that he ſhall go openly againſt his promiſe aforeſaid. Moreover, for the better guarding of this thing, the caſtles of our lord the king and of lord Edward, which are in the hands of [5] ſuſpected perſons, in whomſoever ſuch caſtles be, be committed, by conſent of the ſaid council of our lord the king, to others, who ſhall well and lawfully keep the ſame for them our lord the king and lord Edward, and for the ſafety of the land. Beſides this, our lord the king and lord Edward ſhall cauſe the things aboveſaid to be aſſured, in the beſt manner they can deviſe, throughout Ireland, throughout Gaſcogne, by the king of Scotland, and throughout all the lands ſubject to the king of England[6]. Beſides this, our lord the king and lord Edward have promiſed and ſworn, that they will aſſiſt to carry on the appeals, which are made by the prelates, counts, and barons, and the community of the lands, of certain griefs that have been done them, and to defend the land and the peace thereof againſt all who would do it any ill will or damage, and to aggrieve to the utmoſt of their power all ſuch as ſhall go againſt the peace of the land. Beſides this, lord Edward ſhall borrow of our lord the king five of his caſtles, which the great men of the land ſhall hold for five years as a ſecurity for the peace, and for lord Edward's doing the things aboveſaid: alſo, that neither the king nor lord Edward ſhall enter therein within the ſaid term. And the wardens, who ſhall be appointed to keep theſe caſtles, ſhall ſwear to obſerve this injunction by command of the king. And a reaſonable allowance ſhall be made to the wardens of theſe caſtles at the king's charge, whereby the ſaid caſtles may be ſafely kept for the time aboveſaid. And, if it happen that they commit any offence, let be done to them what ſhall ſeem good, by award of the aforeſaid council of our lord the king and of the prelates and of the great men of the land; and at the end of the term aforeſaid, if the peace be well kept, then theſe five caſtles ſhall be delivered, by the aforeſaid council of the king, to good men [1], who ſhall keep the ſame well and lawfully for their lord the king and his heirs, and for the ſafety of the realm.

---

[1] Barons of the land, that is, unqueſtionably, equivalent to lords and commons of the preſent day.

[2] Namely, among the Records of each county.

[3] Tyrrel.

[4] Fr. Encorues.'

[5] Fr. De gens ſoſpecenus; perhaps obnoxious and diſaffected perſons is nearer the meaning of the French. Soſpecenus is certainly more than ſuſpected.

[6] We ſhould ſay now the crown of England. But in the feudal ages we ſeldom find the king mentioned in quality of prince or chief magiſtrate, but of lord, a purely feudal term.

" Beſides this, our lord the king and lord Edward, and the great men and the community of the land, ſhall put themſelves under the juriſdiction of the prelates and clergy, that the latter may excommunicate all ſuch as ſhall go againſt and obſtruct the things aforeſaid and the peace of the land. And the king and lord Edward, and all in general, have renounced all manner of papal privilegia purchaſed or to be purchaſed; nor will they themſelves purchaſe, or procure to be purchaſed by any other, any abſolution of the oath aforeſaid, nor will receive nor uſe them, unleſs the pope ſhould ſo direct by his own particular authority.

" Beſides this it is agreed, that, ſaving all the things above-written, all the other articles and ordinances, which were provided heretofore by the king and his council and the great men of the land, which are to the honour of God and of the holy church, to the fealty of the king and for the good of the realm, be firmly kept. And all the things aboveſaid, lawfully to do and to hold, our lord the king and lord Edward his ſon have ſworn upon the holy Evangeliſts.

" Moreover, lord Edward ſhall give up to the earl of Leiceſter in fee the caſtle and town of Cheſter, with all the appurtenances, and the New-caſtle under Line, with the appurtenances, and the caſtle of Pec, with the appurtenances, in ſuch manner as he holds or ought to hold the ſame, without any retention whatever [2], for other lands, which the earl ſhall give up in fee to the full value of the earldom of Cheſter aforeſaid, or as nearly ſo as poſſible, out of the lands which the earl has in divers parts of England. And lord Edward has delivered to the aforeſaid earl the caſtle of Briſtol, with the town and appurtenances, to hold in his hand in tenance till theſe things be done; ſo that he anſwer for the reaſonable iſſues, ſaving what he ſhall reaſonably employ in the keeping and ſuſtaining of the caſtle. And this thing ought to be done within one year. And, if the things be done between lord Edward and the earl within the time mentioned, the earl ſhall render to lord Edward the caſtle and the town, with the appurtenances; and then lord Edward ſhall give up the caſtle in hoſtage, without conſent of the council of the king and of the good men of the land, for the term of nine years, in the ſame form as is ſaid of the other five caſtles, which he borrows of the king; ſaving to every one his right, particularly the claim of the earl of Glouceſter in the right of the caſtle of Briſtol and the town, with the appurtenances; ſo that, by reaſon of the hoſtage, the earl of Glouceſter be not ouſted or prevented of his right, whenſoever he ſhall be pleaſed to put it at iſſue. In witneſs of theſe things, our lord the king and lord Edward his ſon, lord Henry ſon of the king of Almaine, and, at their requeſt, for greater teſtimony, the honourable fathers, by the grace of God, Henry of London, Walter of Worceſter, John of Wincheſter, Robert of Durham, Hugh of Ely, Walter of Sareſbiry, Roger of Coventry and of Licheſeud, Stephen of Chicheſter, Walter of Bangor, William of Landaff, biſhops; friers Roger of Veer, prior of the hoſpital of Jeruſalem in England, frier Ambolard, maſter of the chivalry of the Temple in England, and the mayor and the community of London, have put their ſeal to this writing, which was made, granted, and agreed to, in the form aboveſaid, at Weſtminſter at the parliament of London, the eighth day of the month of March, in the year of the Incarnation of our Lord MCCLXIV; that is to ſay, the Wedneſday of the vigil of St. Gregory, in the year of the Incarnation aboveſaid."

On the 10th of March, the king by his letters patent acquitted Henry of Montfort of his charge of lord Edward and lord Henry of Almaine, who were ſet free by the common aſſent and accord of the prelates and great men of the land [3].

On the ſame day, lord Edward by his own ſeparate act ratified the above form of peace, and indemnified the barons and their adherents [4]. His charter is of the ſame tenor, mutatis mutandis, as that of his father of the 14th of March, which will be laid before the reader.

The deliverance of lord Edward was performed with great ſolemnity. It was done in the great hall at Weſtminſter, where Edward was delivered to the king in the preſence of a great aſſembly. After he had ſealed the above form of agreement, which being then publicly read, the biſhops in their robes ſolemnly excommunicated all thoſe who ſhould preſume to act againſt the charters of liberties and the foreſts; and then, for the better ſecuring of the ſaid agreement, lord Henry did of his own accord proffer himſelf to remain in the cuſtody of Henry of Montfort as an hoſtage to the firſt of Auguſt, till it were ſeen how lord Edward would carry himſelf in reſpect of the foreigners, who were ſtill expected to invade the kingdom.

The king, by his letters patent, made over the caſtles of Dover, Scarborough, Nottingham, Bamburgh, and Corf, for five years, in hoſtage to the barons, according to the article in the form of peace [5].

On the 14th of March, the king confirmed the late form of peace, and indemnified the barons and their adherents by the following charter, which was ſent into all the counties of England [6]:

" Henry, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitaine, to all of the county of - - - - - - -, greeting. Whereas, on account of the late hoſtilities in our realm, with the unanimous aſſent and concurrence of ourſelf, of Edward our eldeſt ſon, of the prelates, earls, barons, and of the community of our realm, for the peace of our realm (for the ſecurity of which the ſaid Edward, and Henry ſon of the king of Almaine, our nephew, were given as hoſtages), it was unanimouſly provided, that a certain ordinance, with the unanimous aſſent of us, of our prelates, earls, and barons, and community of our realm aforeſaid, concerning the ſtate of ourſelf and of our realm, made at London in the month of June in the 48th year of our reign, ſhould be inviolably obſerved: We will your univerſity to know, that we have ſworn, upon the holy Evangeliſts, the ſaid ordinance and peace and tranquillity of the realm to obſerve bonâ fide, and to contravene the ſame in no wiſe; this being in the ſaid oath ſpecially and expreſſly ſubjoined, that, by reaſon of any thing done in the time of the late diſturbances or war, will we not burden or accuſe any one of thoſe or of their party, whom we defied as enemies, viz. the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, and others adhering to them, and our barons or citizens of London or of the Cinque-ports; nor will we to any one of the aforeſaid perſons do any damage, or procure it to be done; nor will we in any wiſe permit it to be done by our bailiffs.

---

[1] That is, men of rank and fortune and good character.

[2] The earl of Leiceſter gave up in exchange the manors of Melburn Gunthorp, the Soke of Ludham, Eſingwand, Kingiſhee, Euerle, Colingburne, Cumpton, Sepwyk, Bere, Hungerford, and Chauton. Vide Rot. Pat. 49 Hen. III. m. 16. & Tyrrel's Appendix. Theſe manors were beſtowed by the king on his ſon Edward, the 8th of May following, to hold them during pleaſure. We cannot aſcertain at this time the value of theſe manors, or of the earldom of Cheſter. But the former muſt have been very conſiderable, and, if not equal to the princely earldom of Cheſter, yet might balance it with the great arrear of debt due to the earl of Leiceſter ever ſince his government in Gaſcogne. Some authors, attached to the royal party, have accuſed the earl of Leiceſter of profligate rapacity in getting for himſelf and heirs the magnificent earldom of Cheſter during the depreſſion of the royal family. But the exchange does not ſeem to have been made to enrich or aggrandize the earl of Leiceſter, but to break the power of lord Edward in the Marches of Wales, where lay his principal ſtrength. And, after what has been ſaid, the reader will not be ſurprized at finding a ſtrong miſtruſt of lord Edward. It has been too often the maxim of kings to make no conſcience of breaking the moſt ſolemn engagements made to their people. Hence, for the moſt part, their deſpotiſm and ruin.

[3] Brady's Appendix, p. 243. from Pat. Hen. III. 49 anno, m. 91.

[4] Tyrrel's Appendix, p. 36. from City-Annals in MS.

[5] Tyrrel and Brady, from Pat. 49 Hen. III. N° 87.

[6] Tyrrel's Appendix, p. 36. from Pat. Rot. 49 Hen. III. m. 4.

" Moreover we have ſworn, that we will inviolably obſerve all thoſe things, which, for the diſcharge of our ſaid ſon and nephew, have been provided and ſealed with our ſeals, as far as appertaineth to us; and we will cauſe it to be obſerved by others to the beſt of our power; willing and expreſſly conſenting, that, if we or our ſaid ſon Edward againſt the aforeſaid ordinance, our promiſe or oath, (which God forbid!) ſhould preſume to go, or to diſturb the peace and tranquillity of our realm, or, by reaſon of the things lately done in the time of diſturbance or war aforeſaid, to do damage, or cauſe it to be done, to any of the perſons defied as aboveſaid, or to any of their adherents; be it lawful for all perſons of our realm to riſe up againſt us, and to aſſiſt, and to endeavour to their utmoſt in annoying and grieving us; whereto, by this our preſent command, we will that all and each perſon be bound, the fealty and homage made to us notwithſtanding; ſo that they do not regard or obey us in any wiſe, but do all things to aggrieve and hurt us, as if they were not bound to us in any reſpect, until that which ſhall have been infringed and committed, with ſuitable ſatisfaction for the ſame, ſhall be reformed and reſtored to due ſtate, according to the form of the aforeſaid ordinance and of our promiſe or oath; after which they ſhall be regarding and obedient to us as before. And if any other perſon of our realm ſhall preſume to go againſt the things aforeſaid, or to diſturb the peace and tranquillity of our realm; or to us or our ſon Edward, or to any other going againſt the things aforeſaid, or ſhall lend aſſiſtance, counſel, conſent, or aid, againſt the things aforeſaid, or any of them in any wiſe; if the ſame be notorious, or he be convicted thereof by judgement of our council and of the great men of our land, with unanimous aſſent of ourſelf, of our ſon Edward, of the earls, barons, and community of our realm, it is provided and ſtatuted, that his body, if it ſhall be found, be taken; otherwiſe, that he be outlawed from our realm; and, whether he be found or not, he as well as his heirs be diſherited for ever, and his lands and tenements be done unto, as has been accuſtomed to be done, according to the law and cuſtoms of our realm, concerning the lands of thoſe who have been convicted of felony.

" Moreover, with unanimous aſſent and will of us, of our ſon Edward, of the prelates, earls, barons, and of the community of our realm, it is with one voice provided, that the antient charters of common liberties and of the foreſt, to our community [1] by us heretofore granted, (and by us and the pope ſpecially confirmed); againſt the violators of which, at our petition, ſentence of excommunication was heretofore given, and by the Apoſtolic ſee ſpecially confirmed; and alſo all the articles, with common aſſent of us and the great men of our realm, which we lately, while at Worceſter, tranſmitted under our ſeal through each county, be inviolably obſerved for ever; for the obſervance of which, by oath upon the holy Evangeliſts, we have voluntarily bound ourſelf; and will, that all our juſticiars, ſheriffs, and all bailiffs of our realm whatſoever, be bound by the ſame oath; ſo that no one be bound to obey the bailiff of any one whatſoever, until he ſhall perform the ſaid oath. And if any one ſhall preſume againſt the ſaid charters or articles aforeſaid in any wiſe to go, beſides the guilt of perjury and the ſentence of excommunication which he ſhall incur, by determination of our court, he ſhall be grievouſly puniſhed; ſaving in the premiſſes, as is becoming, the privilege of the clergy. And, becauſe we will that all theſe things be firmly and inviolably obſerved, we command, by firmly injoining and ordering your univerſity, that you all and each of the aforeſaid things, as they are above written, do keep, hold, and inviolably obſerve; and to do, hold, and obſerve, all of them you oblige one another, your corporal oath upon the holy Evangeliſts being thereunto given.

" In teſtimony of which thing, our charters and ordinances aboveſaid, with the preſent letters patent, we tranſmit to you under our ſeal, to be ſafely kept in memory of this thing in our counties, under the cuſtody of truſty perſons choſen for this purpoſe; and, that henceforth againſt the charters and ordinances aforeſaid no one in future may pretend ignorance, at leaſt twice in a year in full county-court we command the ſame to be publiſhed; ſo that the firſt publication be made in the next county-court after Eaſter following; and the ſecond in the county-court next after Michaelmas; and ſo henceforth annually.

" Moreover we will, that, ſaved all the things aboveſaid, all the other ordinances and articles, by us and our council hitherto provided, which ſhall be to the honour of God and the church, our fealty and the profit of our realm, be inviolably obſerved and held.

" But, that all and each of the things aforeſaid may remain firm and unſhaken, the reverend fathers the biſhops appointed throughout our realm, at our inſtance, the ſentence of excommunication have fulminated againſt all thoſe who againſt the premiſſes or any part of the premiſſes have knowingly gone, or attempted to go, with effect. To whoſe juriſdiction or coercion, by our ſpontaneous will, as to the premiſſes, we have ſubmitted ourſelves, our privileges obtained or to be obtained, or at the proper motion of the lord pope granted to us, or hereafter to be granted to us in this behalf, purely renouncing, as in our letters made hereupon, remaining in the hands of the ſaid prelates, is more fully contained.

" In teſtimony whereof, we have cauſed theſe our letters to be made patent. Witneſs myſelf at Weſtminſter, the 14th day of March, in the year of our reign forty-nine."

" After this charter follows the writ that was ſent down into all the counties, together with the great charter and the charter of the foreſt; both of which were now again confirmed in the ſame manner and words as in the 9th of this king's reign [2]."

The earl of Leiceſter, Hugh Deſpenſer the chief juſticiar, and John Fitz-John, aſſumed to themſelves the chief management of the king's perſon, and admitted the earl of Glouceſter to a leſs ſhare of power and confidence than the latter was ſatisfied with [3]. And he was upon other accounts diſpleaſed both with the earl of Leiceſter and his ſon. He did not like to ſee the earl take upon himſelf the direction of the whole kingdom; and demanded a larger proportion of the iſſues of the realm, of the ranſom-money for priſoners, and other emoluments, which he thought ought to be divided, according to former agreement, in equal portions between them [4]. In particular, he expected the king of the Romans to be ſent to him [5], as his priſoner, who had eighteen baronies, of which the earl of Leiceſter obtained from the king the cuſtody. The earl of Leiceſter, upon the earl of Glouceſter's demanding this royal captive and ſome other great perſons taken at Lewes, ſent the latter word, that he ought to be contented that he (i. e. the earl of Leiceſter) had ſaved his lands for him at the battle of Lewes, and he refuſed to comply with the earl of Glouceſter's requiſition. The earl of Glouceſter was likewiſe offended with the earl of Leiceſter about the tournament at Dunſtaple[1], and thought himſelf contemptuouſly treated by the young Montforts. Henry of Montfort had cauſed a tournament to be proclaimed at Dunſtable for Tueſday preceding Aſhwedneſday againſt the earl of Glouceſter; to which came the Londoners, and an infinite number of knights and [2] men at arms. The earl of Glouceſter prepared himſelf for this conteſt. But it was forbidden by the king, as mentioned above. And the earl of Leiceſter, when he found out this intended exhibition, reprimanded his ſons for their preſumption with great ſeverity, and commanded them to deſiſt from their project; otherwiſe, he would put them in a place where they ſhould enjoy the benefit neither of the ſun or moon. The earl of Glouceſter, at hearing this, was exceedingly enraged; and many perſons, who had made expenſive preparations for the tournament, were chagrined at the diſappointment, and ſaid in their anger, that it was highly abſurd, that a foreigner, like the earl of Leiceſter, ſhould pretend to govern the whole kingdom of England.

---

[1] In equivalent records it is ſtated, that the great charter was granted to all the freemen of England. Community, therefore, meant all the freemen of England, whether free with reſpect to frank tenement or to burgs; of which they compoſed the ſeveral communities.

[2] Tyrrel's App. p. 36.

[3] M. Weſtm. ad Ann. 1265, 2d Relation.

[4] Continuator M. Pariſii.

[5] Walteri Hemingford Chron.

At this parliament in Lent[3], A. D. 1265, great complaints were brought againſt Robert de Ferrers earl of Derby by the king, for the monſtrous and enormous miſchiefs and burnings he had committed after the battle of Lewes, and before. The king wanted ſentence to be paſſed upon him at the parliament. But the earl of Leiceſter, wiſhing to ſave the earl of Derby, and to appeaſe the king's wrath, took earl Robert, and impriſoned him in the Tower of London.

It had been decreed by the king and great men, that, for the ſecurity of the public peace, and as a condition for enlarging lord Edward, the Marchers ſhould retire for a time limited into Ireland, and by no means return to England, without the aſſent of the new rulers of the kingdom, within the term preſcribed for their abſence. But the Marchers, inſtead of leaving England by the time fixed for their departure, retired into the remote parts of Wales, and ſheltered themſelves in the lands of the earl of Glouceſter, who connived at this infringement of the ſtatute made reſpecting the Marchers. The earl of Leiceſter remonſtrated with the earl of Glouceſter for his inconſiſtency, and accuſed the great men of the realm of the want of ſteadineſs; and ſaid nothing could be ſo fickle, and ſo little to be depended upon, as they were. He charged the earl of Glouceſter with harbouring in his lands the enemies of the public, and began to demand from him, as a ſuſpected perſon, a ſufficient ſecurity for his peaceable behaviour.

The reaſon of the earl of Glouceſter's diſpleaſure againſt the earl of Leiceſter, according to ſome writers, was his envy at Leiceſter's greatneſs. And this is probably the truth. There ſeems, however, to have been a ſerious quarrel between Glouceſter and ſome of the ſons of the earl of Leiceſter, and a battle meditated between them under the diſguiſe of a tournament[4].

The earl of Glouceſter, apprehending that he might ſhare the fate of the earl of Derby, if he ventured his perſon any longer in London, having taken to himſelf no ſmall band of knights, contemptuouſly withdrew from the parliament or meeting of the great men, and betook himſelf to the Weſtern parts, where he might be ſafe[5].

John Giffard likewiſe, about the ſame time, broke with the earl of Leiceſter[6]. Giffard yielded to no knight of England in perſonal proweſs or military ſkill. He was arraigned by the earl of Leiceſter for ſeizing, contrary to the miſe of Lewes, a great many lands, which ſeemed to belong to other great men by right of capture. Giffard ſubmitted to enter into engagements with the earl of Leiceſter to make full reparation for the wrongs he had done, leſt he alſo ſhould fall into Leiceſter's hands. But he ſoon haſtened after the earl of Glouceſter, to whoſe ſuit he belonged, and with whom he was connected by the cloſeſt ties of familiarity and friendſhip.

Lord Edward had ſubmitted to the late form of peace, made between the king and barons, from neceſſity; but meant to break it as ſoon as he could get an opportunity, which he thought would be quickened by a temporary diſſimulation[7].

Richard king of the Romans ſeems at this time to have been a priſoner in Kenilworth caſtle; and the queen continued abroad with her youngeſt ſon Edmund.

"Boniface archbiſhop of Canterbury had been obliged to flee from England to ſave his life, and had now lived in a ſtate of exile more than a year and an half. He had executed the ſentence of excommunication againſt the earl of Leiceſter, and cooperated with his brother Peter of Savoy and the queen in levying an army for invading England and reducing the barons. In the year 1265[8], and month of March, in the preſence of the king of England, with the advice of the nobles and great men, it was enacted, that the venerable father Boniface, by the grace of God archbiſhop of Canterbury, primate of all England, ſhould return to England, to dwell peaceably there, under the following conditions. In the firſt place, it was enacted, that the archbiſhop, on his return, ſhould without heſitation, in form of law, remit the ſentences of excommunication againſt what perſons ſoever promulged on account of the late diſturbance in England; provided nevertheleſs, that thoſe, who ſhould be found to be excommunicated, were ready to make ſatisfaction for the exceſſes by them committed; and for the ſame they were bound to receive the canonical commands of the archbiſhop in form below contained in the next article. Secondly, it is enacted, that, concerning the amends to be made in the name of exceſſes brought upon churches and eccleſiaſtical perſons within the places immediately ſubject to his juriſdiction, the archbiſhop arbitrate with counſel of all or the greater part of his ſuffragans; and, for the arduous affairs touching the Engliſh church and realm for the times to come, he in like manner, after his return, order and diſpoſe with advice of the ſame perſons and of other diſcreet men of the realm. Thirdly, it is enacted, that he bring with him no other foreign clerc, nor retain any other of that deſcription, but for his own private family and perſonal uſe. Fourthly, it is enacted, that other clercs whoſoever, being beneficed in the kingdom of England, and willing to return with the archbiſhop, may ſafely and ſecurely return and abide in their benefices; and are to ſpend their eccleſiaſtical revenues within the realm, as they are bound, carrying nothing out of the realm or ſending it, unleſs a neceſſary caſe and approved by the council of the king require it. Fifthly, it is enacted, that neither the archbiſhop nor the clercs coming with him bring nothing with them by letters, agents, or mandates, or, while they ſtay in England, by themſelves or any other procure any thing to be done, whereby to the king or to any perſons of the realm damage, or danger, or prejudice, may accrue. For the remembering of the premiſes the ſeal of the illuſtrious king of England was annexed. This was done by the whole council."

It does not appear what was the reſult of this act; but the archbiſhop did not return till after the battle of Eveſham.

The earl of Glouceſter having deſerted the earl of Leiceſter, and retired into Wales and joined the Marchers, it was feared, throughout the nation, that the civil war would be revived[9]. To be prepared as much as poſſible againſt it, and to prevent it, if that could be done, the earl of Leiceſter ſet about collecting new forces, and about the 25th of April led his army towards Wales againſt the earl of Glouceſter and the Marchers, who had broken their faith and oath. The king and lord Edward accompanied the earl in this expedition. The army reached Glouceſter; and the earl ſtrengthened that town and caſtle as much as poſſible, becauſe the earl of Glouceſter and John Giffard were at the ſame time in the foreſt of Dene with a very large army, waiting for an opportunity of being revenged upon the earl of Leiceſter and his ſons. While each party was in this ſituation, and about a fortnight after the earl's arrival at Glouceſter, the two earls were apparently reconciled [1], and their differences agreed to be ſettled by arbitration. This was done on Tueſday the 12th of May. The arbitrators were the [2] biſhop of Worceſter, lord Hugh Deſpenſer, lord John Fitz-John, and lord William de Munchenſy.

---

[1] Continuator Mat. Pariſii.

[2] Armatorum; clad in complete armour, and mounted on deſtrers.

[3] Annales Waverleienſes. Th. Wykes.

[4] M. Weſtm. and Wykes.

[5] Th. Wykes, p. 166. Chron. Dunſtable.

[6] Wykes.

[7] Mat. Weſtm.

[8] Rymer, p. 784.

[9] Th. Wykes. Annales Waverleienſes.

For quieting the minds of the people, who were extremely terrified by the danger of a freſh civil war, the king immediately ordered it to be publiſhed throughout the realm, that the two earls were reconciled, and that the tranquillity of the realm would not be again diſturbed [3]. Things being thus happily adjuſted, the earl ſet forward the next day for Hereford, having the king with him. The earl of Glouceſter had laid a ſnare for him, and villanouſly intended to ſeize him on the road; but the earl's ſpies got notice of the deſign, and he made a ſhift with great difficulty to get to Hereford, where he was forced to ſtay till Whitſuntide. While he remained there, the earl of Glouceſter was contriving with the Marchers how to circumvent him, and opened a ſecret correſpondence for getting lord Edward entirely out of his hands. This correſpondence was carried on with the help of Thomas de Clare, brother of the earl of Glouceſter, for whom the earl of Leiceſter had an uncommon eſteem, and whom he gave to lord Edward, who was equally fond of him as his companion and chamberlain. Thomas de Clare was wrought upon by his brother to enter into the views of the latter, and aſſiſt in lord Edward's eſcape; which was effected in the following manner:

The earl of Glouceſter had now made a cloſe friendſhip with lord Roger Mortimer, who had been invariably attached to the royal party, and was the principal man among the Marchers. It was contrived by Glouceſter and Mortimer, that the latter ſhould ſend to lord Edward a deſtrer of uncommon ſwiftneſs, with notice, that he might depend upon his fleetneſs, whenever he had an opportunity of trying him. Edward, having received this horſe, deſired leave of the earl of Leiceſter to be permitted to take a ride without the city under a guard; which was granted him. He mounted ſeveral horſes, and rode them till they were tired, as if he wiſhed only to make trial of their goodneſs. And then, mounting the horſe that Roger de Mortimer had ſent him, he ſet off with Thomas de Clare. Robert de Ros and ſome other perſons about him followed, but were not able to overtake him. They purſued for ſome time, till, ſeeing Roger de Mortimer coming from his caſtle of Wigmore with an armed band, to receive lord Edward, as had been previouſly agreed, they gave up the purſuit, and returned to Hereford. The earl of Leiceſter complained bitterly of the deceit of Thomas de Clare.

The royal party had lately been greatly ſtrengthened by the arrival of the earl of Warren and William of Valence, with a large corps of baliſters and knights, who found means to land in Pembrokeſhire. By this reinforcement and lord Edward's eſcape things began to wear a new aſpect [4]. The day after the latter reached Wigmore caſtle, he had a meeting at Ludlow with the earls of Glouceſter and Warren, and their reſpective partizans. And here they made up all their old differences, entered into new engagements of reciprocal ſupport, and projected their plan of operations. After which they proceeded immediately to the breaking down of the bridges, and deſtroying the craft of the Severn. And now the king's eldeſt ſon was entirely at liberty, and had taken the field; friends appeared for him in all parts; and thoſe, who had been awed into inactivity by the prevalence of the baronials, lifted up their voices and arms in his defence.

John Giffard in particular began to collect ſuch a numerous body of horſe and foot, and ſo much greater than it was conceived poſſible for him to do, that he aſtoniſhed his own partizans, and ſtruck his adverſaries with fear [5].

On the 30th of May [6], the following ſummons was ſent to all the king's tenants in capite; to wit, as well to biſhops, abbots, priors, as to earls, barons, knights, and [7] all others, thoſe only excepted who belonged to the party of the earl of Glouceſter:

"Whereas we, and certain of our great men and our lieges, being in the parts of Hereford, were labouring with the utmoſt of our power to eſtabliſh the tranquillity and peace of thoſe parts, as their condition required; and hoping to have found in our ſon Edward a principal aſſiſtant, and readier than all others to promote this buſineſs; the ſame Edward, on Thurſday in Whitſun-week towards the evening, did ſuddenly and unexpectedly make away from the ſuit of knights, which he had taken with him out of the town of Hereford for the ſake of exerciſe, with two knights and four eſquires privy to his deſign, in contempt of our counſel, and that of our great men and lieges aforeſaid; his intention, as we are informed, being to join John de Warrenne and William de Valence, and their partizans, who lately without our knowledge or conſent, and againſt our peace, landed in Pembrokeſhire, and alſo ſome of the Marchers our rebels and the diſturbers of our peace; that thence he might go to foreign parts, or ſend others thither, who might procure foreigners to be brought over hither through the parts of Pembrokeſhire [8], (it not being in their power to enter the kingdom in any other part,) to the confuſion of us and our kingdom;

"And, becauſe our ſaid rebels, though at preſent they are few in number, might by this means be able to increaſe their power and ſtrength, unleſs their inſolence, before it reach too great an heighth, were quickly repreſſed; we, truſting entirely in the fidelity and conſtancy of you and our other lieges, command you, in the fealty, homage, and love, whereby ye are bound to us, and upon pain of loſing all that you hold in our realm, and upon the obligation of the oath by which all and each perſon of our realm are hereunto ſpecially obliged, and which we will ſhould be firmly kept, ſtraitly injoining, that immediately, upon ſight of theſe letters, all other things being laid aſide, with horſes and arms and all the ſervice due to us, and alſo with all your own poſſe, with all haſte by day and night, ye march to Worceſter; being prepared to go thence in ſtrong force with us againſt our enemies aforeſaid [9]. And this by no means ye are to decline, as ye wiſh to prevent your diſheriſon and ours, and the perpetual confuſion of the realm, and have regard for your own life. Nor are you to allege the ſhortneſs of time for ſummoning the army, becauſe the moſt preſſing neceſſity does not admit the time to be prolonged; leſt, amidſt delays through the arrival of the foreigners whom our ſaid rebels expect, their ſtrength ſhould be augmented, to the deſtruction of us and our realm; who, while they are a few, can eaſily be reduced by us. Witneſs the king, at Hereford, the 30th day of May."

---

[1] Annales Waverleienſes. Chron. Dunſtable. Rymer.

[2] "Circa idem tempus obiit piæ recordationis Walterus de Cantilupo Wigornienſis epiſcopus; raptus, ut ſanè credi poterit, ne videret malos dies, qui tantâ ſanctitatis eminentiâ cæteris præpollebat epiſcopis; quòd, niſi contra juramentum quod domino regi de fidelitate præſtari debuit, imò etiam contra inhibitionem ſedis apoſtolicæ comiti Leiceſtriæ tam familiaritèr & fortitèr adheſiſſet, in catalogo ſanctorum non immeritò fuerit aſcribendus." Wykes, anno 1265.

[3] Waverl. [4] Rymer, p 810. [5] Th. Wykes. [6] Rymer.

[7] We ſeldom hear of the prelates of all England being convened; they were ſo, however, A. D. 1237. See Chron. Dunſtable. And, in the famous year 1213, the biſhops, abbots, priors, and deans, were aſſembled with the barons. M. P. p. 201.

[8] The caſtle of Pembroke was exceedingly ſtrong, and the honour of it, a palatinate, belonging to William of Valence.

[9] This may be called an army of requiſition; and was conſtitutional. See Leges Edw. Conf. & Will. I. Cùm univerſi & ſinguli fideles noſtri intra regnum ſeu poteſtatem noſtram conſtituti, cùm ipſorum ſubſidio indiguerimus, nobis cùm opus fuerit, teneantur.

Lord Edward, having aſſembled a large army, went to Worceſter; which the citizens ſurrendered without reſiſtance. The adjacent towns and boroughs were immediately at his mercy. And, that no way might be left for the earl of Leiceſter to paſs with his army acroſs the Severn, he cauſed the bridge at Worceſter to be broken down, and all the craft to be drawn to ſhore, and holes and fiſſures to be cut in all thoſe places where people were wont to paſs over[1].

Theſe proceedings cauſed the earl of Leiceſter to iſſue the following order; a copy of which was ſent into each county by the king, the earl of Leiceſter, the high juſticiar, Peter of Montfort, Egid de Argentin, and Roger de Saint John[2]:

" The king to the keeper of the peace in the county of - - - - - - -, and to the ſheriff of the ſaid county, greeting. Whereas, between Simon de Montfort earl of Leiceſter, and Gilbert de Clare earl of Glouceſter, a certain miſunderſtanding lately aroſe; which we thought to be quite adjuſted by means of the reference made by them to certain of our lieges, and confirmed both by their oath and writing; on which account, to quiet the hearts of our ſubjects who feared that hereby a new war would be ſtirred up in this our kingdom, through each county of our realm we cauſed our letters to be tranſmitted, containing, among other things, that the ſaid earls were at unity with one another, and good friends; and the ſaid earl of Glouceſter, in utter contempt and violation of his ſaid oath, has adjoined himſelf, againſt our peace, to certain Marchers and others our rebels, and alſo to William de Valence and John de Warrenne, and their partizans, who lately landed in our kingdom; and he has made a cloſe connexion with them;

" And moreover has drawn over to his party, and that of our rebels aforeſaid, Edward our ſon, who, by voluntarily becoming an hoſtage for the peace of the realm, had gained the public eſteem (which by his late unadviſed levity he has totally loſt); and they have traverſed our land in the parts of the Marche in an hoſtile manner, ſeizing certain caſtles and towns, and moving war therein, and perſuading the Marchers aforeſaid and their adherents to do worſe things againſt our peace and our liege people; all theſe things we have have hitherto borne with patience, willing that, their exceſſes and treſpaſſes being clearly ſeen by all men, it might appear to every perſon whatever, that we did not put a very rigorous hand to this buſineſs, till juſtice authorized, and the wrongs done us compelled us thereto.

" And, ſeeing that we cannot longer ſuffer ſo great rebellion, nor ought to do; we command you, in the faith and love by which you are bound to us, firmly injoining, that you would ſtraitly charge all perſons of your county, as they value themſelves and theirs, not to lend to the ſaid Edward or the ſaid earl, or their adherents, any counſel, aid, or favour whatſoever, which may foment the ſaid rebellion. But, as we have, by our letters patent ſent throughout our counties, commanded all men of our realm to be bound by oath to obſerve the ordinance lately made at London againſt the aforeſaid rebels and all other diſturbers of our peace; and that they ſhould riſe powerfully and manifeſtly againſt the tranſgreſſors of the ſaid ordinance, whoſoever they may be, by arreſting their bodies and ſafely keeping them until we otherwiſe command; ye ſhall moreover cauſe to be proclaimed, through your bailiwic, that all, whom we have cauſed to be ſummoned to our aid with horſe and arms againſt the aforeſaid rebels, with all poſſible haſte, do not omit to come to us by Glouceſter, (as their paſſage by Worceſter is interrupted by the breaking up of the bridges and the dangers of the road), as they would avoid the penalties contained in our former letters. And do you ſo behave in the premiſſes, that we may have cauſe for ever to commend your diligence and fidelity. Witneſs the king, at Hereford, the 7th of June."

Moreover, letters of the ſame date were written in the king's name, directed to the mayor, aldermen, ſheriffs, and the whole community of London; wherein the king thanks them for their fidelity and conſtancy to him and his friends, and deſires them to continue therein, and to contribute their utmoſt aſſiſtance to ſuppreſs the rebels, wherever or of what quality ſoever they were[3].

Another inſtrument, dated the day after the former, is equally curious:

" The king to the venerable fathers in Chriſt Henry of London biſhop, and the other biſhops of the province of Canterbury. Whereas between our beloved and faithful Simon de Montfort earl of Leiceſter ſeneſchal of England, and Gilbert de Clare earl of Glouceſter and Hereford, matter of certain diſagreement lately aroſe; which we believing, and with reaſon, if there was any reliance in the faith of man, to be perfectly appeaſed and adjuſted by the reference agreed upon between the parties, and confirmed by oath, did miſtakenly tranſmit throughout the counties of our realm, for pacifying the minds of our ſubjects diſturbed and alarmed with theſe diſſenſions, our letters, containing, among other things, that the earls aforeſaid were reconciled and in concord; but, lo! we relate it with grief, the ſame earl of Glouceſter, who, by reaſon of the homage made to us at the ſame time, we believed, would perſevere more ardently than uſual in faith and devotion, hath joined himſelf to the Marchers and other our rebels, who (by their agreement made when we were at Worceſter for the peace of the realm, with aſſent of the ſaid earl and other great men of our realm) ought to have transferred themſelves long time ago into Ireland, there to remain for a certain time (but which, againſt our peace and their own oath, they have hitherto delayed to do); and hath alſo joined himſelf to William de Valence and earl Warren, and their accomplices, who lately landed in our kingdom, and, traverſing our land in the parts of the Marche in an hoſtile manner, ſeizing caſtles and towns, and moving war againſt our peace, taking the aforeſaid rebels into his confidence, aiding and abetting them, and perſuading them to commit worſe things; though, if he had any regard for his welfare or the oath he has taken, he as well as our other faithful people would be their enemy and adverſary;

" And, beſides this, what cuts our heart in two with grief, the ſaid earl and the other our rebels aforeſaid, by their deceitful perſuaſions, have treacherouſly drawn over our ſon Edward (whom, alas! they found eaſy of belief and of a diſpoſition to be circumvented) to their party, and in breach of his oath, againſt the form with unanimous conſent of us, of our ſon, of our prelates and great men, lately provided at London, and fortified with numerous and teneantur. Rymer, II. p. 220. This obedience, however, was due propter fidei, legalitatis, & fidelitatis, merita, as the Record in Rymer ſtates, without fealty, no allegiance due, or foriſfactum incurred. William I. obliged all the free men of England, whoſe vaſſals or feodaries ſoever they were, to take the oath of liege-homage to him, as their ſovereign or paramount lord. Hence forfeiture of free lands to the king as capital lord. The crime of treaſon was felony. Till theſe feodaries or vaſſals of lords had taken this oath and done this homage, they were the homines or vaſſals of their ſeveral lords, and were called their ſubjects, or ſubditi. In like manner, talliages were on ſome certain occaſions demandable by chief lords of a certain deſcription of their tenants. The towns or manors of king's demeſne were talliageable by him in common with other lord proprietors; but, as king, no talliage demandable. He could only talliage his own demeſnes; and that but in a limited manner, as lord, or chief proprietor. See Bracton.

---

[1] Th. Wykes.

[2] Rymer.

[3] Tyrrel, from Pat. 49 Hen. III. m. 13. n. 54.

weighty penalties, did fraudulently prevail upon him unadviſedly to go away from us and our lieges; and he now continues contumacious with the ſame perſons, and appears as a ſon of rebellion. With ſuch affronts and injuries do theſe perſons diſreſpectfully treat us; and, though by their deeds they prove themſelves to be our enemies and adverſaries, yet they publicly give out, that all they do is for our good, to rouſe the minds of the people. And all theſe things we and our lieges have patiently endured hitherto, from a deſire that, when we purſue meaſures of rigour, it may appear to all mankind we are actuated by juſtice, and provoked by intolerable injuries.

"But whereas, reverend fathers, againſt all who ſhould preſume to diſturb the peace and tranquillity of our realm ſentence of excommunication was formerly iſſued, and by you lately at London ſolemnly and publicly repeated; although, by the aſſiſtance of God, to quaſh the inſolence of our aforeſaid rebels we have ſufficient ſtrength, ſo as not to need begging for other help; nevertheleſs, as it would manifeſtly redound to the ſcandal of the divine name, if the keys of the church were deſpiſed with impunity; we aſk and require of you, that againſt the ſaid rebels, whoſe exceſſes are ſo notorious and public, that they could not be palliated by any tergiverſation, without ſparing high or low, but judging equally the great and the ſmall, ye would publiſh as appertaineth to your office, and all of you in common againſt them all, and each of you in his dioceſe againſt the individuals by name. And, that we may be aſſured that this is really and not fictitiouſly done by you, who ought to be children of light and the ſtaunch friends of truth, ye are to give us information thereof when it ſhall ſuit you. Witneſs the king at Hereford, 8th of June." And this letter was duplicated by the earl of Leiceſter, the juſticiar, Peter of Montfort, Egid. de Argentein, and R. de Saint John.

About the ſame time Edward went and made an attack upon Glouceſter[1]. The earl of Leiceſter a few days before had thrown into that town Robert de Ros, William de Veſci, and ſome other knights and young men of quality to the amount of about three hundred, who thought they ſhould be able to defend the place againſt Edward and his army. The attack was made with ſo much impetuoſity, and by ſo powerful a force, that the city ſurrendered in two or three days. The baronial forces took refuge in the caſtle, and defended it for three weeks, when they were obliged by the want of proviſions to yield it to Edward; which they did upon the following conditions, that all who pleaſed to go out might do it peaceably and ſafely, and go where they liked with horſe and arms, and without damage, only ſwearing that they would not bear arms againſt Edward for a month to come. Having thus gotten the town and caſtle[2], and left a ſufficient force to protect them, he and the earl of Glouceſter croſſed the Severn and marched towards Hereford, where they intended, if poſſible, to take the king and the earl of Leiceſter; and they kept the Severn well guarded, that the earl might not be able to croſs it; and, on the other ſide, the ſea was guarded by the lord Edward and earl of Glouceſter, that the earl of Leiceſter might not eſcape by Briſtol.

The earl of Leiceſter declined ſtaying at Hereford, and retired to Monmouth, which the earl of Glouceſter had lately taken and fortified[3]. But the earl of Leiceſter obliged the garriſon to ſurrender, and levelled the caſtle with the ground.

Before he left Hereford, he concluded a treaty with Lewellin prince of Wales; whereby it was ſtipulated, that Lewellin ſhould be admitted to the king's grace upon payment of thirty thouſand marcs; that king Henry ſhould ſurrender and cancel all the bonds given by Lewellin, or his predeceſſor David, which had been made repugnant to their rights and liberties, and grant to the prince and his heirs all the ſeiſins which they had at the time of giving ſuch bonds. The king likewiſe confirmed to Lewellin the ſovereignty of the great men of Wales together with the principality; and granted to him and his heirs the caſtle of Matill, the hundred of Elleſmer, and the caſtle of Hawardin, with the appurtenances, promiſing at the ſame time to aſſiſt Lewellin in the conqueſt of the other lands and caſtles in the hands of their common enemies, and belonging to the prince of Wales[4].

From Monmouth the king ſent his letters, dated the 28th of June, to Simon de Montfort, keeper of the peace in the counties of Surrey and Suſſex, to Brian de Goitz, keeper of the peace in the counties of Somerſet and Dorſet, and to ſome others, expreſſing his indignation of his ſon's behaviour, and the hoſtile proceedings of him and the earl of Glouceſter and their partizans, and directing them to be reſiſted in all places with ſpeed and ſpirit.

Leiceſter, going on, took poſſeſſion, without reſiſtance, of Newport, a maritime place belonging to the earl of Glouceſter by inheritance[5]. Thence he ſent to Briſtol, which lies over againſt it acroſs the Channel, ordering the people of Briſtol to ſend over to Newport all the ſhips of burden they could get, that he and the king and their army might be conveyed to Briſtol by water. The earl of Glouceſter, diſcovering this, blocked up the entrance of Newport with three galleys full of armed men; who, when the veſſels from Briſtol came near them, attacked them with ſo much impetuoſity, that eleven were taken or ſunk, and the reſt obliged to betake themſelves back to Briſtol. Lord Edward and the earl of Glouceſter, fluſhed with this ſucceſs, raiſed their banners, drew up their forces in order of battle, and attempted to force the bridge, hoping to get into the town and come to a fair battle. The baronials had ſo much the worſt at the bridge, that, to ſave themſelves from farther hazard, they burnt that part of the bridge which was next the town, to keep the enemy out.

Edward's army returning to their caſtles, the earl of Leiceſter left the town in the middle of the night, and retired into the country belonging to the prince of Wales, and ſought the aid of Lewellin, who promiſed the king his aſſiſtance, if the latter would grant him his inheritance and that of his anceſtors; which king Henry complied with. And without delay Lewellin fell immediately upon the lands of the Marchers, and did them infinite miſchief.

Edward had now at his devotion the counties of Hereford, Shrewſbury, Worceſter, Glouceſter, and Cheſhire.

The earl of Leiceſter wiſhed now to get back to London, which he had imprudently deſerted, and to which he now found it difficult to return. His army, who were uſed to bread, could ill brook the loſs of it with their fleſh-meat, which was all they could get in Wales except milk, upon which chiefly that then barbarous nation ſubſiſted. They were therefore very much diſſatisfied with ſtaying in Wales; and returned to Hereford half famiſhed.

In the mean time young Simon de Montfort was employed, by his father's order, in collecting forces both in the North and South to go to his reſcue, and open a paſſage for him towards the capital. He was detained too long in the ſiege of Pevenſey caſtle, belonging to Peter of Savoy, which he was obliged to abandon upon hearing of the need his father had of immediate relief. Leaving Pevenſey, therefore, he went with his army to London, where he aſſembled the barons, and collected about ſixteen bannerets and an infinite number of warriors, and marched with them to Wincheſter[6], where he arrived about the 12th of July, and where he intended to halt; but the citizens refuſed to admit him, and killed one of his people before his face; which ſo incenſed him, that he attacked the city in an hoſtile manner, and took it and pillaged it, killing the Jews, and loading his troops with plunder. With this he and his army marched to Oxford, which received them without oppoſition; and there he ſtayed two days, being on his way to Kenilworth. His army was now very ample, and he was greatly elated with his ſtrength. From Oxford he went on to Kenilworth, and there remained ſix days. Lord Edward, then at Worceſter, being informed of his ſituation, ſent him word that he ſhould come and pay him a viſit[1]. Young Simon de Montfort was overcome with joy at this news, and, with leſs prudence than became him, went with his men out of the caſtle, and waited for lord Edward all night, with infinite fatigue and inconvenience to his men, who towards the morning, being exceedingly wearied, laid themſelves down to reſt in the priory and town, without going into the caſtle. Edward, being informed by a ſpy of the ſituation of the baronial army, quickened his march for Kenilworth, where he arrived early in the morning of the 1ſt of Auguſt, and found the enemy aſleep in the town and priory of Kenilworth. He attacked them in this ſituation, killed a great many of the common people, and took about fifteen eminent bannerets priſoners, whom Edward's people ſtripped of their horſes and arms and every thing they had about them[2]. Young Simon de Montfort made a ſhift to croſs the lake in a boat, and got ſafe to the caſtle. The principal perſons taken priſoners were Robert de Vere earl of Oxford, lord William de Munchanſey, lord Adam of Newmarket, lord Walter de Colevile. Edward returned immediately to Worceſter with his priſoners and his ſpoil. In the mean while, Simon de Montfort left the parts of Hereford, and boldly paſſed the Severn[3] on Sunday the firſt of Auguſt, and ſtopped at Kemſey, a manor belonging to the biſhop of Worceſter, about three miles to the South of Worceſter: there he ſtayed all Monday. His intention was to march towards Kenilworth, and get back to London, to be in readineſs to receive the foreign forces, which were expected to land in England in behalf of the captive king. In his march to Kenilworth, he conceived a hope that he ſhould be able to incloſe lord Edward and the earl of Glouceſter on one ſide, while young Simon de Montfort hemmed them in on the other[4], not knowing the misfortune that had happened at Kenilworth. He arrived at Eveſham on Tueſday morning, where the king and he heard maſs. His wiſh was to go on immediately towards his ſtrong caſtle at Kenilworth; but the king would needs ſtop to dine; but the earl would take no food. Lord Edward, who by this time was got back to Worceſter, being informed of the earl's movements and plan by ſome truſty ſpies, and finding that the earl intended to march on Tueſday for Kenilworth, determined to intercept him. About ſun-ſet, therefore, on Monday evening, he left Worceſter, taking with him all the Marchers and a prodigious multitude of warriors. Knowing very well that the earl of Leiceſter's ſpies ere in his train, in order to deceive them, he gave out that he ſhould go towards Shrewſbury, or Bridgenorth, or Stafford; but, by the time that he computed the ſpies would be got two or three miles from Worceſter, turning his reins, he rode all night towards Eveſham, where he arrived before ſun-riſe, and ſo poſted himſelf as to cut off the earl's progreſs to Kenilworth. To deceive the earl more effectually, as he now advanced towards the former from the North, he diſplayed the banners of young Simon de Montfort, and of the others who were led captive, and quickened his pace to gain Elyn-hill, that he might be firſt in making the attack. Nicholas the earl's barber, a man famous for his knowledge in armorials, ſeeing a multitude of people in arms at a diſtance to the North, told the earl that he ſaw a great body of men in arms, whom he could not diſtinguiſh; but he perceived the banners of the earl's friends. The earl anſwered, "It is my ſon; do not be afraid; but go and view them carefully, leſt we ſhould be intercepted:" for, he had not yet heard what had befallen young Simon at Kenilworth. Nicholas got up into the tower of the abbey where the earl inned, and ſaw then very diſtinctly the banners of the king's ſon on one ſide (who had now taken down the baronial banners and raiſed his own), the banners of the earl of Glouceſter on the other, and the banners of Roger Mortimer on the Weſt. He cried out immediately to the earl—"We are all dead men! for, it is not your ſon as you ſuppoſe; but the king's ſon on one ſide, the earl of Glouceſter on the other, and Roger Mortimer on the third." The earl, thus ſituated, was under a neceſſity of fighting, or of ſurrendering himſelf and his army, or making a precipitate flight. He choſe the firſt, though his forces bore no proportion to thoſe of his enemy. But he gave all perſons leave to depart that deſired it, and adviſed Hugh Deſpenſer, Ralph Baſſet, and ſome others, to flee and reſerve themſelves for better times. But they declared they would not ſurvive him.

---

[1] Th. Wykes.
[2] Annales Waverleienſes.
[3] Continuator Matth. Pariſii.
[4] Rymer, p. 814.
[5] Th. Wykes.
[6] Waverl.

The two armies drew up in a ſpacious field without the town of Eveſham. Lord Edward, who had acquired wiſdom by his misfortune at Lewes, divided his army very judiciouſly into two lines; and, in order to animate others to fight, he himſelf led on the firſt line with a determination to bear, without flinching, the firſt aſſault. The earl of Glouceſter took the command of the other diviſion, intending to give the prince all poſſible ſupport. The earl of Leiceſter, viewing the fine diſpoſition of lord Edward's army, ſaid—"By the arm of St. James, they advance moſt wiſely! but this they learned from me; it is not their own arrangement." He directed all his people to confeſs their ſins, and told them, that ſuch, as were diſpoſed to die for the laws of the land and for righteouſneſs, ſhould prepare for the battle.

"When the earl ſaw the enemy marching rapidly againſt him, and got no tidings whatever of his ſon's advancing to aſſiſt him, he told his ſon Henry that he ſhould certainly die in battle that day. Henry intreated him to make his eſcape by flight; and he, by the grace of God, would ſtand the ſhock of the battle. 'Far be it from me,' returned the father, 'to act in that manner, who am now in the decline of life, and whoſe termination is drawing near, and who am known to be of ſuch illuſtrious origin, and have never been uſed to flinch in battle. But you would do well to decline this dangerous conflict, that you may not periſh in the flower and vigour of youth, but live to ſucceed your father and his noble race in feats of arms; which God grant!' While they were holding this converſation, and neither of them could perſuade the other to recede, the attack commenced on each ſide[5]."

But juſt as the action began, or, according to ſome, before it, all the Welſh deſerted the earl; and many of them were drowned in the river Avon, while they were eager to make their eſcape. The earl compacted his troops into a ſolid circle, thinking that his men, being thus condenſed, would be better able to ſuſtain the cloſe aſſaults of their enemies. But lord Edward, who was ſuperior to fear, with his uſual vehemence made a violent attack in front upon this embodied ſquadron, the trumpets at the ſame time rending the heavens with their dreadful clangor. The earl of Glouceſter at the ſame time moved towards the rear, and extended his diviſion ſo far, that the extremes of the two diviſions met, and the earl of Leiceſter was entirely ſurrounded. Each ſide maintained the conflict with amazing valour; but the conglobated baronials, being violently aſſailed on all ſides, were not a match for their numerous and ſurrounding enemies. Their ſhields were cut to pieces, the ſteely texture of their coats of mail was pierced and torn to ſhivers, and the enemies' ſpears and ſwords were drunk with their blood. The earl of Leiceſter's horſe was ſhot under him, and he fought on foot till he was numbered among the ſlain. His ſon Henry ſhared, at a little diſtance from him, the ſame fate; as did almoſt all the men who compoſed the baronial army. The victory was complete on the ſide of the royaliſts, who loſt only one knight of moderate note, and two eſquires.

---

[1] It was an etiquette among the knights of that age, to give notice to their enemies of the time when they meant to attack them.

[2] Walter Hemingford writes, that this diſcomfiture happened on the 2d of Auguſt. The Annaliſt of Dunſtable places it on the 28th of July. And Thomas Wykes on the 1ſt of Auguſt.

[3] Th. Wykes ſays he paſſed the Severn with all his army in veſſels. The ſecond relation in Matth. Weſtm. makes him do it by fording the river.

[4] Annales Waverleienſes.

[5] Geſta S. Ludovici IX. per W. de Nangis, in Hiſtoriæ Francorum Scriptores apud Du Cheſne, tom. V. It appears from William of Nangis, that the earl of Leiceſter was not forward to engage in the baronial league, which produced the Oxford proviſions. "Accidit autem in illo tempore, quòd rex Angliæ, barones, & prelati, unanimitèr conſentirent in quandam conſtitutionem ad utilitatem reipublicæ, ut dicebant, & illam juramenti robore firmaverunt. Coactus verò dictus Simon eandem conſtitutionem conſimilitèr juramento firmare reſpondit omnibus, quòd, quicquid alii poſtea facerent, nullo modo deinceps, quod petebant ab ipſo, frangeret juramentum. Cùm igitur poſtea rex ipſe, barones, & prælati, præfatum juramentum cum dictâ conſtitutione unanimitèr irritâſſent, & in nihilum revocâſſent, Simonem ad hoc faciendum compellere nitebantur; ſed ipſe, ſicut prædixerat, juramenti dignitatem inviolabilitèr obſervans, propter hoc inter ipſos diſſenſionis & guerræ materiam miniſtravit." Geſta Sancti Ludovici IX. tom. V. p. 372.

"The whole weight of the battle (ſays Will. of Nangis) fell upon the earl of Leiceſter, who was an old and ſhrewd warrior, and ſtood the ſhock like a ſtrong tower. But, ſurrounded by a rampart formed of a few knights, and overborn by multitudes, he fell, and thus terminated an hereditary proweſs, rendered famous by many glorious deeds, by a laudable finiſh. On the other ſide, his ſon Henry, like a man diſtracted at the death of his father, ſuſtained for a time, and maintained the conflict; but at length was taken, and fell into the hands of certain perſons who were deſirous of ſparing his life, when ſome wicked wretches fell on him and ſlew him. His death, it was reported, gave great concern to lord Edward. But Guy, the younger brother, was picked up among the dead, and thought to be ſlain. But by the will of God he ſoon got well; and afterwards avenged his father's death upon certain of his enemies [1]."

The king went out to this battle on the baronial ſide; but, as ſoon as he ſaw his ſon, he joined him [2]. Some ſay, receiving a ſtroke between the ſhoulders, he cried out, "I am Henry of Wincheſter your king; do not kill me!" for, Henry was not of a military turn. Upon hearing his exclamation, lord Adam de Montalt ſpared him; and lord Edward, hearing his father's voice, ran up to him, and committed him to the care of certain of his knights.

In this battle periſhed of the ſuperior ſort, beſides the earl of Leiceſter, lord Hugh Deſpencer, lord Ralph Baſſett, lord Thomas Heſtelel, lord William de Mandeville, lord John Beauchamp, lord Guy de Balliol, lord Roger de Rouce, Peter of Montfort, Walter de Crepinge, William of York, Robert de Tregor, and many other knights, to the amount of one hundred and ſixty, beſides a very large number of young men of quality, who had not yet been adorned with the belt of knighthood [3]. Only about ten or twelve noble perſons ſurvived this battle. The names of the great men who were wounded and taken priſoners were Guy de Montfort ſon of the earl of Leiceſter, John Fitz-John, Henry de Haſtengs, Humphry de Bohun junior, John de Veſcy, Peter of Montfort junior, and Nicholas de Segrave.

Thus this magnificent earl (ſays the Continuator of Matthew Paris) finiſhed his labours, who gave not only his things but himſelf to relieve the oppreſſed, to defend righteouſneſs and the law of the realm.

After he was dead, the conquerors cut off his head, his hands and feet, and diſhonoured his body in other reſpects, contrary to the principles of chivalry [4]. His head was put upon a ſpear, and borne aloft in token of the king's victory, and afterwards ſent to lady Mortimer at Wigmore caſtle [5].

The bodies of the earl of Leiceſter, of his ſon Henry, and lord Hugh Deſpencer, were buried, by the king's permiſſion, in the conventual church of Eveſham before the altar. Lord Edward attended the funeral obſequies of Henry of Montfort, his couſin and the intimate companion and friend of his youth.

The following diſtich is ſaid to have been the earl of Leiceſter's epitaph:

Nunc dantur fato, caſuque cadunt iterato,
Symone ſublato, Mars, Paris, atque Cato.

At the end of an antient manuſcript in the public library at Cambridge, after a great many rhyming verſes in his praiſe, certain prayers are directed to him as a ſaint; which indeed many people both of the clergy and laity did eſteem him after his death; and many miracles were affirmed to be wrought at his tomb; but worſhip was forbidden to be paid him by the pope's legate, by his maſter's order, out of reſpect, we may ſuppoſe, to the king of England [6]. The Annaliſt of Waverley as well as ſome other writers alſo take notice of a great ſtorm of thunder, lightning, and rain, attended with a wonderful darkneſs, happening at the time of his death, and were interpreted as prodigies. He was certainly very ſtrict in religious duties, and ſcrupulouſly conſcientious in all his actions, therein following the leſſons of his ghoſtly father the late Robert Groſſeteſte, biſhop of Lincoln, to whom Walter de Cantelupe biſhop of Worceſter, the earl's aſſociate in correcting the ſhocking abuſes of king Henry's government, was hardly inferior in piety, ſpirit, and patriotiſm; though ſome writers report that Cantilupe, juſt before his death, repented of his connexion with Simon de Montfort.

After the earl's death, the king ſet every thing at nought which had been done under the great ſeal after the battle of Lewes; from which time he declared the ſeal to have been in the hands of Leiceſter; and that the latter put it to juſt what he pleaſed [7]. Henry of Winton was always the dupe of thoſe about him, and had been very properly declared in parliament inſufficient and incapable of governing his kingdom. Simon de Montfort, therefore, who was intruſted with the care of his perſon, and conſidered by the nation as a kind of regent during the exiſting diſtractions, had naturally the direction of the great ſeal. But, if the allegation was falſe, the lie was politically convenient, as thereby an handle would be made for annulling every thing that had paſſed the great ſeal during Montfort's aſcendancy. After his ſucceſs at Eveſham, king Henry went back to Worceſter, where he ſtayed a few days. While he was there, he revoked moſt of the patents he had paſſed while he was in the power of the earl of Leiceſter. On the 8th of Auguſt, he offered to receive the burgeſſes of Hereford into his protection, provided they would pay a ſufficient fine for all their offences againſt him and his ſon Edward. Wherefore, on the 24th of the ſame month, they were amerced at 560 marcs, a great ſum for ſo ſmall a city. From Worceſter the king went to Winton, and there held his parliament; to which all the biſhops and abbots and great men of England were ſummoned, who had been engaged in the war againſt him; only four biſhops were excepted, viz. the biſhops of Lincoln, London, Worceſter, and Lichfield; they having been entirely of the barons' faction.

In this parliament, the king and great men decreed that the city of London ſhould for her rebellion forfeit all her liberties, and that the poſts and chains ſhould be taken away, and the richer ſorts of citizens committed to priſon; which was ſoon after put into execution.

---

[1] W. de Nangis par Du Cheſne, tom. V. p. 373.

[2] Annales Waverleienſes.

[3] Th. Wykes. Matth. Weſtm. Contin. Matth. Pariſii.

[4] Dominus vero Simon de Monteforti, capite truncato, membratim deciſus, pudibundis ſuis, proh dolor! ablatis, martyrium pro patriæ terræ & regni reparatione, & matris eccleſiæ, ut credimus, conſummavit glorioſum, quia, ſi vellet, apud Kenilworth peroptimè confugiſſet. In eâdem igitur horâ, quâ ſuccubuit, facta ſunt tonitrua magna & fulgura & corruſcationes, & ſol obſcuratus eſt per univerſam terram. Ann. Waverl.

[5] Contin. M. Pariſii.

[6] Tyrrel's Hiſt.

[7] Rymer.

In this parliament was given the king the preſent ſeiſin of all the rebels' lands[1]; and he now appointed two commiſſioners in each county, who with the ſhire-reeve were to extend them, and return the extent, with the names of the lands and their late owners, to himſelf at Weſtminſter by the feaſt of St. Edward [13th Oct.] next enſuing; and they were to appoint two collectors in every hundred, to gather the Michaelmas rents, and to deliver the commiſſioners a note, as appears by the commiſſion itſelf bearing date, at Wincheſter, the 21ſt of September; by which William Bagot and Robert du Grendon were appointed for the counties of Warwick and Leiceſter[2]; and commiſſioners were ordered after the ſame manner for the reſt of the counties of England, whoſe names are found immediately after the commiſſion itſelf. Theſe lands were accordingly ſeized into the king's hands, and in the next ſeſſion of this parliament veſted in him.

On the 25th of October, 49 Hen. III. (ſc. 1265.) this king gave to his youngeſt ſon Edmund the inheritance of the earldom of Leiceſter, together with the ſeneſchalcy of England[3]. This is the firſt grant of the honour of Leiceſter to Edmund. The ſeneſchalcy de feodo was an appendage to it[4].

The king was extremely angry with the city of London, and, according to ſome writers, minded to deſtroy her, for her late rebellion[5]; and about Michaelmas came to Windſor with a great force. This put the mayor and aldermen into great alarm; but many of the ordinary citizens were for defending the city againſt the king. At length, it was agreed to get ſome religious perſons or monks, for whom the king had a ſuperſtitious reſpect, to intercede for them; but their ſolicitations availed nothing; ſo much was the king inflamed againſt the place. At length, by the advice of certain perſons about the king, the citizens thought fit to paſs an inſtrument under their common ſeal, whereby they wholly ſubmitted themſelves and all that they had to the king's mercy: which being done accordingly, it was forthwith ſent to him by eight citizens, who ſeemed to have the beſt intereſt at court; but, in their way thither, they were met by ſir Roger Leibourne, who told them it was the king's pleaſure they ſhould return home; ſince he was entruſted with his majeſty's meſſage: ſo, going with them till they came pretty near the city, he then left them, and went the neareſt way to the Tower, where he took up his quarters: but, at his departure, he ordered the mayor and all the principal citizens to meet him the next morning at Barking church; which order they punctually obeyed; and then ſir Roger in a long ſpeech laid before them the heinouſneſs of their crime, and the great interceſſion that had been made for their pardon; therefore their only way was to ſend the king the abovementioned ſubmiſſion by him; which they accordingly did. About ſix days afterwards he returned; and, meeting them at the ſame place, let them know that the king, at the interceſſion of their friends, had received their ſubmiſſion; and, as a trial of their future obedience, commanded all their poſts to be pulled up, and the chains taken away, with which the ends of the ſtreets were barricadoed; and that the king's farther pleaſure was, that the mayor and about forty of the principal citizens ſhould go the next day to Windſor, and farther confirm the ſaid inſtrument; and that they ſhould have the king's ſafe conduct for four days, both to go and return, which he then alſo delivered them under his own ſeal. Upon confidence of which, the mayor and forty of the chief citizens went to Windſor; but, finding the king gone abroad for his recreation, they ſtaid for his return. When he came home, though he ſaw them waiting for him, yet he took no notice at all of them; only they were bid to attend. But, though the king preſently commanded, that no man, of what degree ſoever, ſhould do them any injury in word or deed; yet he ſent them word he would not ſpeak with them that night. Whereupon they were delivered to the cuſtody of the conſtable of the caſtle, who locked them up in a large tower, where they had hard fare and worſe lodging. The next day they were diſcharged out of the caſtle, and kept by the conſtable in ſeveral lodgings in the town, as he thought fit, except Thomas Fitz-Thomas the mayor, Michael Thony, Stephen Buckerel, Thomas Pynelſdon, and John de Fleet, whom, as being principal leaders in their late rebellion, the king had granted to lord Edward, by whoſe order they were kept priſoners a long time, notwithſtanding their ſafe conduct, till they had paid ſufficient ranſoms for their lives, liberties, and eſtates. But, when the reſt of the city heard of this ſevere uſage, many of the moſt culpable privately conveyed away their effects and perſons, and never returned; which tended very much to the city's impoveriſhment. After a good deal more of ſuch ſort of treatment, and the plundering and oppreſſing many individuals, the king conſented to take a fine of forty thouſand pounds, but afterwards fell to fifty thouſand marcs, as the price of reſtoring the city to its liberties.

After the feaſt of St. Edward[6], he reſumed his parliament, which ſeems to have been adjourned on account of that feaſt. It was now held at Weſtminſter, and laſted eight days; during which the king treated with his great men on the affairs of the kingdom. One of the chief things then done was to paſs ſentence of diſheriſon and forfeiture of lands upon all the king's enemies in the late rebellion, whoſe lands being now given to him, he preſently beſtowed them on his children and friends, ſpecially ſuch as had faithfully ſerved him in this war; but the ſeverity and partiality, which accompanied theſe proceedings, were the cauſe of great diſturbance and a freſh rebellion. The ſeverity of government was deemed as impolitic, as it was known to be contrary to the laws of England.

Hiſtory ſcarcely furniſhes an inſtance of human ſuffering greater than in the perſon of Alianora counteſs of Leiceſter, the wife of Simon de Montfort. Soon after her huſband's death, ſhe was adjudged to the forfeiture of all ſhe had[7]. As ſoon as ſhe learnt the deaths of her huſband and ſon, ſhe threw aſide her purple, and reſumed the widow's weeds which ſhe had worn before her ſecond marriage[8]. Superſtitious people imputed all her misfortunes to the breach of her vow of chaſtity. Of her diſpoſition and conduct we find nothing mentioned in the authors of that time. David Hume, without any authority, as far as I can diſcover, ſays ſhe had been extremely forward in all attacks on the royal family. Her beauty, however, when ſhe married Simon de Montfort, has been noted. Her grief for her late and preſent misfortunes was inconſolable. She had nothing for apparel but garments of wool, and for a long time could not bear to taſte either fiſh or fleſh. After a ſhort interval, ſhe went over to France, ſtripped of her dower and all elſe that ſhe had, and took up her permanent abode in the convent of Montarges, in that houſe of nuns of the order of Preachers there, founded by her huſband's ſiſter[9]. She had five ſons and one daughter by Simon de Montfort; viz. Henry, Simon, Guy, Richard, and Almeric. To Almeric king Henry had given ſome preferment in the church of York; but[10], after the fatal cataſtrophe at Eveſham, the king would not let him retain it, alleging he had intended it for a ſon of Roger de Mortimer, but that the earl of Leiceſter, who had then the great ſeal in his diſpoſal, and fixed it to what he would, had beſtowed it upon this Almeric. Richard and Almeric went with their mother into France. Of Richard I read nothing more. In the year 1276[11], ſhe ſent back Alianora by Almaric her ſon to be married to Lewellin prince of Wales, as the earl her huſband had in his life-time agreed: but both of them were taken at ſea, near the Iſle of Scilly, by four ſhips of Briſtol, and brought to king Edward; who thereupon placed her honourably with his queen, but ſecured Almaric firſt in Corf caſtle, and then in that of Shireburne. Afterwards, viz. in anno 1279, (6 Edw. I.) the king gave this Alianora in marriage to Lewellin prince of Wales, keeping the wedding at his own charge, himſelf and the queen honouring it with their company. In the year 1283, (9 Edw. I.) Almaric de Montfort, being then a priſoner, was, at the inſtance of John Peckham archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſet at liberty; the clergy undertaking for him, that he ſhould thenceforth demean himſelf peaceably; and ſoon after he went into France, and ſo to Rome; where, quitting his orders, for it ſeems he was a prieſt, he was made a knight, and died ſoon after.

---

[1] Tyrrel.

[2] See their return for Leiceſterſhire, Appendix, N° XIV. p. 35.

[3] See Appendix, N° XIV. p. 19; and N° XVI. p. 41.

[4] Dugdale's Baronage, in Earls of Lancaſter.

[5] See Dr. Brady's Append. in Complete Hiſt. N° 223.

[6] 13th of October.

[7] Waverl. 1265.

[8] Wykes.

[9] Walſingham. Dugdale's Baronage.

[10] Rymer.

[11] See Walſingham.

His ſiſter Alianora had but a ſhort and unhappy time with Lewellin. In 1282, freſh war broke out between him and king Edward. Lewellin was killed, and his head put upon the Tower of London, in token of his being a traitor.

Guy, the third ſon of Simon de Montfort, fought in the van of the baronial army at the battle of Lewes, and again on the ſame ſide at the battle of Eveſham, where, being taken priſoner, he was committed to Dover caſtle; whence he made his eſcape through the help of the keeper, who fled with him to France, and then to Tuſcany. In the ſpring of the year 1270, both this Guy and his brother Simon happened to be at Viterbo, where the kings of Sicily and France then were on account of the croiſade. At Viterbo happened alſo to be then their couſin Henry of Almaine, whom Simon and Guy de Montfort murdered at that place, accuſing him of the murder of their father[1]. On a certain day early in the morning, the two brothers, with earl Rufus, whoſe daughter Guy had married, and a conſiderable ſuite of men in coats of mail, ſuddenly entered the church, where lord Henry had been juſt before attending maſs. They all ruſhed upon him inſtantly, and, calling him murderer, with drawn ſwords diſpatched him. Henry had fled to an altar; but the aſſaſſins, without any reverence for that ſacred place or to the church, repeated their blows till he was dead. This happened on the 13th of March, in the church of St. Blaſe. The college of cardinals, who were then at Viterbo, inſtantly launched the thunder of excommunication againſt the authors of this deed; but they ſecured themſelves in their fortreſſes, till the court of Rome compromiſed the matter with them.

About the year 1282, pope Martin liberated Guy de Montfort from priſon, where he had been put by Gregory X. for the above murder, and ſent him to Romaniola, which he almoſt overran in the courſe of this year. A little after, by the ſame pope's leave, he returned to Tuſcany, and took poſſeſſion of the earldom which came to him through his wife. He is ſaid to have been a great general[2]. We now proceed to Simon.

"When young Simon de Montfort heard at Kenilworth caſtle of his father's and brothers' miſhap, he was overwhelmed with grief; and, whether of his own head, or by the advice of thoſe about him, is uncertain, he forthwith releaſed his uncle Richard, king of Almaine, out of priſon, and alſo ſir Richard Fitz-peter, and others whom he had had in his cuſtody; and theſe things were done on the 6th of September, 1265[3]."

He had marched to Eveſham to give ſuccour to his father; but did not arrive till after the defeat, and time enough to behold his father's head upon a ſpear. He was ſtruck with horror, and haſtened to his mother at Kenilworth, and could not taſte of food for ſeveral days.

"About the beginning of November[4], the queen conſort returned to England, together with the papal legate Ottobone, who excommunicated Simon de Montfort, although dead, and all his adherents againſt juſtice, and the peace of the realm (ſays my author); and at the feaſt of St. Edward were diſinherited at London all thoſe who carried arms againſt the king and his ſon Edward, and all who adhered to young Simon de Montfort after the battle of Eveſham; and Richard king of Almaine, and the earl marſhal, alſo ſir Philip Baſſett, and other grandees, gave their aſſent to this diſheriſon[5]."

About the feaſt of St. Edmund the king and martyr all the citizens of London except ſeven were releaſed from priſon.

About the feaſt of St. Catharine the virgin, (25th of November) was burnt the town of Portſmouth by the citizens of the Cinque-ports, who would by no means conſent to come to the peace of the king and lord Edward, becauſe lord Edward had hung up their fellow-citizens of Wincheſea, and ſo ſhockingly and abominably uſed the citizens of London. Taking care of themſelves, they kept at ſea with their wives and children; but did infinite miſchief by ſea and land.

On the 23d of November, ſir Simon de Montfort junior went out of the caſtle of Kenilworth, leaving the garriſon there; and joined himſelf to the diſinherited, putting himſelf in the Iſle of Axholme with them: and lord Edward with a great army beſieged him there from that time to Chriſtmas-day; and then beguiled him with words of peace, and fair promiſes to go to Northampton, where the lord king and the queen and the legate were at that time treating about peace. And, when he was arrived there, he could not get back to the iſland, as had been premiſed; for, he had been overreached. Hoſtages, therefore, were given for him, viz. Edmund the king's ſon, and Henry ſon of the king of Almaine. But, ſeeing himſelf thus circumvented, he reluctantly followed the king and lord Edward, under a guard, to London; where arriving ſoon after, he was adjudged to perpetual baniſhment; yet ſo, that every year, as long as he ſhould keep his oath, he ſhould receive from the chancery of the king five hundred marcs ſterling. Finding himſelf thus detained by them againſt his will, he complied with their demands. Afterwards he began to conſider how he might give them the ſlip; being apprized by a ſpecial perſon about him, that, if he did not make haſte to be gone, he would be committed to perpetual impriſonment. Availing himſelf of this warning, and dreading the evil of ſuch impriſonment, on the 13th of February he ſtole privately out of London in the night with ſome particular friends, and immediately adjoined himſelf to the citizens of the Cinque-ports, who were at Wincheſea and waited for his arrival, and abode a long time with them upon the ſeas. The barons of the Cinque-ports held out till they had obtained a complete amneſty for all they had done, and a confirmation of their charters and rights. We find this Simon de Montfort at Viterbo on the 13th of March, 1270, and aſſiſting in the murder of Henry of Almaine his couſin. From that time he is ſuppoſed to have been a vagabond, and to have died not long after[6]. The cauſe of this murder does not ſeem to have been known. As the two brothers were concerned in it, and did not ſcruple to commit it in a church, and even at the altar, it was probably done to revenge ſome family injury; perhaps it was on account of their father. The injury muſt be ſuppoſed to be very great.

---

[1] Wykes, and Walſingham.

[2] Walſingham.

[3] Annales Waverleienſes.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Here is an intimation, that but few of the grandees were then ſummoned to the king's parliaments. I find the following paſſage in Camden; of which the reader will make what uſe he thinks fit: "Ad ſummum honorem pertinet (viz. the order of parliamentary barons), ex quo rex Henricus III. ex tantâ multitudine, quæ ſeditioſa & turbulenta fuit, optimos quoſque reſcripto ad comitia parliamentaria evocaverit. Illi enim (ex ſatis antiquo ſcriptore loquor) poſt magnas perturbationes & enormas vexationes inter ipſum regem, Simonem de Monteforti, & alios barones regni Angliæ, quibus ipſe dignatus eſt brevia ſummonitionis dirigere, venirent ad parliamentum ſuum, & non alii, niſi fortè dominus rex alia ſimilia brevia eis dirigere voluiſſet." Camdeni Hiſt.; and ſee Selden's Remarks in Titles of Honour.

[6] See Walſingham.

It ſeems to have been a remarkable effort of the earl of Leiceſter's military genius to have given ſuch amazing ſtrength to the caſtle of Kenilworth. The counteſs of Leiceſter left it on the 28th of October, 1265; after which, the brave garriſon defended it of their own accord. Nor did it ſurrender to the king upon her ſon Simon's quitting it on the 23d of November following. And, from the time of his leaving it, thoſe who kept it did not ceaſe to plunder, and lay waſte, and deſtroy, the whole country [1], deſpoiling and taking fines of abbots and priors and prelates in their neighbourhood. Nor would they render the caſtle to any one; no, not to the king, nor even to Simon de Montfort junior, unleſs the counteſs of Leiceſter would come herſelf, and give order about it. Wherefore the king got ſummoned all who owed him military ſervice, to meet him at Oxon with their due ſervice on the third week after the cloſe of Eaſter [2], 1266; and, from every town in Berks and Oxon, four or five men, according to the ſize of each town, were ſummoned, by the king's writ, to guard the town of Oxon againſt the ſaid garriſon of Kenilworth; for, the Oxonians were apprehenſive of their viſits [3].

" A little before Midſummer, anno 1266, the king ſent his ſon lord Edward before, with a great part of the army, from Warwic towards Kenilworth, in order to beſiege it: but the garriſon, ſallying out, fell upon the prince's forces with ſuch violence, that they beat them back as far as Warwic [4]. At Midſummer, however, the king, attended by all the great men of the kingdom who owed him knight-ſervice in capite, being arrived in perſon, began to lay cloſe ſiege to the caſtle, and battered it with all ſorts of warlike engines; but it was altogether in vain; for the place, being well victualled, truſted to the ſtrength of the works, and defended itſelf ſo obſtinately, that a great many men were killed on both ſides. And, when the ſiege had continued till towards the end of Auguſt, Ottobon the pope's legate, with the archbiſhop of Canterbury and biſhop of London, went down thither, to try if they could propoſe any terms of peace between the king and the beſieged; but it was to no purpoſe; for they, expecting a ſpeedy and powerful relief under Simon de Montfort from beyond ſea, would hearken to nothing that was offered. Wherefore the legate excommunicated all thoſe that held the caſtle, together with their adherents in other places; ſo that all the king's forces could then do was to keep it cloſe blocked up, in hopes that they might be forced to ſurrender it at laſt for want of proviſions."

But, the kingdom being yet in great ferment, the king was ſolicitous to ſettle matters as expeditiouſly, and with as much appearance of moderation, as he could. At the inſtance, therefore, of the legate and others of his own biſhops and nobility, he ſummoned a parliament to meet at Kenilworth on the 24th of Auguſt, 1266; and there paſſed the famous ſtatute called " Dictum de Kenilworth"; the deeds of which are in Tyrrel's Hiſtory, vol. II. p. 1065; and printed copies may be ſeen in Raſtel's Statutes. The intention of the Dictum was to allow all perſons, whoſe lands were forfeited for Simon de Montfort's rebellion, to compound for their eſtates, and receive the ſame back again, upon paying from one to ſeven years' value, according to the delinquency of the ſeveral parties; of which the commiſſioners were to judge. But theſe commiſſioners ſeem to be all of the king's ſide; and the Dictum gave but little ſatisfaction. All the family of Montfort, and alſo Robert de Ferrers earl of Derby [5], were expreſſly excepted out of this act of grace, as it was called.

But, notwithſtanding the pacific complection of this famous " Dictum de Kenilworth," yet it produced no ſurrender of the caſtle. And once more the clergy, who favoured Simon de Montfort, were excommunicated by the legate; particularly, John biſhop of Winton, Henry biſhop of London, and Stephen, biſhop of Chicheſter; who, being alſo ſuperſeded, were all not long after fain to go to Rome, to beg the pope's abſolution. The garriſon of Kenilworth, having now been blocked up a good part of two ſummers and one whole winter, were driven to the extremity of eating horſe-fleſh. At length, another winter coming on, and fuel failing (the cold being very ſevere), they began to make a much more feeble defence than they had hitherto done [6]; ſo that about the beginning of November, anno 1266, they were forced to capitulate; and at laſt agreed for the delivery of the caſtle within the ſpace of forty days, if it were not relieved by Simon de Montfort before that time. And, for the true performance of this, ſir Richard de Edmundeville and ſeven other knights were delivered as hoſtages till that time was accompliſhed; during which it was alſo agreed, that, if their lord Simon relieved the caſtle, then theſe hoſtages were again to be returned into it; but, if otherwiſe, the caſtle was to be delivered when the forty days were expired; but, no relief coming to them within that time, they were forced to ſurrender on the 13th of December. But, when the beſieged marched out, it was a miſerable ſight to ſee how pale and meagre they looked by reaſon of their long want of victuals; and, when the king's men went into it to take poſſeſſion, they were almoſt choaked with the horrid ſtench of the dead carcaſes and other naſtineſs they met with. But, as for the beſieged, they had very good terms given them; for, they marched out not only with their arms and ſuch horſes as were left, but alſo with all the rich plunder they had taken from the adjacent country, before the ſiege began; all which, together with their lives and liberties, were ſecured to them. This detail evinces the amazing ſtrength of the fortification, as well as the invincible ſpirit of the garriſon, and their ſurpriſing attachment to the family of Montfort. As ſoon almoſt as the king was in poſſeſſion of the caſtle, as a forfeit to the crown for the treaſon of Simon de Montfort earl of Leiceſter, he beſtowed it upon his ſecond ſon Edmund earl of Lancaſter, with the earldom, honour, and town, of Leiceſter; in conſequence of which, it became incorporated with the duchy of Lancaſter. All theſe confuſions and confiſcations produced at leaſt one pleaſure to the king in giving him an opportunity of making ſome amends to his ſon Edmund for the loſs of the crown of Sicily. Some time before the grant of the honour of Leiceſter to Edmund, the latter had been created earl of Derby; and all that earl's prodigious eſtate beſtowed upon him. It muſt excite ſurpriſe to ſee the king ſo laviſh of his grants to his ſecond ſon; and one can hardly account for the eldeſt ſon's permitting it. The ſons of Edmund, ſucceſſively earls of Lancaſter and Leiceſter, as alſo of Derby, in the reign of Edward II. revived the ſcheme of reform, for which Simon de Montfort earl of Leiceſter paid ſo dearly, and effected with no great difficulty the depoſition and deſtruction of that prince. Thus the earldoms of Leiceſter and Derby, and the eſtates of aſſociated rebels, united in one branch of Henry the third's own family, were, by conſolidation, the avengers of the Montforts and the Ferrars. The eſtates, taken from the rebels after the battle of Eveſham, and given with a laviſh and raſh hand to the houſe of Lancaſter, produced ſtill more fatal effects in the realm of England; the conſequences of which will probably never be obliterated.

---

[1] Waverl.

[2] 15th of March.

[3] Tyrrel.

[4] Ib.

[5] Robert de Ferrers earl of Derby, ſiding with Simon de Montfort againſt king Henry III. was fined at 50,000£. to be paid prid. Johan. Baptiſt. next following. I know not whether more to admire at the ſuddeneſs of payment, or vaſtneſs of the ſum; ſeeing 100,000£. was the ranſom ſet by the emperor on our king Richard I.; and it ſhaked all the coffers of England in that age, without the help of the church-plate, to make it up. Well, theſe lords following were the ſecurity bound for the earl's true payment at the time appointed:

Henry ſon to Richard king of the Romans;
John de Warren earl of Surrey,
Sir Roger de Somery,
Sir Robert Walerond,
Sir Hamond le Strange,
Sir Robert Bruce,
William Valence earl of Pembroke,
William Beauchamp earl of Warwick,
Sir Thomas de Clare,
Sir Roger Clifford,
Sir Bartholomew Sudely;
all barons of the land.

But earl Robert, unable to advance the money at the time appointed, and unwilling to leave the lords his bail under the king's laſh, ſurrendered his lands, and Tutbury caſtle among the reſt, to the clear yearly value of 3000£. into the king's hands; redeemable, when he or his heirs ſhould pay down in one day 50,000£.; which was never performed.

The Engliſh clergy much pitied John, the ſon of this earl Robert, who preſented a petition to the pope, informing his holineſs, that the Engliſh clergy were willing to give him money, by way of contribution, to redeem his eſtate, but durſt not, becauſe commanded to the contrary, under the pain of the pope's curſe. And therefore he craved his apoſtolical indulgence therein.

Something, I find, was reſtored to him; but Tutbury was too ſweet a morſel to return, being annexed to the duchy of Lancaſter. John of Gaunt built a fair caſtle there, walled on three ſides by art, and the fourth by its natural ſteepneſs. Fuller's Worthies in Staffordſhire, p. 39. Dugdale's Warwickſhire, II. 1094.

[6] Tyrrel, p. 1069.

⁂ The MSS. of Mr. Carte ſupply the following addition to the document, inſerted p. 100, relative to the partition of the property of Robert earl of Leiceſter:

"Poſt obitum verò comitiſſarum Petronille matris ejuſdem Roberti comitis, & Laurette quondam uxoris ipſius Roberti, que dotate ſunt de predicto honore, dotes illarum, ſicut deliberabuntur, dividentur; & una medietas indè remanebit predicto Simoni, & altera medietas predicto Saihero. Quare volumus, &c. quòd predictus comes Saiherus & heredes ſui habeant & teneant in perpetuum predictam partem, cum pertinentiis, &c. Teſtibus; domino W. Londonienſi, domino P. Wintonienſi, epiſcopis; Galfrido, filio Petri, comite Eſſexie; Alberico de Vere, comite Oxonie; Rogero de Laſci, conſtabulario Ceſtrie. Datum per manum Hugonis de Welles, archidiaconi Wellen', apud Lingebi, decimo Martii, regni noſtri octavo.

"Johannes, Dei gratiâ, rex Anglie, &c. Sciatis nos, &c. confirmâſſe Saihero de Quenci, comiti Winton', decem libras, percipiendas ſibi & heredibus ſuis, &c. ſingulis annis, de exitibus comitatûs Southampton', per manus vicecomitis Southampton', apud Wintoniam, nomine comitis; ſcilicet, ad Paſcham ſolidos 100, & ad feſtum Sancti Michaelis 100 ſolidos. Quare volumus, &c. Teſtibus, ut ſuprà, 13 Martii, regni noſtri octavo, apud Lameiham [1]."

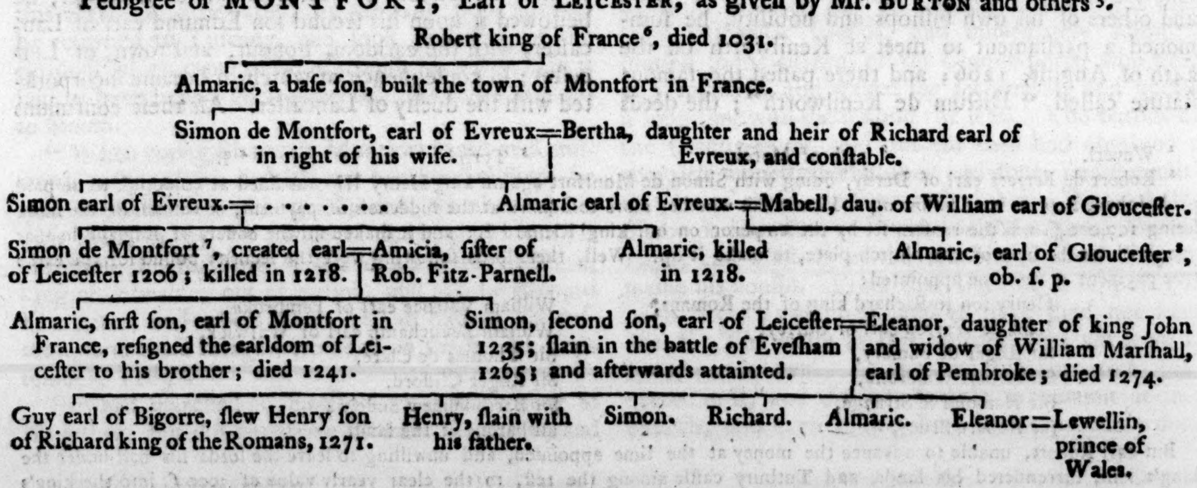
P. 195. "The king to all, &c. greeting. Be it known to your univerſity, that we ordain and conſtitute the fathers Henry of London, Walter of Worceſter, and John of Winton, biſhops; and our noble men Hugh Diſpenſer, juſtice of England; and Peter of Montfort; and maſter Richard de Mepham, archdeacon of Oxford, our proctors and ſolemn nuncios; giving to them power of treating, in preſence of the magnificent prince king of France, the illuſtrious and venerable father G. biſhop of Sabino, legate of the apoſtolic ſee, or either of them, upon reformation of the eſtate of our realm, and what ſhall be provided in this behalf, of accepting and ratifying, if they ſhall ſee good, and of making all ſecurity which the quality of the buſineſs requires, and which they ſhall judge to be ſuitable to us and our realm; giving moreover to the aforeſaid Peter the power of ſwearing upon our ſoul, that whatſoever they in the premiſſes in our name ſhall hold fit to be done, we will eſteem ratified and accepted. Given at Canterbury on the Sabbath [2] next after the feaſt of the Nativity of the bleſſed Virgin, A.D. 1264 [3]."

P. 208. From the following extract of a Cloſe Roll of 4 Edward I. we can tell exactly the duration of this war:

"Et ſecundùm quod tempus guerræ incepit à quarto die Aprilis, anno regni dicti patris noſtri 48 [1264], quando vexillis explicatis exivit cum exercitu ſuo ab Oxoniâ versùs Northamptoniam, & duravit continuè uſque ſextum-decimum diem Septembris, anno regni dicti patris noſtri 49 [1265], quando apud Wyntoniam pacem ſuam poſt bellum de Eveſham, in preſentiâ baronum ſuorum qui ibidem convenerant, firmari fecit & clamari.

"Proviſum eſt etiam, ne aliquis amitteret vitam vel membra pro roberiis, aut homicidiis, aut aliis commiſſis ſub ſpecie guerræ per illos qui contra dictum patrem noſtrum erant, à quarto die Junii, anno regni ejuſdem patris noſtri 47 [1263], quando illi, vexillis explicatis primò per terram ſuam incedentes, roberias, homicidias, incarcerationes tam perſonis eccleſiaſticis quàm ſecularibus, fecerunt uſque ad predictum tempus, quo ab Oxoniâ versùs Northamptoniam cum exercitu ſuo receſſit [4]."

Pedigree of MONTFORT, Earl of LEICESTER, as given by Mr. BURTON and others [5].



Robert king of France [6], died 1031.

Almaric, a baſe ſon, built the town of Montfort in France.

Simon de Montfort, earl of Evreux in right of his wife. = Bertha, daughter and heir of Richard earl of Evreux, and conſtable.

Simon earl of Evreux. = ...

Almaric earl of Evreux. = Mabell, dau. of William earl of Glouceſter.

Simon de Montfort [7], created earl of Leiceſter 1206; killed in 1218. = Amicia, ſiſter of Rob. Fitz-Parnell.

Almaric, killed in 1218.

Almaric, earl of Glouceſter [8], ob. ſ. p.

Almaric, firſt ſon, earl of Montfort in France, reſigned the earldom of Leiceſter to his brother; died 1241.

Simon, ſecond ſon, earl of Leiceſter 1235; ſlain in the battle of Eveſham 1265; and afterwards attainted. = Eleanor, daughter of king John and widow of William Marſhall, earl of Pembroke; died 1274.

Guy earl of Bigorre, ſlew Henry ſon of Richard king of the Romans, 1271.

Henry, ſlain with his father.

Simon.

Richard.

Almaric.

Eleanor = Lewellin, prince of Wales.

---

[1] Carte, MS. from Sir William Dugdale's Analecta breviſſima, ex Rotulis in Turri Londinenſi.

[2] Sept. 8.

[3] Pat. 48 Hen. III. m. 4. dorſo. Brady's Hiſt. vol. I. Appendix, N° 215.

[4] Riley's Placita Parliamentaria, p. 440; from a Cloſe Roll of 4 Edward I.

[5] We leave it to more able Genealogiſts to complete this pedigree from the particulars furniſhed by the preſent memoir; particularly, in pp. 99, 104.

[6] Arms: Azure, ſemé of fleurs de lis, Or, plate X. fig. 28.

[7] Arms: Gules, a lion rampant, queuée fichée, Argent; fig. 29.

[8] Arms: Per pale indented, Argent and Gules; fig. 30.

Comments on ſome Expreſſions of MATTHEW PARIS; (cited in p. 110.)

[A] Nobility.] England was conſidered at that time as divided, for the greater part, between two deſcriptions of principal proprietors, the king, and the nobility. What appertained to the king, in right of his crown, was called royal demeſne; the remainder, which belonged chiefly to the nobility, was franc fief; and nobility properly reſulted from landed poſſeſſions and honourable tenure. It became confounded with pre-eminence of birth, becauſe illuſtrious extraction uſually led to pre-eminence of fortune and of privilege. Thoſe, however, were moſt properly noble who had noble fief; for, blood alone could be but of little avail. The dignitaries of the church were therefore ſtyled noble; and ſome have ſaid, that they held a third part of the whole landed property of England; but I think this aſſertion a great exaggeration. Fief was landed eſtate of the ſureſt tenure and higheſt dignity. The proprietors of fief had within their tenements prodigious rights. Fief was a ſpecies of tenure. To all tenure was annexed the idea of reference, derivation, and connexion. To hold was always to hold de aliquo. Even the king held his royal demeſne as of his crown. And, for his adequate ſupport as prince, he was, in legal ſuppoſition, the ſovereign lord of all the fiefs of England. To every fief there belonged lord and tenant. Theſe were inſeparable, like ſubſtance and ſhadow. To fief belonged the epithets frank or noble. A larger portion of landed property, taken together or in the aggregate, under one ſervice, and derived from the crown, and for ever holding the tenant and his heirs to the given ſervice thereof (which implied vaſſalage), was called noble or frank. Smaller portions, derived in like manner either from the king or one of his vaſſals, and owing ſervice as in the former caſe, were ſtyled franc fief. The phraſe in capite marked the relation of tenant and lord, or, if you will, the homager and homagee. Every ſpecies of tenure, whether baſe or free, required fealty; but in the transfer of franc fief homage was added to fealty, and one or both were the foundation and cement of the connexion. For the tenant's homage the fief was ſuppoſed to have been given, and it implied a reciprocal tie—on the part of the lord, warranty of the fief, and protection both of the tenant's fief and perſon; on the part of the tenant, fidelity and attachment to the lord, and particularly a ſtrict performance of the ſervices or onus attaching to the fief. What the lord had a right to from his tenant was the latter's ſervice; all beyond was gratuity, and conſidered by the name of aid. The lord had a right to the ſervice of his vaſſal. And it ſeemed reaſonable, at leaſt in his eye, and cuſtom had given a ſort of ſanction to the thing, that aid might be called for now and then, if the lord's neceſſities were urgent, and the requiſition was moderate, that is, ſuitable to the tenant's circumſtances and the exigences of the lord.

In feudal language, England at large, with all its appendances, was a ſeignory veſted in the king, who was alſo, in right of his crown, its feudal lord. The diſtinction was material; for, the rights between a feudal lord and his vaſſal were reciprocal and well defined. Not ſo, perhaps, the rights between prince and ſubject. All the king's dominions were either in his demeſne or in his ſervice. The latter belonged to his vaſſals by actual, or at leaſt virtual, derivation, in which light the law conſidered them. Theſe again were called fiefs of the king, as of his crown, the ſeveral tenants holding them immediately of the king. They might be held by any ſervice that was deemed equivalent, but not otherwiſe; for, the king could not waſte the patrimony of the crown. The ſanction, therefore, of the grandees was neceſſary to give validity to grants of crown-property; and, unleſs the alienations were made with due caution, what one king gave away would be reſumed by his ſucceſſors. The chief ſervices required for fiefs held immediately of the king were franc almoignry, or free alms, and grand ſerjeantry, and knight's ſervice. There were likewiſe ſmaller tenements held immediately of him by ſocage. The three former particularly concerned the ſtate; free alms in particular; for, the prayers of the faithful were held to be of more uſe to the public than the arms of the barons and knights. Hence the ſpiritual baronies. The word fief had two ſignifications: firſt, it was called the lord's fief, in reſpect of the ſervice due for it; ſecondly, the tenant's fief, becauſe he was ſeiſed of it in his own demeſne, as of his fief and right. Again, as the tenant's fief, it became a ſeignory with regard to ſuch tenant's tenants; for, he again might have his fief partly in his own demeſne, and partly in his ſervice. Perhaps he might be reſtrained from alienating, that is, granting away in fee ſimple, more of his fief than was compatible with the ſervice attached to it. But, if he did not retain enough for that purpoſe, the lord would ſieze the alienated part to ſupply the deficiency. It was an invariable maxim, that the king was never to loſe his ſervice.

As the king had his vaſſals of various degrees, ſo had his vaſſals theirs after the ſame faſhion. It was not uſual for eccleſiaſtics to acknowledge themſelves the men or vaſſals of a temporal lord, being the vaſſals of their lord the pope. But they did fealty for their tenements; and the civil power knew how to make their tenements as ſubſervient, or nearly ſo, as the temporal ones. Some of them held in barony, and ſome in pure and franc alms. If they held in barony, they were ſummoned, like laymen holding lands and tenements in baroniâ, to the king's expedition, or, as we might call it, his campaign; and to furniſh their quota of military ſervice by their military tenants and perſonal contributions.

Let me obſerve: The diffuſive body of the nation was ſometimes expreſſed by two words—in the Anglo-Saxon and Daniſh times, by eorl and cheorl (whence churl): alſo by thegen and theor:—Latinized, by magnates and plebeii; or by liber and villanus; the former denoting all the nobleſſe or gentry; the latter the plebs or ordinary people. But each of theſe terms was a ſort of genus comprehending ſeveral ſpecies. In thanes, earls, or the Latin liberi, were couched vaſſals of all ſorts, whether kings, princes, dukes, marquiſes, earls, viſcounts, barons, knights, or freeholders. And under this laſt term were frequently compriſed all the others. The Anglo-Normans, ſpeaking the French language, familiariſed their word baron to the Engliſh idiom, and ſubſtituted it for thane, which they even tranſlated by baro. Yet probably, after the inſtitution of knights' fees, the words took different ſignifications; as I ſuppoſe the Anglo-Norman freeholders held their fiefs, for the greater part, in baroniâ; and many of the Anglo-Saxon thanes continued to hold their franc tenements (I will not venture to call them fiefs) of their ſeveral lords in allodio, or thenagio. After the Conqueſt, immenſe tracts of land were amoved from thenage to military fief. It ſeems to have been the predominant tenure in Normandy, France, and perhaps throughout Europe; and the Chriſtians extended it to Paleſtine and ſome other parts of Syria. There were two ſpecies of thanes, viz. the nobleſſe, who held immediately of the king; and the franc tenants in thenage holding of the others. In like manner, there were barons of each ſort. Some of the king's chief vaſſals, who had immenſe fiefs, had their vaſſals honoured with the title of their barons; who ſeem to have compoſed the tribunal of the pares in the court of their reſpective lords in chief. But the vaſſals of theſe great vaſſals of the king were in general ſtyled their knights and freeholders. I would wiſh to call theſe the gentry of England, and the other the nobleſſe. But I cannot demonſtrate ſuch diſtinction. All theſe degrees were comprehended under the French phraſe of libres hommes. Of vilanes likewiſe there were various ramifications. Taken in large, the word comprehended the burgeſſes, or burgeoiſe, more expreſſive of their popular eſtimation. There were beſides vilanes or tenants, holding their lands in villenagio, regardant to a manor, whoſe condition ſeems much preferable to vilanes or bondmen by birth, who had neither lands nor goods which could be called their property, who were ſaleable like live-ſtock, and, if fugitive, might be ſeized or recovered almoſt in the ſame manner. Vilane was alſo a name given to a man who was free, that is, belonged to no proper maſter, and rented land by vilane ſervices. Strict vilany was an incident of birth or accident. Moreover, occupiers of cottages, and perhaps other mean dependents of a manerial lord, partook of the appellation of vilanes. Tradeſmen and townſmen, particularly ſuch as were mechanics, had no higher degree than that of villani, and were frequently ſtyled by no other name than that of ſervi, being reputed ſuch by the gentry or nobleſſe. Vavaſors, threngi, armigeri, ſcutiferi, francolani, were ſpecifications of liberi homines, either as milites or liberè tenentes. The learned Selden extended the meaning of baro to all the king's tenants in capite, whether princes, earls, viſcounts, barons, knights, or freeholders. There were vaſſals of the crown of all theſe denominations; and of them conſiſted the commune concilium regni; and they were called collectively baronagium Angliæ. Feudal barons muſt not be confounded with certain functionaries of the king, who, I ſuppoſe, by courteſy enjoyed that title, viz. ſuch juſtices of his exchequer as were juriſts and not barons by tenure. I find too the juſtices in Eire ſtyled the king's barons; of whom the ſame may be ſaid as of the barons of the exchequer. The libres hommes, or citizens of the Cinque-ports, holding of the king in capite, were honoured alſo with the name of kings barons. The citizens of London, as a compliment to the grandeur of the city, were likewiſe ſtyled his barons. Moſt chronicles have noted this diſtinction.

Knight's fief was holden by military tenure, that is, by knight-ſervice. A franc tenement holden by knight's ſervice, amounting to twenty librates, or ſo many pounds per annum, was called a knight's fief. Such a tenant was liable to be knighted, and to be made to furniſh himſelf with the habiliments of a knight, ſuch as a deſtrer, &c. and to do ſervice for forty days in the king's campaign as a knight, whether he were a dubbed knight or not. Other franc tenants by knight's ſervice paid eſcuage, according to the part they held of a knight's fief, or did ſervice in perſon according to their fief. In the king's expedition, if a lord ſent eſquires or freeholders inſtead of knights, each eſquire went for half a knight. Every tenant in capite of the king by barony muſt attend the king's perſon in his war, if ſummoned, with the number of his knights appendant to his fief. He muſt go himſelf, and alſo ſend his knights, or compound for himſelf and them by fine. But, if any of his knights attended the king, ſuch knights paid no eſcuage either to his lord or the king. If the king's vaſſal did his devoir in perſon, the king allowed him (for he could not take it without his licence) eſcuage from ſuch of his military tenants as did not attend the expedition. Knights fiefs were inſtituted at the Conqueſt for the defence of the realm; and therefore the ſervice was to the king's uſe. And by another ſtatute of William I. all military tenants, of whoſe fief ſoever, were required, in their oath of fealty to their reſpective lords, to qualify by a ſaving of the leigeance they owed the king. Hence, upon conviction of treaſon to the king, their franc tenements eſcheated to the king, and not to their immediate lord. The thing was otherwiſe in caſe of felony.

It was the nature of franc fief, that of whomſoever it was held, and of what extent ſoever it was, it had the ſame privileges. All franc fief was tenure of a moſt honourable ſort—ſtyled franc, becauſe exempt from every ſervice, whether to the king or its lord, that could put it upon a footing with tenure in villenage, that is, land in ſervitude. The king had great variety of immediate tenants; ſome holding prodigious fiefs, even realms, and principalities, and counties, and hundreds, and caſtellaries; and ſome holding only very ſmall tenements. They held by various ſervices; but in general in barony or by knight-ſervice, whereby they were obliged to do him ſtated ſervices perſonally in his councils and expeditions; in the latter, taking with them their reſpective knights and eſquires, or compounding with the king for one or both by compoſition-money called eſcuage. Some immediate tenants of the king by knight ſervice had tenements amounting only to a few marcs a year.

The king's immediate tenancy, when collected, muſt have made a very large aſſembly. Matthew Paris, ſpeaking, as it ſhould ſeem, only of ſuch, writes thus:—"Illos quoque qui ex parte baronum affuerunt, qui innumerabiles fuere, non eſt neceſſe numerare; cùm tota Angliæ nobilitas in unum collecta quaſi ſub numero non cadebat." M. Paris, anno 1215. "Convenerunt omnes nobiles Angliæ, tam viri eccleſiaſtici quàm ſeculares; ita quòd nunquam tam populoſa multitudo ibi antea viſa fuit congregata." Ib. anno 1255, Hen. III. 39. "Miſit autem continuò [ſc. rex] per omnes fines Angliæ ſcripta regalia, præcipiens omnibus ad regnum ſpectantibus" [a common phraſe for tenants holding immediately of the king] "viz. archiepiſcopis, epiſcopis, abbatibus, & prioribus inſtallatis, comitibus & baronibus, ut omnes ſine omiſſione in octavis Epiphaniæ Londoniis convenirent, regia negotia tractaturi totum regnum contingentia. Venit igitur die ſancti Hilarii Londonias infinita nobilium multitudo, viz. regni totalis univerſitas." Here, as in general, M. Paris takes no particular notice of tenants in capite; nor does he enumerate nobles below barons. Yet it is certain there were others; becauſe ſuch were ordered by John's Magna Charta to be ſummoned to make part of the common council, when aid or ſcutage was to be aſked; and M. Paris himſelf does ſometimes allude to them. He ſeems to ſpecify only the major barons, who, according to John's Magna Charta, were required to be ſummoned to the common council by the king's ſpecial writs, and to omit the tenants in capite, who were to be ſummoned by their reſpective ſhirereeves generally. The charter itſelf ſeems to make a conſiderable difference between theſe two orders of baronial nobles, not only by the mode of ſummoning, but in their comparative importance. For it is there ordered, that, if all the tenants in capite did not attend, the buſineſs for which the parliament was announced ſhould not therefore be impeded. And theſe notices make it doubtful whether they were wont to attend. One would think, however, that, without them, the baronage of England could not be ſo great as to make them correſpond with M. Paris's account of their multitude. I can not diſcover there were ever more than two hundred and fifty baronies; conſequently not ſo many major barons, as many of the latter had ſeveral baronies individually. In the year 1257, king Henry told M. Paris, that there were two hundred and fifty baronies. Whether in this number he included the eccleſiaſtical baronies is uncertain; as alſo, whether that number be the true one. This part of M. Paris's Hiſtory is very confuſed, and his text very faulty. Some of our beſt Antiquaries have not been able to make out more than about one hundred and fifty major barons, viz. ſuch as were ſummoned to the king's parliament by particular writ. And in the famous parliament at Oxford, anno 1258, which made the proviſions of that name, it is ſpoken of as a proof of the zeal of the barons of England in the reformation then projected, that there were at Oxford on that occaſion above one hundred barons; and of theſe ſome were majors and ſome minors. See Annales Burton.

Some perſons have thought, that Matthew Paris could never have made the baronage of England ſo multitudinous without comprehending the tenants in capite below barons. Certainly their fiefs were as free as the larger ones of the king's higher orders of tenants; and they were as noble as they, and as much entitled, according to John's Charter, to a ſeat in the great council, when eſcuage or aid, (i. e. ſubſidy, ſuch as fifteenths, &c.) were granted. Theſe tenants in capite below barons ſeem to have loſt their ſeat in the baronial aſſembly in the reign of Henry III. His great charter has not the clauſe which required them to be ſummoned. And I ſuſpect, that, at the end of his reign, they made no part of the baronage. It has been a great miſtake, however, to ſuppoſe, knights commiſſioners of ſhires were the delegates of their body. Two things are here very remarkable. The nobles ſpecified by Matthew Paris are deſcribed as competent to tax themſelves and the whole realm. "Tallagium conceſſum eſt regi" (ſays M. Paris) "à prælatis & proceribus." But in the commiſſions to ſhirereeves and other miniſters of the crown, appointed to aſſeſs the tax agreed to, we diſcover the contrary. Of which the following inſtrument is a ſtrong proof:—"Rex vicecomiti Kantiæ ſalutem. Sciās, quòd, cùm in octavis ſancti Hilarii, anno, &c. viceſimo primo, ad mandatum noſtrum convenerunt apud Weſtmonaſterium archiepiſcopi, epiſcopi, abbates, priores, comites & barones totius regni noſtri, & tractatum haberent nobiſcum de ſtatu noſtro & regni noſtri: iidem archiepiſcopi, epiſcopi, abbates, priores, & clerici, terras habentes quæ ad eccleſias ſuas non pertinent, comites, barones, milites, & liberi homines, pro ſe & ſuis villanis, nobis conceſſerunt in auxilium triceſimam partem omnium mobilium ſuorum." Brady's Hiſt. vol. I. Appendix, p. 182; 2 Julii, Hen. III. 22. Hence it ſeems that, although the nobles of the realm were deemed ſufficient for conſultation, though not for agreeing to the ſubſidy, the others were implied; and that they were not liable to the charge, but upon the ground of having aſſented to it. And this ſeems founded in clear reaſon; for how, in ſtrictneſs of law, could the higher orders diſpoſe of the property of the knights and freeholders of the different ſhires of the realm?

In a ſimilar grant of a ſubſidy of the 40th of the moveables, anno 1232, the tenor of the preamble is a little different:—"Henricus, &c.————————collectoribus quadrageſimæ ſalutem. Sciatis, quòd archiepiſcopi, epiſcopi, abbates, priores, & clerici, terras habentes quæ ad eccleſias ſuas non pertinent; comites, barones, milites, liberi homines, & villani de regno noſtro, conceſſerunt nobis in auxilium XL omnium mobilium ſuorum, &c." M. Paris. It has given great embarraſs to political critics to explain villani. In other inſtruments we find it pro villanis; which may perhaps be the ſenſe; for, the proprietors of fiefs did exerciſe this and much greater power over the goods of their vilanes, who were conſidered as part of the ſtock upon their manors; but vilanes did never themſelves give an aid, nor were they poſſeſſed of any independent property, for which they could make ſuch a grant. Some again have thought villani were citizens and burgeſſes, and certain tenants of the king holding certain towns or manors of royal demeſne at fee-firm. And as villa in romantic Latin ſignifies town, ſo villanus frequently denotes a townſman; and Walſingham uſually expreſſes townſmen, or men of towns, by villani. Villani does not occur in the account of the Annaliſt of Waverley of a ſubſidy granted in the year 1225:—"Henricus rex Anglorum conceſſit & dedit hominibus de regno Angliæ libertates & conſuetudines, ſicut erant in diebus antiquis, & fecit eis indè chartas duas, unam de libertatibus & liberis conſuetudinibus regni, aliam verò de libertatibus foreſtæ & ad foreſtam pertinentibus. Pro hâc igitur conceſſione & donatione archiepiſcopi, epiſcopi, abbates, priores, comites, barones, milites, & homines liberè tenentes de regno, conceſſerunt & dederunt eidem regi quindecimam omnium mobilium ſuorum." Who could the omnes de regno be but citizens and burgeſſes? With this agrees the charter itſelf, which runs thus: "Pro hâc igitur conceſſione & donatione libertatum iſtarum, & aliarum contentarum in chartâ noſtrâ de foreſtâ, archiepiſcopi, epiſcopi, abbates, priores, comites, barones, milites, liberè tenentes, & omnes de regno noſtro, dederunt nobis quintam-decimam partem omnium bonorum ſuorum mobilium." E Chartâ Magnâ Hen. III. 11 Feb. anno regni 9°.

Matthew Paris does occaſionally add others below barons to his catalogue of members of the common council. Thus, in the very parliament we have been ſpeaking of, he calls the nobility, thereto ſummoned, barons, knights, and nobles. And in a letter of king John, anno regni 15, wherein he applies to his vaſſals for an aid, he ſtyles them barons, knights, and lieges. Who could knights and lieges be, but tenants in capite of baronial rank, and ſitting among the barons?

"Rex, cum archiepiſcopis, epiſcopis, comitibus, baronibus, & aliis multis, convenerunt ad colloquium in octavis Sanctæ Trinitatis apud Northampton, de regni negotiis tractaturi: voluit enim rex uti conſilio magnatum ſuorum de terris tranſmarinis." M. Paris, anno 1221. Here is a parliament of the king's counſellors and the grandees of the realm; if you pleaſe, a great council of notables. I have no doubt but ſome commiſſioners for the commons, ſuch as the mayor of London and barons of the cinque-ports, were a part of it. The executive power was not contracted in the choice of its counſellors; but the grandees of the realm were a part de jure.

"Convenerunt ad colloquium in octavis Sanctæ Trinitatis apud Northampton, rex, cum archiepiſcopis, epiſcopis, comitibus, baronibus, & aliis multis, de regni negotiis tractaturi." M. Paris, anno 1224. A ſimilar convention of notables.

Obſerve the difference between theſe and the following aſſembly, wherein a ſubſidy was granted:

"Rex Henricus ad Natale tenuit curiam ſuam apud Weſtmonaſterium, preſentibus clero & populo, cum magnatibus regionis. Hâc ſolennitate completâ, conceſſa eſt regi XV pars rerum mobilium." M. Paris defines magnates by the orders of grandees, whom he ſpecifies; therefore populus could not be his magnates or grandees. Thus they deſcribe this parliament, convened for the purpoſe of a ſubſidy. "Anno 1225. Omnes magnates regni tam religioſi quam ſeculares, conceſſerunt regi quintam-decimam partem omnium bonorum mobilium per totum regnum Angliæ & rex conceſſit eis & confirmavit magnam chartam de libertatibus, quas pater ſuus Johannes rex dudum conceſſeret." Here the hiſtorian ſpecifies no other orders of granters, but the grandees who at that time were conſidered, in a looſe manner of ſpeaking, as the realm. But the grandees granted only for themſelves and their vilanes, as appears as well from the account of other ſubſidies, as from the plain nature of the caſe. See the perſons who granted king John his fifteenth in his Magna Carta in the Chronicle of Walter Heminford.

Of this ſubſidy in 1225, the Annaliſt of Waverley writes thus: "MCCXXV. Henricus rex Anglorum conceſſit & dedit hominibus de regno Angliæ libertates & conſuetudines ſicut erant in dictis antiquis, & fecit eis inde cartas duas. Pro hac igitur conceſſione & donatione archiepiſcopi, epiſcopi, abbates, priores, comites, barones, milites, & homines libere tenentes de regno conceſſerunt & dederunt eidem regi quindecimam partem omnium mobilium ſuorum."

Hear alſo Matt. Weſtminſter: "Anno 1225. Rex Henricus ad Natale Domini tenuit curiam ſuam apud Weſtmonaſterium, preſentibus clero & populo, cum regni magnatibus. Ipſo anno facta eſt generalis exactio quintedecimæ partis omnium mobilium catallorum, per totam Angliam, tam ſuper viros eccleſiaſticos & religioſos, quam ſeculares." And then mentions the king's grant in return of Magna Carta. Thus alſo the Annaliſt of Dunſtaple: "Anno 1225. Tandem generali colloquio Lundoniis celebrato petiit rex a baronibus ſuis, pro regni defenſione, auxilium generale. Barones vero, vice verſa, libertates quaſdam exegerunt a rege Johanne conceſſas, & ab ipſo rege poſtmodum confirmatas, licet nondum ſervatas. "Poſt multas verò ſententiarum revolutiones communitèr placuit, quòd rex tam populo quàm plebi libertates, prius ab eo puero conceſſas, jam major factus indulſerit. Et vice versâ archiepiſcopi, epiſcopi, comites, barones, & viri religioſi, ipſi regi in tanto diſcrimine XV partem mobilium ſuorum liberaliter conceſſerunt." Do not theſe accounts make it as clear as day-light, that the great councils were formed chiefly, if not altogether, of the grandees; but in the general council, convened for the granting of ſubſidies or national aid, the knights and freeholders made a part, and granted their own money?

In other places alſo we find ſubſidies granted in the ſame manner. Thus, in the Annaliſt of Dunſtaple, anno 1244, "Rex verò eodem tempore petiit auxilium, tam à clero, quàm à magnatibus & populo. Omnes verò de eo tenentes per ſervitium militare conceſſerunt ei auxilium; ſcilicet, ad ſcutum viginti ſolidos ad filiam ſuam primogenitam maritandam." That is, he beſought a general aid or ſubſidy from the clergy and grandees and people [to wit, the knights and freeholders of England]: and all who owed the king knight-ſervice in capite granted the aid called eſcuage, viz. twenty ſhillings upon each of the fiefs of their knights, for marrying his eldeſt daughter. This, we ſee, was an aſſeſſment upon military fief alone, and could only concern tenants of that deſcription. Knights fiefs were franc tenements held of their reſpective lords by knights ſervice. Some of theſe franc tenements were held of the king in capite by their reſpective lords; ſome not. Franc tenements held of the king in capite by knight-ſervice were merely liable to eſcuage, a payment ſo called, and aſſeſſed upon military fiefs: it was called an aid. The king demanded it of his tenant in capite; and the latter demanded and levied it upon his tenants; and theſe tenants were frequently called the barony of the king's tenant in capite; and it was in reference only to theſe military tenants the term in capite applied to him. Every ſuch tenant in capite had more or leſs of ſuch tenants; and the aid they paid their ſeveral lords for the king's uſe was called a ſervice, or due, from their fiefs. But theſe tenants of the king in capite had oftentimes knights and freeholders holding of them tenements which their lords did not hold of the king in capite. And in the granting of aids to the king by the grandees and community of the realm, the latter were aſſeſſed, as well as the former, under the name of eſcuage. Thus, in the famous caſe of the Prior of Coventry, all the knights and freeholders of the prior amounted to 10 knights fiefs, and all paid to the aid, although the barony of the prior owed the king no more than two knights fiefs by ſervice. About the 20th of Henry (anno 1235) eſcuage was levied upon knights fiefs, for the marriage of the king's ſiſter Iſabella to the emperor of Germany. The aſſeſſment was after the rate of forty ſhillings for each knight's fee, and the prior of Coventry paid the king £.20. and levied the ſame upon his knights and freeholders. About the 39th year of the ſame king (i. e. 1255), an aid, called eſcuage, was aſſeſſed upon each knight's fief after the ſame rate. In the 17th of Edward III. theſe precedents furniſhed a colour to the barons of the Exchequer for demanding from the prior of Coventry a ſervice for his knights fees after the rate of ten knights; whereas, as he alleges, as well he as his predeceſſors held all their lands and tenements, to wit, as well thoſe which they had in demeſne, as thoſe they had in ſervice by the ſervice of two knights fees only. And as to what was found, as was alleged, in the Rolls, "Quod tempore dicti regis Henrici tertii computandum fuit de certis pecuniæ ſummis de auxiliis eidem regi Henrico ad filium ſuum militem faciendum & ſororem ſuam maritandam conceſſis—dicit, quod auxilia illa non fuerunt nec cenſeri poſſunt eſſe ſervitia, immo quædam ſubſidia per magnates & communitatem regni ſpontaneâ & merâ voluntate regi conceſſa," &c. Brady's Introduction in Appendix, p. 26.

OF AID, CARUCAGE, HIDAGE, DANEGELD, ESCUAGE.

Aid. I will define this word according to the feudiſts. It was the honourable contribution of a vaſſal to his lord; that is, to him from whom his fief was derived; to whom he owed homage and fealty; who guaranteed to him his fief; whom he was bound by reciprocal ties to honour and protect; and was honourable, being gratuitous; and to diſtinguiſh it from ſervice, or what was due to the lord de jure. If the lord applied to his tenant for aid, it was to be but ſeldom; it was to be reaſonable or moderate, apportioned to the giver's ability, and the receiver's neceſſity. Carucage was a tax upon charues or ploughlands: "Carucagium, id eſt hidagium," ſays an antient chronicler. "Hydagium & carucagium idem ſonant," ſays another. They were therefore undoubtedly pretty much alike. But, as I frequently find ſome difference, I conceive carucage to be the old hidage, put under new regulations, and taken upon new ſurveys. Both words import a diſtribution of the hides and other lands belonging to each pariſh into hides and charues; that is, portions not of equal extent, but of equal value. The valuation, once made, turned the hide and the charue into hidate and carucate; each ſtanding for the ſuppoſed yearly value of what was rated by the charue. Such valuations, the reader ſees, muſt be for ever fluctuating. But ſuch aſſeſſments upon every occaſion might be troubleſome and expenſive; and it might be invidious to aſſeſs with rigour. William Rufus was reputed a great oppreſſor: Ordericus ſays, he meaſured all the hides, that is, he ſays, the carucates of England, with a rope. To have ſome notion of hidage or carucage, we muſt recollect, that at that time moſt pariſhes conſiſted of what we call open undivided fields, which are now diſtinguiſhed by yardlands, which are only parcels or members of hides or charues; and as now every pariſh knows how many yardlands its fields contain, ſo it did then. The tillage lands being the chief ſource of all the tax, it took its name from them. But other lands were alſo rated when the eſtimate could be made of them; and I find gardens, woods, waters, and, I think, mills alſo, rated to the hidage. Carucage was not, I think, granted by the community of England more than about twice between the acceſſion of Henry III. anno 1216, and the year 1248. The ſame aſſembly granted ſubſidies, or tax, upon the moveables or chattels. The carucage was generally two ſhillings per charue. In times ſubſequent to Henry II. the carucage ſeems to have been ſubſtituted for the dona: it charged under one grant the landed property (comprehending, as I conceive, the beaſts of the plough, and other live ſtock, and alſo all the commonage, paſture, and meadow ground, appendant to each pariſh), of the proprietor and his tenants, whether freeholders or baſe tenants. The king's bailiffs, ſuch as his ſhire-reeves, and bailiffs of hundreds, and of towns, and his miniſters ſpecially appointed for aſſeſſing carucage and ſubſidy, durſt not enter the fiefs of the grandees, either to aſſeſs or levy, without the company of the lord himſelf, or of his ſeneſchal or bailiff. Such fiefs were liberties or franchiſes, and the king's bailiff could not enter them.

[B] Of the DANEGELD, ESCUAGE, CARUCAGE, alias HIDAGE.

We may fix the commencement of the Engliſh monarchy about the year 900. Till the diſſolution of the Heptarchy we ſhall not expect to find a general tax throughout England. Danegeld was the firſt thing of this ſort; and it was impoſed anno 991. "Ethelredi regis anno decimo tertio primum ſtatuerunt Angli conſilio infauſto Siricii archiepiſcopi, quod ipſi cenſum Danis perſolverent, quatenus à rapinis & cæde deſiſterent, & dederunt eis decem millia librarum." Huntingdom.—"Quo inſuper anno Sirici Dorobornenſis archiepiſcopi, & ducum Athelwardi & Alfrici conſilio Danis tributum, quod erat decem librarum primitus datum eſt, ut a crebris rapinis incendiis, & hominum occiſionibus, quas circa maris ripas frequenter agebant, deſiſterent pacemque firmam cum eis tenerent." This tax was upon the hides of land throughout England, or at leaſt the greater part, and was a national tax. It was in fact no more than hidage, ſtyled Danegeld from the occaſion of it. But, inſtead of being ſubſequently given to the Danes, to purchaſe a forbearance of their predatory invaſions, it was made a revenue to procure ſhips and arms to repel them. William I. found this a ſort of perennial tax on his acceſſion; but, having eſtabliſhed a firm government, and leſſened the fear of Daniſh invaſion, he thought the effect ſhould keep pace with the cauſe; and therefore, with the advice of his council of barons, or chief men of the realm, made a ſtatute, That in future this tax ſhould never be levied but in ſeaſons of impending danger, or great public alarm. Accordingly it was levied very ſeldom in his reign; no more, I think, than twice, when the Danes were collecting their whole ſtrength for the ſubjugation of England. The nation, however, was but little the better for this juſt and public-ſpirited regulation of the firſt William. The wars between Robert Curthoſe (who was diſinherited of the crown of England by his father and the grandees, for rebellion and treaſon), and William Rufus firſt, and again, after Rufus's death, between the two ſurviving brothers, induced both Rufus and Beauclerc to revive the odious tax of Danegeld, which Huntingdon, who flouriſhed in the court of Henry Beauclerc, thought England would never, without great providence, get rid of. Hoc autem malum (theſe are his words) uſque in hodiernum diem duravit, & diu niſi dei pietas ſubveniat, durabit. The grandees of England, before they would elect Stephen of Blois to be their king, obliged him to aboliſh Danegeld for ever by his ſolemn charter; and I do not know that it was laid upon the nation in his reign. But it ſeems to have been a monſter hardly to be cruſhed by the club of Hercules.

Henry II. had no poſitive paſſion for war, from a dread of its expence, and a conviction of its uncertain iſſue; yet his rapacity, and perhaps real provocation in ſome inſtances, involved him in many quarrels, and never ſuffered him to enjoy any durable tranquillity. His eſcuages were frequent, and ſeverely felt. In the 14th year of his reign, Danegeld was aſſeſſed throughout the realm, to raiſe a portion for his daughter Maud.

Henry levied this tax with the advice of his grandees. This king was a great œconomiſt, if œconomy can be predicated of a man who was not very ſcrupulous about the means whereby he acquired wealth, and who was ſolicitous to hoard it more from ſelfiſh policy, than a deſire of doing any ſort of good with it, either to his ſubjects or his friends. Coeval hiſtorians do not, however, ſtigmatize him for the enormity of his oppreſſions; a ſymptom in his favour, which ought not to be overlooked. Several things occurred in his time worthy of an hiſtorian's notice who would ſpeak of finance. Our records ſhew, that he had frequent recourſe to benevolences, as a mode of raiſing money; this was one. Another, his introduction of eſcuage. Perhaps he was not, in ſtrictneſs, the author of theſe expedients; one cannot doubt, however, but that he was at leaſt ſo much concerned in improving them, as to be ſomething very like their author; and that, from what he did concerning them, they acquired a national conſequence. The famous author of The Dialogue de Scaccario could find no aſſeſſment of eſcuage before his time; he muſt mean an allowed general eſcuage; for the thing implying a commutation for perſonal ſervice in the king's war, could not but be permitted before that time, when the military tenant was not able to do his duty perſonally, and the eccleſiaſtical barons ſeem generally to have compounded. Of the dona or benevolences, the reader may find large and curious inſtances in the Hiſtory of the Exchequer. Mr. Madox ſeems, in his partiality to prerogative, to have conſidered them rather as dues to the crown, than gratuities; and he might be juſtified in ſuppoſing that Henry Curtmantel viewed them in the ſame light, from the rigour with which the Exchequer in that reign exacted their payment. But there is ample proof, that the proper ſenſe of donum was gratuity. The author of the Dialogue gives the following account of eſcuage: "Fit interdum, ut imminente vel inſurgente in regnum hoſtium machinatione decernat rex de ſingulis feodis militum ſummam aliquam ſolvi, marcam ſcilicet, vel libram unam, unde militibus ſtipendia vel donativa ſuccedant. Mavult enim princeps ſtipendiarios, quàm domeſticos bellicis apponere caſibus. Hæc itaque ſumma, quia nomine ſcutorum colligitur ſcutagium nuncupatur." Lib. I. c. 9. This was a great departure from William the Firſt's grand ſcheme of a national milice, formed out of the vaſſals of the crown, at once the chief men of the realm both in rank and property, and their vaſſals, who held fiefs of them by knight's ſervice. All theſe, by the inſtitution of military fiefs at the Conqueſt, became bound to defend the king's dominions by their bodies: "Terras autem militibus ita diſtribuit, & eorum ordines ita diſpoſuit, ut Angliæ regnum ſexaginta millia militum indeſinenter haberet, & ad imperium regis, prout ratio popoſcerit, celeriter exhiberet." Ordericus. In compenſation for the toils of war, military tenants were placed by ſtatute out of the reach of talliage; their lands were to be entirely free, "ab omni exactione injuſtâ, & ab omni tallagio;" ſo enacts a ſtatute of the firſt William. With which agrees that of Henry Beauclerc: "Militibus, qui per loricas terras ſuas defendunt" (that is, who hold their eſtates by the ſervice of the ſhield or hauberc), terras dominicarum carucarum ſuarum quietas ab omnibus geldis, & omni proprio dono meo concedo." Either proprio is the adjective to dono, or an error of the text; probably after omni ought to be exactione. If the Engliſh nobility ſuffered their minds and arms to ruſt, while their king was maintaining large armies of mercenaries at their expence, they were haſtening to a ſtate of ſlavery.

In the laſt year of this reign, a new ſort of tax was impoſed, which ſeems, after his deceaſe, to have extended far beyond the firſt intention; viz. a tithe of all the rents and chattels of the kingdom, aſſeſſed by ſtrict ſurvey, and taken ad valorem. The pretence was the king's cruſade, and the ſuccour of Paleſtine; conſequently it had the approbation of the Holy See, and of many good Chriſtians, as well as of king Henry. After his deceaſe, it was found very convenient to be repeated for purpoſes of ſtate only. This ſeems to be the origin of ſubſidies: which at length wholly ſuperſeded carucage or hidage.

Of Richard I. we may ſay his regal features are almoſt unknown to poſterity, except through the medium of his exactions. In a reign of ten years he was not in the whole reſident in England ſo many months. His cruſade was calamitous to the Infidels; hardly leſs ſo to his ſubjects. His captivity and redemption deprived them almoſt of their laſt ſterling. He twice levied the hidage: the latter time at four ſhillings per each charue, or ploughland; which was reckoned extremely high. Let it be remembered, that taxes then were impoſed only pro hâc vice.

Brompton, ſpeaking of Richard's aſſeſſing the hidage, calls it tributum minus uſitatum; which implies the infrequency of it at that time. It ſeems to be gradually giving way, as a general tax, to ſubſidy or tax upon rents and moveables. For moveables, I frequently find chattels; which ſhews the words to be equivalent. All ſubſidies, however, did not include rents, or the clear annual value of freehold eſtates. Richard's premature death might have been deemed propitious to England, had he been ſucceeded by a prince of more worth than John Lackland, whoſe deteſtability was ſaid to foul even hell itſelf:

> "Anglia ſicut adhuc ſordet fœtore Joannis: > Sordida fœtatur fœdante Johanne gehenna." M. Paris.

All the taxation known in this age conſiſted of carucage, eſcuage, and ſubſidy. John had recourſe in turn to them all; and, to do him juſtice, he ſeems to have grounded his demands in the exigence of his occaſions. Moſt writers, however, of his time, repreſent all the money he acquired by thoſe means as extortions and robberies; which ſhews the public was not yet prepared for taxation; nor indeed does it ſeem able to bear it; and taxation was felt the more, as it was the public opinion there would be no cauſe for it, with a prudent management of the royal revenue. William I. was immenſely rich, notwithſtanding the wars and commotions of his reign. He was indulgent with reſpect to the hidage in levying it very ſeldom: but his hidages were unmercifully high. He ſeems, however, to have been a very hard landlord with reſpect to his manors and other demeſnes.

In the courſe of John's reign, things came to a criſis. The prelates and barons ſaw the conſtitution much impaired ſince the demiſe of William I. and were determined to bring it back to the ſtandard of that king's laws, and the ſtatutes of Henry I. made at his election, which confirmed afreſh the laws of the Conqueror. The well-known ſtruggle enſued between John and his barons; and the former reluctantly conceded Magna Charta at Runingmede, on the 15th of June, 17 John, A. D. 1216. It was allowed and ratified by John upon his oath, under his great ſeal, with the expreſs ſecurity of being done and delivered, bona fide, ſine malo ingenio. And yet this king, who ſaid he was thereby turned from rex to fæx, had hardly parted from his barons, but he commenced a ſavage civil war againſt them; in which he would have been pretty certain of loſing his crown, and probably his life too, if the nation had not fortunately been ridded of him by other means. Whether, however, he died a violent or natural death, is not determined. As one of the principal objects of the baronial league (in which epithet I include the clergy) was to reſtrain the crown from arbitrary and undue taxation, which was now coming to an alarming pitch, we might naturally expect ſome very preciſe and ſtrong proviſions on that head. The ſubject was not forgot in the capitula, or heads, from which the Great Charter was drawn; and in the tenor of the charter, theſe capitula received additional ſtrength. They are as follow: "Nullum ſcutagium vel auxilium ponatur in regno noſtro niſi per commune concilium regni noſtri; niſi ad corpus noſtrum redimendum, & primogenitum filium noſtrum militem faciendum, & ad filiam noſtram primogenitam ſemel maritandam: et ad hæc non fiat niſi rationabile auxilium. Simili modo fiat de auxiliis de civitate London; & civitas London habeat omnes antiquas libertates & liberas conſuetudines ſuas; & ad habendum commune conſilium regni de auxilio aſſidendo, aliter quàm in tribus caſibus predictis, vel de ſcutagio aſſidendo, ſummoneri faciemus archiepiſcopos, epiſcopos, abbates, comites, & majores barones, ſigillatim per literas noſtras; & preterea faciemus ſummoneri in generali, per vicecomites & ballivos noſtros, omnes illos qui de nobis tenent in capite ad certum diem; ſcilicet, ad terminum quadraginta dierum ad minus, & ad certum locum. Et in omnibus literis illius ſummonitionis cauſam ſummonionis exprimemus; et, ſic factâ ſummonitione, negotium ad diem aſſignatum procedat ſecundùm conſilium illorum qui preſentes fuerint, quamvis non omnes ſummoniti venerint. E Cartâ Magnâ Johannis regis, 15 June, anno regni 17°." If we recollect that the chief object of the community of England, when they demanded in arms the ſtatute of rights, called Magna Carta, was to prevent arbitrary taxation, under which they had groaned more or leſs from the demiſe of William I, to the parliament at Runingmede, it muſt raiſe our wonder, to find this paſſage wholly omitted in all the great charters, to which the kings of England have been ſworn, from the 9th of Henry III. to the preſent day. That prince, on his becoming major, and taking the helm of government into his own hand, A. D. 1225, was required by his barons, previous to his aſſuming kingly power, to confirm by a ſolemn and freſh recognition the Great Charter. He is ſaid, by all hiſtorians, to have done ſo. But in the charter which bears his ſeal on this occaſion, there is a total omiſſion of this paſſage. Nor is there to be found the purport of it, or any ſort of alluſion to it; and yet any one would have thought himſelf ſafe in affirming, that no ſort of alteration had been made, upon reading M. Paris's relation of this affair at the time it happened, or what he ſays on the ſubject in other parts of his hiſtory. "Anno 1225, Petiit ergo rex ab omnibus [ſcilicet, archiepiſcopis, epiſcopis, comitibus, baronibus, & aliis univerſis], conſilium paritèr & auxilium, quibus corona Angliæ dignitates amiſſas ac jura poſſet priſtina revocare. Ad hoc quoque plenè perficiendum regi ſufficere credidit, ſi ei quintadecima pars omnium rerum mobilium totius regni Angliæ, tam à perſonis eccleſiaſticis quàm à laicis donaretur. His in hunc modum proſecutis, archiepiſcopus, & concio tota epiſcoporum, comitum, baronum, abbatum, & priorum, habitâ deliberatione, regi dedere reſponſum; quod regis petitionibus gratantèr adquieſcerent ſi illis diu petitas libertates concedere voluiſſet. Annuit itaque rex, cupiditate ductus, quod petebant magnates: chartiſque protinus conſcriptis, & regio ſigillo munitis, ad ſingulos Angliæ comitatus chartæ ſingulæ diriguntur; & ad provincias illas, quæ in foreſtis ſunt conſtitutæ, duæ chartæ ſunt directæ; una ſcilicet de libertatibus communibus, et altera de libertatibus foreſtæ. Iſtarum autem tenor chartarum ſuperiùs habetur expreſſiùs; ubi hiſtoria agitur de rege Johanne: ita quòd chartæ utrorumque regum in nullo inveniuntur diſſimiles." Theſe charters differ in another very material point. It was the determination of the univerſity, that the nation ſhould have preciſely the ſame liberties it had by the laws of William I. and Henry I. In Henry the Third's charter, it was to have the liberties it had in the time of his grandfather Henry II. which was quite another thing.

It equally deſerves obſervation, that although theſe proviſions of John's charter were actually expunged from the charter ratified by Henry III. anno Domini 1225; yet in a famous parliament of his time the barons recur to the very clauſes expunged, as if to the beſt of their knowledge they ſtill made a part of the charter. See M. Paris, anno 1255. And not the leaſt hint is to be found in M. Paris of his being apprized of the contrary when he left off writing, A. D. 1259. I ſuſpect the barons did not well look after king Henry and his miniſters, when the great ſeal was put to the charter, A. D. 1225.

This defalcation of Magna Charta was probably meant to be ſupplied by the ſtatute De Tallagio non concedendo, 25 Edward I; but Mr. Madox ſays, the latter was never inrolled, as far as he could diſcover. Mr. Madox, however, I believe, is miſtaken.

Taxation is the teſt of every political conſtitution; and rights depend in great meaſure upon antient maxims and practices. We are tracing the cauſes of a bloody civil war, and of a prodigious revolution in the government of England. In preceding notes I have endeavoured to elucidate ſome very obſcure and perplexed parts of our antient hiſtory, that the reader might not be bewildered in the region through which he was to travel. As a ſort of ſupplement to what I have already ſuggeſted on the general ſubject of Anglo-Saxon taxation, I beg to ſubmit the following outline of taxation from the commencement of John, A. D. 1200, to the year 1248, when our earl of Leiceſter was made ſeneſchal of Gaſcogne; whoſe appointment to that office was one cauſe of Henry the Third's convening the univerſity of the realm in the beginning of that year; ſubſequent taxes to the death of Simon de Montfort will be interwoven with the preſent memoir.

CARUCAGE, ESCUAGE, and SUBSIDIES in King JOHN's time.

"Anno 1200. Rex Anglorum interim tranfretavit in Angliam; & cepit de unaquaque carucata terræ totius Angliæ tres ſolidos de auxilio; expletiſque aliis negotiis in Normanniam iterum tranfretavit." M. Paris. Eodem anno, "Sub diebus iſtis, Gaufridus Eboracenſis, ex mandato regis Johannis, ſpoliatus eſt omnibus bonis ſui archiepiſcopatus. Jacobus autem vicecomes Eboracenſis, & miniſtri ejus, maneria illius ſimul & clericorum virorumque religioſorum poſſeſſiones violenter aggreſſi, bona eorum diſtrahere preſumpſerunt, unde idem archiepiſcopus Jacobum prefatum nominatim excommunicavit, & in genere omnes hujus violentiæ authores; quique regem adverſus eum in iram & indignationem commoverant. Cauſa enim regiæ perturbationis contra eum multiplex erat, primo quod non permiſit præfatum vicecomitem colligere carucagium in ſuâ dioceſi ad opus regis. Sicut ei fuerat generaliter per Angliam conceſſum." M. Paris.

"Anno gratiæ 1201. Deinde Northanumbriam rex profectus maximam pecuniæ ſummam à comprovincialibus regionis illius extorſit." M. Paris.

"Anno 1204. Deinde in craſtino circumciſionis convenerunt ad colloquium apud Oxoniam rex & magnates Angliæ; ubi conceſſa ſunt regi auxilia militaria, de quolibet ſcuto, ſcilicet duæ marcæ & dimidia. Nec etiam epiſcopi & abbates ſive eccleſiaſticæ perſonæ ſine promiſſione receſſerunt." M. Paris.

"Anno 1205. Reverſus autem rex cepit de comitibus, baronibus, militibus, & viris religioſis, pecuniam infinitam; occaſiones pretendens, quod noluerunt ipſum ſequi ad partes tranſmarinas, ut hereditatem amiſſam recuperaret." M. Paris.

"Anno 1207. Rex Joannes celebravit Natale Domini apud Wintoniam, preſentibus magnatibus regni. Deinde in Purificatione Beatæ Mariæ cepit per totam Angliam tertiam decimam partem ex omnibus mobilibus & rebus aliis, tam de laicis quam de viris eccleſiaſticis, & prelatis cunctis murmurantibus ſed contradicere non audentibus. Solus Gaufridus archiepiſcopus Eboracenſis non conſentiens, ſed plane contradicens."

"Anno 1210. Deinde Londonias cum feſtinatione properans fecit omnes Angliæ prelatos in ſuâ preſentiâ convenire. Venerunt autem ad hanc generalem vocationem abbates, priores, abbatiſſæ, Templarii, Hoſpitalarii, cuſtodes villarum ordinis Cluniacenſis, & aliarum regionum tranſmarinarum, cujuſcunque dignitatis & ordinis; qui omnes ad tam gravem compulſi ſunt redemptionem, ac rerum eccleſiaſticarum dilapidationem, quòd ſumma extortæ pecuniæ excreviſſe fertur ad centum millia librarum ſterlingorum. Albi quoque monachi de regno Angliæ, aliis exceptis, quadraginta millia librarum argenti in hoc tallagio, vellent nollent, caſſatis privilegiis regi perſolverunt. Cujus rei ſeriem ſi quis pleniùs proſequeretur lacrymas excuteret tyrannorum, & animos audientium perturbaret." M. Paris.

"Anno 1207. Poſtea generaliter ſtatuit per univerſum regnum, ut omnes homines de cujuſcunque feodo jurarent pretium catallorum ſuorum de immobili & mobili, & de ſuis darent decimam tertiam partem regi ad recuperandam hereditatem ſuam in Normannia, & in aliis terris ſuis." Annales Waverl.

"Anno 1207. Rex Johannes rediens de Pictaviâ coadunatis magnatibus terræ apud Oxenford de aſſenſu eorum cepit XIII partem omnium catallorum hominum totius Angliæ. Pontifices verò & viri religioſi cujuſcunque profeſſionis eſſent omnes indiſcretè, cum rege & ſuis pro ſe & hominibus ſuis pacem fecerunt ut meliùs potuerunt." Annales de Margan.

"Anno 1207. Rex Johannes extorſit tredecimam partem omnium bonorum mobilium, tam de clericis religioſis & ſecularibus quàm de laicis." Cron. Th. Wykes.

"Anno 1207. Eodem anno data eſt regi tredecima per Angliam; et tunc habuit rex de Dunſtaple centum marcas preter munera vicecomitis, & preter finem, quem fecimus de dominicis noſtris, ſcilicet, undecim marcas." Cron. de Dunſtaple.

"Deinde in Purificatione Beatæ Mariæ, tantum de rapina cogitans, & ponens ſpem & brachium in pecuniæ theſauris cœpit per totam Angliam tertiam decimam partem ex omnibus mobilibus & rebus aliis, tam de laicis quam viris aliis eccleſiaſticis & prelatis, cunctis murmurantibus, & contradicere non audentibus, imprecantibus tamen & optantibus, ut talis rapina nequaquam bonos eventus ſortiretur. Quæ oratio à domino eſt audita, ſicut ſequens narratio declarabit; ſolus Galfridus archiepiſcopus Eboracenſis non conſentiens, ſed planè contradicens clanculo receſſit ab Angliâ, & in receſſu ſuo omnes ſpecialiter in archiepiſcopatu ſuo hanc rapinam facientes, & in genere univerſos eccleſiæ, ſive rerum eccleſiaſticarum invaſores anathematis ſententia innodavit." M. Weſtm. anno 1207.

"Rex verò interim nunc hunc, nunc illum, de magnatibus regni, vel pecuniâ injuſtè mulctavit, vel libertatibus aut poſſeſſionibus ſpoliavit, nonnullos uxoribus ſuis zelotypavit, filias defloravit, ita quod manifeſte tam Deo quàm hominibus exoſus videretur & deteſtabilis." M. Weſt. 1208.

CARUCAGES and ESCUAGES in HENRY III's time to 1248.

"Rex vicecomitibus Northampton, ſalutem. Scias quod pro magnâ neceſſitate noſtrâ, & ingentiſſimâ debitorum noſtrorum inſtantiâ, necnon & pro conſervatione terræ noſtræ Pictav. conceſſerunt nobis ſuâ gratiâ communitèr omnes magnates & fideles totius regni noſtri donum nobis faciendum, ſcilicet, de quâlibet carucâ, ſicut juncta fuit craſtino beati Johannis proxime preterito anno regni noſtri quarto duos ſolidos, &c. Clauſ. Hen. III. Brady's Introduction in Appendix, p. 41.

"Anno Domini MCCXX. Henricus rex accepit tallagium per totam Angliam de ſingulis carucis duos ſolidos." Ex Annalibus, &c. Madox, Exchequer, vol. I. p. 706.

"Eodem anno (ſcilicet 1220), menſe Septembri, poſitum eſt carucagium per totum regnum ad opus domini regis; à quo archiepiſcopi et epiſcopi, et omnes clerici, et omnes viri religioſi, et eorum ruſtici quieti fuerunt. Veruntamen epiſcopi per ſuas dioceſes collegerunt auxilium ad opus domini regis ab abbatibus & prioribus, per liberam voluntatem eorum: et tunc domus de Dunſtaple ſolvit tres marcas."

I will give the different accounts of a carucagium, as alſo of an eſcuage, in the year 1224, taken on account of the ſiege of Bedford. I begin with Matthew Paris: "Regi verò pro maximis laboribus ſuis, & expenſis, tam à prelatis quàm à laicis, conceſſum eſt per totam Angliam carucagium, de quâlibet carucâ duo ſolidi argenti. Magnatibus item conceſſit rex ſcutagium; viz. de ſcuto quolibet duas marcas ſterlingorum, & ſic omnes ad propria receſſerunt." The omnes, according to the context, were archiepiſcopi, epiſcopi, comites, barones, & alii multi, who had met a little before in common council, de regni negotiis tractaturi, at Northampton; whence, upon a ſudden alarm, they all haſtened to the ſiege of Bedford. According to the Annaliſt of Dunſtaple, the king was in a conſultation with the clergy and barons of the realm on the affairs of Poitou, when notice was brought of a ſedition, and the taking of Bedford caſtle. "Quòd rex gravitèr ferens obſedit Bedefordiam, in cujus auxilium venit Cantuarienſis archiepiſcopus, cum epiſcopis et abbatibus ſuffraganeis; et inſuper conceſſerunt ei carucagium; ſcilicet, dimidiam marcam de ſingulis carucis dominicis; et duos ſolidos de ſingulis carucis tenentium ſuorum, et duos operarios de ſingulis hidis ad machinas exercendas. Sed ne hoc traheretur aliàs in ſervitutem dominus rex conceſſit eis cartam de futuri temporis immunitate."

Next for John abbot of Peterburg: "In illâ obſidione conceſſum fuit ab omni clero & populo; viz. de ſingulis carucis epiſcoporum & abbatum in baroniâ, ſimilitèr & hominum ſuorum, dimidium marcæ, & à ſingulis carucis omnium non tenentium in baroniâ, & hominum ſuorum, duo ſolidi tantum darentur." Cron. Joannis Abb. Petr. de Burgo.

"Rex omnibus, &c. ſalutem. Cum peteremus à prelatis Angliæ, quod nobis auxilium facerent pro magnâ neceſſitate noſtrâ de quâ eis conſtabat; viz. epiſcopis, abbatibus, abbatiſſis, prioribus et prioriſſis, qui de nobis tenent in capite, ipſi nobis liberalitèr conceſſerunt auxilium tale; ſcilicet, de ſingulis feodis militum ſuorum quæ de eis tenentur 40 ſol." 15 Hen. III. E. Recordis. Brady's Introduction to Appendix, p. 42. Before, we ſaw the king give his warrant for the abbots, &c. to aſſeſs the ſcutage upon their vaſſals, to indemnify them concerning their expences in the king's expedition. Here we ſee them granting the king an eſcuage out of their knights fiefs.

"Eodem anno conceſſa eſt quadrageſima totius Angliæ domino regi de blado habito die Sancti Matthæi Apoſtoli; et de averiis tunc apparentibus; eccleſiæ verò, et earum bona jure parochiali ad ea ſpectantia, ab hoc tallagio fuerunt libera." Annal. Dunſtaple, anno 1232. M. Paris calls this a tallage, and ſays it was granted à prelatis & proceribus regni; while others enumerate all the orders ſpecified in a former note.

"Eodem anno [1235] Fredericus imperator Alemanniæ, duxit in uxorem Iſabellam filiam Johannis regis Angliæ, accipiens pro dote triginta millia marcarum; pro quibus petitum & conceſſum fuit generale ſcutagium duarum marcarum per totam Angliam; non ſolum de feodis habitis in capite de rege, ſed etiam de aliis cultis; domus etiam religioſæ, tam de fundatione regis quam alia, ad hoc ſuum auxilium præſtiterunt."

"Rex omnibus ad quos preſentes literæ pervenerint ſalutem. Sciatis, quod cum nuper rogaſſemus archiepiſcopos, epiſcopos, abbates, priores, et alias perſonas eccleſiaſticas de regno noſtro, quod pro urgenti neceſſitate noſtra auxilium nobis impenderent, ipſi gratis et ſpontanea voluntate nobis conceſſerunt quoddam auxilium de omnibus feodis ſuis, tam de illis de quibus nobis reſpondent quando ſcutagium datur, quam de aliis quæ retinent ad opus ſuum, videlicet, duas marcas de ſcuto quolibet; ne igitur hujuſmodi conceſſio et auxilii præſtatio poſſit aliquo tempore trahi in conſequentiam, concedimus pro nobis et heredibus noſtris, et preſentium tenore proteſtamur, quod pro gratiâ hâc vice nobis factâ, prædictis archiepiſcopis, epiſcopis, abbatibus, prioribus, et aliis perſonis eccleſiaſticis, vel eorum ſucceſſoribus, aut eccleſiis ſuis in poſterum non derogetur. In cujus rei teſtimonium has literas noſtras patentes fieri fecimus. Teſte rege apud Weſtm. quarto die Mai." Pat. 20 Hen. III. Madox, Exchequer, vol. I. p. 607.

"Quia per commune conſilium regni conceſſæ fuerunt duæ marcæ de ſingulis feodis militum de auxilio promiſſo ad ſororem regis maritandam; viz. tam de novo feſamento, quam de veteri; nec conſtat regi, quæ vel quot feoda militum ſunt in comitatu Herefordiæ; ideo mandatum eſt vicecomiti, quod diligenter inquirat per ſacramentum duodecim tam militum quam aliorum proborum et legalium hominum per quos, &c. et qui tales ſint, &c. quot feoda militum teneantur de ſingulis tenentibus de rege in capite in comitatu ſuo, tam de novo feſamento quam de veteri; et diſtringat tenentes ſingula feoda prædicta ad reddendum regi duas marcas, de ſingulis feodis de prædicto auxilio, niſi prius inde ei ſatisfecerint; ita quod habeat prædictos denarios à die S. Trinitatis in quindecim dies." E. Rot. Hen. III. Madox, Exchequer, vol. I. p. 593. Hence it appears that the commune concilium regni conſiſted of the king's tenants in capite, holding in and by the ſervice of their knights. M. Paris calls the above magnum ſcutagium.

"Anno 1244. Rex verò eodem tempore petiit auxilium tam à clero quam à magnatibus et populo; omnes verò de eo tenentes per ſervitium militare conceſſerunt ei auxilium; ſcilicet, ad ſcutum viginti ſolidos ad filiam ſuam primogenitam maritandam. Hoc facto miſit nuncios ſuos per totam Angliam ad viros religioſos, qui nihil tenebant de eo per ſervitium militare; petens ab eis auxilium; et obtinuit. Et tunc ſolvimus nos centum ſolidos anno ſequente." Annal. de Dunſtaple.

"Auxilium conceſſum regi ad filiam ſuam primogenitam maritandam; ſcilicet, de quolibet feodo viginti ſolidorum. De eodem auxilio à prelatis conceſſo—abbas de Heyneſham quinque marcas." Then follow the contributions of many other inferior abbeys, who did not hold in barony. See Madox, Exchequer, vol. I. p. 597.

It was in the power of the magnates, aſſembled in common council, to increaſe or diminiſh this aid upon the fiefs of their tenants in capite: "Concordatum eſt et communiter conceſſum, quod ad auxilium ad primogenitam filiam maritandam dentur de quolibet feodo quadraginta ſolidorum; ita ſcilicet, quod non cedat eis in prejudicium preſens conceſſio, quin auxilium alias in caſu conſimili concedendum augeatur vel minuatur, ſecundum quod magnates Angliæ tunc temporis duxerint concedendum; et quod predictum auxilium levetur de feodis, ſicut auxilium alias conceſſum levari conſuevit." Rot. 18 Edw. I. Madox, Exchequer, vol. I. p. 599. Such was the difference of the aid for marrying the king's daughter between 29 Henry III. (ſc. 1244), and 18 Edward I.

Eſcuage, for the above purpoſe, according to John's charter, was a due to the king; it was hardly, therefore, deſerving the name of aid, except as to the quantum. Tenants in capite by ſocage were not charged to this aid; at leaſt non de jure. See documents extracted by Madox.

Sometimes the earls and barons met in council to conſider of ſcutage to the king, as for his expedition or the like, without the archbiſhops and biſhops; then the military tenants of the latter were not aſſeſſed: but they might meet ſeparately and aſſeſs their tenants. Madox, Exch. vol. I. p. 607. Such an inſtance happened 13 Hen. III. (anno 1229).

In the grant of a ſcutage by the tenants in capite, if any of them diſſented, neither himſelf or his military tenants paid it.

A BRIEF ACCOUNT of the Earls of CHESTER, and others, Lords of the Country ſituate between the Ribble and the Merſey; illuſtrative of the preceding and ſubſequent Articles.

AFTER the final baniſhment of Roger of Poitou, A. D. 1106, this fine country, compriſing the larger half of Lancaſhire, ſeems to have remained in the king's hands, till it was beſtowed on Ranulf de Bricaſard, the third earl of Cheſter. In a charter of this Ranulf's ſon, annexed to this Memoir [1], Ranulf the father is mentioned next after Roger of Poitou, as lord of this extenſive region. I cannot diſcover at what time, or upon what account, Henry I. yielded this territory to Ranulf.

During the weak and tumultuous reign of Stephen, Ranulf ſon of the above, and fourth of the earls of Cheſter, poſſeſſed himſelf of almoſt a third part of the whole realm of England. Some of this he might acquire by uſurpation; but the greater part ſeems to have been founded in an hereditary claim, as appears by the grants made to him both by Stephen and king Henry II. In a former part of this work [2], may be ſeen his famous agreement with Robert earl of Leiceſter; and a ſpecification ſhall be given [3] of the fiefs confirmed to him by the ſolemn act of Henry of Anjou, in the alliance made between them about the year 1150; which had for its object the depoſition of king Stephen, and raiſing Henry of Anjou to the throne of England. Among the great variety of lands ceded to Ranulf the ſon [4] by both thoſe princes, is all the land contained between Ribble and Merſey, and all that belonged to Roger of Poitou, whereſoever ſituate. Of this celebrated earl, who was nephew to Edwin earl of Mercia, and married a daughter of the earl of Glouceſter, lord Lyttelton ſays, that among the Engliſh nobility none was more powerful, none of more conſequence to either of the parties. He died in 1156 [5].

From Ranulf the ſon it deſcended to Hugh [6] de Kevelioc and Ranulf ſurnamed de Blundeville, ſon and grandſon of the former, and ſucceſſively earls of Cheſter. To this Ranulf was given by king John, in 1215, the cuſtody of the earldom of Leiceſter; which, though we find it the next year in the poſſeſſion of Stephen de Segrave, was again committed to the care of earl Ranulf in 1219 [7].

Ranulf de Blundeville [8], in 13 Henry III. had a confirmation from the king of all his lands [9] between the Ribble and Merſey, viz. the town of Weſt Derby, with the wapentake; the borough of Liverpool, the town and wapentake of Salford, and wapentake of Lailond; with all foreſts, hays, homages, and other appurtenances. We find likewiſe from other authentic vouchers, that he executed the office of ſheriff, by his deputies, for the county of Lancaſter, in the third, fourth, fifth, ſixth, ſeventh, and ninth, of that king [10].

In 15 Hen. III. this Ranulf de Blundevill purchaſed all the lands of Roger de Mareſey, which he had between the rivers of Ribble and Merſey. Theſe lands were very conſiderable [11], and are diſtinctly enumerated in a deed copied into the great Coucher of the Dutchy [12]. Ranulf paid down 40 marks of ſilver for theſe lands, and afterward 200 marks more; and agreed farther to render annually at Eaſter ſome white gloves, or one penny, for all ſervices whatſoever.

This Ranulf was earl of Cheſter fifty-one years; and died in 1232.

Leaving no iſſue by either of his wives, his whole inheritance was ſhared by his four ſiſters and coheirs.

Maud, the eldeſt, married David earl of Huntingdon [13], brother to William king of Scots. Of them was born John, ſurnamed the Scot, earl of Cheſter in his mother's right: ſhe likewiſe had her father's lands in North Wales [14].

Mabil, the next, married William de Albini, earl of Arundel. He died before the earl, his brother-in-law; as did William, earl of Arundel, his eldeſt ſon: whereupon Hugh de Albini, her ſecond ſon, then earl of Arundel, and in minority, came to ſhare in that great inheritance, unto whom Coventry was in partition aſſigned for his capital ſeat, as ſome records do teſtify; but others ſay, that the manor of Barow was allotted to him for his chief manſion; and that he had for the preſent the manors of Camden in Glouceſterſhire, Olney in Buckinghamſhire, as alſo Coventry, until ſuch time as a more perfect and equal partition ſhould be made amongſt them; and the next year following, an addition of the manor of Leeds.

Agnes, the third ſiſter, married William earl of Ferrers, the ſixth in lineal deſcent from Robert de Ferrers, raiſed by king Stephen to the earldom of Derby for his prowes at the Battle of the Standard, in the third year of king Stephen. The heirs of the firſt earl of Derby were uſually called earls of Ferrers, though they were likewiſe earls of Derby. This Agnes had the caſtle of Chartley in Staffordſhire, and the lands in that part of Wales called Powis; and alſo the manor of Weſt-Derby, and all earl Ranulf's lands between Ribble and Merſey; with Buckbrock in Northamptonſhire, and Navenby in Lincolnſhire.

In the 8th year of Henry III. William earl of Ferrers was conſtituted governor of the caſtle and honour of Lancaſter [15]. And the next year he executed the ſheriff's office for that county for three parts of the year; as he likewiſe did for the whole years 10 and 11 of the ſame king [16].

In the 17th year of the ſame king, having taken to wife Agnes, he accounted £50. for the relief of the lands of her inheritance; and the year enſuing had livery of her purparty, viz. of all thoſe lying between the rivers of Ribble and Merſey; for which he and ſhe were bound to pay yearly a goſhawk, or fifty ſhillings, into the king's exchequer, as had been uſual [17].

In 26 Henry III. he gave a fine of one hundred pounds to the king, for the livery of thoſe three wapentakes lying between Ribble and Merſey, viz. Weſt Derby, Layland, and Salford, which had been ſeized into the king's hands for certain miſdemeanors of his bailiffs. He died Sept. 20, 1247. His counteſs alſo died in the month following. They had lived together as man and wife 75 years.

This earl had a younger brother, called Robert, who ſerved king John, in the 17th year of that king, with five knights, himſelf included, in the war with his barons [18]. He was alſo one of thoſe who met in the tournament held at Blithe in Yorkſhire in 7 Hen. III.; for which his lands were ſeized: but, next year, he was made cuſtos of the honour and caſtle of Lancaſter.

---

[1] See p. 220. [2] P. 26. [3] P. 220.

[4] See a curious diſſertation on the great ſeal of this earl, Archæologia IV. 119; and a copy of the ſeal, Plate XII. fig. 7.

[5] Ranulf earl of Cheſter gave to the biſhop and to the church of Lincoln "Merſtonam & Wavercurt, pro 30 libratis terre, recompenſationem dampnorum que fecerat eccleſie Sancte Marie Lincoln'. Teſtibus; A. epiſcopo Abrinc', Thomâ cancellario, Reginald' com' Cornub', &c. Apud Eveſham." Regiſtrum Magnum apud Decan' & Capit' Lincoln', f. 27.

[6] See two charters of this earl Hugh, and two of his ſon Ranulph, Appendix, p. 39.

[7] Sir Peter Leiceſter's Cheſhire, ex Pat. 1 Hen. III. m. 4, and 7; and ſee before, p. 104. The high ſtewardſhip the king retained in his own hands, as annexed to the crown by forfeiture. "Now doth the power of the ſeneſcalcy," ſays an antient writer (Harl. MSS. 2194), "ſuffer an eclipſe, by being overſhadowed by the royal mantle of the crown; a power next to the king's, and in ſome ſort matching the Ephori of the Lacedemonians." The ſecond Simon de Montford was reſtored by Henry III. 1231, to his lands in England, and to all his father's honours; the high ſtewardſhip alone excepted, the king conceiving the power of that office to be too great and exorbitant for any ſubject. Coke, Inſtit. part IV. p. 58.

[8] Clauſ. Rot. 14 Hen. III. m. 2.

[9] Lands;] i. e. he was made chief lord, under the king, of all that county. [10] Id. Rot. Pip. de iiſdem annis.

[11] He ſeems to have held them as the king's firmarius, but not in feodo. [12] Tom. I title Lancaſt. fol. 77, N° 70.

[13] Earl David, in 1173, was choſen governor of Leiceſter, then in rebellion. Kennet, Par. Ant. p. 129.

[14] Sir Peter Leiceſter's Cheſhire; and Dugdale. [15] Dugdale, Baron. ex Pat. 8 Hen. III. m. 12.

[16] Rot. Pip. de iiſdem annis. [17] This, I conceive, made it a tenure in capite by ſocage, not by barony or knight-ſervice.

[18] Dugdale, ex Clauſ. 17 John, m. 7.

William earl of Ferrers, ſon and heir of the above earl and Agnes, in 32 Hen III. (being the next year after his father's death) doing his homage, had livery of Chartley caſtle, as alſo of all other the lands of his mother's inheritance; and the next year obtained a mandate to the ſheriff of Lancaſhire for the enjoyment of ſuch lands, between Ribble and Merſey, as his uncle Ranulf earl of Cheſter formerly poſſeſſed. He alſo obtained a charter for free warren for himſelf and his heirs in all his demeſne lands throughout his lordſhips in Lancaſhire and elſewhere [1].

In 35 Hen. III. he procured a ſpecial grant from the king of ſuch officers, for conſervation of the peace between Ribble and Merſey, as Ranulf earl of Cheſter formerly had; which officers were maintained at the expence of the inhabitants [2].

By Margaret his ſecond wife, one of the daughters and coheirs of Roger de Quency earl of Wincheſter, he had two ſons; Robert, who ſucceeded him in the earldom of Derby, and ſettled at Groby in Leiceſterſhire. This Robert, taking part with Simon de Montfort, was deprived of his earldom and all his lands in 1265; among which were confiſcated all his lands between Ribble and Merſey, which Henry III. united with the honour of Lancaſter, and gave to Edmund Crouchback his ſon, who, by that king's creation, was the firſt earl bearing that title.

Hawiſe, the fourth ſiſter [3] of earl Ranulf, married Robert Quency, ſon and heir of Saher de Quency, earl of Wincheſter. She had the earldom of Lincoln, to wit, the caſtle and honour of Bolingbroke, and all the lands of earl Ranulf in Lindſey and Holland in Lincolnſhire; for which ſhe gave £50. for a relief, as appears by a deed in the Dutchy office [4].

Unto this Hawiſe the earl her brother, a little before his death, viz. 16 Henry III. A. D. 1232, granted the earldom of Lincoln, as far as it appertained to him, to the end that ſhe might be counteſs thereof, and that her heirs might alſo enjoy it. The witneſſes to this grant are the biſhops of Wincheſter and Lichfield; R. Mareſchal, earl of Pembroke; William de Ferrers, earl of Derby; Stephen de Segrave, juſticiary of England; Simon de Montford; William de Ferrariis; and others. After her brother's death, Henry the Third, in the 17th year of his reign, at her inſtance, conferred the honour upon John de Lacy, conſtable of Cheſter, and the heirs of his body by Margaret her daughter [5].

---

1. Ranulfus, conſul Ceſtrie, conſtabulario, dapifero, baronibus, juſticiariis, vicecomitibus, miniſtris, & ballivis, quicunque fuerint, inter Ribbam & Merſam, & omnibus hominibus ſuis Francis & Anglis, ſalutem. Sciatis me conceſſiſſe Deo & Sancte Marie, & monachis de Eveſham, eleemoſinam ſuam de Hocwicce, ita bene & liberè, & quietè, & honorificè, ſicut meliùs tenuerunt tempore comitis Rogeri Pictavenſis, & tempore Ranulfi patris mei, & ſicut decet eleemoſinam habere ſancta eccleſia. Ita quòd nullus ſuper monachos predictos ſe intromittat de predictâ eleemoſinâ, nec de operationibus, nec de aliis exactionibus, nec de occaſione aliquà, aliquis eos vel eorum eleemoſinam, ſuper timorem meum & ſuper foriſfactum meum, inquietet; ſed honorificè teneant in terris, & decimis, & paſturis, & in boſco, & in plano, & in aquis, & in molendinis, & piſcariis, & in omnibus aliis locis. Teſtibus, Euſtachio conſtabulario Ceſtrie, & Hugone Oſtvero, & Serlone venatore, & Richardo Buiſſel, Richardo Pinc', apud Molas warini [6].

2. The following tranſlated charter is tranſcribed from a MS. in the Britiſh Muſeum, as nearly as can be made out; the writing being ſcarcely legible, and the charter ill tranſlated [7].

Ranulf earl of Cheſter to his conſtable, dapifer, juſticiaries, ſheriffs, and bailiffs, that are betwixt Ribble and Merſey, and to all his men French and Engliſh—health. Know me to have granted and confirmed to the abbot of Eveſham, and monks ſerving God, all poſſeſſions, lands, and tenements, and all liberties given and granted by Warin and Albert Buiſſel in all things; and alſo that they may have their courts in Hocwice of all their tenants, as truly as I have mine at Penwortham, for him and all his tenants, houſehold and hayhold, for building or burning, and uſeful for all other his neceſſities, without diſturbance, or my being, or of any other whatſoever. I alſo will and firmly command, that no man againſt the ſame monks concerning my grant and confirmation ſhall interfere upon any occaſion, exaction, or confirmation; I will warrant the aforeſaid abbot, convent, and their ſucceſſors, without fine or demand, for fear and my forfeiture, but they ſhall hold the ſame freely and honourably in all places; and I Ranulf and my heirs the aforeſaid conceſſion and confirmation to the aforeſaid abbot and their ſucceſſors with warrant, and without fine. Teſte meipſo.

3. Henricus dux Normannie & comes Andegavie, omnibus archiepiſcopis, epiſcopis, comitibus, baronibus, vicecomitibus, & omnibus amicis & fidelibus ſuis Normannie & Anglie, ſalutem. Sciatis me dediſſe Ranulfo comiti Ceſtrie omnem hereditatem ſuam Norm' & Angl', ſicut unquam aliquis anteceſſorum ſuorum eam meliùs & liberiùs tenuit; & nominatim caſtellum de Virâ & Barbifluvium, cum tali libertate, quòd per totam Banlevgam poſſit capere foriſfactum ſuum, & Brullium de foſſis, & Alebec, & hoc unum erat vicecomes Albrincus, & in Sancto Jacobo de hoc feci eum comitem; & quicquid habui in Abrinchein ei dedi, preter epiſcopatum & abbatiam de Monte Sancti Michaelis, & quod eis pertinet. Inſuper dedi totum honorem comitis Rogeri Pictavenſis, ubicunque aliquid habetur; & honorem de Blis, ubicunque ſit in Angliâ; & totum honorem de Eiâ, ſicut Robertus Malet avunculus matris ſue illum meliùs & pleniùs ubicunque tenuit. Inſuper dedi ei Staford & Staffordieſire totum, quicquid ego ibi habui in feodo & hereditate, excepto feodo epiſcopi Ceſtrie, & comitis Roberti de Ferrers, & Hugonis de Mortuomari, & Gervaſii Pag'; & excepto foreſto de Canot', quod in manu meâ retineo. Et feodum Alani de Lincoln' ei dedi, qui fuit avunculus matris ſuè; & feodum Erniſii de Burun, ſicut ſuam hereditatem; & feodum Roberti de Chalz, ubicunque ſit; & totum feodum Radulfi filii Odonis; & totum feodum Normanni de Verdun; & feodum Roberti de Staf', ubicunque ſit; & triginta libratas terre, quas habui in Grimeſbeiâ, ei dedi. Et Notingeham caſtell & burgum, & quicquid habui in Notingeham in feodo & hereditate, ſibi & heredibus ſuis dedi; & totum feodum Willielmi Peverell, ubicunque ſit, niſi poterit ſe dirationare in meâ curiâ de ſcelere & traditione, excepto Hecham. Et, ſi Engelramus de Albamarl non voluerit ſe capere mecum neque comite Simone, & illud vi capere potero, predictam Hecham reddo comiti Ranulfo, ſi eam habere voluerit. Et in Orcheſiam & Oſwardbeek wapentac, & Derbeiam, cum ſuis pertinentiis; & Mammesfield, cum ſochâ; & Roeley, cum ſochâ; & Stanleiam juxta Coventriam, cum ſochâ; & de Belvario tenebo ei rectum quî citiùs potero, ſicut de ſuâ hereditate; & ſex baronibus ſuis, quos eligeret, cuique centum libratas terre dabo de his que mihi ex hoſtibus meis adquiſita accederunt, de me tenendas; & omnibus parentibus ſuis ſuam reddo hereditatem cùm potens ſum, & de hoc unum ad preſens potens non ſum . . . . plenarium tenebo ex quo potens ero. Teſtibus; Willielmo cancellàrio; R. comite Cornub'; R. comite Herf'; Patricio comite S———; Humfrido de Buh̄ Dap'; I. filio Gilberti; R. de Hum̄ Ma——— Dap'; Philippo de Columb', ex parte comitis; Ranulfo, Will', com' Lincoln'; Hug' Wac'; G. Caſtell de Fines; Simone filio Willielmi; Turſt' de Monteforti; Gauf' de Coſtentin; Willo de Verđ; Ric' Pincernâ; Rogero Wac'; Simone, filio Oſberti. Apud Diviſas [8].

[1] Cart. 36 Hen. III. m. 14.
[2] Dugdale.
[3] See Appendix, p. 39, 40.
[4] See Great Cowcher, tom. II. N° 26, p. 508.
[5] Ib. p. 500, N° 10. Both theſe grants are printed in the Appendix, p. 39; and others of Roger de Quency and Margaret his wife in p. 40.
[6] Dugdale, Mon. Angl. I. p. 361.
[7] Harl. MSS. 7386.
[8] From the Addenda to the Antient Charters in the Britiſh Muſeum, XVII. 2. H.

EARLS

BRITISH 12 JN 1923 MUSEUM

Vol. I. Pl. XIII. p. 221.

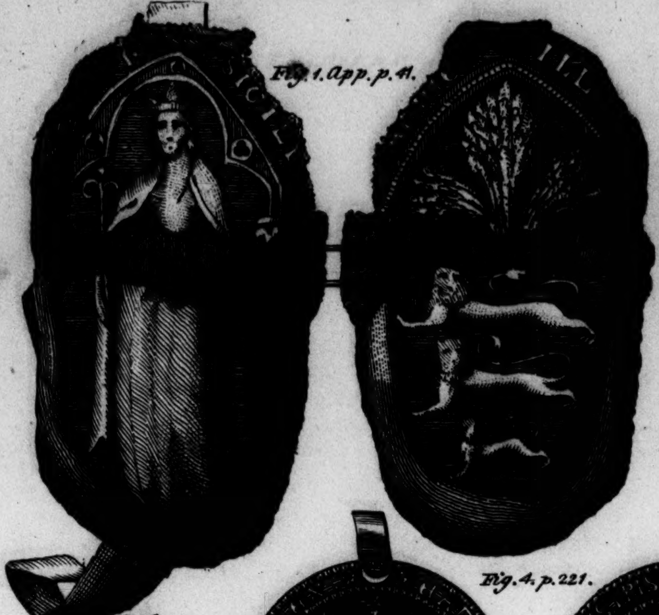

Fig. 1. App. p. 41.

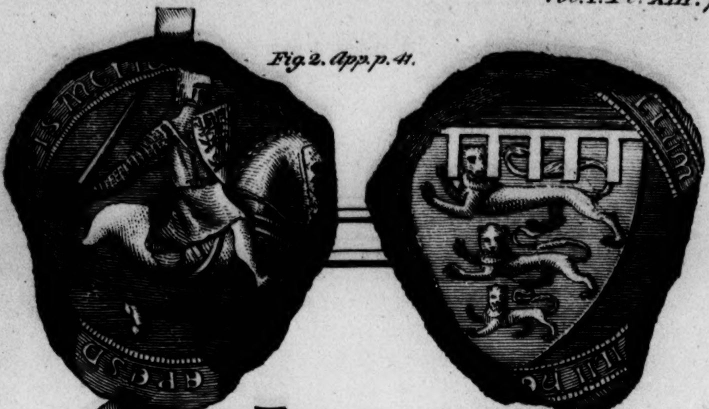

Fig. 2. App. p. 41.

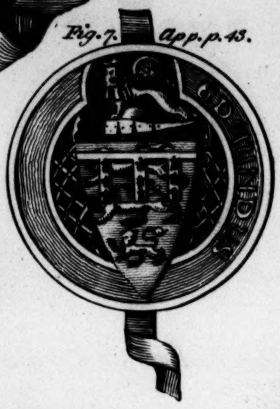

Fig. 7. App. p. 43.

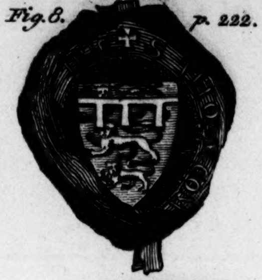

Fig. 8. p. 222.

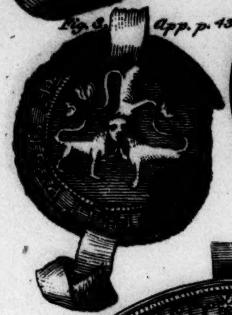

Fig. 3. App. p. 43.

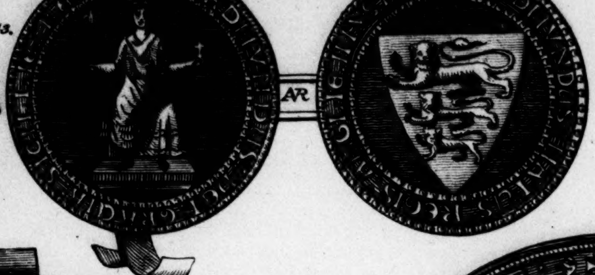

Fig. 4. p. 221.

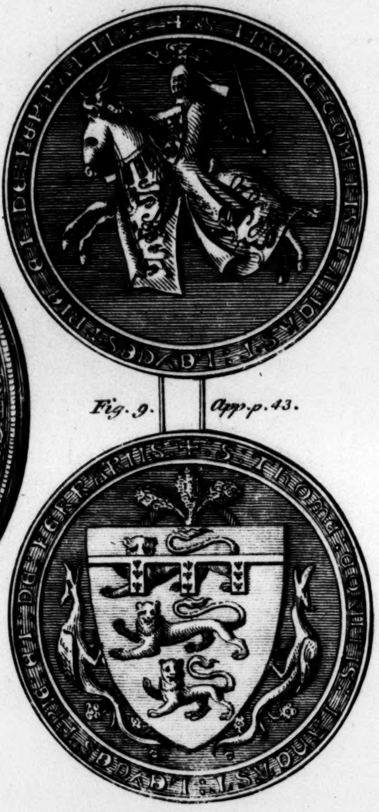

Fig. 9. App. p. 43.

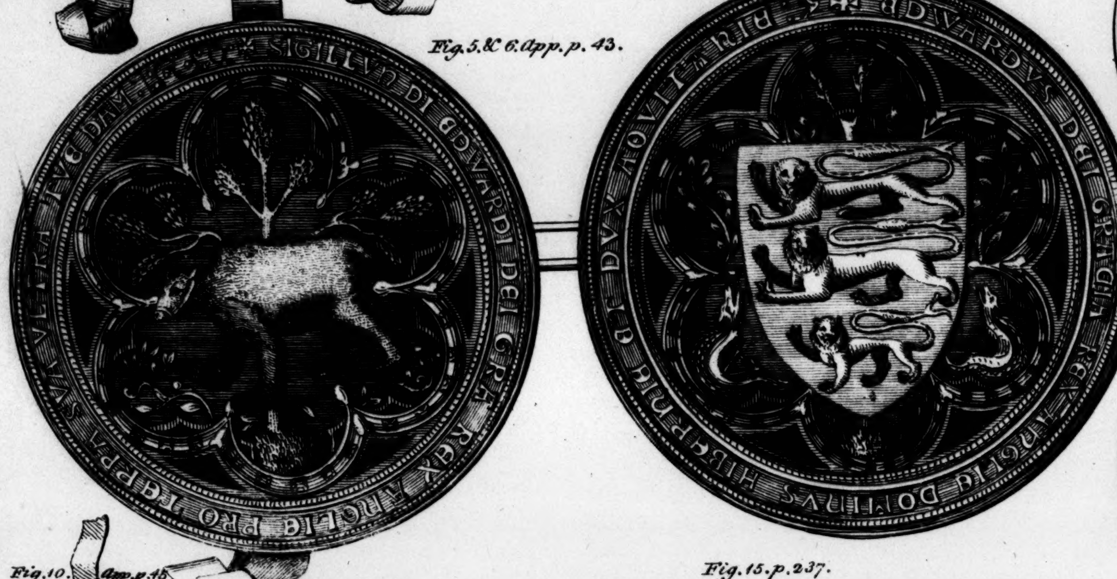

Fig. 5. & 6. App. p. 43.

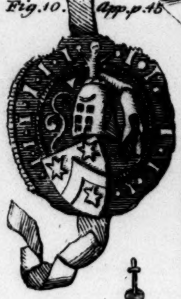

Fig. 10. App. p. 45.

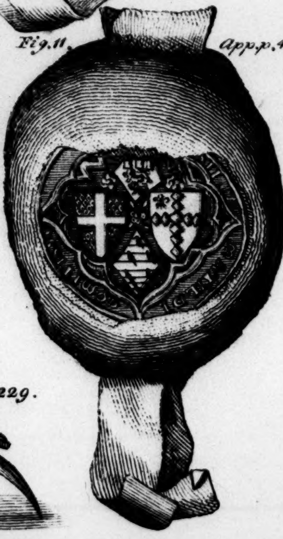

Fig. 11. App. p. 45.

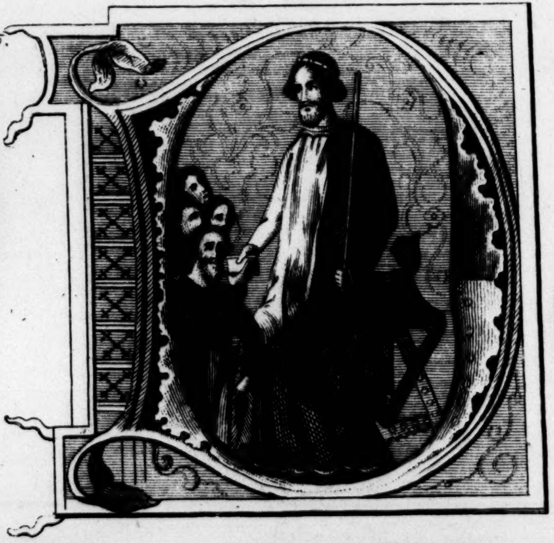

Fig. 15. p. 237.

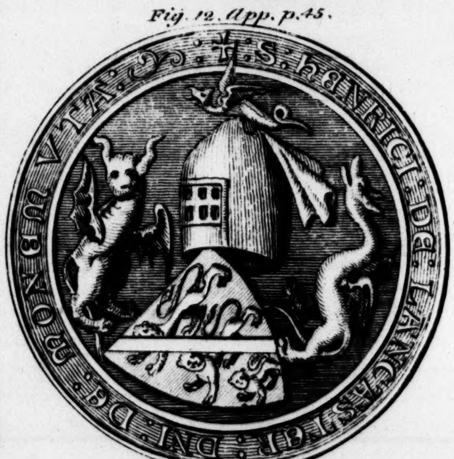

Fig. 12. App. p. 45.

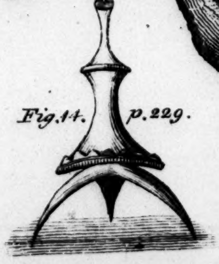

Fig. 14. p. 229.

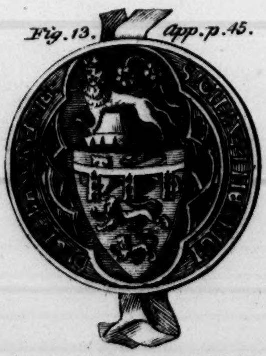

Fig. 13. App. p. 45.

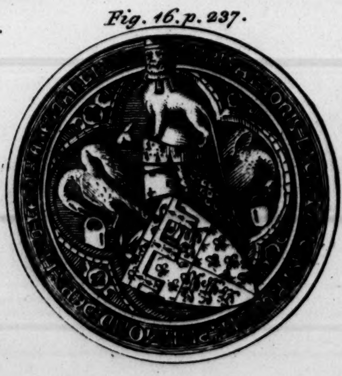

Fig. 16. p. 237.

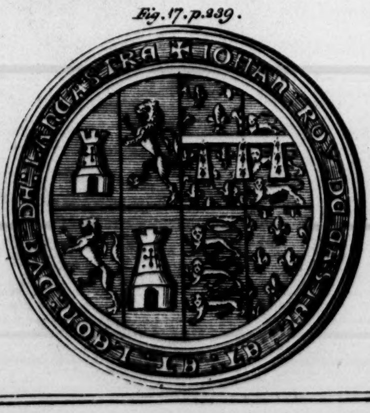

Fig. 17. p. 239.

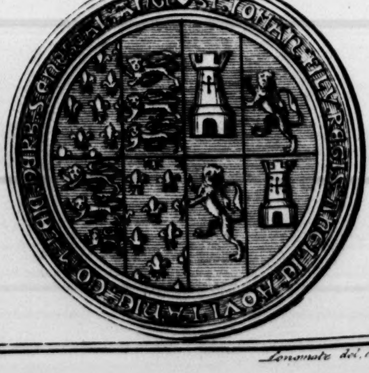

Fig. 18. p. 239.

Longmate del. et sc.

EARLS OF LANCASTER AND LEICESTER.

BEFORE I ſpeak of the advancement of Edmund Crouchback, the firſt of theſe earls, to the joint titles, I ſhall obſerve that he was the younger ſon of king Henry III. and born at London upon St. Marcel's day, (ſcil. 17 kal. Feb.) anno 1245, (30 Hen. III.) [1].

Next, that, upon St. Luke's day, 1253, the king convening many of his nobles, the biſhop of Romania (of the order of the Friers-preachers) came to him from pope Innocent IV; and, having brought a ring from his holineſs, gave it to this Edmund, inveſting him therewith into the dominion of Sicily and Apulia; whereupon he had the title of king of Sicily. Which being done, the biſhop returned with large rewards. This ridiculous grant produced the greateſt events, in their conſequence, that ever appeared in our annals; amongſt others, the aſſociation of the barons againſt Henry III; the appointing of conſervators of the peace in the ſeveral counties; and the ſettling the democratical part of our conſtitution on a permanent baſis by Simon Montfort earl of Leiceſter, while the king was his priſoner.

Prince Edmund, thus collated by the pope, took the ſtyle and title of king of Sicily; and was authorized, by a papal bull, to fabricate a ſeal for the affairs of that kingdom [2]. About the ſame time alſo he was made earl of Cheſter; but, as he was young, the king, as his guardian for the kingdom of Sicily, iſſued out letters of attorney, dated at Bourdeaux 14 Oct. for taking poſſeſſion thereof. Whereupon this Edmund granted the principality of Capua (a member of that regality) to Thomas earl of Savoy.

Upon Innocent's death, Alexander IV. obtained the papal chair; who, by a ring, in 1255, inveſted prince Edmund with the kingdom of Sicily in due form.

Pope Urban IV. by a bull in 1263, revoked the grant of Innocent; and the earl of Leiceſter, June 6, 1265, renounced, in the king and prince's name, all manner of claim and pretenſion to that crown.

But prince Edmund had ample amends for the loſs of that kingdom; for, on the 4th of Auguſt, 1265, his brother prince Edward having defeated the earl of Leiceſter and his adherents at the battle of Eveſham, the king, by his letters patent bearing date 25 Oct. created him earl of Leiceſter; giving him therewith the honour of Hinckley and the ſtewardſhip of England [3]; likewiſe all the lands of Nicholas de Segrave, a partaker with Simon de Montfort in his rebellious actings. And the next enſuing year, upon the 12th day of July, gave him the honour, town, and caſtle of Derby, with all their appurtenances, and all the goods and chattels whereof Robert de Ferrers, earl of Derby, was poſſeſſed upon the day of the ſkirmiſh at Cheſterfield; as alſo the honour, town, and caſtle of Leiceſter, with all their appurtenances, late parcel of the poſſeſſions of Simon de Montfort, with all his lands, to hold to himſelf and the heirs of his body [4]. Moreover, about this time, he farther granted unto him the cuſtody of the caſtles of Kaermerdin and Cardigan; and likewiſe the Iſle of Lundy; and, thinking all this not ſufficient, ſhortly after gave him the caſtle of Shireburne, co. Dorſet; the caſtle of Kenilworth, co. Warwick, with all the lands thereto belonging; the honour, earldom, caſtle, and town of Lancaſter, with their appurtenances; together with the honour and caſtle of Monmouth; to hold to himſelf and the heirs of his body [5].

Theſe vaſt poſſeſſions laid the foundation of the future greatneſs of the houſe of Lancaſter; the power and influence of which increaſed to ſuch a height, that Henry of Bolingbrook, becoming too powerful for a ſubject, depoſed his couſin-german king Richard II, and mounted the throne of this kingdom. Thus, in the perſon of prince Edmund, were originally founded the great contentions which long ſubſiſted between the two houſes of York and Lancaſter.

Not long after this, on the 2d of April, 53 Hen. III. prince Edmund obtained a farther grant of the honour, town, and caſtle of Leiceſter, to hold to himſelf and the heirs of his body lawfully begotten; as alſo of all the lands which he the ſaid Simon held of the barony of John le Viſcount in the county of Northumberland, and of all other the lands of the ſame Simon, which by his forfeiture eſcheated to the crown; likewiſe of the ſtewardſhip of England; to hold for life [6]; and the ſame year was, with prince Edward (his brother) and many others, ſigned with the croſs [7].

The next year following, 1269, 6 id. April, he obtained a rich inheritance by marrying Aveline, the daughter of William earl of Albemarle, counteſs of Holderneſs, heir to her father, and by her mother counteſs of Devon and the Iſle of Wight; but by this lady, who died the ſame year, and was buried in Weſtminſter Abbey [8], he had no iſſue.

About the ſame time he obtained a diſcharge from the king of a debt of one thouſand ſeven hundred ſixty-ſeven pounds, four ſhillings, and five pence, due by John de Monmouth, whereunto the caſtle and honour of Monmouth (which he then poſſeſſed) were liable. Shortly after which, he went into the Holy Land; and in 56 Hen. III. returned. Thus much as to what I find memorable of him in his father's time.

After which, ſcil. in 3 Edw. I. he releaſed to Walter de Helyon an annual rent of 10*s*. for lands in Redleye, Dunye, and Menſtrurth [9]; and, next year, obtained a grant from the king, bearing date 26 July, of the caſtle of Chartley, co. Stafford, and to the heirs of his body, part of the poſſeſſions of Thomas de Ferrers; and in 5 Edw. I. a farther confirmation of the manor, caſtle, and honour, of Monmouth, late John de Monmouth's, which had been granted to him by king Henry III. with a ſpecial diſcharge from thoſe debts which were owing to the exchequer by the ſame John. Alſo in 7 Edw. I. a grant from the king of the manors of Wirkſworth and Eſburne, with the wapentake of Wirkſworth in fee; to hold by the ſervice of two knights fees, in exchange for the caſtles of Kaermerden and Cardigan. In this year likewiſe he obtained the title of Earl Champaigne by the grant of king Edward; and in 10 Edw. I. was in that expedition then made into Scotland. In 12 Edw. I. he procured from queen Eleanor (his mother) a grant of the houſes, garden, place, and rents, by her purchaſed from the provoſt and canons of Montjoy, ſituate in the ſuburbs of London, lately belonging to Peter de Savoy, her uncle. And in 13 Edw. I. as earl of Cheſter, obtained from the king a grant of divers liberties, as alſo free chaſe in the Chaſe of Wiſſeley and Wimburghoſt; likewiſe a farther confirmation of the caſtle and honour of Monmouth, with the caſtles of Groſmund, Skenfrith, and Blaunch-caſtell, and of all the lands of Robert de Ferrers, late earl of Derby, given to him by his father king Henry III.; alſo of the town and caſtle of Leiceſter, late Simon de Montfort's, earl of Leiceſter; the caſtle of Kenilworth; the honour, earldom, and caſtle, of Lancaſter, with the foreſts of Wireſdale and Loneſdale; Newcaſtle under Line; the manor, caſtle, and foreſt of Pickering; the manor of Scalby, and town of Gomeceſter (vulgò Godmancheſter), with the rent of the town of Huntingdon. 18 Edw. I. he releaſed to Ralph de Limeſey the lands of ſir Ralph de Limeſey in Northamptonſhire[1]; and in 19 Edw. I. obtained a charter for a fair every year at his manor of Pickering in com. Ebor. upon the eve, day, and morrow after the Exaltation of the Holy Croſs; as alſo for another at Eſingwold, in the ſame county, upon the eve and feſtival of our Lady; and free warren at Melleburne, co. Derby.

---

[1] Dugdale's Baronage; whence the ground-work of the preſent Memoir is deduced.

[2] See this, and other ſeals of Earl Edmund, in Plate XIII; and the papal bull, &c. in the Appendix, N° XVI.

[3] A commiſſion was appointed, by order, I think, of Henry IV, to ſearch for the right to the ſtewardſhip of England (ſee note 7, p. 219). It was found, as the commiſſioners reported, to be an antient appendage of the earldom of Leiceſter. I can find no proof of what Knyghton reports, that the manor of Hinckley was held of the king in capite by this ſergeancy. Nor could the office be an honour, as Dugdale ſuppoſes.

[4] See Appendix, N° XVI; and ſee before, p. 100.

[5] On the 6th of November, 53 Hen. III. the king made him a freſh grant of the caſtles and lands of Kermerdyn, Cardigan, Skenefrith, Greſemond, and Blanchcaſtel, to hold to him and his heirs, and to have the king's regality within the ſame, and his own writ, as other marquiſes had in their lands in March-Wales. See Appendix, N° XV, pp. 19, 20.

[6] Ibid. p. 20.

[7] Ibid. p. 21.

[8] "Of the elegant monument of this lady on the North ſide of the choir at Weſtminſter, Mr. Dart, for reaſons beſt known to himſelf, has thought fit to engrave only the altar part, which is the moſt inconſiderable; and Sandford, with Hollar's aſſiſtance, has not done the reſt juſtice. The figure of the counteſs, worthy a Grecian ſculptor, and the finiſhing of the niche above, with its foliage and enamelled blazony, were reſerved for the hand of Mr. Baſire." Gough, Sepulchral Monuments, vol. I. p. 67. The monument of the counteſs, with the fine figure here referred to, may be ſeen in the "Vetuſta Monumenta" of the Society of Antiquaries, vol. II. Plates XXIX, XXX.

[9] See Appendix, N° XVI.

In 20 Edw. I. he obtained another grant for life of the caſtle, town, and honour, of Monmouth[2]; as alſo of the caſtles of Groſſemont and Skenefrith Blanch-caſtell, with the manors of Kedley and Menſtreworth; the remainder to his three ſons, viz. Thomas, Henry, and John, ſucceſſively, in tail; but this grant he ſurrendered back the ſame year. And in 21 Edw. I. procured licence to make a caſtle of his houſe in the pariſh of St. Clement Danes, in the county of Middleſex, called the Savoy[3]; and founded that houſe of nuns, of the order of Sancta Clara, called the Minoreſſes, without Aldgate, in the ſuburbs of London[4]. He was alſo the chief builder of the Grey-friers' houſe in Preſton in Amunderneſſe, co. Lancaſter.

Moreover, the ſame year, for reconciling the differences betwixt king Edward and the king of France, he was ſent to treat with the two queens. Whereupon it was concluded, that ſix caſtles ſhould be delivered up to the king of France; but, the king of France falling off from that agreement, he returned. Shortly after which, the Welſh putting themſelves in arms, and entering upon the earl of Glouceſter's lands of Glamorgan, he attended the king with his army into thoſe parts.

And in 24 Edw. I. being ſent with the earl of Lincoln and twenty-ſix bannerets into Gaſcoigne, they ſat down before Bourdeaux; but, ſeeing no likelihood of its render, after ſome ſkirmiſhes, marched thence to Langon, which was ſoon given up to them; thence to Bayon, where they were honourably received; but, having many ſoldiers, which they could not keep together by reaſon that their treaſure was exhauſted, he grew much troubled in mind; and, thereupon falling ſick, he departed this life about the feaſt of Pentecoſt, 1296, commanding that his body ſhould not be buried till his debts were paid. After which, truce being made, his corpſe was carried into England, and buried in the abbey church of Weſtminſter; where there was a monument erected to his memory; of which, by the liberal indulgence of Mr. Gough, two admirable plates by Baſire (XIV, XV.) are here introduced from the "Sepulchral Monuments of Great Britain[5]."

This great earl, by Blanch his ſecond wife, daughter to Robert earl of Artois (third ſon to Lewis the eighth king of France), widow of Henry king of Navarre, earl of Champaigne and Bry, had iſſue three ſons—viz. Thomas, Henry, and John; and a daughter; (which John died in France, with his ſiſter, without iſſue): She, ſurviving him, had for her dowry an aſſignation of the manors of Trepton Duffield, with its members; viz. Southwood, Holebroke, Hey-Egge, Beaurepair, Allerwaſleigh, Edricheſhay, New Bigging, and Holland, with the whole foreſt of Duffield; as alſo the manor of Hertindon, with Croudecote; all in Derbyſhire. Likewiſe certain lands in Bunteſhale, Bracington, Spondon, Penrewich, with the hundred of Greſele; and certain lands in Newbald, with the advowſon of the church of Duffield, in the ſame county. Likewiſe the manor of Raundes, with its members; viz. Scarwigge, Ringſted, and Haregrave, co. Northampton. And the advowſons of the churches of Raundes, in the ſame county; Wolſtanton and Tatenhull, co. Stafford; and Thorpe-Edmere, co. Leiceſter.

I now come to THOMAS[6], his eldeſt ſon and immediate ſucceſſor; who, in 26 Edw. I. doing his homage (being then reputed by the king to be of full age), had livery of his lands, excepting the dowry of Blanch his mother; and thereupon marched into Scotland, the king himſelf being then in that expedition. Being ſheriff of Lancaſhire by inheritance, he ſubſtituted Richard de Hoghton, his deputy, in that office. He was ſummoned to parliament 27 Edw. I.; and next year obtained licence to have a market every week, on the Saturday, at his manor of Porhall, co. Stafford; as alſo for a fair yearly to be there held upon the eve, day, and morrow, of St. Swithin; and likewiſe for a fair yearly at Higham Ferrers, co. Northampton, upon the eve of St. Michael, the day and morrow following. In this 28th year he was again in the wars of Scotland; and ſo likewiſe in 31, 32, and 34, Edw. I.

In 33 Edw. I. he releaſed to Robert le Venour all the lands, &c. in the manor of Lokeſlegh, co. Stafford, which came into his poſſeſſion by the nonage of Thomas, ſon and heir of Thomas de Ferrers[7].

In 34 Edw. I. he obtained another licence for a market every week, upon the Tueſday, at his manor of Wirkſworth, co. Derby; and a fair yearly on the eve, day, and morrow after the feaſt of the Nativity of our Lady; as alſo for free warren in all his demeſne lands at Stanford, co. Northumberland.

In 1 Edw. II. he had a grant of the earldom of Leiceſter, and the ſeneſchalcy which accompanied it, as amply as Simon de Montford had ſeiſin of the ſame; and the ſame year obtained a fair at Leiceſter every year on the morrow after the feaſt of the Holy Trinity, and fourteen days following[8]. And in 2 Edw. II. for a market on the Wedneſday, every week, at Uttoxeter, co. Stafford; as alſo for a fair there on the eve, day, and morrow, of St. Mary Magdalen; likewiſe for a market and fair at his manor of Stapleford, co. Leiceſter.

In 4 Edw. II. having married Alice the ſole daughter and heir to Henry de Lacy, earl of Lincoln, doing his fealty, he had livery of the caſtle of Denbigh, and all other the lands of her inheritance, his homage for them being performed the next enſuing year, upon Thurſday after the feaſt of St. Bartholomew, in the preſence of divers biſhops, earls, and barons, and others of the king's council, in a certain chamber within the houſe of Friers-preachers in London.

---

[1] Cotton MSS. Julius, C. VII, p. 155. See the ſeal to this deed in Plate XIII.

[2] See Appendix, N° XV, p. 22.

[3] Ibid.

[4] See Strype's Stow, 1720, Book II, p. 14.

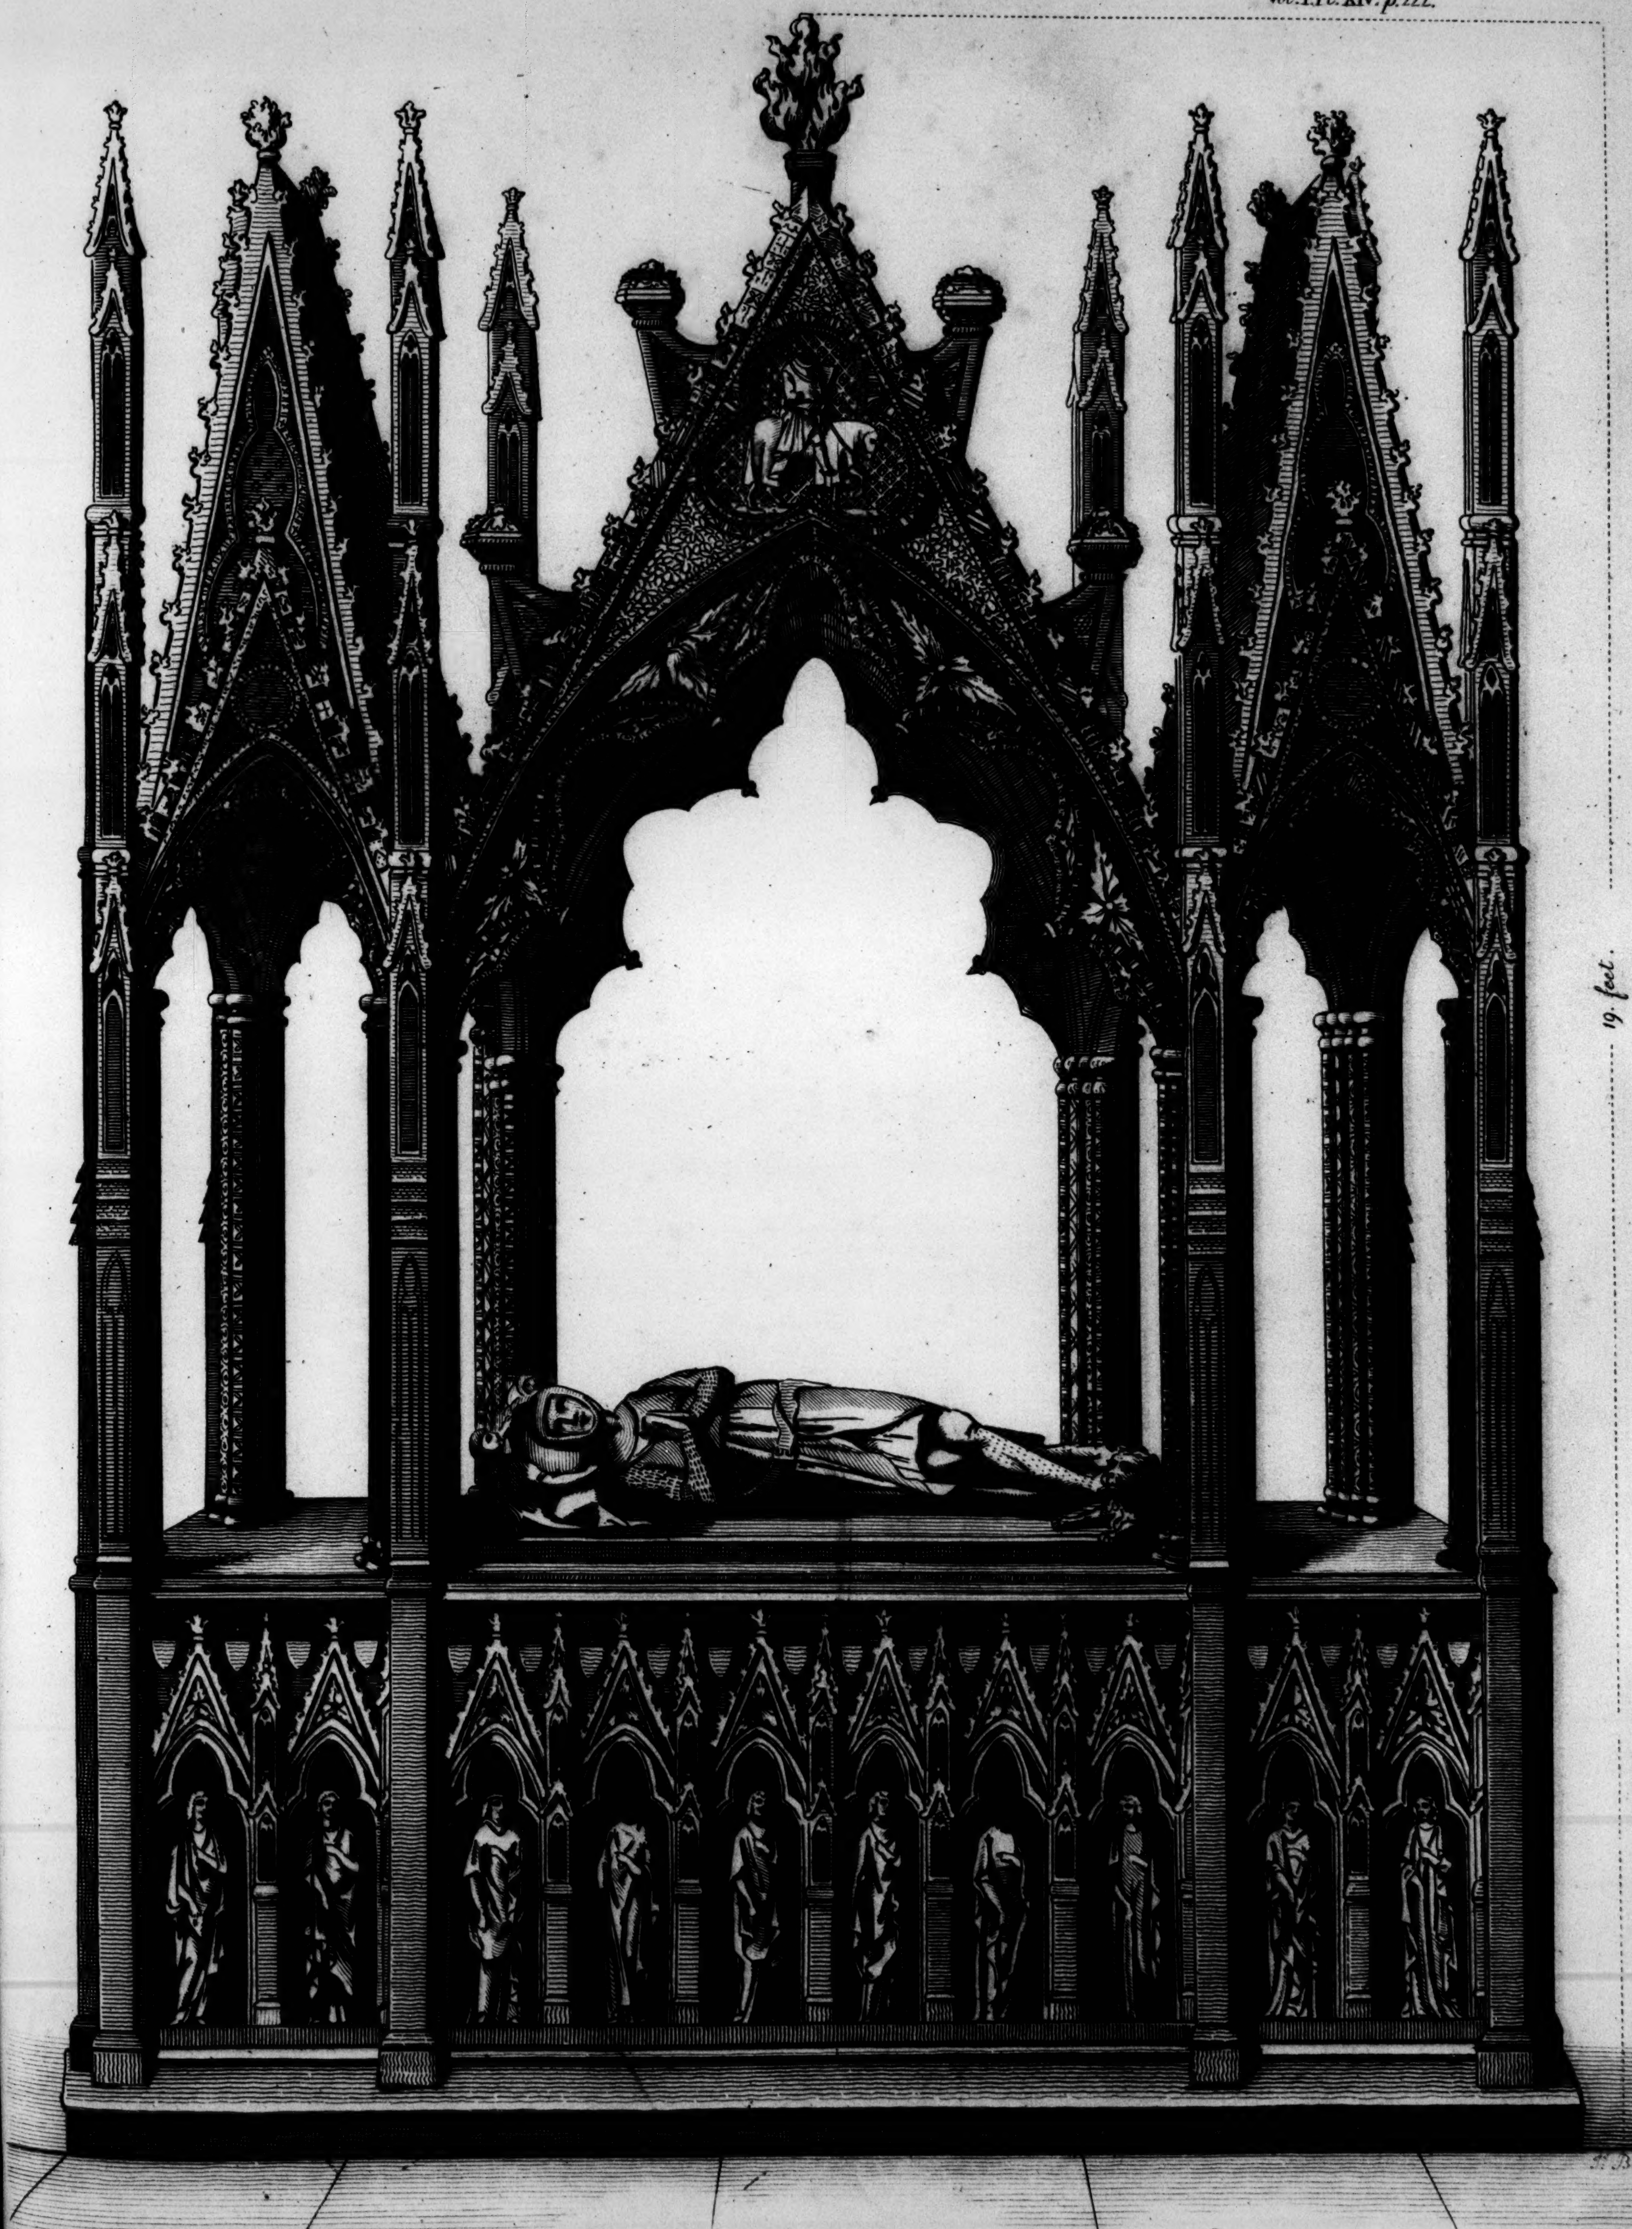
[5] "In this monument I know not which moſt to admire; the free ſtone figure of the earl in armour laid on one ſide towards the choir, with a round helmet, coat of mail and ſurcote, hands joined, long ſword, hilt and ſhield gone, legs croſſed, and butting againſt a lion, his head ſupported by angels; the elegant little ſtatues at the ſides, ten on each, repreſenting his alliances; or the airy triple canopy, with all its finials, froſtings, ſtatues, enamelings, emblazonings, and other elegant decorations; and, above all, the bold beautiful relief in a trefoil in the larger pediment, which repreſents the earl on horſeback; armed in mail, with a ſurcote, in the front and back of which are painted his arms; his helmet round, and cloſe up to his chin; his face animated and eyes open, expreſſing devotion, perhaps alluding to the cruſade he had juſt undertaken; his hands covered with mail elevated, his ſhield adorned with his arms hung round his neck, his ſcabbard alſo richly ornamented.. His horſe in a ſtanding poſture, beautifully dappled with brown and white ſpots under the belly, his face turned outwards, has the bridle on his neck, and is completely covered from head to foot, having the earl's arms on his capariſon, and on the back part of the ſaddle. On the top of the earl next the area are the remains of painting, much defaced, exhibiting two knights in ſurcotes of arms and croſs belted, with banners, repreſenting perhaps his expedition into the Holy Land, the number ſuiting with Matthew Paris's account, that there went the earl, his brother Edward (afterwards king), four earls, and four barons." Sepulchral Monuments, I. 69—75; where ſee a more particular deſcription of the arms and ſplendid ornaments of this noble tomb.

[6] 9 July, 25 Edw. I. the king directs that all, who held lands belonging to the late Edmund earl of Lancaſter, ſhould do homage for the ſame to Thomas his ſon, though yet a minor. See Appendix, p. 23.

[7] See this deed in the Appendix, N° XVI; and the ſeal, Plate XIII.

[8] See Appendi, p. 23.

Vol. I. Pl. XIV. p. 222.

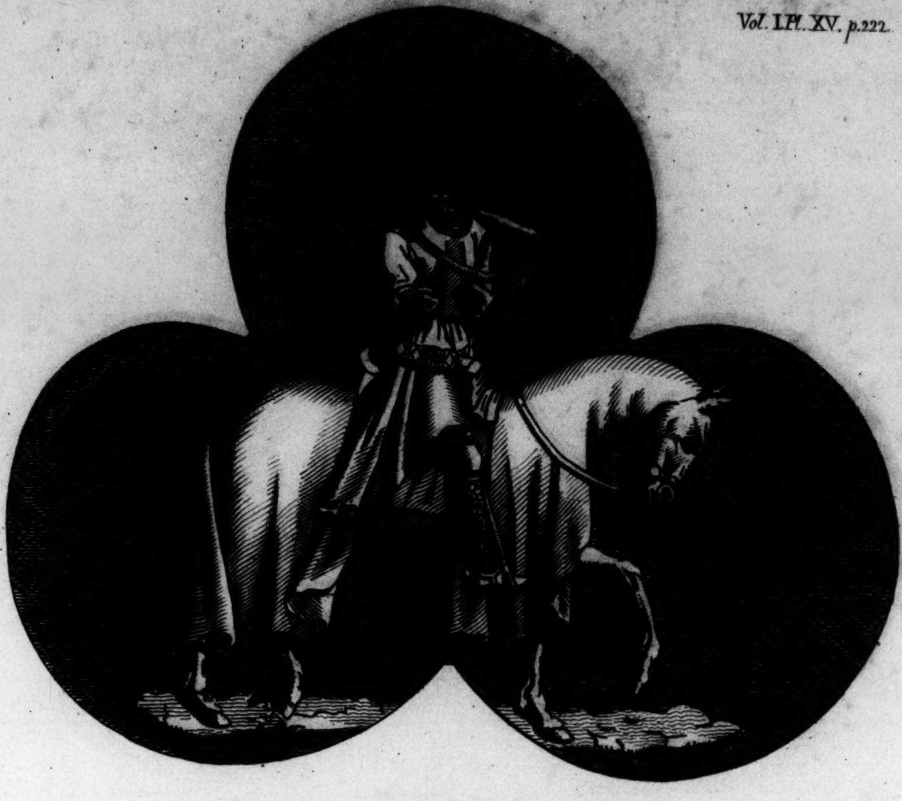


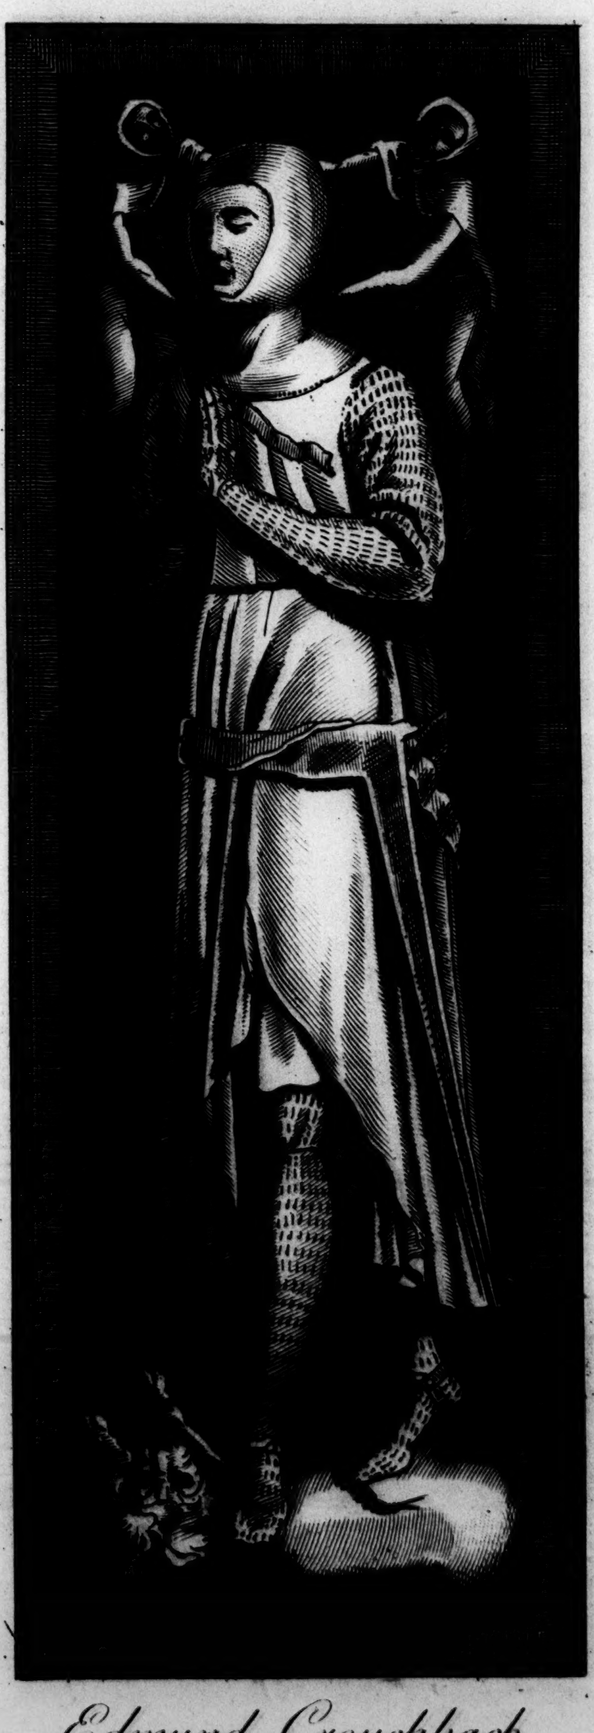
J. Baſire del. & sc.

Monument of Edmund Crouchback, Earl of Lancaster. 1296.

BRITISH
12 JN 1923
MUSEUM

Vol. I Pl. XV. p.222.





J. Baſire del. et sc.

Edmund Crouchback.

BRITISH
12 JN 1923

In 5 Edw. II. he was the chief of thoſe nobles that entered into a combination againſt Piers de Gaveſton (the king's great favourite), under colour of defending religion, and reſtoring the people's liberties. And, being thereupon made choice of for their general, ſent meſſengers to the king, requiring the delivery of this Piers unto them, or to baniſh him the realm.

It is ſaid, that Henry de Lacy, earl of Lincoln, (whoſe daughter and heir he had married, as is obſerved) gave him in charge upon his death-bed, that he ſhould maintain his quarrel againſt the ſame Piers; and that thereupon he joined with the earl of Warwick, and cauſed him to be put to death on the 29th of June, 1312, 5 Edw. II.

To perſons who are curious after the manners and cuſtoms of former times, it may not be diſagreeable to give the following account of the grand manner in which the antient wealthy nobility of England lived heretofore. It is the amount of the diſburſements of this great nobleman, Thomas earl of Lancaſter, in his domeſtic expences for one whole year, made out by Henry Leiceſter his cofferer, 1313; at which time ſilver was at one ſhilling and eight pence the ounce; ſo that twelve ounces made a pound ſterling. His total expence, therefore, in that year amounted (in our money) to two and twenty thouſand and ſeventy-eight pounds, ſeventeen ſhillings, and eight pence; whence it is evident he muſt have had a prodigious eſtate; eſpecially when we conſider the great diſparity between the prices of proviſions at that time and now[1].

	£.	s.	d.
Charge of the pantry, buttery, and kitchin,	3405	0	0
To 184 tons, 1 pipe, of red or claret wine, and 2 tons of white wine,	104	17	6
To grocery,	180	17	0
To 6 barrels of ſturgeon,	19	0	0
To 6800 ſtock-fiſhes, ſo called, and for dried fiſhes of all ſorts, as lings, haberdines, &c.	41	6	7
To 1714 pounds of wax, vermilion, and turpentine,	314	7	4½
To 2319 pounds of tallow-candles for the houſehold, and 1870 of lights for Paris candles, called perchers,	31	14	3
To charge of the earl's great horſes[2] and ſervants' wages,	486	4	3½
To linen for the earl and his chaplains, and for the pantry,	43	17	0
To 129 dozen of parchment, and ink,	4	8	3½
To 2 cloths of ſcarlet for the earl's uſe; one of ruſſet for the biſhop of Anjou; 70 of blue for the knights; 28 for the eſquires; 15 of medley for the clerks; 15 for the officers; 19 for the grooms; 5 for the archers; 4 for the minſtrels and carpenters; with the ſharing and carriage for the earl's liveries at Chriſtmas,	460	15	0
To 7 furs of variable miniver, or powdered ermine, 7 hoods of purple, 395 furs of budge, for the liveries of barons, knights, and clerks; 123 furs of lamb, bought at Chriſtmas, for the eſquites,	147	17	8
To 65 ſaffron-coloured cloths for the barons and knights in ſummer; 12 red cloths for the clerks; 26 ray-cloths for the eſquires; 1 for the officers; and 4 ray-cloths for carpets in the hall,	345	13	8
To 100 pieces of green ſilk for the knights; 14 budge furs for ſurcoats; 13 hoods of budge for clerks; 75 furs of lambs for liveries in ſummer, with canvas and cords to truſs them,	72	19	0
To ſaddles for the lord's ſummer liveries	51	6	8
To 1 ſaddle for the earl, of the prince's arms,	2	0	0
To ſeveral items [the particulars in the account defaced],	241	14	1½
To horſes loſt in ſervice of the earl,	8	6	8
To fees paid to earls, barons, knights, and eſquires,	623	15	5
To gifts to knights of France, the queen of England's nurſes, to the counteſs of Warren, eſquires, minſtrels, meſſengers, and riders,	92	14	0
To 168 yards of ruſſet cloth, and 24 coats for poor men, with money given the poor on Maundy-Thurſday,	8	16	7
To 24 ſilver diſhes; 24 ſaucers; 24 cups; 1 pair of pater-noſters; 1 ſilver coffer; all bought this year,	103	5	6
To divers meſſengers about the earl's buſineſs,	34	19	8
To ſundry things in the earl's chamber,	5	0	0
To ſeveral old debts paid this year,	88	16	0¾
The expences of the counteſs at Pickering, in the pantry, buttery, kitchen, &c.	285	13	4½
In wine, wax, ſpices, cloths, furs, &c. for the counteſs's wardrobe,	154	7	4½
Total,	£.7957	13	4½

A table of proviſions, with their prices, as eſtabliſhed by the king's proclamation in 1314[3], but revoked in 1326.

	£.	s.	d.
The beſt graſs-fed ox alive at	0	16	0
The beſt grain-fed ox at	1	4	0
The beſt cow, alive and fat, at	0	12	0
The beſt hog of two years old at	0	3	4
The beſt ſhorn mutton at	0	1	2
The beſt gooſe at	0	0	3
The beſt capon at	0	0	2½
The beſt hen	0	0	1½
The beſt chicken, two for	0	0	1½
The beſt young pigeons, three for	0	0	1
Twenty eggs at	0	0	1

In 8 Edw. II. this earl obtained a charter for a market every week, upon the Friday, at his manor of Burron-Stather, co. Lincoln: and two fairs; the one to begin on Alhallow-eve, and to continue the next day and thirteen days after; the other on the eve of the Holy Trinity, the day, and three days after.

In the ſame year a conveyance occurs, from the earl of Leiceſter, to Aymer de Valence earl of Pembroke, of an agreement between the king and Walter de Langton, biſhop of Cheſter, touching the caſtle and manor of Thorp Watervill, and the manors of Aldwynkle and Achirch, co. Northampton[4].

9 Edw. II. the earl had licence to make a caſtle of his manor-houſe at Dunſtanburgh, co Northumberland. In 10 Edw. II, he was again in the Scottiſh wars; and in 11 Edw. II, having command to raiſe two thouſand foot well armed out of his own lands and fees, and to bring them to the king at Newcaſtle within one month after the feaſt of the Nativity of St. John Baptiſt, he retained (by indenture) ſir Hugh Meynill, knight, to ſerve him in peace and war for the term of his whole life, in the wars of England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, with three men at arms, well mounted, armed, and arrayed; covenanting to allow him harneſs for his own body, and recompence for what arms and horſes ſhould be loſt in the war in his ſervice; as alſo, apparel and ſaddles, livery of hay and oats for his horſes, and the like wages for as many grooms as he gave to his other bachelors; and, in time of peace, upon his going to parliament or elſewhere, livery of

---

[1] See Strype's edition of Stow, 1720, Book I. p. 243; from a Houſehold-book of this great Earl, which Mr. Strype calls the Record of Pontefract. A copy of this Houſehold-book was in the hands of the late John Watſon Reed, eſq. F.S.A. who had intended to have publiſhed it as a counterpart to the famous Northumberland Houſehold-book; and had actually printed 16 pages of it in quarto, the completion of which was prevented by his death Jan. 30, 1790.

[2] The number of the earl's horſes was generally more than 1500; and their expence is mentioned in the daily accompts.

[3] Strype, ibid. Book V. p. 365. A proclamation to the ſame purport had been iſſued by king Edward I. in 1274, and was repeated by Queen Elizabeth in 1572. See the prices at both periods in Strype, ubi ſupra, pp. 366, 367.

[4] See Appendix, N° XVI; and the ſeal in Plate XIII.

hay and oats for four horſes, and wages for the like number of grooms; and, over and above all this, an annuity of ten marks.

The like retainer had ſir John de Eure to ſerve him, with ten men at arms, in time of war, whereof three to be knights; allowing them bouch of court, with livery of hay, oats, horſeſhoes, and nails, as other bannerets uſually had; and in time of peace, attending him to parliament or other aſſemblies, with all his knights in livery, to have diet in his hall; as alſo hay, oats, horſeſhoes, and nails, for eight and twenty horſes; and wages for as many grooms, with livery of wine, and candles for his chamber. And, when he ſhould come himſelf with one knight, then to have bouch of court, with hay and oats for ſeven horſes, wages for ſo many grooms, and livery of wine and candles for his chamber.

But, the grudge ſtill remaining betwixt the king and this earl, in 10 Edw. II. two cardinals were ſent into England from the pope to reconcile them. Which being done, the conditions on the king's part were ſoon broken; whereupon diſcontents more and more increaſed. Nevertheleſs, ſhortly after this, 12 Edw. II. queen Eleanor [1], late wife to king Henry III. having formerly, out of her entire affection to this Thomas and Henry his brother (her grandſons), given unto them and their heirs a certain part of the earldom of Provence, which, by right of inheritance, deſcended to her from her father and mother, with juriſdiction of a meer and mixt empire, and all rights and privileges thereto belonging; and, for defect of iſſue by them, to revert to her heirs, kings of England, he obtained a confirmation thereof from the king, bearing date the 5th day of June, the ſame year.

But that favour no whit qualified thoſe diſcontents which were harboured in his breaſt towards the king; which, more and more increaſing, at length, in 14 Edw. II. broke out openly, he then appearing the principal of thoſe who confederated together for the deſtruction of ſuch as they called traitors to the realm, whereof the two Spenſers were the chief; charging them with miſleading the king, to the great damage of the people, and engaging themſelves to live and die with each other for the cauſe of juſtice (for, that term they gave to their deſign) againſt thoſe perſons. In which juncture, there happening a great quarrel betwixt Humphry de Bohun earl of Hereford, and William de Braoſe (an eminent baron in the Marchers of Wales), about a certain territory, called Gowberland, lying in thoſe parts; Roger de Mortimer the uncle and Roger the nephew dealt with Braoſe for his title thereto; John de Mowbray alſo, who had married the daughter of Braoſe, ſole heir to that land, accounting his to be the better right, likewiſe putting in his claim. But, whilſt they were thus in conteſt for it, Hugh le Deſpenſer the younger (the great favourite and powerful man of that time), taking advantage of theſe their differences, entered upon it, and excluded them both. Which inſolent act ſo alarmed the earl of Hereford, that he preſently complained thereof to this Thomas earl of Lancaſter; who, thereupon drawing in divers of the nobility to his ſide, came to Shireburne; whence, with bannerets diſplayed, he marched to St. Albans, pretending to reform what was amiſs in the government; where ſtaying for three days, he ſent the biſhops of Ely, Hereford, and Chicheſter, to the king, then at London, requiring that he would baniſh the Spenſers, as perſons highly cenſured by the people for divers great miſdemeanors; as alſo to afford letters of indemnity to himſelf and all others who were parties in that inſurrection. Which being denied, they forthwith marched to London, and there appeared ſo formidable, that, by the advice of the queen and thoſe biſhops, the king at length aſſented; inſomuch as the edict for their baniſhment was forthwith publiſhed by the earl of Hereford in Weſtminſter-hall. But, not long after, the tide turned the other way; for, the next enſuing year, 15 Edw. II. the king raiſing a powerful army, divers of this earl's confederates fell off by reaſon of diſpleaſure which he had taken againſt the lord Badleſmere, and ſubmitted. Whereupon, thoſe who ſtood firm marched with him firſt to Glouceſter; thence to Burton upon Trent; and ſo to his caſtle at Tutbury (about four miles diſtant); doing much ſpoil to the country in their paſſage. In which journey, having with him a certain knight, called ſir Robert de Holland, whom he had taken out of his buttery and preferred to two thouſand marks per annum, he ſent him into Lancaſhire, to bring up five hundred men out thoſe parts; but, inſtead of bringing them to him, he conducted them to the king.

The king, therefore, having notice of their motion, purſued them with all his power, firſt marching down to Coventry, and thence to Lichfield; to which place, on the morrow after St. Chad's day, the two Spenſers came to him with all their ſtrength; which ſo ſtartled this earl, that upon the ſixth ides of March he placed foot on each ſide the bridge at Burton, to hinder the king's paſſage over Trent; by reaſon whereof he was conſtrained to ford the river at Walton (about three miles above); which being made known to this earl, he drew out his men from Tutbury caſtle, expecting aid from the before-ſpecified ſir Robert de Holland, and others who had promiſed their help; and, when he ſaw they failed him, fled Northward. Whereupon the king, coming to Tutbury, ſealed a commiſſion (bearing date there 11 March) to Edmund earl of Kent, and John de Warren earl of Surrey, requiring them forthwith to purſue and arreſt him and all his party; as alſo to beſiege his caſtle of Pontefract, and take it; commanding the aſſiſtance to them therein of all his ſubjects to their utmoſt power.

It is ſaid, that in this his flight, conſulting with thoſe barons then with him at the Black-friers in Pontefract, they adviſed him to march to Dunſtanburgh (a caſtle of his own in Northumberland); and that, refuſing ſo to do, leſt it ſhould be thought he held intelligence with the Scots, he expreſſed that he did reſolve to ſtay ſtill at Pontefract; and that thereupon ſir Roger de Clifford, drawing out his dagger, ſwore that he would kill him unleſs he would go with them; whereupon he went, having ſeven hundred men of his company; and, before the king's forces could overtake him, got to Burrowbridge in Yorkſhire; where finding the country people in arms, and William lord Latimer then governor of the city of York, and ſir Andrew de Harcla of Carliſle, ready to give him battle, after a ſhort ſkirmiſh, Humphry de Bohun, earl of Hereford, attempting to paſs the bridge, was ſlain by one who lay under an arch, and he himſelf (overpowered with numbers) taken by the ſame ſir Andrew: ſo likewiſe were Roger de Clifford, John de Mowbray, Warren de l'Iſle, and many others, and thence carried to Pontefract, where the king and both the Spenſers at that time were; where, being brought into the town, he was ſcorned, and by the people, in deriſion, called king Arthur; which being obſerved, many did deem it a juſt judgement upon him, in regard he had in ſuch ſort abuſed the king when coming out of the North, not long before he lay at Pontefract; for, at this time, iſſuing out of the caſtle with his men, they uſed him very contemptibly, exclaiming vilely againſt him in a moſt tumultuous manner. And, being thus fetched thither, he was on the third day afterwards brought before the king (the earl of Kent, the earl of Wincheſter, John earl Warren and Surrey, David earl of Athol, and Robert earl of Angos, being all preſent), who gave ſentence upon him, to be drawn, hanged, and beheaded; but, in regard of his great birth, ſomewhat qualified it, and appointed that he ſhould only loſe his head. In purſuance whereof, he was upon the morrow after the feaſt of St. Benedict brought to a plain without the town, and there beheaded; on which a beautiful church was afterwards erected to the honour of his memory; the reſt being ſentenced to be drawn and hanged at York, and ſeveral other places.

Others relate the ſtory thus: that, being come to Burrowbridge, he there found ſir Andrew de Harcla, warden of Carliſle and the Marches; and ſir Simon Ward, ſheriff of Yorkſhire; ready to encounter him: where, relating to Harcla his juſt quarrel to the Spenſers, he promiſed him, if he would favour his cauſe, to give him one of thoſe five earldoms which he had in poſſeſſion; and that Harcla, refuſing, told him, that he would ſoon repent it, and that he ſhould die a ſhameful death (as it afterwards happened). Alſo that, Harcla then cauſing his archers to ſhoot, the fight began; in which many of this earl's party being ſlain, he betook himſelf to a chapel, refuſing to yield to Harcla; and, looking on the crucifix, ſaid:—"Good Lord, I render myſelf to thee, and put myſelf into thy mercy!" Alſo that they then took off his coat-armour, and, putting upon him one of his men's liveries, carried him by water to York, where they threw balls of dirt at him. Moreover, that thence they brought him back to the king at Pontefract, and there put him in a tower towards the abbey, which he had newly made. Likewiſe that ſoon after, being brought into the hall, he had ſentence of death by theſe juſtices, viz. Aymer earl of Pembroke, Edmund earl of Kent, John de Bretaigne, and ſir Robert Malmethorpe, who pronounced the judgement. Whereupon ſaying, "Shall I die without anſwer?" a certain Gaſcoigne took him away, and put a pilled broken hood on his head, and ſet him on a lean white jade without a bridle; and that then he added, "King of Heaven, have mercy on me! for, the king of the earth nous ad guerthi." And that thus he was carried, ſome throwing pellets of dirt at him (having a frier-preacher for his confeſſor), to an hill without the town, where he kneeled down towards the Eaſt, until one Hugin de Muſton cauſed him to turn his face toward Scotland; and then a villain of London cut off his head. After which the prior and monks, obtaining his body from the king, buried it on the right hand of the high altar. The day of his death was certainly upon the Monday next preceding the Annunciation of the Bleſſed Virgin. But of this his death the king ſoon after repented, as it is ſaid.

---

[1] Among the charters in the Britiſh Muſeum, 43 C. 42. is a bond of this queen, and of Edward her eldeſt ſon, and others, to certain merchants of Florence for 1700 marks, dated 1364, with two curious ſeals, which are engraved in Plate XIII.

Touching his merits there happened afterwards very great diſputes; ſome thinking it fit that he ſhould be accounted a ſaint, becauſe he was ſo charitable, and ſo much an honourer of the religious; as alſo that he died in a juſt cauſe; but chiefly that his perſecutors came to untimely ends in a ſhort time.

On the other ſide, many there were who taxed him with adultery in keeping of ſundry women, notwithſtanding he had a wife; aſperſing him likewiſe for cruelty in putting to death ſome perſons for ſmall offences, and protecting ſome from puniſhment who were tranſgreſſors of the laws; alleging alſo that he was chiefly ſwayed by one of his ſecretaries; and that he did not fight ſtoutly for juſtice, but fled, and was taken unarmed. Nevertheleſs, many miracles were reported to have been afterwards wrought at his tomb, and by his relics [1]; much confluence of people coming thereto in honour thereof, till the king, through the incitation of the Spenſers, ſet guards to reſtrain them; whereupon they flocked to the place where he ſuffered death, and ſo much the more eagerly, by how much endeavours were uſed to reſtrain them, until a church was erected on the place where he ſuffered. Moſt certain it is, that the vulgar ſort of people had ſo great a veneration to him, that they worſhiped his picture, which (with other things) was drawn on a tablet in St. Paul's cathedral at London, till the king, by his ſpecial letters to the biſhop of London, bearing date at York, 28 Junii, 16 Edw. II. inhibited them ſo to do [2]. Nor was it long after, the ſtream turning another way by the unhappy depoſal and lamentable murder of king Edward the Second, but that all proceedings concerning the attainder of him and his adherents being annulled and vacated in the parliament begun at Weſtminſter on the morrow after the feaſt of the Epiphany, 1 Edw. III. there ſtill continued the like veneration for his memory; ſo that in 33 Edw. III. it was generally believed, that miracles were done at his tomb, and that blood iſſued out of it.

Touching Alice his wife, who ſurvived him, I ſhall obſerve that, upon his marriage with her, ſhe was endowed at the church-door with the caſtle and borough of Newcaſtle under Line; the towns of Penkhill, Sheprugg, Walſtatton, and Clayton, in Staffordſhire; and all other hamlets belonging to the ſame caſtle and borough; as alſo with the caſtle, town, manor, and honour of Donington, in Leiceſterſhire; and divers manors and lordſhips in other counties; of all which ſhe had livery in July, 16 Edw. II.; and immediately thereupon (viz. on the 9th of July) quitted unto king Edward all her right to the caſtle and honour of Donington [3]; and alſo to the lordſhips of Winterborn, Ambreſbury, and Trowbridge, co. Wilts; Kaneford, co. Dorſet; Henſtridge and Charlton, co. Somerſet; with all the hamlets and advowſons of churches to them belonging, in which John earl Warren had an eſtate for life, they being of her inheritance. Moreover, ſoon after this, taking to huſband Ebulo le Strange (a younger ſon to the lord Strange of Knockin), ſhe had farther livery (as daughter and heir to Henry de Lacy, earl of Lincoln) of the court of the fee of De la Hay; and the goal ſtanding before the gate of Lincoln caſtle; as alſo of an annuity of twenty pounds, as the third penny of the county of Lincoln; all which, by reaſon of the forfeiture of her late huſband, had been ſeized into the king's hands.

It is ſaid that, divers years before the death of Thomas earl of Lancaſter, her huſband, ſhe was by him repudiated; and that ſhe had been familiar with this Ebulo Le Strange, whom ſhe ſo married afterwards. Alſo that, taking him to huſband without the king's licence, all the lands of her inheritance and otherwiſe, which were held of the king in capite, were ſeized and detained till ſhe delivered up thoſe of her inheritance which lay in the counties of Lancaſter, Cheſhire, and Yorkſhire; and gave the caſtle and lordſhip of Denbigh, in Wales, as alſo the caſtle of Bullingbrook, co. Lincoln, with all its appurtenances, and all other her lands in that county, and many in other parts of the realm, unto Hugh le Deſpenſer (the great favourite of that time); and that the lands which ſhe had left, after all thoſe were ſo extorted from her, amounted to no leſs in value than three thouſand marks per annum [4]. It is farther ſaid, that ſhe died without iſſue in 1348, (22 Edw. III.) about the feaſt of St. Matthew the Apoſtle, being then ſixty-ſeven years of age; alſo that ſhe was buried in the conventual church of Barling, near to the grave of Ebulo her huſband; and that thereupon all the lands of that great inheritance, which deſcended to her from Henry de Lacy, late earl of Lincoln, her father, by virtue of the render and grant made by the ſaid Henry, and by the grant of king Edward the Firſt, came to Henry earl of Lancaſter (father of Henry), afterwards duke of Lancaſter; which lands lay in Blackburnſhire, Rochdale, Tottington, and Penwortham, co. Lancaſter; Halton, co. Cheſter; Bowland and Snath, co. York; and in divers other parts of England.

Henry, brother and heir of Thomas, upon the death of Edmund earl of Lancaſter (his father), in 24 Edw. I. doing his homage, had livery of the caſtle, town, and honour, of Monmouth; as alſo of the caſtles of Skenefrith and Blanch-caſtell, with the manors of Radley and Menſtreworth; and all other his father's lands beyond Severn; and in 25 Edw. I. was in that expedition then made into Flanders.

---

[1] "What eſteem was had of theſe may partly appear by this, that, in the time of king Henry VIII, upon the diſſolution of the monaſteries at Leiceſter, a multitude of falſe miracles and ſuperſtitious relicks were detected; and, amongſt the reſt, our Lady's girdle ſhewn in eleven ſeveral places, and her milk in eight; the penknife and boots of St. Thomas of Canterbury, and a piece of his ſhirt, much reverenced by big-bellied women; the coals that roaſted St. Lawrence; two or three heads of St. Urſula; Malchus's ear; the parings of St. Edmund's nails; the bell of St. Guthlac; and the felt hat of this St. Thomas of Lancaſter, both remedies for the head-ach, &c." STAVELEY, MS.

"In an account of the profits of the church of St. Martin, received by the Abbey of Leiceſter about 1348, I find this article: "Pes Thomæ Lancaſtr'; reddit' 6*l.* 10*s.*" CARTE, MS.

[2] See this letter in the Appendix, p. 25; and ſee Rot. Parl. vol. I. pp. 188, 190.

[3] See Appendix, p. 25.

[4] See ſeveral grants of king Edward III, to this lady and her huſband, Appendix, p. 26.

In 27 Edw. I. having taken to wife Mary, the daughter and heir of ſir Patrick Chaworth, he had reſpite for payment of his relief. In 28 and 32 Edw. I. he was in the expeditions then made into Scotland; and, in conſideration of his eminent ſervice in that war, obtained a diſcharge of ſo much debt as was due from him to the king's exchequer for his reliefs, viz. upon the death of Hawiſe de London, grandmother, and Pain de Chaworth, uncle, to Maud his wife, by reaſon of the lands which deſcended to her by their reſpective deaths; which diſcharge bears date at Dumfermelin in the ſame year.

In 34 Edw. I. being again in the wars of Scotland, he had, in conſideration thereof, livery of the manor of Hertley, co. Southampton, without performing his homage; which manor, by the death of Iſabel the wife of Hugh le Deſpenſer, deſcended to Maud his wiſe as her next heir. In 8 Edw. II. he received command to fit himſelf with horſe and arms, and to be at Newcaſtle upon Tine on the feaſt of the Bleſſed Virgin; thence to march againſt the Scots. And in 10 Edw. II. obtained a charter for free warren to himſelf and the ſaid Maud his wife, and to her heirs, in all his demeſne lands within his lordſhips of Swinburn, Langſtoke, Stockbridge, and Weſton Patrick, co. Southampton. In 11 Edw. II. he was charged with providing one hundred foot ſoldiers out of his lands in Kidwelly and Kadewalhan in Wales, and to bring them to Newcaſtle upon Tine within three weeks after the Nativity of St. John Baptiſt to march into Scotland. And, in conſideration of his eminent ſervices, had ſo great an eſteem from the king, as that (notwithſtanding his brother's attainder), having had livery of his lands 29 March, 17 Edw. II, he obtained ſuch farther favour, that he ſhould enjoy the title, name, and honour, of earl of Leiceſter, and be thenceforth ſo written in the king's courts.

But, after this, Roger lord Mortimer and queen Iſabel bearing ſuch a ſway that the people grew much concerted, he confederated with Thomas de Brotherton then Marſhal, and Edmund of Woodſtock, the king's uncles, to amend what was amiſs, if they could. Alſo in 19 Edw. II. upon the putting to death of Hugh le Deſpenſer the elder by the authority of the great lords then powerful (prince Edward being by them conſtituted governor of the realm, the chancellor and treaſurer being likewiſe appointed by them), he was ſent into Wales; and, by the aſſiſtance of the Welſh, took the king, with Hugh le Deſpenſer the younger, and others of the king's familiars, near the caſtle of Lantruſſan; and thereupon having the perſon of the king committed to his cuſtody, forthwith carried him by Monmouth, Ledbury, and other places, to his caſtle of Kenilworth; where he ſtayed the whole winter following.

Moreover, in 20 Edw. II. (the king being ſtill in his cuſtody), through his intereſt with the lords then ruling, he obtained a grant of the cuſtody of the caſtles and honours of Lancaſter, Tutbury, and Pickering. But, ſhortly after this, by a command from king Edward the Third, he delivered up Edward the Second unto Thomas lord Berkley; who conveyed him to Berkley caſtle; and, upon the proclaiming of the prince by the name of king Edward the Third, girded him with the ſword of knighthood; having likewiſe the tuition of him (in regard of his tender years) ſo ſoon as he was crowned.

After which, in the parliament begun at Weſtminſter 7 March, in the firſt year of his reign, he obtained an act for reverſing the attainder of Thomas earl of Lancaſter, his brother[1]; and thereupon re-poſſeſſed all thoſe lands and lordſhips[2] which had been ſeized by reaſon thereof; viz. the earldoms of Lancaſter and Leiceſter, and divers lands whereof Edmund his father and Thomas his brother were formerly poſſeſſed.

About this time, being by inquiſition found heir to his ſaid brother[3], the king, taking his homage, commanded his eſcheator North of Trent, that he ſhould not meddle with the caſtles of Sandale and Coningſburgh, or any of the manors of Wakefield, Thorne, Soureby, Hatfield, and Stainford, whereunto John de Warren, earl of Surrey, laid claim; thoſe being, by conſent of both parties, to remain in the king's hands to be delivered to this Henry.

In the ſame year, viz. 1 Edw. III. he was made captain-general of all the king's forces in the Marches of Scotland. Howbeit, after this, in the quindenes of St. Michael, there being another parliament held at Saliſbury, this earl, with ſome others, declining to come thither, the king took high offence againſt him, being made to believe that he had a purpoſe to deſtroy him; and thereupon, raiſing a great power, marched to Bedford, where he then lay; but the earl Marſhal and earl of Kent reconciled that buſineſs.

In 2 Edw. III. he obtained licence for a market every week, upon the Wedneſday, at his manor of Melburne, co. Derby; and an enquiry being that year made, by order of parliament, what lands had been ſeized by the king's father in conſequence of the treaſon of earl Thomas; it appeared that, among many other lands in various counties, there were in Leiceſterſhire the manors of Bagworth, Lyndrach, Thornton, Bochardeſton, and Newton, with Bagworth park, and certain tenements in the town of Leiceſter; all which were held by Robert de Holand and Maud his wife[4].

In this year an inquiſition was taken, at Syreſham in Northamptonſhire, in the court of Henry earl of Leiceſter, to determine whether the earl was entitled to amerciaments from the tenants of the abbey of Bitleſden, who ſold bread and ale, in houſes beyond the precincts of the abbey, contrary to the aſſize; when it was found that the houſes in queſtion were all within the county of Bucks, and that no former earl of Leiceſter had ever claimed ſuch juriſdiction[5].

In 1329, 3 Edw. III, Henry earl of Leiceſter attended the king in his expedition then made into France. In 4 Edw. III. he procured a confirmation from the king, to himſelf and the heirs of his body, of all the caſtles, manors, and lands, of Robert de Ferrers; likewiſe of the whole honour of Leiceſter, and all the lands of Simon de Montfort, ſome time earl of Leiceſter; as alſo a grant of all the lands and fees of John de Middleton in the Newlands and Woadham, co. Northumberland; and in this fourth year of that king began the foundation of the hoſpital within the Newark near his caſtle at Leiceſter[6].

But in an. 1345, (19 Edw. III.) he departed this life, and was buried at Leiceſter; the king and queen, with almoſt all the biſhops, earls, and barons of the realm, being at his funeral; where a fair tomb, in the collegiate church of our Lady there, was afterwards erected[7]. He left iſſue, by the before ſpecified Maud his wife, Henry his ſon and heir[8], and ſix daughters; Maud, married to William de Burgh, earl of Ulſter, and afterwards to Ralph, ſon and heir to the earl of Suffolk; Blanch, to the lord Wake; Eleanor, to Richard earl of Arundel, having the pope's diſpenſation for the ſame in regard of their affinity, and likewiſe, becauſe in his tender years he had contracted matrimony with Iſabel, the daughter of Hugh le Deſpenſer, his kinſwoman in the ſecond degree of conſanguinity; Iſabel, prioreſs of Ambreſbury; Jane, wedded to lord Mowbray; and Mary, to lord Percy.

---

[1] See Rot. Parl. vol. I. p. 394; vol. II. p. 29.

[2] Among theſe, in the county of Leiceſter, were the manor of Shepeſhed, the manors of Lyndrach, Thornton, Bochardeſton, Newton, Bagworth Park, and ſome tenements in the town of Leiceſter. Rot. Parl. II. 29.

[3] See the Inquiſition taken after the death of Earl Edmund, Appendix, p. 31; and that after the death of Earl Thomas, p. 32.

[4] See Appendix, p. 26.

[5] Charters in Britiſh Muſeum, 84 H. 21. See the ſeal, Plate XIII.

[6] See the particular hiſtory of this noble foundation among the Parochial Collections for the Town of Leiceſter.

[7] "There lyith on the North ſide of the high altare Henry erle of Lancaſter, without a crounet, and 2 men childern under the arche next to his hedde." Leland, Itin. I. 17.

[8] Search being made in the Exchequer for the reliefs due from Henry earl of Lancaſter, ſon and heir of Henry earl of Lancaſter; it was found that his father had been charged with the relief of fifty pounds, for the honour, town, and caſtle, of Leiceſter, formerly belonging to Simon de Montfort, to wit, for the moiety of the inheritance formerly belonging to Robert de Melan, formerly earl of Leiceſter. Com. Hill. 25 Edw. III. Rot. 4, ex parte Rem. Theſ.; and Hill. 6 Edw. III. Fines.

Which Maud founded a chantry of five prieſts within the chapel of the Annunciation of the Bleſſed Virgin, within the church of the priory of Campeſſe, co. Suffolk, for the health of the ſouls of William de Burgh, ſome time earl of Ulſter; Elizabeth de Burgh, and Maud de Ufford, her daughters; alſo for the good eſtate of herſelf, and of ſir John de Ufford, and ſir Thomas de Hereford, knights, during their lives; and for the health of their ſouls afterwards. Which chantry ſhe endowed with certain lands in Aſh juxta Rendleſham; and the advowſons of the churches of Burgh, co. Suffolk; and Hargham, co. Norfolk.

Henry, ſon and heir to the before-ſpecified Henry, ſurnamed Griſmond from the place of his birth, obtained in 7 Edw. III. a grant from his father, dated at Kenilworth, 28 December, of the caſtle and town of Kidwelly, with the whole territory of Carnwarthlan; as alſo of the caſtles of Oggemor, Groſſemunt, and Skenefrith, and manor of Ebboth; and in 9 Edw. III. was in an expedition then made into Scotland; at which time he gave ſuch teſtimony of his valour and military ſkill, that he obtained from the king a grant of certain lands at Berwick upon Tweed, which had belonged to Peter de Kymeringham[1]. Upon the 7th of April, in the year next enſuing, he was made captain-general of the king's army in that realm; and in May following had the title of banneret.

In 11 Edw. III. (12 March) he obtained an aſſignment of five hundred and ſeven pounds, ten ſhillings, for his own wages, and the wages of his men at arms, which he retained for the wars of Scotland, from the 1ſt of May, the preceding year, until the 16th of November: and the ſame year, upon the 16th of March, was advanced to the dignity and title of earl of Derby; having, beſides the annual fee of twenty pounds per annum (uſually given in lieu of the tertium denarium de placitis comitatûs, which the old earls antiently had), a penſion of a thouſand marks, to be received yearly, during his father's life, out of the cuſtoms of London, Boſton, and Kingſton ſuper Hull, until the king ſhould otherwiſe provide for him, in lands or rents of that value.

Shortly after this, king Edward, deſigning to clear the Iſle of Cagant of a garriſon which the French had placed there, ſent over this earl with conſiderable forces; where, upon the firſt encounter of the French and Flemings, he was felled to the ground; but, by the valour of the famous ſir Walter Manney, brought off; who thereupon cried, "Lancaſter for the earl of Derby[2]!"

In 12 Edw. III. he was again in the wars of Flanders, the king himſelf being at that time there; and in 13 Edw. III. attended him to Vironfoſſe in France, having a ſpecial command in his army there drawn up for battle againſt the French.

In 14 Edw. III. he was again with the king in the great naval fight with the French before Sluſe; and after that, continuing in Flanders, had an aſſignation of ten ſhips to tranſport his horſe from the port of Orwell thither; and upon the truce made, the ſame year, betwixt king Edward and the French, was one of the commiſſioners, who, on the part of the Engliſh, upon the 19th of January, in the priory of St. Mary Magdalen at Maletrete, made oath for the obſerving thereof.

In 15 Edw. III. he was again in Scotland; and, being the king's lieutenant for the North parts of England, and general of his army againſt the Scots, had a ſpecial commiſſion to treat of peace with them; in which year, the king keeping his Chriſtmas at Meuroſe in Scotland, and this earl at Rokeſburgh, he encountered with William de Douglas in a tournament, and wounded him.

In 16 Edw. III. he was in another expedition then made into France, having with him of his retinue five bannerets, fifty knights, one hundred and forty-four eſquires, and two hundred archers, on horſeback; and had, for his wages in that ſervice, an aſſignation of an hundred and eight ſacks of wool and an half, of the king's wool; taking for himſelf eight ſhillings per diem; for every banneret four ſhillings; every knight two ſhillings; every eſquire twelve pence; and every archer ſix pence. He had alſo the ſame year an aſſignation of a thouſand marks for guarding the Marches of Scotland.

In the ſame year he obtained a grant that himſelf and his heirs ſhould be quieti de pannagio, paſſagio, &c. and ſeveral other privileges of ſo extraordinary a nature, that they were ſoon after revoked, as being in maximum dampnum & exhæredationem regis[3].

In 17 Edw. III. (with the earls of Glouceſter, Warwick, Northampton, and others,) he marched into Scotland, to raiſe the ſiege of Louhmaban caſtle; and the ſame year was appointed an ambaſſador (with William de Montacute, earl of Saliſbury) to treat with Alfonſe, king of Caſtile, for the appeaſing of certain differences betwixt the ſubjects of that king and the ſubjects of king Edward, eſpecially mariners and citizens of Bayon; and was alſo one of the commiſſioners ſent to Rome, there to treat, in the preſence of the pope, touching a peace betwixt king Edward and Philip de Valois, as alſo concerning king Edward's right to the crown of France.

In 18 Edw. III. Henry de Lancaſter, earl of Derby, granted to ſir Roger de Chetwynd (whom he ſtyles noſtre cher bacheler) and Joan his wife, for the term of their lives, an annual rent of twenty pounds, out of his manor of Shenſtone[4].

In the ſame year he was joined in commiſſion with Richard earl of Arundel, to treat farther with Alfonſe, king of Caſtile, for appeaſing the differences before mentioned; likewiſe in the lieutenancy of the dukedom of Aquitaine, with power to govern and defend that country, and to recover whatſoever thereof ſhould be unjuſtly detained, as alſo to receive ſuch to favour as ſhould return to their obedience. Moreover, upon advertiſement given to the king of the weak condition of that country, he was ſent (together with the earl of Pembroke and ſome other eminent perſons) with five hundred knights and eſquires, and two thouſand archers; and, taking ſhipping at Southampton, arrived at Bayonne upon the 6th of June. Thence coming to Bourdeaux, he was entertained with ſolemn proceſſion, and there ſtayed fifteen days; after which, marching to Brigerac, ſir Walter Manney (one of the marſhals of the hoſt) ſaying to him as they ſat at dinner—"If we were good men at arms, we ſhould drink this evening with the French lords in Brigerac"—he replied: "And for me, it ſhall not be let." Wherefore, putting his men in order, he made a ſharp aſſault upon that town, which endured till noon; but without effect, inſomuch that he reſolved to aſſault it by water; and to that purpoſe ſent to Bourdeaux for ſhips: but, ſoon after, the town deſiring mercy, he aſſented thereto, and entered; and within a ſhort ſpace, having ſuch proſperous ſucceſs at Brigerac, took theſe places in High Gaſcoigne, viz. the caſtle of Langa; the town of le

---

[1] See the grant in the Britiſh Muſeum, 43 D. 32; and two ſeals of the king, annexed to it, in Plate XIII; one of which was the king's private ſeal, for the lands he poſſeſſed beyond the Tweed.—"That our kings, and all great perſons, antiently uſed their own pictures in the impreſſions of their ſeals, is very evident; military men always on horſeback, and in the ſame kind of armour that they wore, which in the elder times was mail for the moſt part, with a ſhield on the left arm, and in the right hand a naked ſword; upon which ſhields it is rare, before king Richard I's time, to ſee any diſtinct charge, at leaſt ſuch as became hereditary; but, after that, it was held a great honour for thoſe whoſe anceſtors had ſerved in the Holy Wars to retain ſome badges and marks which they there bore, ſo that then they did not only continue them upon their ſhields, but, to be better known, had the like depicted upon ſurcotes of ſilk, behind and before, which they wore over their mail. But, after this, ere long, divers bore their arms on fair, large, and deep ſhields, on their ſeals; and ſome on the reverſe, where the picture on horſeback was on the other ſide. Howbeit, in Edward I's days and after, moſt men began to leave off their pictures on horſeback in their ſeals; which cuſtom, by degrees declining, was utterly given over about 1356." Dugdale, Warwickſhire, vol. II, p. 921; where ſee ſome valuable remarks on the original uſe of ſeals, which were firſt introduced into this country by Edward the Confeſſor, in imitation of the Normans amongſt whom he had been educated.

[2] Froiſſart, lib. i. cap. 31.

[3] Appendix, p. 26.

[4] See this grant in the Appendix, N° XVI; and the ſeal in Plate XIII.

Lacke; alſo Mandurant; the caſtle of Montgiſe; the town of Punache; the caſtle of la Lewe; the town of la Lewe; the town of Forſait; and the tower of Pondayre; the great town of Beaumont, in Layl-loyles; and the chief town pertaining to the earl of Laylle. Thence he marched to Bonu, which he took by aſſault; with the caſtles of Pelagrue and Auberoche; and, ſhortly after, Auberoche being beſieged by the French, he ſent to the earl of Pembroke at Bergerath, as alſo to the lord Stafford, to meet him at a certain place; and ſo (with ſir Walter Manney) marched towards Auberoche; ſtaying a whole day at Lybourne, expecting the earl of Pembroke. But, when he ſaw he did not come, he went himſelf to the relief thereof (the earl of Oxford, ſir Walter Manney, ſir Richard Haſtings, the lord Ferrers, &c. accompanying him); and, riding all night, came within two miles of it in the morning; and then, putting their horſes to graze, ſtayed in a wood till towards noon, expecting the earl of Pembroke; being no more than three hundred ſpears, and ſix hundred archers; whereas the French, who lay before it, were ten or twelve thouſand. Notwithſtanding which diſparity, deeming it very diſhonourable to loſe their companions in Auberoche, ſir Walter Manney ſaying, "Sirs! let us leap on our horſes, and coaſt under the covert of this wood, till we be on the ſame ſide that joineth to their hoſt; and, when we be near, put ſpurs to our horſes, and cry our cries; we ſhall enter while they be at ſupper, and not aware of us; for, you ſhall ſee them ſo diſcomfited that they ſhall keep none array;" they thereupon all agreed; and, putting ſpurs to their horſes, came in a trout upon the French hoſt amongſt the Gaſcoignes, who were going to ſupper; the Engliſh, crying "A Derby! a Derby!" overthrew their pavilions, and wounded many. Amongſt the priſoners which they took, there were the earls of Layll and Pyergort, and the uncle of the earl of Pyergort, all taken in their tents; this being done on St. Lawrence's night. Beſides theſe before mentioned, he won St. Baſill; the town and caſtle of Rochemyllon; and caſtle of Augyllon; all in Gaſcoigne.

Thomas Walſingham ſaith, that, after the taking of that ſtrong town of Brigerac, he ſoon after ſubjected no leſs than fifty-ſix cities, and places of note, to the dominion of king Edward. Moreover, that he routed the French army approaching towards him; ſlew many, and took twenty-three priſoners of note: and that his bounty was ſuch, that it allured divers ſoldiers, from remote parts, to ſerve him; he giving them the plunder of the places which he took.

At this his being in Gaſcoigne, he made forty knights (Engliſh and Gaſcoignes): he alſo took at Brigerak a pipe full of gold, beſides other treaſures; and followed the earl of Armanak to Paragort; but, by getting into the caſtle, he eſcaped him.

Moreover, laying ſiege to Mountſegur, and battering it for fifteen days, it was at length yielded to him. After this, laying ſiege to Reole, it ſurrendered on terms of mercy. So likewiſe did the caſtle, after eleven weeks ſiege beſides. The caſtle of Mountpeſaunce he alſo took by ſtorm; and Mauleon by the advantage of an ambuſh. The Ville Franche in Agenois, with the caſtle, he likewiſe won by aſſault; and, marching through the country, took many others without difficulty. After three days' ſiege, Myremant was yielded to him. So likewiſe were Thomynes (on the river Garonne), and the caſtle of Damaſau; as alſo Angoleſme, after a month's ſiege.

In this year of theſe his great exploits, his father departing this life in England (as before is noted), he could not be at his funeral; and in the year following he was made the king's lieutenant in Aquitaine.

About this time was firſt inſtituted the famous order of the Garter; of which, next to the king, prince Edward was the firſt knight companion, and our earl of Leiceſter the ſecond.

In 20 Edw. III. being in Bourdeaux when Aguylon was beſieged, after he heard that the ſiege was raiſed, he ſent for all his knights and eſquires, which held of the Engliſh party; having twelve hundred men at arms, two thouſand archers, and three thouſand foot: and, paſſing the Garonne betwixt Bourdeaux and Blay, entered Poictou; where he took the town and caſtle of Mirabell by aſſault: likewiſe the town and caſtle of Alnoy; the towns of Surgeres and Benon; as alſo Mortain, on the ſea-ſide; burnt the town of Luſignan; won the town and caſtle of Taylbourg; obtained the town of St. John d'Angle, by render; took the town of Burg St. Maximien, by aſſault. So likewiſe Monſtrell, Boyvin, and the city of Poitiers. But theſe laſt paſſages are ſomewhat otherwiſe reported by Thomas Walſingham; who ſaith, that in this year (viz. 20 Edw. III.), upon a council held at Brigerak, in Aquitaine, by this earl and the great men of that country (he being then ſeneſchal there), John, the eldeſt ſon to the king of France, who had long beſieged Aguilon, but could not take it, ſent to him for a truce; which was expreſſly denied: and, ſeeing he could not obtain his deſire, quitted the ſiege by night in much diſorder, leaving his tents and baggage behind; and that this earl thereupon fixed himſelf in Aquilon, Reas, and ſeveral other places; as alſo in the caſtles of Agenoys and Tonynges. Likewiſe that, marching by Seintonge with a thouſand men, he lodged at Salveterre, which was rendered to him for fear; and that, after this, having taken the towns of St. John d'Angelyn and Ilyngham by aſſault; as alſo the caſtle; coming to Poytiers, after a ſhort ſiege, he took it; and, having refreſhed his army there for eight days, returned with great booty and triumph to Bourdeaux.

About this time alſo, Calais being beſieged by the Engliſh, king Edward took care that the avenues thereto ſhould be ſtrictly guarded, ſo that the French might not approach to raiſe that ſiege; whereupon he ſent this earl, to keep Newland Bridge, with a choice number of men and archers. Shortly after which, that ſtrong garriſon was rendered.

At this ſiege, bearing then the title of earl of Lancaſter, Derby, and Leiceſter, and ſteward of England, he was appointed by the king, together with William de Clinton earl of Huntingdon, Renaud de Cobham, ſir Walter Manney, William Lovell, and Stephen de Coſintone, to hear and determine all diſputes touching arms; and thereupon did, by a certain inſtrument under his and their hands and ſeals, bearing date in the camp there on the eve of St. Margaret (21 Edw. III.), give judgement for John de Warbelton in a certain cauſe then controverted betwixt him the ſaid John (ſon and heir to ſir John de Warbelton) and Tibaud the ſon of ſir Tibaud de Ruſſell, who aſſumed the ſurname of Gorges, for bearing his arms, viz. lozenge d'Or and d'Azure [1], without any difference; it being ſufficiently proved, that the anceſtors of the ſaid John de Warbelton had, time out of mind, borne the ſame; likewiſe, that ſir Raufe de Gorges (grandfather of this Tibaud) forſook his own proper arms, and, of his own accord, aſſumed theſe.

At this time he had, of his own retinue, eight hundred men at arms, and two thouſand archers; as alſo thirty banners until the truce; and kept ſuch hoſpitality, that he ſpent an hundred pounds a day, and eight or nine marks. After which truce, it was found alſo, upon account, that he had expended in thoſe wars of France, of his own treaſure, above ſeventeen thouſand pounds ſterling, beſides the pay which he had from the king. In conſideration, therefore, of his glorious atchievements in the dutchy of Aquitaine, and elſewhere, by many victories in open fight; as alſo in taking divers cities, towns, and caſtles (as the record itſelf doth expreſs), he obtained a grant, bearing date in the camp before Calais, the 1ſt of June, 21 Edw. III, to himſelf and the heirs male of his body, of the caſtle and town of Brigerac, which was one of thoſe places he had taken by ſtrong aſſault; likewiſe of all the lands and goods of thoſe priſoners which he had taken at St. John d'Angelyn, until their ranſoms were ſatisfied; and ſoon after that procured another grant to himſelf and the heirs male of his body of Horeſtan caſtle, co. Derby; and the annual rent of forty pounds, iſſuing out of the town of Derby.

---

[1] See Plate X. fig. 50.

In this year, there being a tournament held at Eltham in Kent, amongſt other accoutrements prepared for that heroic exerciſe, this earl had a hood given unto him by the king, made of white cloth, and embroidered with dancing men in blue habits, and buttoned before with great pearls. He obtained alſo a grant from the king of Horeſton caſtle in Derbyſhire, and twenty pounds a year to be received out of the ferme of the town of Derby [1].

About this period, by deed dated 18 March, 21 Edw. III, he aſſigned over to his dear ſiſter Maud, counteſs of Ulſter, the caſtle and manor of Melbourne [2].

In 22 Edw. III. he was the principal of thoſe perſons unto whom the king gave commiſſion to treat with the earl of Flanders upon certain differences betwixt the ſubjects of England and people of Flanders; as alſo made choice of to treat with the conſtable of France upon a truce for ſix weeks, in order to a peace throughout Picardy, Normandy, Artois, Boulogne, and Flanders. And upon the 25th of September, the ſame year, was conſtituted the king's lieutenant throughout the parts of Flanders, Calais, and all other places in France, with power to treat and agree with any of the king's adverſaries or their adherents; and in December following was ſent to Denemere, to receive the fealty and homage of the earl of Flanders. In this year likewiſe he obtained a charter for free-warren in all his lordſhips of Gymingham, Methwolde, Thetford, and Beſton, co. Norfolk. And in 23 Edw. III, by letters patent bearing date the 20th of Auguſt, was advanced to the title and dignity of earl of Lincoln; having therewith the annual fee of twenty pounds granted to him, to be paid by the ſheriff of that ſhire, in lieu of the tertium denarium of that county, as Thomas his uncle, late earl of Lincoln, had.

Soon after which, he was conſtituted the king's lieutenant and captain-general in the parts of Poictou, with power to treat of peace and amity; as alſo for obſervation of the truce with the French; and, upon his journey thither, obtained licence to grant a thouſand pounds per annum, lands and rents, to certain perſons, to diſpoſe of according to his own direction, for the term of twelve years. In this year he marched into Gaſcoigne with thirty thouſand men; and for ten days' ſpace made great ſpoil in the country, for ten leagues, with fire and ſword; at which time he took forty-two towns and caſtles; and, coming with his army to Tholouſe, challenged them out to fight; which they declining, he burnt the ſuburbs of the city.

In 25 Edw. III, having merited ſo highly by his prudent conduct and renowned exploits in the wars, and bearing then the titles of earl of Lancaſter, Leiceſter, Lincoln, Derby, Griſmond, and Ferrers, he was farther advanced to a higher pitch of honour, by the king's ſpecial charter, bearing date the 6th of March, the ſame year, viz. to the title and dignity of duke of Lancaſter. Which being done, by the general conſent of all the prelates and peers then ſitting in parliament at Weſtminſter, for his life, he was inveſted therewith by the cincture of a ſword; with power to have a chancery in the county of Lancaſter, and to iſſue out writs there under his own ſeal, as well touching pleas of the crown as any other relating to the common laws of this realm; as alſo to enjoy all other liberties and regalities belonging to a county Palatine, in as ample manner as the earl of Cheſter was known to have within that county [3]. About this time likewiſe he was conſtituted admiral of the king's whole fleet, from the Thames Weſtward.

And having the ſame year obtained licence to take a journey into Spruſe, there to fight againſt the Infidels [4]; the king thereby granted, that, in caſe he ſhould depart this life before his return, his executors ſhould retain all his caſtles, manors, and lands, into their hands, until his debts were diſcharged. In his journey thither, being taken in High-Almaine, he was conſtrained to give three hundred ſcutes of gold for his liberty. Which ſurpriſal of him was made by the duke of Brunſwick's means, as it ſeems; the deſign thereof being told him when he lay at Coloine. But, before he came to Syruſe, hearing that the Chriſtians and Pagans had made a truce, he returned to Coloine; and there, relating what he had heard of the duke of Brunſwick's purpoſe, ſaid, "It did not become ſuch a perſon to deal ſo with a ſtranger, in his journey, who had never offended him, nor intended any thing of ill towards him; and that, in caſe he had a mind to meddle with him, he ſhould find him ready to perform a ſoldier's part."

Which being told to the duke of Brunſwick, he ſent him a letter of challenge; whereunto he returned anſwer, that "he would meet him upon a day appointed, to perform, in his own perſon, what might juſtly be required:" and accordingly rode to Calais, with fifty knights, beſides others of his retinue. In this his paſſage, coming near Gyſnes, meeting with ſir John Clermont, marſhal of France, with a large attendance of men in arms, he was honourably received by him in the quindenes before Chriſtmas, and conducted nobly to Heddyng, where ſir James de Bourbon met him, and attended him to Paris; at which place he was alſo received by the nobility and all other people with high regard. The like reception he had by the king of France, who ſent for him to his palace; as alſo by (his own kinſman) the king of Navarre. Much agitation there was, before the day of battle, to reconcile them; but in vain. Upon that day, therefore, they entered the liſts; and, having firſt taken their oaths (as it is the cuſtom of duelliſts to do), mounted their horſes for the combat. But it was obſerved, that, before they had thus taken their oaths, no man could appear more valiant and heroic than the duke of Brunſwick ſeemed to be; and, that afterwards his countenance changed ſo, that he could not wield his ſword, ſhield, and lance; his ſhield alſo turning aſide three times in his taking it up. Which being diſcerned by his friends, they adviſed him to ſubmit himſelf to the judgement of the king of France in that quarrel. But this our duke, ſtanding chearfully in his place, expecting the combat, ſaid, "that, before he entered the liſts, perhaps he might have been perſuaded to an agreement; but now that he had mounted his horſe, and was ready, and that the king, with his nobles, and an extraordinary confluence of people, were there come together; it would be an high diſhonour to himſelf and to the whole Engliſh nation to depart without performing what truth and juſtice did require; adding, that he would not go out of the liſts, neither with diſhonour to his blood, to the king of England, nor to his country." Whereupon the duke of Brunſwick, wholly quitting the quarrel without reſervation of his honour, and ſubmitting himſelf to the award of the king of France therein, the king of France at a great feaſt reconciled them; and, having ſo done, took this our duke and, ſhewing him divers delightful things, offered to give them to him; but of theſe he accepted only of a thorn out of the crown of our Saviour, which he brought away, and left as a relick in the collegiate church of our Lady at Leiceſter [5]. After which, taking his leave of the king of France, he returned into England, and came to the king at St. Albans, where he was received with much joy and honour, the king then keeping his Chriſtmas there.

This pious prince, who, from his heroic virtues, was ſtyled "the good duke of Lancaſter," out of his devout reſpect to the canons of his collegiate church at Leiceſter, permitted them to incloſe their woods, and ſtored them with deer out of his own parks; and perſonably interceded with the pope for appropriating the churches of Humberſton and Hungarton to that abbey. About this time alſo he received ſpecial command from the king, to keep a ſtrict guard upon all the ſea-coaſts of Lancaſhire, and to arm all thoſe forty lanciers, which were then raiſed in his territories of Monmouth, Groſmunt, Whitcaſtel, Kedewy, Karwatheland, and Iſkennyn, for the public ſervice.

In 28 Edw. III. he attended the king into France, having intelligence that the king of France would give him battle at St. Omers; but, when he came hither, he found that the French were retreated.

Shortly after this, there being a truce with the

---

[1] Appendix, p. 26.

[2] See this grant in the Appendix, N° XVI; and the ſeal in Plate XIII.

[3] Appendix, p. 26.

[4] Knighton, p. 2603.

[5] See a ſketch of this relick in Plate XIII.

French until Eaſter, he was ſent, with the earl of Arundel and others, to the pope, then at Avignon, to treat of farther peace with them. But the duke of Bourbon, earl of Arminiak, and others who were ſent ambaſſadors from the French, fell off from what they had formerly agreed to upon the truce concluded at Calais, refuſing any farther agreement; ſaying, that they were prepared to defend their country againſt the Engliſh; requiring, that the king of England ſhould firſt forbear to quarter the arms of France, and that he ſhould do homage to the king of France for Gaſcoigne. But hereunto this our duke anſwered, that "thoſe arms of France, which he bore by the advice of his liege-men of France, he would not relinquiſh for any man's pleaſure; and, that the king of England ſhould not do homage to any perſon, over whom, by hereditary right from his mother, he claimed ſuperiority." At this time of his coming to Avignon (viz. on Chriſtmas-eve), he had two hundred horſe in his train, whereof thirty-two were covered with harneſs: at which place he ſtayed ſix weeks in great honour; the biſhops, nobles, citizens, and others, to the number of two thouſand horſe, meeting him; ſo that, from three of the clock till night, they had ſcarce time to paſs the bridge. At his entrance, he ſaluted all the people, and rode to the pope's palace; where, alighting from his horſe without the gate, he made his approach to his holineſs with all due reverence, which he knew well how to perform; and, after ſome brief diſcourſe with him, went to his lodgings, where he kept ſuch hoſpitality, for the time he ſtayed, that all the court admired it, having laid in an hundred tuns of wine before his coming; being ſo courteous to all perſons, eſpecially to the pope and cardinals, that they ſaid he had not his fellow in the whole world. And though, upon his return, the French laid their deſigns to ſurprize him, he eſcaped them all, and came into England with ſafety and honour [1]; and in 28 Edw. III. obtained a remiſſion of a rent which he had been uſed to pay for the bailiwick of Scalleby within the foreſt of Pickering; and ſome exemptions and other privileges [2].

In 29 Edw. III, being in Scotland, he gave intelligence to king Edward, that the Scots prepared for battle; and in 30 Edw. III. was conſtituted lieutenant and captain-general for the king, and for John de Montfort, duke of Bretaigne, in the dukedom of Bretaigne, that duke being then in minority; and after Whitſuntide went with him thither; paſſing firſt through Normandy over the lands of the king of Naverne, whom the king of France had by fraud ſurprized and put into priſon, becauſe he adhered to king Edward, he came to Mountebrigge, in the Iſle of Conſtantin; thence to Caranten; and ſo to the caſtle of Pont d'Audomer, belonging to the king of Naverne, and then beſieged by the French: the ſoldiers in which, hearing of his approach, fled, leaving all their military engines and neceſſaries behind them. Whereupon, having manned and victualled it anew, he marched to Bretoil (belonging likewiſe to the king of Naverne), then likewiſe beleaguered by the French; and, removing that ſiege, victualled it alſo. Thence to Vernoil, a ſtrong city on the ſkirt of Normandy, and took it by ſtorm the firſt day that he came before it. After which, he aſſaulted the caſtle thrice; and on the third day took it, having a ſpecial engine, wherewith he did wonders in demoliſhing the walls of the caſtle. But, it being told him, on the morrow, that the king of France was within five leagues, he drew out his army; and, preparing for battle, ſtayed in expectance of him, till he had intelligence, that he would neither fight, nor come nearer.

In this interim, the king of France ſent two heralds of arms unto him, to let him know he obſerved, that he had for a long time been in his country, and done great ſpoil to his people there, ſo that he thought he had a mind to give him battle; and, if ſo, that he would fulfil his deſire. Whereunto he returned anſwer, that "he was come into thoſe parts upon ſpecial buſineſs, which he had already in part effected; and, that he was then going back to ſome other parts, where he had ſomewhat to do; adding that, if the king of France, or any one of his ſubjects, ſhould endeavour to hinder him, he was ready to make his way by force; reſolving to do nothing obſcurely: and, that he would cauſe a lantern to be carried behind him, that the king of France might know which way he bent his courſe. But the king of France forbore to follow him, expecting his return, until he had accompliſhed what he had deſigned againſt the prince of Wales, having a purpoſe to vanquiſh them both; and ſo, going back, made towards the prince.

Hereupon the duke marched towards Argentoile, to Turri, and ſo by the abbey of St. Fremund, where he paſſed over a dangerous river, the bridge being broken by the French, and ſixty-ſeven armed men left there to hinder his paſſage: but eighteen Engliſh, going before, ſlew and wounded all thoſe, ſo that none of them came off. Thence he marched to Caratan, and ſo to Mantebourgh; no day paſſing wherein he did not take ſome ſtrong hold, and divers priſoners. Winter, therefore, drawing on, by means whereof he diſcerned that he could not keep the field, he marched to the city of Reynnes, in Britanny, about Allhallow-tide, and laid ſiege to it, with a thouſand men at arms, and five hundred archers. And, though he lay before it nine months, waſting the country adjacent, yet durſt not Charles de Bloys, with his army of ten thouſand men, encounter him. Which being obſerved by the inhabitants, they deſired a treaty with him; and thereupon, giving him an hundred thouſand ſcutes for the charges he had been at, yielded it to him, with condition to enjoy their goods. And ſo, giving ſecurity to render it up whenſoever it ſhould be required on the king of England's behalf, he placed a governor in it, and departed. At this ſiege of Reynnes, he iſſued from the army, and won Otty and Semay, lying on the river of Aine, on the march of Lorein.

In 31 Edw. III, when John king of France, having been taken priſoner by Edward the Black Prince, was brought into this country, the captive monarch was entertained in the Savoy, a ſtately palace in the ſuburbs of London, then lately built by Henry duke of Lancaſter at the expence of 52,000 marks, which he had got at the taking of Brigerak.

In 33 Edw. III, being ſent with his retinue to Calais, to bring forth with him the marquis of Miſe, and thoſe Almaines who tarried for the arrival of king Edward, he marched with them over the river of Soume, to beſiege the town of Bray; where, paſſing behind the walls, he cauſed his men to wade up to the ſhoulders; and, failing of his purpoſe, returned to Calais. After which, ere long, king Edward himſelf coming with a potent army, he joined his forces thereto, and ſo, dividing it into three bodies, marched towards Reymes in Champaign; where, being peaceably received (with the earls of Richmond, March, and the famous ſir John Chandos), he went out in the night (being the feſtival of St. Thomas of Canterbury) to ſtorm the town of Cerney, in Dormoys; a place of great ſtrength, with a double ditch and a huge wall, with many turrets full of armed men. On the morrow, coming within a league thereof, the alarm was given to the town. But, notwithſtanding this, on they marched, and, being come near to it, alighted from their horſes; and, ſtoutly paſſing the ditches, ſcaled the wall, killing all that reſiſted; and, having thus gotten the town, made preparation to ſtorm the caſtle; but, that being diſcerned, they ſoon yielded it up. Thence he marched, about three leagues farther, to Auby, in Dormoys, lying upon the river Dayne, being ſtronger than Cerneye; but, before they got thither, the inhabitants fled, and left it to him. Thence, the ſame day, to Menray, in Champaine, a fortified town alſo; whereupon he returned ſafe to the king.

In 34 Edw. III. this duke obtained a charter from the king, dated June 28, for changing the time of holding one of the annual fairs at Leiceſter [3].

---

[1] Among the Records in the King's Remembrancer's Office of this year, is a claim of forfeitures, under the title of "De clameo ducis Lancaſtrie;" Paſch. Rec. 28 Edw. III. Rot. 1. And in the ſame year occurs "Carta Ducis Lancaſtrie, de 40 libris annuis percipiendis ſub Honore Comitis Derbie & Lincolnie, equali portione;" Mich. Rec. 28 Edw. III.

[2] Appendix, p. 26.

[3] Ibidem.

In the ſame year, the king keeping his Chriſtmas near unto the ſaid city of Rhemes, thence diſpoſed of his army into nine parts, and made four hundred knights. Having ſo done, being upon his march towards Paris, he ſent this duke to the gates of Paris, offering battle to the French; with condition, that, if he ſhould then be worſted, he would never make farther challenge to the crown of France. But, the next year, there was a peace concluded betwixt both realms; after which, finding nothing more of his military employments, we ſhall notice his works of piety.

Of theſe, the chief and principal was his completion of the hoſpital, or bedehouſe, begun by his father at Leiceſter [1]; wherein were maintained 100 infirm poor perſons, the third part of them to be women; and alſo ten other poor women to be keepers and waſhers of the ſaid 100. Within the precincts alſo of the Newark he founded a moſt magnificent and goodly college [2], and ſet over it a dean, twelve canons, thirteen vicars choral, three clerks, ſix choiriſters, and one verger, the ſame alſo to be a porter of the college. And all theſe were ſufficiently provided with revenues; which John of Gaunt, afterward duke of Lancaſter, in fulfilling of that his devout deſign, perfected; and both the hoſpital and college continued the greateſt ornaments of the town of Leiceſter till the general diſſolution of religious houſes in the reign of king Henry VIII.

The next was the gift of a certain livery to the two Recluſes, in the houſe of St. Helen at Pontefract, called "the Blanch liveries," which did appertain to his donation, as lord of the honour of Pontefract, to be paid every day, out of the hoſpital of St. Nicholas there, for the finding of a prieſt to celebrate divine ſervice in the chapel of St. Helen for ever.

Moreover, by his deed bearing date Jan. 2, in the tenth year after he was duke (which was in 35 Edw. III.), he gave to the monks of Whalley, co. Lancaſter, and to their ſucceſſors, two cottages, ſeven acres of land, an hundred and eighty-three acres of paſture, two hundred acres of wood, called Rommeſgrove; all lying in the chaſe of Blakburn: likewiſe two meſſuages; an hundred and twenty-ſix acres of land; twenty-ſix acres of meadow; an hundred and thirty acres of paſture, called Standen, Holcroft, and Grenelache, lying within the towns of Penhulton and Cliderhou, with the fold and foldage of Standen, to ſupport and maintain two recluſes in a certain place within the church-yard of the parochial church of Whalley, and their ſucceſſors recluſes there; as alſo for two women-ſervants to attend them, there to pray for the ſoul of him the ſaid duke, his anceſtors, and heirs; that is to ſay, to find them every week, throughout the year, ſeventeen loaves of bread, ſuch as uſually were made in their convent, each of them weighing fifty ſhillings ſterling; and ſeven loaves of the ſecond ſort, of the ſame weight; as alſo eight gallons of their better ſort of beer; and three pence for their food. Moreover, every year, at the feaſt of All Saints, to provide for them ten large fiſhes, called ſtock-fiſh; and one buſhel of oat-meal for pottage; one buſhel of rye; two gallons of oil for their lamps; one pound of tallow for candle; ſix loads of turf, and one load of faggots, for their fuel; likewiſe to repair their habitations; and to find a chaplain, with a clerk, to ſing maſs in the chapel belonging to thoſe recluſes every day; as alſo all veſtments, and other utenſils and ornaments, for the ſame chapel. Upon deaths, the duke and his heirs to nominate the ſucceſſors.

After all which, by his teſtament, bearing date at his caſtle of Leiceſter, the 15th day of March next enſuing, (1360, 35 Edw. III.) wherein he ſtyles himſelf duke of Lancaſter, earl of Derby, Lincoln, and Leiceſter, ſteward of England, as alſo lord of Brigerak and Beaufort, he bequeathed his body to be buried in the collegiate church of our Lady at Leiceſter, on that ſide the high altar where the corpſe of his father lay interred [3]; appointing that it ſhould be buried within three weeks after his death; and, in caſe he ſhould die at Leiceſter, to be firſt carried to the pariſh-church, the third day before his funeral, and that divine ſervice ſhould there be performed in due manner, with twenty-four torches; whereof twelve, with two cloths of gold, to remain to that church. Moreover, that the curate of that church ſhould have his beſt horſe, or the price, in name of a principal. And that thence his corpſe ſhould be carried to the before-ſpecified collegiate church of our Lady, and there buried; but without pomp of armed men, or horſes covered, or other vanities; only an horſe, with five tapers, each of an hundred pound weight; four great morters; 100 torches about his body; fifty poor people (whereof twenty-five clothed in white raiment, and twenty-five in blue), bearing thoſe torches. The king, queen, prince and his brothers, the duke's wife and his ſiſters and brothers, and other noble relations, to be invited to the funeral. He bequeaths 50 pieces of linen to be divided, as he had verbally directed his executors, among as many poor women at the time, if ſo many could be found; but no expence among the country people. If he died in any other place, yet his body was to be brought to the collegiate church of our Lady there, to which all the wax and cloth of gold were to remain. He alſo bequeathed to the church all the furniture and relics of his chapel; and all his goods, ſilver plate, and other furniture, for payment of his debts, and rewards to his ſervants not before rewarded, at the diſcretion of his executors; who were alſo to finiſh the collegiate church, with the deanry and prebendal houſes which he had planned around it [4]; and to redreſs and make ſatisfaction for all wrongs done by him, as ſoon as they could aſcertain them. His executors were, John Gynewell, biſhop of Lincoln; William, abbot of Leiceſter; his ſecond ſiſter Blanch, married to lord Wake; his couſin Walkynton; Robert la Mare; John Bokelonde; John Charnele; Walter Power; Simkyn Simeon; and John Newmarch; who were to diſpoſe of all remainders, after his bequeſts were fulfilled and debts paid, for the good of his ſoul [5]."

"This year," ſays Barnes, "a plague happened ſomething like the former, in reſpect of which it was called the ſecond plague, nothing near ſo diſmal and univerſally fatal as the former, but much more deſtructive of the nobility and prelacy. Thus," adds the Hiſtorian, "died a man more worthy to live for ever, even the great, valiant, and liberal prince Henry Plantagenet, by the plague, March 24."

This event happened at Leiceſter; and the duke was buried in the collegiate church there, agreeably to the direction of his will; which was proved 3 kal. April, 1361, in Leiceſter, before John biſhop of Lincoln. The caſtle, manor, and ſoke of Bolingbroke, the manor of Thoreſby, &c. were ſoon after, by the king's order, committed to the care of the biſhop of Lincoln and the other executors; with an injunction that all the records and deeds relative to the dutchy ſhould be produced, when neceſſary, at the Exchequer [6].

He left iſſue, by Iſabel his wife, daughter to Henry lord Beaumont, two daughters, his heirs; Maud, 22 years old, firſt married to Ralph, ſon and heir to Ralph lord Stafford; and after to William of Bavaria, ſon to Lewis the emperor, and duke of Zealand, Holland, Haynault, and Frizeland; and Blanch, 19 years old, to John of Gaunt, earl of Richmond, fourth ſon to king Edward III. Betwixt which two daughters partition of the lordſhip and lands of their inheritance being made, the 16th of July, 35 Edw. III; Maud [7], the elder, had, for her purparty, an aſſignment of the manors of Tyberton, Rodleye, and Mynſtreworth, co. Glouceſter; the caſtles and lordſhips of Monmouth, Hodenak, Blanch-caſtle, Skenefrith, Groſſemont, Ettelowe, Eggemor, Kedewelly; the provoſtſhip of Kedewelly; the office of Meſſore; the quarter Cadugan; the quarter Peynryn, Karwathlan, Iſkoyt; and quarter Mory, Leirwith, de Karn, and Kedewelly, Iſkenny, and Maherdyf, with the appurtenances, in the Marches of Wales; the manors of Somburne and Briggeſtoke, co. Southampton; Eſt Gartone, Standone, Poghele, Sandone, and Hungerford, with the meadows of Kenlebury and Hungerford, co. Berks; the manors of Lavynton, Colingbourne, and Everle, co. Wilts; the manors of Shapwyk, Kingſton, Chauton, Lecchelade, and Eton-Meyſy; as alſo a certain parcel of wood in the foreſt of Braddene, co. Wilts; the manor of Britteſgrave, co. Surrey; the caſtle and manor of Newcaſtle under Line, with its members, co. Stafford; the manors of Shilton and Desford, co. Leiceſter; the bailiwick of the honour of Leiceſter, co. Warwick; the bailiwicks of Carleton and Glenfield; the bailiwicks of Sileby and Hinckley; the caſtle and manor of Leiceſter, with its members; the gaol and mills of Leiceſter; the bailiwick of the fees of the honour of Leiceſter, co. Northampton and Rutland; the yearly ferme of ſixty-four pounds, four ſhillings, out of the town of Huntingdon; the annual ferme of an hundred and twenty pounds out of the town of Gurmeceſtre, co. Huntingdon; as alſo the lordſhips of Beuford and Nogent, in France.

---

[1] See before, p. 226.

[2] See the hiſtory of this foundation among the Parochial Collections for Leiceſter.

[3] "On the South ſide lyeth Henry the firſt duke of Lancaſter; and in the next arch to his hedde lyeth a lady, by likelihod his wife." Leland, Itin. I. 17.

[4] The church and buildings were completed by John of Gaunt, who for many years granted an annual ſum towards carrying on this great work.

[5] See this will at large in the "Royal and Noble Wills," p. 83.

[6] Appendix, p. 27.

[7] For a liſt of the knights fees which came to this lady on her father's death, ſee p. 234.

And to John earl of Richmond, and Blanch his wife, the other daughter and coheir (whoſe homage was then taken by reaſon of iſſue betwixt them), the caſtle and town of Pontefract; the manors of Bradeford, Almanbury, Aitofts, Warnfeld, Rothewell, Ledes, Roundehay, Scoles, Berewyk, Kepax, Aberton, Knottingley, with the mills there; Beghale, Kamſale, Ouſton, Elmeſale, Akworth, and Tanſhelf; the bailiwicks of Oſgodcros, Agbrigge, and Staincros; the bailiwick and honour of Pontefract; a certain rent, called Caſtleferme, with the pleas and perquiſites. Alſo the manors of Kriteling and Barlay; excepting ſuch lands therein as were held for life (the reverſion to the ſaid duke); the caſtle of Pykering, with the ſoke and all its members; the manors of Eſyngwold and Scalby, with their members, all co. York; the caſtle and manor of Dunſtamburgh, with the manors of Shoplaye, Stanford, Burton, and Emeldon; alſo the fiſhing of Tweed, co. Northumberland; the wapentakes of Leyland, Amunderneſs, and Londeſdale; the manors of Oveſ-walton, Preſton, Shingleton, Riggeby, and Wra, Overton, Skerton; the towns of Lancaſter and Slyne; the royal bailiwick of Blackburnſhire; the office of maſter-foreſter beyond Ribbel; the vaccary of Wyreldale, with its members, co. Lancaſter. Likewiſe the manors of Penwortham, Totyngton, and Rachedale; the wapentake of Elyderhowe, with the demeſne lands there; the lordſhip of Bouland; the vaccary of Bouland and Blackburnſhire; the foreſt of Blackburnſhire, and park of Ightenhull, with the appurtenances in Blackburnſhire, in the ſame county of Lancaſter; the manor of Hinckley, with the bailiwick there, co. Leiceſter; the caſtle and manor of Kenilworth, with the pool and mill there; the manors of Wotton, Shrewele, Radeſle, and Aſhtul, with their appurtenances, co. Warwick; the manors of Halton, Ronkore, More, Whitelawe, Congelton, Keleſhole, and Bedeſtan; the bailiwick of Halton; the town of Wyndenes, and ſerjeantry of Wyndes, co. Cheſter. Moreover, beſides theſe great lordſhips and lands, there was a farther aſſignment made unto the ſaid John earl of Richmond, and Blanch his wife, of the manors of Coggeſhul, Cridelyng, Barley, Kilbourne, Toreſholme, Martheſdon, Swanyngton, Paſſenham. Likewiſe certain lands in Daventre and Hinkele, with the mills of Lilleborn; alſo of the manor of Uggele, co. Eſſex.

And to the before-ſpecified Maud, of the manors of Hertleghe, Langeſtoke, Weſton, Berewyk, Staundene; a certain bakehouſe in Leiceſter; the bedellary of Sornburne; the manor of Heidewyke, in Wales; the manor of Ebbethe; the mill of Hungerford; the manor of Rye, &c.

This illuſtrious perſon received an honour from David Bruce, king of Scots, not known to any of our hiſtorians. In April, 1359, (that is, in the 29th year of king David's reign,) this latter made Henry duke of Lancaſter earl of Moray; to hold the ſame to him and his heirs male; and, in default of heirs male, to his daughters, Maud, counteſs of Holland, Zeland, and Henault, with remainder to Blanch of Lancaſter [1].

WILLIAM, EARL OF LEICESTER.

William the Firſt, ſurnamed the Good, count of Henault [2], of Holland, and of Zeland, and lord of Frizeland, was eſpouſed the 19th of May, 1305, to Jane de Valois, ſiſter of Philip de Valois; who afterward became king of France. William and Jane had three ſons and four daughters. The firſt and ſecond ſons, John and Lewis of Henault, died young. Of the four daughters, Elizabeth of Henault, the youngeſt, on the 2d of February, 1354, was contracted to Robert of Namur, lord of Beaufort-ſur-meuſe and of Renaix, ſixth ſon of John of Flanders, count of Namur [3]. This ſir Robert of Namur was the perſon, to whom Froiſſart dedicates the firſt volume of his celebrated Chronicle; according to whom this Robert made a conſiderable figure in his time, both as a warrior and negociator. Edward III. and his ſons, particularly John of Gaunt, had in him a ſteady friend, and uſeful ally. Elizabeth deceaſed, without children, the 26th of January, 1360. About 20 years after her death, Robert of Namur eſpouſed Iſabel of Melun; but he had no children by her; and died, leaving no lawful iſſue, the 18th of Auguſt, 1392.

Philippa of Henault, duke William's third daughter, on the 24th of January, 1327, was married to our Edward III.

Jane of Henault, the duke's ſecond daughter, became the wife of William VI, the firſt duke of Juliers; and died in 1337.

Of Margaret we ſhall ſpeak preſently.

William, the only ſurviving ſon of William the Good, carried ſuccour to the king of Spain againſt the Moors, made the voyage into the Holy Land, and, entering into a fierce and bloody war againſt the Friſons, was ſlain in battle Sept. 26, 1345; leaving no children, his ſiſter Margaret became his heir.

In the year 1345, ſhe was married to Louis IV, emperor of Germany; and became his widow Oct. 11, 1347. On the death of William above-mentioned, ſhe took poſſeſſion of his earldoms and ſeignories [4].

The empreſs Margaret had by Lewis three ſons, William, Albert, and Lewis; who were entitled dukes of Bavaria, according to the courteſy of the Empire, where all the children take their fathers' titles; none of them were proprietaries in poſſeſſion, but only the iſſue of the right ſtock of a duke of Bavaria; for, the emperor Lewis was but ſecond ſon to Lewis, duke of Bavaria, palatine of the Rhine. The empreſs, having left her huſband, to go and take poſſeſſion of her brother's earldoms of Henault, Holland, and Zeland, and his lordſhips of Frizeland, before her return to Germany, appointed her eldeſt ſon regent of thoſe countries, upon condition that he ſhould pay to her annually ten thouſand French crowns; and, in failure of ſuch payment, ſhe ſhould be at liberty to reſume the property of theſe earldoms and lordſhips as before. Her reſignation of them was made by letters patent, and declared in the preſence of many princes and prelates. But, ſome time after, William, following bad advice, refuſed to pay his mother the ſtipulated penſion, and carried himſelf like an abſolute prince.

After the death of Lewis the emperor, the empreſs-dowager came into Holland to Dordrecht, whither ſhe ſent for her ſon the regent; who, being come to her, reſigned the government and poſſeſſion of Holland, Zeland, and Frizeland, which ſhe had made over to him, and of which ſhe now demanded the reſtitution, as he had failed to remit to her any part of the ſum for which ſhe had given up the countries in queſtion. Upon this ſurrender, William retired into Henault, and his mother remained ſole ſovereign; but ſhe governed her people very indifferently.

---

[1] The creation-charter is among the Records of the Dutchy. See Bag B. N° 5.

[2] Geneal. Hiſt. de Maiſon de France.

[3] Froiſſart, Geneal. Hiſt.

[4] Grimeſtone's Hiſtory of the Netherlands.

In the year 1349, the war, which had been for ſome time ſubſiſting between the earls of Holland and the biſhops of Utrecht, was renewed, and then followed by a ſhort truce, which was to laſt to the feaſt of St. Michael, 1350.

In that year commenced two dangerous factions in Holland; which afflicted that country for above an hundred and fifty years, and brought it almoſt to ruin. Thoſe of the one party were called Cabilleaux, or Merlus, which ſignifies a voracious ſea-fiſh; thoſe who took this name meant to imply, that they ſhould ſwallow up their adverſaries. The other party called themſelves Hoecks, or Hooks, meaning that they ſhould catch the Cabilleaux, or Merlus, before the latter could devour them. The principal nobility and barons were engaged on one ſide or other; and the whole country was diſtracted by diſcord, and laid waſte by murders, robberies, and fire.

Theſe animoſities increaſing, the Cabillautins ſent their deputies to duke William, entreating him to come into Holland, and take the government of it; being determined no longer to ſubmit to his mother. With ſome difficulty duke William complied with their importunities, and became their leader. Upon his coming among them, the towns of North Holland the Kennemers, and Weſt Friſons, received him for their lord, by doing the ſame homage, and taking the ſame oath to him, that were due to the earls of Holland. The Hecktins had recourſe to the empreſs, whoſe party they held; they began to furniſh their towns and caſtles with men, victuals, and ammunition. On the other ſide, the Cabillautins laid ſiege to their places; and, in leſs than a year, ruined ſeventy of them. The empreſs expoſtulated with her ſon, by letters, for preſuming to intermeddle with her authority, and ſhewing ſuch deadly rancour againſt the towns of Holland. William anſwered, "that the country was his by the grant which ſhe had made of it in his favour;" and he refuſed to give it up. Upon which, the empreſs levied an army, which, with the ſuccour ſent to her by her ſiſter Philippa, queen of England, was rendered very conſiderable. She embarked with her forces, and landed with them at La Vere, in Zeland. Her ſon landed with his troops in the ſame iſland; and a violent battle enſued, wherein a great number were ſlain and drowned on either ſide. In the end, victory declared for the mother; and the ſon eſcaped with great difficulty, and fled into Holland. This battle was fought in the year 1351. Each party collected new forces; and ſoon after was fought a ſecond battle, more bloody and obſtinate than the former; in which the empreſs's forces were all either drowned, killed, or put to flight. She had the good fortune to get on-board a little bark, and eſcape ſafe to England. The general of the Engliſh troops was ſlain; and lies buried at Loſdanen, where his tomb is yet to be ſeen in black marble. So much blood was ſpilt in this battle, that for three days after (if credit may be given to antient Hiſtorians) the river Meuſe, at full ſea, was red in that place. It was fought in the year 1351; and the ſame year matters were made up between the mother and the ſon. By the terms of agreement it was ſtipulated, that the empreſs ſhould hold the county of Henault during her life, and duke William have the quiet poſſeſſion of Holland, Zeland, and Frizeland.

The queen of England, it may be ſuppoſed, had uſed her beſt endeavours to put an end to this unnatural war; and, it is likely, the good duke of Lancaſter had not been ſparing of his pains in the ſame virtuous undertaking. In 1351, immediately, we may preſume, after the accommodation between the empreſs and her ſon, Maud, the duke's eldeſt daughter, and relict of Ralph de Stafford, ſon of lord Stafford, was betrothed to duke William. The duke of Lancaſter left England, in order to make a journey into Pruſſia during the truce between England and France, before the ſolemnization of his daughter's marriage; which was managed by the queen, and brought to a completion the next year. On this occaſion the earl of Holland made a journey to England [1], and eſpouſed Maud in the king's chapel at Weſtminſter, where the nuptials were performed in the preſence of the nobility, and in a very magnificent manner. The duke took away Maud with him, and carried her to Zeland. At the time of this ſecond marriage, ſhe was only 19 years of age. It is probable that her marriage with the ſon of lord Stafford had gone no farther than to a contract, and had never been conſummated. Barnes ſays, though he mentions no authority for it, that ſhe had been a widow about three years at the time of her ſecond marriage; that is, in 26 Edw. III.; but Ralph (as I judge from Dugdale) died in 22 Edw. III. when Maud could not be more than 14, or thereabouts. Lord Stafford we find to be married to Margaret, daughter to the earl of Glouceſter, in 10 Edw. III; and Hugh, who ſucceeded Ralph in the line of ſucceſſion, was born about 18 Edw. III.; ſo that Ralph, who muſt have had his birth between the two periods, muſt have been at leaſt ſomewhat older than Maud, though I know not the time preciſely.

The empreſs died about five years after the marriage of her ſon; but neither her reconciliation to him, nor her death, extinguiſhed the mutual animoſity between the Cabillaux and the Hoecks; which continued to diſturb the peace of Holland to the time of Maximilian the Firſt.

About the time of the empreſs Margaret's death, the war broke out afreſh between duke William and the biſhop of Utrecht; in which the former had conſiderably the advantage. At length, about the year 1357, the depredations and miſeries they had wrought upon each other were ſuſpended by the mediation of their friends, and a peace concluded upon terms agreeable to each party.

In the year 1358, on St. George's day, the king kept a ſolemn feaſt and open court for all comers, princes, barons, knights, ladies, and gentlemen. To this celebrity the earl of Holland was invited both by the king and the queen, who received him with great marks of love and eſteem. At his return home, the earl (we are not told through what accident) loſt his ſenſes, and killed Gerard of Wateringhen. The earl was a very large and ſtrong man, and diſpatched the knight with a blow of his fiſt. After this, he was ſhut up, and kept under ward till his death, which happened about nineteen years afterwards.

Upon this accident, the factions between the Hoectins and Cabillaux broke out afreſh. The Cabillaux would have the counteſs Maud to be governeſs of the countries ſubject to the earl her huſband; but, as Maud had no children, the oppoſite party choſe Albert of Bavaria, count William's next brother, to be adminiſtrator and regent of the provinces during William's inſanity. The nobility of Henault conſented, for their parts, to this choice; and ſent a ſplendid embaſſy to Albert in Bavaria, intreating him to ſupply his brother's place among them. Albert readily accepted the invitation; and, on his arrival in Holland, was well received by both parties, and appointed governor of his brother's ſeveral provinces. At the ſame time it was agreed, that he ſhould pay yearly to the counteſs Maud, his ſiſter-in-law, the ſum of twelve thouſand French crowns. Both factions ſeemed to be ſatisfied with this award; but did not long continue friends. In the ſubſequent commotions, however, I do not read that Maud took any ſhare. The compromiſe, made on this occaſion between Maud and Albert, may be ſeen in Du Mont's Corps Diplomatic, which has a copy of the inſtrument made on the occaſion.

Authors affirm, that Maud outlived her huſband about four years [2]. He died in 1377. But they who give this account of Maud's death are very much miſtaken; for, ſhe died on Palm Sunday, 1362 [3].

After the death of her father, who deceaſed about a year before, her huſband William earl of Holland bore the title of earl of Leiceſter and ſteward of England.

---

[1] Walſingham. Knyghton.

[2] Grimeſtone, Barnes, & alii.

[3] Eſch. 36 Edw. III.

land. The other titles of Henry duke of Lancaſter went to John of Gaunt, huſband of duke Henry's youngeſt daughter Blanch. Upon the death of duke Henry, Maud came over to England, to claim her moiety of the duke's inheritance; which accordingly was divided between the two ſiſters. The vulgar notion (ſays Knyghton) was, that Maud was taken off by poiſon, to prevent a diviſion of the Lancaſter eſtate. Her dying ſo opportunely for John of Gaunt might give riſe to ſuch a ſuſpicion, and a report of that ſort might afterwards be propagated by the enemies of John of Gaunt; who, however, does not ſeem to have given any occaſion for an imputation ſo injurious to his honour. On the death of Maud, he received the additional title of earl of Leiceſter; which ſhews the earl of Holland to have held it only by courteſy, and during his wife's life; and with this title John of Gaunt obtained the other moiety of the late duke of Lancaſter's eſtate. A few months after this acceſſion of fortune and title, he was advanced to the dukedom of Lancaſter in full parliament, with the uſual ceremonies.

Partitio feodorum militum inter heredes Henrici nuper ducis Lancaſtrie, facta anno 35 Edw. III.

Feoda militum pertin' honori Leic', in com' Leic'.

Rex, &c. dilecto ſibi Waltero atte Bergh, cuſtodi terrarum, tenementorum, & feodorum militum, que fuerunt Henrici nuper ducis Lancaſtrie, defuncti, qui de nobis tenuit in capite. Aſſignavimus dilecte conſanguinee noſtre Matilde, alteri filiarum & heredum ejuſdem ducis, feoda & partes feodorum militum ſubſcript'; viz. duodecimam partem 1 feodi militis, cum pertinentiis, in Hinckley, quam tenentes de Hinckley tenuerunt; feod' unius militis, cum pertin', in Stoke, quod Robertus Champaine; medietat' 1 feodi militis, cum pertin', in Whenleſbergh, quam Thomas Whenleſbergh; feod' unius militis, cum pertin', in Whetherdley & Atterton, quod Thomas Wake; medietat' 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Hinckley, quam Nicħus Charnells; quartam partem 1 feod' militis in Higham, quam Thomas Aſtlegh; tertiam ꝑtem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Frolleſworth, quam Joħes de Daunv' & Alienora ux' ejus; quartam partem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Enderby, quam Philippus de Nevill; feod' unius militis, cum pertin', in Sapcote, Stoke, Upton, quod Rađus Baſſet; feodum 1 militis, cum pertin', in Thurleſton, Normanton, Croft, & Sutton, quod Rob̄tus Champaign; feod' 1 militis, cum pertin', in Normanton, Thurleſton, & Croft, quod Hugo Turvill; feod' 1 militis, cum pertin', in Broughton & Sutton, quod Thomas de Aſtlegh; feod' 1 militis, cum pertin', in Counteſthorpe & Blaby, quod comes Warr'; ſedecimam partem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Shulton, quam Joħes de Barwell; duodecimam partem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Wheſton, quam Henricus Danett; quartam partem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Whatton, quam Joħes de Seagrave; tertiam partem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Burſtall, quam Thomas de Rugelegh; feod' unius militis, cum pertin', in Sileby, Thurneby, quam Joħes de Seagrave; quartam partem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Belgrave, quam Laurentius de Belgrave; viceſimam partem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Hatherne, quam Thomas de Thorpe; feod' 1 militis, cum pertin', in Wymondeſwould, Burton, & Preſtwould, quod Thomas de Chaworth; decimam partem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Thorpe-Serley, quam Johanna, que fuit uxor Serlonis de Thorpe; feodum 1 militis, cum pertin', in Anlip, quam Hugo Turvill; feod' 1 militis, cum pertin', in Stywaldeſby & Saxby, quod idem Hugo; tertiam partem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Walton, quam idem Hugo; duas partes 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Whatton, quas Ankeitnus Huband; tria feoda militis, cum pertin', in Evington & Humberſton, que Ric̄us de Grey; medietatem 1 feodi militis, cum pertin', in Belgrave, quam Henricus de Ferrers; feodum 1 militis, cum pertin', in Wymondeſwould, Burton, Preſtwould, & Coates, quod Joħes de Seagrave; feodum 1 militis, cum pertin', in Garthorpe, quod Petrus de Monteforti; feod' 1 militis, cum pertin', in Lokynton, quod abbas de Leiceſtr'; feod' 1 militis, cum pertin', in Shanſton & Herdewick, quod Rob̄tus de Wyvele; feod' 1 militis, cum pertin', in Staunton & Thedingworth, quod idem Rob̄tus; medietatem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Wykingeſton, quam Rob̄tus de Champagne; decimam partem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Wylleſby & Enderby, quam Thomas de Rypariis; quartam partem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Langeton, quam Rob̄tus de Saddington; medietatem 1 feodi militis, cum pertin', in Walton & South Killingworth, quam Alicia de Woure; medietat' 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in eâdem villâ, quam Ric̄us de Lonerd; quartam partem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in eâdem villâ, quam Rob̄tus filius Simonis; medietat' 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Thorpe juxta Lilleburne, in dicto com' Leiceſtr', quam Rogerus Malury; medietatem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Buttenſwell, quam Conſtantina de Nevill; feod' 1 militis, cum pertin', in Mouſeleye & Humberſton, quod Anketinus Huband; feod' 1 militis, cum pertin', in Knaptoft, quod Thomas de Roſhale; feod' 1 militis, cum pertin', in Gloriſton, Crunalegh, & Stokefaſton, quod Rađus Baſſet; medietatem 1 feodi militis, cum pertin', in Smytheton Weſterby, quam Hugo Turvill; duo feod' militum, cum pertin', in Langeton, cum manſo, que Thomas de Aſtleigh; feodum 1 militis, cum pertin', in Magnâ Aſhby, quod Jacobus de Audeley; quartam partem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Raveneſton, quam Will̄s Botiller; ſextam partem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Cateby, quam Joħes de Seagrave; feodum 1 militis, cum pertin', in Pigheleton & Stapleton, quod Will̄s Moton; medietatem 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Kirkby, quod Rađus Malury; medietat' 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Bagworth, quam đnus de Holland; medietat' 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Thorneton, quam comes Warr'; medietat' 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Clenefield, quam Henricus de Ferrers; medietat' 1 feod' militis, cum pertin', in Bryntingthorpe, quam Henricus Danett tenet.

JOHN OF GAUNT, DUKE OF LANCASTER, fourth ſon of Edward the Third, born at Gaunt, in Flanders, between the 25th and 31ſt of March, 1340 [1], had thereupon his ſurname from that place; and, on the 20th of September, 1343, (being at that time but two years and a half old) was created earl of Richmond; having therewith a grant, in tail general, of all the caſtles, manors, and lands, belonging to that earldom; as alſo all prerogatives and royalties which John late duke of Britanny and Richmond did enjoy [2]; and in the next year he had a like grant of the manor of Daneby ſuper Wyſke, co. York.

In 1345, he had a charter for a market every week at his manor of Baſſingburne, co. Cambridge; and for a fair, every year, on the eve and day of the Apoſtles Peter and Paul, and ſix days following; alſo for a market at Badburham, in the ſame county, on the Monday, every week. The like at Cheſhunt, co. Hertford, and at Boughes, co. York, on the Tueſday; with two fairs yearly; one on the eve and day of St. Barnabas the Apoſtle, and two days following; the other on the eve and day of St. Giles the Abbot, and two days enſuing.

In 1353, he had a confirmation of the earldom of Richmond, with all the caſtles, manors, and lands, thereto belonging. In 1355, he attended the king his father in an expedition into Flanders; and, in 1357, had a grant, in ſpecial tail, of the caſtle and lordſhip of Lydell, co. Northumberland (wherein Blanch, the widow of Thomas lord Wake, had an eſtate for life, which ſhe then quitted), with remainder to the crown [3].

May 19, 1359, having obtained a ſpecial diſpenſation from Rome, he was married, at Reading in Berkſhire, the Sunday before Rogation Sunday (being the 14th of the kalends of June), to his couſin the lady Blanch, ſecond daughter and coheir to Henry Plantagenet, duke of Lancaſter, earl of Derby, Lincoln, and Leiceſter, ſteward of England, lord of Brigerac and Beaufort, by Iſabel his wife, daughter of Henry lord Beaumont, couſin german to queen Iſabel, wife to king Edward II.

In 1361, he obtained an eſpecial charter for divers privileges to himſelf and the heirs of his body by her the ſaid Blanch; viz. return of writs, pleas of Withernam [4], felons' goods, &c. in all the lordſhips and lands whereof he was then poſſeſſed; and, the ſame year, having iſſue by her, and doing his homage, had an aſſignation of her purparty in all the lands whereof her father died ſeiſed; viz. of the caſtle and manor of Pontefract, with the manors of Bradford, Almanbury, Altofts, Warnfeld, Rothewell, Ledes, Roundehay, Scoles, Berewyk, Kepax, Alderton, Knottingley, with the mill; Beghale, Kamſale, Ouſton, Elmeſale, Akworth, and Tanſhelf; likewiſe of the bailiwicks of Oſgodcros, Agbrigge, and Stayncros, with the bailiwick of the honour of Pontefract; the annual rent called Caſtel-ferme, and pleas and perquiſites of the court; and of the manors of Kritelyng and Barlay; of the caſtle of Pykering, with the ſoke; as alſo of the manors of Eſyngwold and Scalby; all in the county of York; at that time valued at one thouſand one hundred fourſcore and ſeven pounds, three ſhillings, and four pence; of the caſtle and manor of Dunſtanburgh, with the manors of Shoplaye, Stanford, Burton, and Emeldon; as alſo of the fiſhing of Twede, co. Northumberland, valued at two hundred and twenty pounds, fifteen ſhillings, eight pence farthing; of the wapentakes of Leyland, Amunderneſſe, and Londeſdale; with the manors of Oveſ-walton, Preſton, Shingelton, Wriggeby, and Wra; Overton, Skerton; the towns of Lancaſter and Slyne; the royal bailiwick of Blackbournſhire; the office of chief foreſter beyond Ribble,; and of the vaccary of Wyreſdale, co. Lancaſter, valued at four hundred and thirty-three pounds, four ſhillings, and one farthing; of the manors of Penwortham, Totyngton, and Rachedale; of the wapentake of Clyderhowe, with the demeſne lands there; of the lordſhip of Bouland, the vaccary of Bouland and Blackbournſhire; of the foreſt of Blackbournſhire, and park of Ightenhull, in Blackburnſhire, all in the ſaid county of Lancaſter, valued at five hundred and forty-nine pounds, one farthing, per annum; of the manor of Hinckley, with the bailiwick there, co. Leiceſter, valued at forty-ſeven pounds, eleven ſhillings, two pence; of the caſtle and manor of Kenilworth, the pool and mill there, with the manors of Watton, Shrewele, Radeſſe, and Aſthull, co. Warwick, valued at ſeventy-two pounds, four ſhillings, two pence, per annum; of the manors of Halton, Ronkore, More, Whitelawe, Congelton, Keteſhale, and Bedeſtan, with the bailiwick of Halton; the town and ſerjeantry of Wyndenes, co. Cheſter, valued at three hundred and twelve pounds, eleven ſhillings, five pence farthing, per annum; as alſo of the manors of Cridelyng, Barley, Kilbourne, Toreſholme, Marcheſdon, Swanyngton, Paſſenham; and certain lands in Daventre and Hinckley; the mills at Lilleburne, and manor of Uggele, co. Eſſex.

Moreover, by virtue of the king's licence, he obtained a grant from John biſhop of Lincoln, Richard earl of Arundel, and others, to himſelf, and her the ſaid Blanch, and the iſſue of their two bodies lawfully begotten, of the caſtle of Bolingbroke, with the park, knights-fees, and advowſons of churches thereto belonging (the town and ſoke of Bolingbroke, with the manors of Sutton, Thoreſby, Wathe, and Ingoldmels, co. Lincoln, excepted); likewiſe of the town, manor, and caſtle of Tutbury, with the towns of Screpton, Marchington, Chalangwode, Uttoxeter, Aggarſley, and Newburgh, co. Stafford; of the hundred of Higham-Ferrers, with the manors of Raundes and Ruſheden, co. Northumberland; and of the towns of Braſyngton, Matlok, and Hertyngdon, co. Derby.

And, in 1362, upon the death of Maud, the widow of William duke of Bavaria, without iſſue (which happened on Palm-Sunday in that year), had, in right of the ſaid Blanch (ſhe being her ſiſter and heir), the manor and honour of Leiceſter, with the manor of Desford, in that county; the manſion called the Savoy, co. Middleſex; the manors of Gymingham, Tunſtede, Methewold, Thetford, with the hundreds of Gallowe and Brothercros, co. Norfolk; the manors of Rothewell, Naveſby, Wiſhton, Glapthorne, with the leets of Denford, Cotherſtoke, and Barton, co. Northampton; the manor of Southo, with the ferme of the towns of Gomeceſtre and Huntingdon; the manors of Hungerford and Eſgarton, co. Berks; the manors of Colingborne, Everle, and Lavinton, co. Wilts; the manor of Kings-Somborne, co. Southampton; the manors of Langſtoke, Weſton juxta Odyham, and Hertele, co. Somerſet; the manor of Newcaſtle under Line, co. Stafford; with the manors of Penkhul, Clayton, Sheprug, Wolſtanton, and Shelton, members thereof; the manors of Minſterworth; and caſtle of Monmouth, with the Berton and Little Monmouth; the caſtles of Groſſemont and Oken, with the Berton; as alſo Blan-caſtle, in the Marches of Wales; the caſtle, town, and lordſhip, of Kidwelly; the lordſhip of Carnewathlan, with the caſtle of Kaer-kennyn, the commot of Iſkennyng; the caſtle of Ogemore, and manor of Ebbothe; alſo in the Marches of Wales; and the manor of Kingſton-Laci, the borough of Wimburne-Minſter, the chace of Winburne-Holt, the hundreds of Gadbury and Mayden-Newton, with the manor of Shapwicke, co. Dorſet [5].

Whereupon he was in parliament declared duke of Lancaſter, in right of his wife Blanch; and the king girt him with a ſword, and ſet on his head a cap of fur, and a circlet of gold with pearls therein; and created him duke of Lancaſter, with all the liberties and regalities of an earl palatine in the county of Cheſter; as alſo earl of Leiceſter, Lincoln, and Derby, with the office of high ſteward of England [6].

In 1364, a grant which had been made by king Henry III. to his ſon prince Edmond, of ſeveral exemptions and privileges, to himſelf and all his tenants; and which, on the death of that prince, had been given up by earl Henry to be cancelled, without having a legal authority ſo to do, to the prejudice of his heirs; was renewed, and amply confirmed, in favour of duke John and his heirs by Blanch his wife[1].

---

[1] Chron. Gloſterb. MS. in Muſeo Britannico.

[2] Cart. in officinâ ducatûs Lancaſtriæ.

[3] Appendix, p. 26.

[4] So Dugdale; which Jacob explains to be, "when a diſtreſs is levied out of the county, and the ſheriff upon a replevin cannot make deliverance to the party diſtreſſed." The original is de vetito navio; ſee Appendix, p. 27.

[5] Appendix, p. 27.

[6] Ibid.

In 1366, the duke of Lancaſter, after having been empowered to veſt ſeveral of his eſtates in feoffees, in order to make a ſettlement on his lady, and to diſcharge ſome pecuniary incumbrances[2], joined his brother prince Edward, at Bourdeaux, on the behalf of Don Pedro king of Caſtile; who, by reaſon of an inſurrection of his ſubjects, fled into Gaſcoigne for aid; and thence paſſed with him into Spain, under the mountains, between St. John de Pie du Port and the city of Pampylone, which was ſtrait and perilous; and, leading the vanguard of his army, made twelve knights; viz. ſir Raphe Camoys, ſir Thomas Damory, &c.; and upon the 3d of April, 1367, leading the van in that battle againſt Henry the baſtard-brother of Don Pedro (raiſed to the kingdom by the power of the pope), he ſaid to ſir William de Beauchamp, "Sir William, behold your enemies! This day you ſhall ſee me a good knight, or die in the quarrel."

In 1368, the league betwixt the French and king Edward being broken, he was ſent with a powerful army into France; and, at that time bearing the title of duke of Britanny, he pawned the caſtle of Becherell, in thoſe parts, to king Edward (his father) for a ſum of money.

In 1369, upon breach of the truce, he was ſent, with conſiderable forces, to give battle to the French; being retained to ſerve the king, for half a year, with 300 men at arms, 500 archers, 3 bannerets, 80 knights, and 216 eſquires[3]; but, by reaſon of great ſickneſs among his ſoldiers, durſt not adventure to attack them.

On his return, Nov. 19, from Calais to England, he found that his wife, the lady Blanch, had been taken off by the great peſtilence in September; and that ſhe had been honourably interred in St. Paul's cathedral.

In 1370, the duke of Lancaſter was engaged in an expedition into Gaſcoigne; and Peter the Cruel, king of Caſtile and Leon (whom Edward prince of Wales had inveſted in his kingdom), having left at his death, 1367, two daughters, who, to avoid the uſurper their uncle, had taken refuge in Gaſcoigne; the duke cauſed them to be brought, in 1372, to a village called Rochefort, not far from Bourdeaux, where he married Conſtance the eldeſt of the ſiſters; and at the ſame time Edward earl of Cambridge married Iſabel the youngeſt. Soon after this event, John of Gaunt aſſumed the title of king of Caſtile and Leon; and ſupported his claim by force of arms, but without ſucceſs. He impaled alſo the arms of Caſtile and Leon with his ducal coat; ſee Plate X. fig. 51.

On his return to this kingdom, in 1372, the duke was empowered to ſurrender to the king his father his earldom of Richmond, with all the caſtles, manors, lands, &c. to the ſame belonging; in lieu whereof, he had a grant, in general tail, bearing date the 25th of June, of the caſtle, manor, and honour of Tykhull; of the manor of High Peak (de Alto Pecco), in Derbyſhire, with the knights-fees thereto belonging; of the advowſons of the churches of Steyndrope and Brancepath, in the biſhoprick of Durham; of the free chapels of Tykhull and High Peak; of the church of Marsfield, and free chapel there; of the free chapel within the caſtle of Pevenſey; likewiſe of the advowſons of the priory of Wilmingdon, which was a cell to the abbey of St. Mary of Greſtene, in Normandy; of the priory of Withiham, being a cell to St. Martin's, at Marmonſtire; and of the houſe of St. Robert at Knareſburgh; alſo of the caſtle, manor, and honour of Knareſburgh; of the wapentake of Steyncliff, co. York; of the manors of Gryngleye and Wheteley, co. Nottingham; of the manors of Wighton, Alleſham, Fakenhamdam, and Sneteſham, with the hundreds of North Grenhowe, North Erpyngham, and Smetheton, in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk; of the manors of Clatton and Holme, co. Huntingdon; of the manor of Saham, co. Cambridge; of the caſtle and leucate of Pevenſe, with the manors of Wylindon and Marſfield, and bailiwick of Endelenewyk, co. Suſſex; of the free chaſe of High-Peak, and free chaſe of Aſhedon; and of the yearly ferme of two hundred marks, which the abbot and convent of St. Marie's at York ought to pay for the manor of Whitgift.

Shortly after this, the duke of Lancaſter took ſhipping at Southampton[4], and ſailed towards Rochell, for the relief of Thouars, with 3000 men at arms and 10000 archers; but, after being nine months at ſea, baffled by contrary winds, he returned.

In 1373, he was made the king's lieutenant in France, Aquitaine, and all other parts beyond ſea; and paſſed through France without oppoſition; but in the deſarts and mountains of Alverne many of his men periſhed through lack of victuals. Froiſſart ſays, that his greateſt loſſes were near Douchy and Rabymont.

About Chriſtmas, 1374, coming to Bourdeaux, he lay there, with the duke of Britanny, all that winter; but, on his return for England ſhortly after, the people of thoſe parts almoſt totally revolted.

In 1375, he was one of the embaſſadors ſent to treat of peace with the French: which treaty continued little leſs than two years; and ended with a truce, which hardly laſted one year.

In 1376, he obtained the town and honour of Hertford, with the towns of Bayford, Eſendon, and Hertingfordingbury[5]; and in the ſame year, the king, being grown aged, took this duke as an aſſiſtant in the government; and beſtowed upon him, in ſpecial tail, the town and caſtle of Brigerak, in the dioceſe of Perigort, to hold in as ample manner as Henry duke of Lancaſter did ever enjoy the ſame[6].

It was about this time that the duke brought prince Richard, then about eleven years old, to the parliament-houſe, and, placing him on the king's ſeat, taught him to demand a ſubſidy of two tenths in one year[7].

In 1377, he obtained the manor of Grenеſted, Seford, and Leighton, with ſeveral privileges in the ſame, and in the caſtle and honour of Tikhill, &c.[8] He had licence alſo to give his lordſhips of Gryngeleye and Wheteley to Catharine Swinford, his concubine (widow of ſir Hugh Swinford knight, and daughter to ſir Paen Roet knight, Guyen king of arms), for life; and procured the grant of a chancery in his dukedom of Lancaſter, with all other royalties pertaining to a county-palatine, to hold in as ample a manner as the earl of Cheſter ever enjoyed the ſame; under an obligation of ſending two knights to parliament, as repreſentatives of the commonalty of the county of Lancaſter, and two burgeſſes for every borough within the ſaid county[9]. He had licence alſo to coin money, for the ſpace of two years, from the 12th of June, in the city of Bayone, or the caſtle of Guyſſen, or any other place within the ſeneſchalcy of Landere, of gold, ſilver, or any other metal whatſoever. In this year, John Wickliffe (the moſt eminent of all the Lollards of that time) being convened before the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhop of London, this John duke of Lancaſter, and the lord Percy, at the Black-Friers in London; he ſpoke, in favour of Wickliffe, ſome reproachful words againſt the biſhop; which gave ſuch diſcontent to the citizens, that they roſe in an uproar, and reſolved to have murdered him, and to have ſet on fire his houſe, called the Savoy, in the Strand, had not the biſhop qualified them. Whereupon, to ſave himſelf, he was conſtrained to leave a dinner which he was taking at the houſe of John de Ypres, an eminent merchant in London, and get privily over the Thames to Kennington, where the prince then lay; ſo that, miſſing him in his houſe, all they then did was only the reverſing of his arms, as if he had been a traitor; but, king Edward's death ſoon after happening, king Richard the Second, his grandſon and ſucceſſor, with a prudence and moderation much above his age, reconciled the buſineſs with the citizens.

After the death of Edward the Third, conſultation being had about the ſolemnity of the coronation of king Richard the Second; John king of Caſtile and Leon, duke of Lancaſter, appeared before the king and council, and claimed, as earl of Leiceſter, the office of ſeneſchal of England; as duke of Lancaſter, the right of bearing the principal ſword, called the Curtana, on the day of the coronation; and, as earl of Lincoln, to cut and carve for the king, ſitting at table, on the day of his coronation. Diligent examination being made before certain of the king's council concerning theſe demands, it ſufficiently appearing that to the ſaid duke, as holding by the law of England, after the death of Blanch his wife, appertained what he claimed; it was agreed that he ſhould exerciſe the ſaid offices, by himſelf or proper deputies, and receive the fees thereto belonging[1]. Accordingly, on the Thurſday before the day of coronation (which was on the Thurſday following), by order of the king, he ſat judicially, and kept his court in the Whitehall of the king's palace at Weſtminſter, near the king's chapel, and there received the bills and petitions of all ſuch of the nobility and others as, by reaſon of their tenure or otherwiſe, claimed to do ſervice at the new king's coronation, and to receive the accuſtomed fees and allowances[2]. He was alſo, with Edmond earl of Cambridge and certain biſhops, appointed one of the protectors of the king during his minority.

---

[1] Appendix, pp. 27. 42.
[2] Ibid. p. 27.
[3] Ex autographo penès Cler. Pell.
[4] Froiſſart, 185. b.
[5] Appendix, p. 27.
[6] Ibid.
[7] Kennet, vol. I. p. 232.
[8] Ibid.
[9] Rymer, Fœd. tom. VII p. 138, 139.

In the ſame year he went to ſea, by reaſon of his retainer to ſerve, with 500 men at arms, 500 archers, 5 bannerets, 100 knights, and 134 eſquires; but, ſhortly after the ſolemnity of the coronation was over, diſcerning that the king was wholly ſwayed by the advice of young heads, and fearing that whatſoever happened might be imputed to him, he craved leave to retire; promiſing, if need were, to repair again to the court: yet he was not a little troubled, by reaſon that the king had taken the caſtle of Hereford from him, where he intended to have made his chief reſidence, having for that purpoſe begged ſtore of timber from the gentlemen of thoſe parts for the repairing and fortifying thereof; and thereupon went to his caſtle at Kenilworth. Nevertheleſs, though he kept at this diſtance from the court, he deſired that the money given in the preceding parliament ſhould be put into his hands; promiſing that it ſhould be employed for the defence of the realm. This being granted, he hired nine ſhips from Bayone; which, coming hitherwards, encountered the Spaniſh fleet, and took fourteen ſhips, laden with wine and other merchandiſe.

The blame of a murder, which was committed in Auguſt this year, during the duke's abſence, on a Mr. Hawl and his ſervant, in the Sanctuary at Weſtminſter, redounded on the duke, and contributed much to increaſe the hatred of him among the populace[3].

In 1379, he was conſtituted the king's lieutenant in the Marches of Scotland; and, being informed that, if he would go into Britanny with an army, divers forts and caſtles would yield to him, he raiſed a conſiderable ſtrength, and ſailed from Southampton to St. Malos; but, laying ſiege to it, prevailed not. Which ill ſucceſs (much treaſure being conſumed to no purpoſe) cauſed him no little diſeſteem and envy from the people.

In 1380, upon a trial by combat, which was to have been ſolemnly performed betwixt ſir John de Aneſley knight, and Thomas Katerington eſquire, by reaſon that Anneſley had accuſed Katerington for ſelling the caſtle of St. Saviour's (in Normandy) to the French, this duke, diſcerning that Katerington did endeavour to avoid the combat by frivolous exceptions, ſwore that, if he did not perform what he ought to do therein, according to the law of arms, he ſhould be drawn to the gallows as a traitor: which expreſſions gained him ſo much reſpect from the people, that it utterly wiped off the ſtain he had undergone for his former miſcarriages. Next year he obtained authority to eſtabliſh a treaſury, with barons and other proper officers, within his dutchy of Lancaſter[4].

In 1381 (Thomas Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, being then appointed ſole protector) our duke obtained a grant of the marriage of Mary, one of the daughters and heirs to Humphrey de Bohun, late earl of Hereford, Eſſex, and Huntingdon, valued at five thouſand marks, in part of ſatisfaction of a greater ſum due to him for his wages of war; to the end ſhe might be a wife to Henry de Bolingbroke, earl of Derby, his ſon. In the ſame year he was the principal of all the commiſſioners, then appointed to meet, with others from Scotland for rectifying and giving ſatisfaction for ſuch wrongs and abuſes as had been done by the ſubjects of either kingdom to each other, contrary to the article of truce agreed on betwixt king Edward and David de Brus king of Scotland; and, ſoon after that, was ſingly ſent embaſſador into Scotland, touching a league of peace and amity betwixt both realms; and, though he had conſiderable forces with him, and that the Scots had done much miſchief in Cumberland and Weſtmoreland by their frequent incurſions, through their deceitfulneſs, he returned with little honour. It is ſaid that, upon his coming back thence, ſir Matthew Redman, governor of Berwick, refuſed to give him entrance, though his proviſions lay there; which ſo incenſed him, that he afterwards expoſtulated it very hotly with the earl of Northumberland, whoſe ſubſtitute ſir Matthew then was in that command; but the earl excuſed himſelf, having given him that charge by virtue of the king's warrants, as he alleged; ſo that the king, to appeaſe the quarrel, was neceſſitated to take it upon himſelf, imputing the fault to the clerk who drew it up. During this his abſence in Scotland happened that dangerous inſurrection by the commons of Kent, headed by Jack Straw, who entered the city of London; and, amongſt other outrages, bearing great hatred toward this duke for his unſucceſsfulneſs in ſundry things, burnt his houſe called the Savoy, with much rich furniture and other things of great value therein, beſides his charters, evidences, and ſundry writings of note; which houſe was then accounted the faireſt ſtructure in England. It is ſaid by ſome, that this furious dealing towards him was becauſe he kept ſir Peter de la Mere (a knight of Herefordſhire) priſoner, who had been a diſcoverer of the evil practices of Alice Perers, a concubine to king Edward the Third. Having therefore ſudden advertiſement of this miſchief, he thought it beſt to make peace with the Scots for two years; and ſo did, before they had intelligence of what had befallen him.

Certain it is, that, upon this outrage thus committed at the Savoy, much apprehenſion there was, that thoſe rude people would have perſiſted in their fury towards him, and have deſtroyed his caſtle at Leiceſter, with all he had therein. Whereupon, the keeper of his wardrobe haſted thither from London, and loaded what he could ſuddenly remove into carts, which he brought to the abbey of Leiceſter, there to be ſecured; but the abbot, being terrified with fear that his reception of them might endanger the deſtruction of their monaſtery by the enraged multitude, durſt not ſuffer them to be unloaded there; ſo that they were conſtrained to carry them to St. Mary's church, near the caſtle. The lady Conſtance his wife alſo, being put into no little fright, made all the haſte ſhe could to Pontefract caſtle for refuge, expecting ſecurity there; but, when ſhe got thither, thoſe who were their own ſervants durſt not permit her to come in; ſo that ſhe was conſtrained to go ſeven miles by torch-light to Knareſburgh caſtle; where ſhe continued till that violent ſtorm ceaſed, and the duke returned. Moreover, upon his return, the earl of Northumberland dared not ſuffer him to come where he was, nor to enter into the caſtle of Bamburgh, where he had left his family during his abode in the Marches of Scotland, neither to permit him to make uſe of thoſe proviſions which he had cauſed to be made there; which occaſioned great diſcontent from him towards that earl. Diſcerning, therefore, in what diſtreſs he then was, and that many who made ſhow of good-will towards him were perfidious; as alſo that divers of his own party forſook him; and hearing that the king had been ſo wrought upon, that for very fear he offered to deliver him up to the people; he deſired that the Scots (who had made large offers to him) would give him ſafe conduct to come into their country, and with freedom to return, when he ſhould ſee fit; which they readily did: whereupon he went back thither; and, coming to Edinburgh, was honourably received by the earls of Douglas and Dunbar, who, ſtaying there, entertained him at their own charge. Theſe great afflictions cauſing him to reflect ſeriouſly upon himſelf, he thereupon made a vow that he would rid his houſe of Catharine Swinford, whom he had long kept as a concubine. The king, therefore, having advertiſement of theſe things, and much reſenting his hard condition, wrote a conſolatory letter to him; and commanded the earl of Northumberland with all his power to protect him from danger, as alſo to conduct him ſafely through thoſe parts where he had to do; but, when that earl repaired to him accordingly, he refuſed his guard. The like command from the king had all the ſheriffs of the North; whereupon he was ſafely conducted to York; and ſo to Nottingham and Leiceſter; ſometimes attended with no leſs than a thouſand lances, beſides archers and others; and at length came to the king at Reading, who received him with much joy and honour.

---

[1] Appendix, p. 28.

[2] Hiſtorical Diſſertation on the Office of Lord High Steward in England, 1776, 8vo. from a MS. in the Cotton library.—See his portrait, in this capacity, (from a drawing in that MS.) in Plate XIII; and in the ſame plate is alſo one of his private ſeals.

[3] Kennet, p. 240.

[4] Appendix, p. 28.

The duke, being highly diſcontented with the earl of Northumberland for an affront offered to him by ſir Matthew Redman at Barwick, wrote to the king, to know his pleaſure, how and in what manner he ſhould return, offering to come with one knight, one eſquire, and one groom; or, rather than any trouble ſhould happen to the realm, he would go into exile, and never return. But the king anſwered, he ſhould return with all his train; and, in caſe that was not ſufficient to guard him, he might have aid from town to town. Whereupon, coming to court, he made great complaint againſt the earl of Northumberland; but, after ſome time, the king reconciled them.

A little after Eaſter, 1384, John Latimer, an Iriſh Carmelite frier, charged the duke of Lancaſter with an intention of deſtroying the king, and uſurping the crown; but, being convened upon this accuſation, he did ſo juſtify his integrity, as that the king gave no credit to the information[1]. Hereupon he was conſtituted the king's lieutenant in the parts of Picardy, as alſo in France and Flanders; and about the month of Auguſt ſent into France, to treat of peace, or truce; which he concluded till the firſt of May enſuing; as alſo with the earl of Flanders; and ſo returned, having ſpent in that embaſſy fifty thouſand marks of ſilver. Before the end of that year alſo, he was ſent with Thomas of Woodſtock, earl of Buckingham, with a great power into Scotland, the Scots having perfidiouſly broken the truce; but quartered ſo long upon the borders, that he did the inhabitants more hurt than the Scots had done by their incurſions; and, when he entered Scotland, he did not vindicate the injuries which the Engliſh had ſuffered from them, as he might have done.

It is ſaid, that in 1385, the king, being young and guided by ill counſel, conſpired the death of this duke; but that he, having private intimation thereof from one of them that were of the plot, retired to his caſtle at Pontefract, and uſed the beſt means he could, by manning and victualling it, to ſtand upon his guard, if there ſhould be occaſion. Likewiſe, that the princeſs Joan (mother to the king), diſcerning the ill conſequence which might be of this breach, though ſhe was very corpulent, ſpared neither for pains nor charge in journeying to and fro, till ſhe had made a perfect reconciliation betwixt them. After this (before the end of that year), attending the king in his expedition at that time into Scotland; the Engliſh army coming to Edinburgh, and wanting victuals, a great ſickneſs happened therein; whereupon he adviſed him to paſs the Scottiſh ſea, and deſtroy the country with fire and ſword, to the end he might provoke the Scots to fight, or to a diſhonourable retreat. Which counſel ſo diſpleaſed the king, that he ſharply upbraided him with the loſs which had every where befallen his ill conduct; ſeeming to look upon this advice, as of deſign to betray his army to utter ruin; whereupon he returned without farther proſecuting the war.

